stephan, or coronal, of twelve stars” (ch. 12:1). Here were “the Fellowservants”—the “Holy Catholic” element of the Lamb’s espoused (2 Cor. 11:1–3)—clothed with imperial Roman splendor, and so entering into the elemental constitution of, not the Sun of Righteousness, but of the supreme imperial power of the new Roman Christendom—the sun of the Roman world. But the sunshine of the world’s heavens is no condition for the Spouse of Christ. The Bowman of the first seal had “conquered,” and won the starry stephan; but, this accomplished, it was no place for “the Brethren” to disport themselves “in purple and fine linen, faring sumptuously every day.” The time, therefore, having now come for the Spirit to spue the rich Laodicean fellowservants out of his mouth, and thereby to mark the broad line of separation that was henceforth to divide “the Brethren” from the Kingdom of the Clergy, and all its pride and circumstance of worldly pomp and glory, the Woman fled from the dazzling sunshine into the deep shadow of the Roman wilderness, where she was to be fed for, thousand two hundred and sixty symbolic days.

But the history of the Sixth Head of the Dragon illustrates the remarkable appropriateness of the sun and moon as the symbols of the imperality of the Roman State. The reader will please return with me to the reign of Elagabalus, A.D. 218, parallel with the period of the third seal, of some of the transactions of which Gibbon furnishes in substance the following account:

Elagabalus caused his portrait to be placed in the Senate House, over the altar of Victory. He was painted in his sacerdotal robes of silk and gold, after the loose and flowing fashion of the Medes and Phoenicians. His head was covered with a lofty tiara, his numerous collars and bracelets were adorned with gems of inestimable value. His eyebrows were tinged with black, and his cheeks painted with an artificial red and white. Such was the ornamentation of the High Priest of the Sun.

The Sun was worshipped at Emesa under the name of Elagabalus, and under the form of a black conical stone, which was believed to have fallen from heaven at Emesa. To this protecting deity the emperor ascribed his elevation to the throne. The display of superstitious gratitude was the only serious business of his reign. The triumph of the Sun over all the religions of the earth was the great object of his zeal and vanity; and the appellation of Elagabalus (for, as pontiff and favorite, he assumed the name of his god) was dearer to him than all the titles of imperial greatness.

In a solemn procession through the streets of Rome, the way was strewed with gold dust; the black stone set in precious gems (a notable antithesis to the White Stone engraved with a New Name which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it—Apoc. 2:17), was placed on a chariot drawn by six milk-white horses richly caparisoned. The imperial fanatic held the reins, and, supported by his ministers, moved slowly backwards, that he might perpetually enjoy the felicity of the divine presence of the Sun. In a magnificent temple raised on the Palatine Mount, the sacrifices of the Sun were celebrated with every circumstance of cost and solemnity. The richest wines, the most extraordinary victims, and the rarest aromatics, were profusely consumed on his altar. Around the altar a chorus of Syrian damsels performed their lascivious dances to the sound of barbarian music, whilst the gravest personages of the state and army, clothed in long Phoenician tunics officiated in the meanest functions, with affected zeal and secret indignation.

To this temple, as to the common centre of religious worship, Elagabalus removed the Ancilia, the Paladium, and all the insignia of the superstition of Numa. A crowd of inferior deities were set up in various stations to attend, as it were, upon the Majesty of the Sun; but his court was considered still imperfect, till a goddess of distinguished rank was admitted to his couch. Pallas had been first chosen for his consort, but as it was feared that her warlike terrors might affright the soft delicacy of an Eastern deity, THE MOON, adored by the Africans under the name of Astarte, the Queen of Heaven, was deemed a more suitable companion for the Sun. Her image, with the rich offerings of her temple as a marriage portion, was transported with solemn pomp from Carthage to Rome, and the day of these mystic nuptials was a general festival in the capital and throughout the empire.

Thus were the Sun and Moon inaugurated as the sovereign deities of the Roman world. After the death of Elagabalus, they still retained their high and sovereign position in the pagan heavens and the state. Gibbon informs us that Constantine had a particular veneration for Apollo, or the Sun, to which Julian, surnamed “the Apostate” by catholics, alludes in his orations. His words are as follow:—”The devotion of Constantine (while a pagan) was more peculiarly directed to the genius of the Sun, the Apollo of the Greek and Roman mythology, and he was pleased to be represented with the symbols of the god of light and poetry. The unerring shafts of that deity, the brightness of his eyes, his laurel wreath (stephan), immortal beauty, and elegant accomplishments, seem to point him out as the patron of a young hero. The altars of Apollo were crowned with the votive offerings of Constantine, and the credulous multitude were taught to believe that the emperor was permitted to behold with mortal eyes the visible majesty of that tutelar deity, and that, either waking or in a vision, he was blessed with the auspicious omens of a long and victorious reign. The sun was universally celebrated as the invincible guide and protector of Constantine, and the pagans might reasonably expect that the insulted god would pursue with unrelenting Vengeance the impiety of his ungrateful favorite” when he became a catholic. Thus, it was a worshipper of the Sun, himself a constituent of the sun of the political heaven, who with adulterous embrace united the Catholic Jezebel to the Roman State. She was clothed with the sun, and standing upon the moon, became symbolically identified with that orb as the future Queen Consort of the Imperial Majesty of the heavens of the Laodicean Apostasy.

But, in the apocalypse, the sun is also used to symbolize the enlightening majesty of the millennial heavens, which are to succeed and supersede the heavens of the apostasy, in which at present shine over all the nominally “christian world,” the spirituals of a mystery of iniquity. In ch. 1:16, the symbolic Son of Man’s countenance is “as the sun shining in his strength.” Again, in ch. 10 the same multitudinous personage appears as a mighty messenger descending from heaven, his “face being as it were the sun:” and in ch. 16:12, certain “kings” are mentioned, and styled “risings of a Sun,” in the phrase, he hodos ton basileon ton amo anatolon heliou. These kings that are “the risings,” are aggregately the Sun-power of the Millennial Heavens, “from whose face the earth and heaven” of the Apostasy “flee away” (ch. 20:11). They are the Millennial Sun-Power, because they are emanations from “the Sun of Righteousness,” whose beams have healed them in quickening them with incorruptibility and power (Mal. 4:2). Having become elements of this power, they go forth, and tread down the wicked of the earth and sea with their “feet as pillars of fire”—“feet like unto fine brass, as if they glowed in a furnace;” “for they shall be ashes under the soles of their feet, in the day that Yahweh Tz’vaoth (the Spirit who shall be Hosts) shall work.” This Millennial Sun, then, symbolizes all the saints when “glorified together” with Jesus (Rom. 8:17, 29, 32): and, when they “rest from their labors” of destroying Babylon who oppressed them; of giving the worshippers of the Beast to drink of the wine of divine wrath; of binding the Dragon, and shutting him up in the abyss; and of “enlightening the earth with their glory”—they will “then shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father;” or, as the same idea is expressed in Dan. 12:3, “they shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and as the stars for the Olahm and beyond” (Matt. 13:43).

The above (left) is known as The Burnt Column (Istanbul, formerly known as Constantinople). It was taken from the Temple of Apollo in Rome and set in the centre of Constantinople by Constantine. Formerly, on its top, there was the statue of Apollo, the sun god, revered by Constantine, the pagan-christian. Right. The laborum was the “Christian” military standard adopted by Constantine after he had claimed to have seen a vision of a cross shining in the heavens. It remained in use by the western Roman Emperors, and is still used as a symbol in the Roman Catholic Church.

The glorified and victorious saints, then, will be the Sun of the Millennial Kingdom. They will therefore have “no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it” (ch. 21:23): and “the nations of them being saved shall walk in the light of it.” These are the New Heavens and New Earth. How unlike those of the Apostasy by which they are preceded. These new heavens will “declare the glory of Ail; and their firmament, or aerial, His handiwork. Day unto day will utter speech; and night unto night shall show knowledge: and there will be no speech or language where their voice is not heard. THEIR rule will go out through all the earth, and THEIR words to the end of the world.” Paul has quoted these words in Rom. 10:18, as predictive of the apostolic proclamation of the kingdom. There was great significancy in such an application; for they who made the proclamation will constitute the heavens that rule—the personal Son of Man on the throne of his glory; and the apostles on the thrones of David’s house; with all the approved and glorified sharing in their administration, in the grand era of regeneration (Matt. 19:28; Apoc. 2:26; 3:21). “Among them he sets a habitation for the sun, who is as a Bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race. His going forth is from the end of the heaven, and his circuit to the ends of it: and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof” (Psa. 19:1–6). This bridegroom is the Sun, and his bride, the moon, and her distinguished companions, the stars of the brilliant firmament which will be displayed as the handiwork of the Spirit; when, co-operating with them, he looks forth as the morning, “fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners” (Cant. 6:10; Apoc. 14:13; Zech. 4:6).

4. Concluding Remarks

This sixth seal is a prophetic summary of what is more particularly related in the twelfth chapter, concerning the Woman, her man child, the Dragon, and the war in the heaven between the symbolical Michael and his angels on the one side; and the great red Dragon and his angels, on the other. I shall, therefore, follow the apocalyptic arrangement, and defer entering into details until I arrive at that chapter. A few things, however, may be presented here of a general character. The seal-prophecy predicts an exceedingly tempestuous period, which in an especial manner affects the ruling orders of the Roman Habitable. The first three verses represent this in the expressive imagery of symbolical prophecy. There is much grandeur in the symbolization. The earthquake, the darkness, the falling stars, the hurricane, the curling up departure of the firmament, and the removal of the mountains and islands from their places—all these phenomena in combined operation, show a political universe in a state of awful and terrific tumult. The last three verses of the prophecy interpret what had gone before, and demonstrate that this was the true condition of things in the period succeeding to the termination of the fifth seal, when the Lamb’s enemies found that it was more easy for them to decree the extinction of the christian name than to effect it. The situation was awful and terrific to “the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich, and the military chieftains, and the mighty ones, and every bondman, and every freeman;” for the peril of the time caused them to “conceal themselves in the caverns, and among the rocks of the mountains;” and to call on them to fall upon them, and hide them from the vengeance in execution. Here were all ranks and classes of society recognizing the crisis; as “the great day of the Lamb’s wrath” upon them. They had been warring against him upwards of two hundred and eighty years; and in all that long period had sought by every and any means in their power, to suppress and extirpate his name from the earth. But hitherto they had failed; and they now perceived that the death-struggle for ascendancy on earth had overtaken them.

The Sixth Seal was opened A.D. 311–12, and closed A.D. 324, a period of twelve years. It opened with the Roman empire subject to four emperors, Licinius, Maximin, Maxentius, and Constantine; and paganism the religion of the state: it closed with the battle of Chrysopolis, or Scutari, as it is now called, the result of which was the reunion of the empire under Constantine as the sole emperor; and the establishment of the Catholic Apostasy as the Lunar Bride of the Roman Sun. In the defeat of Hadrianople, which preceded that of Scutari, the historian says, that “the greater part of the fugitives retired the mountains.” This they did, of course, for the purpose of concealment from the conqueror who had won the wreath, as predicted in the seal. Though the mountains did not fall on them, they hid them until their panic having subsided they surrendered themselves to the discretion of the victor.

CHAPTER 7

THE LAODICEAN STATE

The Laodicean State is parallel with the Seventh Seal from its opening to the Fall of Babylon after the appearing of “THE ANCIENT OF DAYS.”

TRANSLATION

APOC. 7

1. And AFTER THESE THINGS, I saw four angels standing at the four corners of the earth, restraining the four winds of the earth, that a wind blow not against the earth, nor against the sea, nor against any tree.

2. And I saw another angel having ascended from sun’s rising having a seal of the living Deity: and he cried with a loud voice to the four angels, to whom it was given for them to injure the earth and the sea: 3. Saying, Injure ye not the earth, nor the sea, nor the trees, while that we may seal the servants of our Deity upon their foreheads.

4. And I heard the number of them who had been sealed—a hundred and forty-four thousands having been sealed out of every tribe of Israel’s sons.

5. From Judah’s tribe, twelve thousands having been sealed; from Reuben’s tribe, twelve thousands having been sealed; from Gad’s tribe, twelve thousands having been sealed; from Asher’s tribe, twelve thousands having been sealed; from Nephthalim’s tribe, twelve thousands having been sealed; from Manasseh's tribe, twelve thousands having been sealed; from Simeon's tribe, twelve thousands having been sealed; from Levi's tribe, twelve thousands being sealed; from Issachar's tribe, twelve thousands having been sealed; from Zebulon's tribe, twelve thousands having been sealed; from Joseph's tribe, twelve thousands having been sealed; from Benjamin's tribe, twelve thousands having been sealed.

9. AFTER THESE THINGS, I saw, and behold, a great multitude, (which, that it be numbered, no one was competent to do) out of every nation, and tribes, and peoples, and tongues, who had been standing before the throne, and before the Lamb, having been clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands; 10. And vociferating with a loud voice, saying, "The salvation be ascribed to him who sits upon the throne of our Deity, and to the Lamb!" 11. And all the angels stood in the circle of the throne and of the elders, and of the four living ones; and they fell before the throne upon their face, and did homage to the Deity; 12. Saying, "So let it be! The blessing, and the glory, and the wisdom, and the thanksgiving, and the honor, and the power, and the majesty, be to our Deity for the cycles of the cycles! So let it be!" 13. And one from among the elders was speaking, saying to me, "These who have been clothed with white robes, who are they, and whence came they? 14. And I answered him, "Sire, thou hast known." And he said to me, "These are they who came out of the great tribulation, and washed their robes, and made their robes white in the blood of the Lamb. 15. On account of this, they are before the throne of the Deity, and they shall minister to him day and night in his temple; and he that is sitting upon the throne shall pitch his tent over them. 16. They shall hunger no more, neither shall they thirst any more, neither shall the sun smite them, nor any heat. 17. Because the Lamb in the very midst of the throne shall tend them, and lead them to living fountains of waters, and the Deity shall wipe away every tear from their eyes."

1. Of Things Written on the inside of the Scroll

The arena upon which the predicted operation of sealing the servants of the Deity was to be performed was "the earth and sea." The reason given why the four angels were to restrain the four winds from blowing to the injury of these, is proof of this. The blowing of the winds upon the earth and sea, by injuring them with the tempests they were capable of exciting, would have rendered the work of sealing impossible. Greece, Italy, Britain, France, Spain, Africa, the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean, the countries of the Danube, the Rhine, and the heights and valleys of the Alps and Appenines—these constituting the western Roman empire, were "the earth and sea" upon which the apocalyptic tempests were forbidden to blow until the work of sealing should have been complete. At the four corners of the terrestrial of this arena, stood four angels, or restraining powers, having a certain mission to execute in favor of the inhabitants of the earth and sea. In the period of the sixth seal, the Devil had come down to them with great wrath, knowing that he had but a short time (ch. 12:12); but that time had passed with the termination of the seal period, A.D. 324; and now a period of tranquillity was granted them, for the sake of those who might be separated among them as the sealed ones of the Deity.

History shows us that the first "wind" began to blow upon "the earth" A.D. 396. Hence, the interval between A.D. 324 and A.D. 396, a period of three score years and twelve, must be regarded as the time allotted for the work of "sealing the servants of the Deity in their foreheads." There can be no doubt of the sealing period commencing after the sixth seal, and not contemporary with it, as some suppose, inasmuch as this seventh chapter begins with the words meta tauta, after these things; and the only things that can be intended, are those recited in the sixth seal which immediately precede the chapter. I suppose the notion of the sixth seal including the sealing arises from the position of the chapter between the prophecy of the sixth seal and the intimation of the opening of the seventh in ch. 8. But the truth is, that the sealing is the opening event of the Seventh Seal, concurrent with "the silence in the heaven." It does not terminate with the breaking of the silence, but continued long after. The seventy-two years of the sealing were the first seventy-two years of the seventh seal-period; and though the Laodicean Catholic Apostasy imperialized in the heaven, richly deserved all the judgments restrained by the four angels, its adherents were spared the infliction for the sake of the servants to be sealed. The first seal-period was peaceful and prosperous for the idolatrous empire under Nerva, Trajan, Hadrian, and the Antonines; not for the sake of the pagans, but for the sake of the work the Holy Archer had to perform in the period: so in this opening period of the Seventh Seal, judgment was restrained, not for the sake of the Laodiceans, but on account of the sealing angel's work.

2. The Sealing Angel

But, beside the four angel-powers standing at the four corners of the earth restraining the four winds thereof, John saw a fifth, or "another angel." Of this angel, he says, anabanta apo anatoles heliou, having ascended from sun's rising. He did not see him, as the English version would lead us to suppose, in the act of ascending from sun's rising; but having ascended at some previous epoch not indicated in this scene, he sees him at the expiration of the sixth seal, in possession of a certain seal, and about to make use of it in all the period the winds are restrained from blowing upon the arena of his operations. The word anabanta, rendered in the English Version ascending, as if it were the present participle, is really the second aorist participle; and signifies a past action, the effect of which, may or may not be in operation. Having once ascended, is the force of the tense or time of anabanta. When John saw him he was up. He was not down east, and about to set out on his ascent. John did not in this scene catch sight of him there, and then see him ascending westward; but he saw him in the west—"having ascended from sun's rising." His back was therefore towards the sun rising, and his face consequently westward. His ascending from east to west had been completed when John saw him in this scene. The phrase quoted shows this. The exact rendering of anabanta relieves us of a great difficulty. On the hypothesis of John seeing him start from the east, and beholding him travelling an ascending course until he had gained his highest altitude in the west, we must have sought for something in the history of the times immediately succeeding the expiry of the sixth seal answerable to the symbolization; but we should have sought in vain; for there is no testimony in history ecclesiastical or profane that gives anything analogous to it. There was nothing remarkable transpiring in the east connected with "a seal of the living Deity" in any part of the three score years and twelve succeeding the expiration of the sixth seal. The seal for sealing was inoperative there at that time, and has continued so even to this day. No symbolic angel was seen there commencing a sealing work, and ascending in that work until he had established himself and his labors in the west. We might seek for this, but we should not find it. Not so, however, our search for an ascended angel in the west. There we find one in activity who had already arrived from the east. We find him there, too, just at the right time—the time the Woman turned her back upon the emperors and courts and fled into the western wilderness, where she had henceforth two wings of the Great Eagle—a place which had been prepared of Deity, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and threescore days (ch. 12:6, 14). We find him effecting her transition from imperial sunshine, and developing her as the Mother of the Servants of the Deity being sealed in their foreheads; and thus, by the sealing, constituting them "the remnant of Her seed, who keep the commandments of the Deity, and have the testimony of the Anointed Jesus" (ch. 12:17). In other words, the persecuted woman and the remnant of her seed, are identical in time, place, and persons, with the sealed ones, or 144,000.

But this sealing angel was not a single individual. He was neither, according to the Rev. Mr. Elliott's notion, "The Angel of the Covenant, the Lord Jesus;" nor, according to the Rev. P. Allwood's "evidently Constantine the Great." He was a symbolical personage representative of a class of agents engaged in the work of sealing. This is manifest from the terms of the proclamation put into his mouth by Him who invented the hieroglyphic. In his address to the four angels, he commands them not to injure any thing, “while that WE may seal the servants of OUR Deity in their foreheads.” Here, the “we” and the “our” are indicative of a plurality associated in the sealing operation upon the foreheads of men. The agency divinely appointed for the carrying on of this work when the apostles and their inspired collaborators should have been withdrawn from the scene, was that enjoined by Paul in 2 Tim. 2:2, where he says to his son in the faith, “The things which thou hast heard of me with many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men who shall be able to teach others also.” Were there any faithful men competent to teach the faith once delivered to the saints, contemporary with the establishment of the “Holy Apostolic Catholic Church” as the religion of the Roman Dragon? Where were those “few names even in Sardis;” the “little strength” of the Philadelphian State? Were there none in the Laodicean state of Apostasy now fully developed, and firmly established, who had escaped the general lukewarmness; who heard the voice of Him standing at the door and knocking, and opened to him? To these inquiries we may confidently reply, that there was extant at this time a class of true believers, or Brethren of Christ, Christadelphians, who refused to identify themselves in fellowship with those “Fellowservants,” who now styled themselves the “Holy Apostolic Catholic Church;”—a class which included the “few names,” the “little strength,” and the “loved, convinced, and instructed,” who still lived to witness the Jews after the flesh, and the heathen humiliated, and compelled to do homage to “the Galileans.” Only twenty one years had elapsed since the beginning of the emblematic cry of the symbolic souls underneath the altar. In this sanguinary period, some of their number had been killed by the enemy; but he had not succeeded in exterminating them all. There were many survivors of the Christadelphian class, styled “the Brethren;” yet, compared with contemporary “Fellowservants,” they were what would now be called “a contemptible few.” But few and contemptible as they may have been in the judgment of “the Synagogue of the Satan who say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie,” they were the enlightened few, beloved, convinced and instructed by the Lamb. They were those of the fourth century who had responded to the counsel of the Spirit in Apoc. 3:18–20. They had bought of Him “gold tried in the fire,” that they might be “rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom” promised in verse 21: they had bought of Him also, “white raiment that they might be clothed, and that the shame of their nakedness appear not;” and they had “anointed their eyes with eye salve, that they might see.” The effort made in the Diocletian and Galerian persecution of the fifth seal period to destroy every copy of the Holy Scriptures that could be found, while it failed, served to endear these writings to the faithful, and to stir them up to a more diligent study of their contents. The Satan perceived, that “the truth as it is in Jesus” could not be extinguished so long as a single copy of the writings of the apostles and prophets remained in circulation. It has been the satanic policy, therefore, of all the ages and generations, either to suppress the scriptures, by destroying them, or forbidding people to read them; or to persuade readers of them, that their true meaning is too recondite and obscure to be “seen” by any, but a highly educated and learned few. This has been the policy of pagan, catholic, papist, and protesant; a policy, that has been circumvented by “the Brethren” by all means within their reach. They are devoted students of the scriptures themselves, and earnest in their endeavours to induce all within the sphere of their influence to study them also; and to enable them to understand them that they may believe and obey the truth; for they believe with full assurance of faith, the saying of Paul, that “Every scripture divinely inspired is also profitable for teaching, for conviction, for correction, for the instruction in righteousness; that the man of the Deity may be perfect, completely fitted for every good work” (2 Tim. 3:16).

There was, then, in this sealing period, a class of men “completely fitted” by scripture study, for the “good work” of sealing those of their contemporaries who were teachable. They were Paul’s “faithful men, able to teach others;” and who in this crisis of Laodiceanism, heard the voice of the Spirit, who had come into them, and supped with them, and they with Him (ch. 3:20). These repudiated the alliance of "Church and State" with indignation and disgust; and would have no fellowship with such an abomination. It could hardly be styled a fellowship of righteousness with unrighteousness; or a communion of light with darkness; or a concord of Christ with Belial; for the thing called "Church," that could ally itself with "the Powers that be," or accept their patronage and donatives, as do catholics, papists, protestants and dissenting sects, is already Belial, in utter darkness and unrighteousness. THE ECCLESIA of the Deity, in this sealing period, would have no fellowship with "the Church" of the Dragon; but protested against it as antichristian, and rejected all its institutions and traditions as mere will worship, after the commandments and doctrines of men (Col. 2:8, 18–23).

Now, in the apocalypse, THE ECCLESIA is symbolized by a persecuted woman; by the 144,000; by the temple of the Deity and the Holy City; and by the Lamb's wife made ready (ch. 12:6; 7:4; 11:1, 2; 19:7): while "the Church" so-called, is styled "the Synagogue of the Satan;" "the Court of the Gentiles without the temple;" "the Great City, spiritually called Sodom and Egypt;" "a woman clothed with the Sun, and the Moon under her feet and upon her head a crown of twelve stars;" "Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots and Abominations of the Earth," and "Names of Blasphemy" (ch. 2:9; 3:9; 11:2, 8; 12:1; 17:3, 5). Between these two institutions, there has been since their contemporary development irreconcilable "enmity," so long as the Brethren of the Ecclesia are faithful to the Word of the Deity, there can be nothing else; for they are "the Seed of the Woman," who "keep the commandments of the Deity, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ" (Gen. 3:15; Apoc. 12:17): while "the Church" is "the Seed of the Serpent;" and between these two seeds, the Deity has put an "enmity," which can only cease by the destruction of one or the other party, or by apostasy from the truth.

The enmity between these hostile institutions is amply illustrated in the apocalypse. Thus, the Church, or Court of the Gentiles, treads under foot the Ecclesia, or Holy City, forty and two symbolical months; and the Church again, becomes "drunken with the blood of the Saints, and with the blood of the witnesses of Jesus." But though the Church prevails against the Ecclesia for a symbolic "time, times, and a half," this period has an end; and in that end, the Church is humbled in the dust at the feet of the Ecclesia; as it is written: "I will make them of the Synagogue of the Satan who say they are Jews (or christadelphians) and are not, but do lie; behold, I will make them to come and worship before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee."

This state of things, however, in connection with the Body of Christ, did not obtain in the beginning. There were then no rival bodies, each claiming superiority over the other "There is," says Paul, "one Body;" and that body he styles "the Ecclesia;" of which the Head is Jesus; and the foundation, the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself the chief corner (Eph. 4:4; 1:22, 23; 2:20). In the beginning, the members of this body were brethren, the sons of the Deity; and consequently, the brethren of Jesus Christ. There were no sects, nor any Catholic or Protestant churches. But all the brethren were of one mind and disposition; or, in the words of Luke, "the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul;" an original unity to which the Brethren of the Ecclesia in all ages and generations, are earnestly exhorted, both by their Elder Brother and Lord, and his apostles. "Holy Father," said he, "keep through thine own name those (the apostles) whom thou hast given me, that they may be one as we are, sanctify them through thy truth: thy word is truth. I pray for them also who shall believe on me through their word; that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us ... that they may be made perfect in one" (John 17). And Paul says: "The Deity of patience and consolation grant you to be like-minded one toward another after Jesus Christ; that ye may with one mind and one mouth glorify the Deity" (Rom. 15:5, 6); and in 1 Cor. 1:10, he says; "I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment.” Like passages might be also quoted, but these are enough to show the mind of Christ.

But, though things were thus in the beginning, the Spirit expressly predicted the development of division and factions among the professors of the faith; and that they would be originated by “grievous wolves” speaking perverse things in the very eldership of the body; and for the purpose of drawing away disciples after them. These “evil men and seducers” were those whom Jude declares, “crept in among them unawares;” and set up to be Clergy, and lords over “the flock.” They were the founders of “the Church,” or Kingdom of the Clergy; and by all of their communion, are styled and revered as “THE FATHERS.” Hence, the Spirit through Jesus and the Apostles founded the Ecclesia; and “the Fathers,” the Church. But a divinely formal separation between the two classes did not ensue until the Clerical Apostasy was consummated in its alliance with the Dragon power. The Spirit had forewarned them by John, that He would “spue them out of his mouth.” This is a very remarkable and forcible expression. The word emeo, to spue, is used metaphorically by Eunapius in the fourth century, in the sense of to throw up a flood of bad words. Hence, in the metaphorical phrase above quoted, we are to understand the Spirit as threatening to “throw forth from his mouth words of evil against them.” “Because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I am about to spue thee, mello se emesai, out of my mouth.” The time had now arrived for this work—the vomiting forth a testimony against the Clerical Adulteress, in the sealing of the servants of the Deity in their foreheads.

As I have already remarked, there was a class of enlightened believers, who were able to discern the signs of their times, and who had in their understandings and affections, “the testimony of Jesus Christ.” Armed with this, they were prepared as the Spirit’s Mouth, to fight against the clerical Nikolaitanes and children of Jezebel with his sword. By the possession of the testimony, they were completely fitted for the good work of unmasking the Laodicean Apostasy; and, having full assurance in what they understood, they were stirred up by the testimony, as a few are in our time, to “contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints.” “Having the very spirit of the faith, as it has been written, ‘I believed, and therefore have I spoken;’ we also believe, and therefore speak.” They had been sanctified by the truth, and they boldly stepped into the arena of the west, to do battle for it against the Apostasy, as in former times they had combated against paganism to the death.

In the symbolization before us, this intelligent and enterprising class of believers are dramatized by the “Angel who had ascended from sun’s rising.” They had a seal of the living Deity, whom they claimed as “our Deity,” and thereby, in effect, repudiating the right of their adversaries to any relationship with him. Having been themselves sealed, as are all the faithful in all ages and generations, they went forth in all the region of the “two wings of the Great Eagle.” The third wing was not included in the scene of their labors. They had ascended from this, and, in the early years of the Seventh Seal, were engaged in organizing a community whose mission should be to witness for the truth against “the Church” that “worshipped demons, and images of gold, and silver, and brass, and stone, and wood”—images of saints—“which neither can see, nor hear, nor walk; and which repents not of its murders, nor of its sorceries, nor of its fornication, nor of its thefts” (Apoc. 9:20). The apostasy in the third division of the Great Roman Eagle was abandoned to its own corruption. In this it was allowed to perish. John did not see the Angel sealing in the East. Syria and Egypt were beyond the limits of his mission. Empire, for many ages, was destined to proceed westward; and this would be the empire of the Apostasy. It was deemed necessary, therefore, in view of the end, to antagonize it with a living organized testimony. We can now see that such a testimony in the Asiatic provinces of the Dragon would have been for ages past of no use, Mohammedanism having there tormented it and then suppressed it. Hence, it was in the west that John saw him sealing—an operation the effect of which is still felt by the populations of that section of the earth.

But, though John did not see these Angel-sealers in the East and ascending, their class had executed a like mission there, and had been ascending thence toward the Roman Metropolis and throne, during the previous period of nearly three hundred years. They commenced operations at “sun-rising,” both in a doctrinal and natural sense. Doctrinally, they began the sealing when the Sun of Righteousness had risen from beneath the horizon of life. They could not begin it before, because it was indispensable that He should rise, that justification of life might be proclaimed through his resurrection—“He was raised for our justification.” They proclaimed the rising of a Sun, anatole heliou, whose rays would shed life and vigor, with endless glory, upon all who should be warmed by them. From this Sun’s rising they took their departure. No one could be sealed who did not believe that the Deity had raised him from the night of the invisible, and had placed him in the heavens to rule the day. The death, burial, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus are essential and indispensable elements of the faith that seals the intellects of men. Believe every thing else, but reject these facts and their doctrinal signification and no such professor can be saved—he is unsealed with the seal from a sun’s rising. In a natural sense, these Angel-Sealers took their departure from the sun’s rising. They were commanded to “begin at Jerusalem,” and from thence to proceed to the ends of the earth. This commission they had executed they had preached the gospel to every creature under heaven (Col. 1:23)—and had therefore “ascended;” and now, in this scene, John, seeing them thus, also sees their class prepared for a new effort against a new enemy in the West—against the self-styled “Holy Apostolic Catholic Church,” the unholy and least apostolical community that can be conceived.

In dismissing this part of the symbolization, it may be remarked that the phrase apo anatoles heliou is rendered in the translation as literally as our language will admit. It is destitute of articles and I have inserted none. From sun’s rising is a formula that leaves the subject of discourse to determine whether it be the natural sun or the Sun of Righteousness whose rising is intended. Although it is true that the apostolic sealers began in the geographical east, I believe that the symbolization has more especial reference to the rising of the Sun of Righteousness as the doctrinal point of departure; in other words, that the Angel-Sealers, in their new western enterprise against the Laodicean Apostasy, labored to bring back the minds of their contemporaries to “the Revelation of the Mystery,” based on the rising of the Christ-Sun, as it was originally proclaimed by the apostles on the Day of Pentecost. They were, therefore, in every sense, Messengers from Sun’s rising.

But, in Apoc. 16:12, “the East” is again in the English Version made the substitute for a similar formula. There the phrase reads he hodos ton basileon ton apo anatolon heliou, literally, “the way of the kings which (are) from risings of sun.” There is doubtless a good reason for anatolon here being substituted for anatoles, as it is in ch. 7. The one is genitive plural, the other is genitive singular. In ch. 7 there is but one rising; but in ch. 16:12, we have a plurality—as many risings, in fact, as there are kings. In other words, every king is an individual rising emanating from the Sun. The formula is the symbolization of the oracle in Mal. 4:2—“Unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing in his wings; and ye shall go forth, and grow up as calves of the stall. And ye shall tread down the wicked; for they shall be ashes under the soles of your feet in the day that I shall do, saith Yahweh Tz’vaoth.” Here this Sun is a rising and a healing to every one that fears his name. Symbolically, he is a sun’s rising, and where there are many they are sun’s risings.

3. The Seal and the Foreheads Sealed

John says, the angel who had ascended had a seal. It was a remarkable seal, and pertained to “the living Deity,” as opposed to all other deities flourishing in those times which had no life in them. Of course, it was a symbolical seal he saw, and represented something capable of making an impression upon the sealed. Seals were anciently, as in modern times, engraved with devices, that when pressed upon a softened surface the device might be transferred thereto, as the mark of the owner of the seal. The Deity has a device which he has himself engraved upon his own seal, the counterpart or mark of which is transferred to the hearts of those who are impressible, and they become his sealed servants. It is written in Job 33:16, "The Deity openeth the ears of men and sealeth their instruction." From this we may learn that sealing has to do with teaching; and, consequently, as the seal of the Deity is applied to a surface capable of thinking, his seal is that which impresses his ideas, or "thoughts and ways," upon the brains of his creatures.

Now, all the true servants of the Deity are thus "sealed in their foreheads," which, hieroglyphically, are symbolical of their intellects and affections. The Chief of these servants, the Messiah or Christ, was himself to be sealed. This predetermination was revealed by the Spirit to Daniel the prophet, in ch. 9:24. In that place we are informed that, within the Seventy Weeks, prophetic time, "the Vision and PROPHET" should be sealed, lakhtom khazon wenavi; and, besides this, "the Holy of holies" should be "anointed", limshoakh kodesh kodashim. Within the period prescribed, Jesus was manifested, and put in his claim to be THE PROPHET; and, from the New Testament, we learn that he was both anointed and sealed. "The Deity," says Peter, "anointed Jesus of Nazareth with holy spirit and power"—pneumati hagio kai dunamei—(Acts 10:38); and, speaking of the Son of Man, Jesus says, "him hath the Father, the Deity, sealed." Now, as sealing has to do with instruction, we find Jesus was not only able to do works of power, in "healing all that were oppressed of the devil," but he could speak words of spirit and life which the sealed only can do. "The words I speak unto you," said he, "are spirit and life." And, again, he said: "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me." "I have not spoken of myself; but the Father who sent me, he gave me a commandment what I should say and what I should speak." "I am in the Father and the Father in me. The words that I speak unto you I speak not of myself." Hence, the discourses of Jesus must be received as the discourses of the Deity or Spirit in him. What he gave utterance to was "the word," or teaching of the Spirit—the things sealed or impressed upon his brain by the Deity. To be sealed is, therefore, to be taught of the Deity; and, in regard to those who in very deed come to Christ, it is written in the prophets, "they shall be all taught of the Deity." "Every man, therefore," saith Jesus, "that hath heard and hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me." The Father teaches men by what he causes them to hear, that they may learn it. "I have told you the truth which I have heard of the Deity." "I speak to the world those things I have heard of him." These things spake Jesus. He was sealed by what he heard; and the things spoken to him were the seal of the Deity by which he was impressed.

The impress of a seal on an object established the right of possession to the owner of the seal. The impress was usually made in clay and allowed to harden. The above seal was found during the excavations at Megiddo. The inscription reads: "Belonging to Shema, servant of Jeroboam."

The seal of the Deity, then, is divine teaching. This may be sealed or impressed upon the brains or "foreheads" of men directly or indirectly. Jesus was sealed directly. He heard in his sensorium what no one heard but himself. "How knoweth this man letters not having been taught?" said the Jews. "He knew what was in man," says John. This was inspiration. Select ones alone were sealed thus. "The Revelation of the Mystery" was sealed upon the foreheads of the apostles in the same way. "I have yet many things to say unto you," said Jesus to the apostles, "but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit, when he the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all the truth; for he will not speak from himself, but whatsoever he shall hear he shall speak, and will declare to you the things coming. He shall glorify me." And, on another occasion, he said to them, "When they deliver you up, take no thought how or what ye shall speak: for it shall be given to you in that very time what ye shall speak: for it is not ye who are speaking, but the Spirit of your Father which is speaking by you.” This was divine sealing direct, without the intervention of any human agency. The Father could have sealed or taught all men in this way. There can be no question of his ability so to do; but it did not so please him. It would have saved mankind a great deal of trouble, and might have saved them from much error. It would have been a system of infallible sealing or teaching, which would have left them nothing to think out; so that, for want of use, their brains might have become enervated and imbecile. Thus, extremes meet. Imbecility from knowing all the truth without mental effort, and imbecility from knowing nothing about it, as in the case of our contemporaries who have sold themselves to the clerical soul-merchants of the world (Apoc. 18:13). But except in the class of cases adduced, the Father requires men to use “their foreheads” upon what he causes to be presented to them for faith. He requires them to listen and to understand what the Spirit saith. He hath created them with ears for the purpose of hearing what he hath to say, that by the hearing they may learn the truth and believe it. “Faith comes by hearing the word of the Deity,” says Paul; and it matters not how the hearing gets into our “foreheads” so that the word heard effects a lodgment there.

In the case of Jesus and the Apostles, there were no writings from which they could learn the mystery hidden from the ages and the generations. The knowledge of this had to come by direct sealing. There was ample material for them to exercise “their foreheads” upon in the scriptures of the prophets, so as to sharpen them by reason of use. But they had to speak things about which all antiquity was silent, and this required direct sealing or teaching by the Deity himself.

When men are sealed they are sanctified; and it is written “Sanctify them by thy truth; thy word is truth;” and John says: “to pneuma estin he aletheia, the Spirit is the truth.” To be sealed, then, by the truth is to be sealed by the Spirit; and to be sealed by the Spirit is to be sealed by the truth; and he that is ignorant of the teaching of Jesus and the apostles, which was in strict harmony with the prophets, is not sealed at all, however pious or religious he may feel. The feelings are blind, and excitable by any and every kind of foolishness; so that pious and religious feeling may, and does, result from faith in the dogmas of Confucius, of Mohammed, and of all classes of so-called “divines” in all the realm of the catholic and protestant Laodicea. Hence, pious feeling is no evidence of a person being one of the sealed servants of the Deity. The New Man these sealed ones put on is “made new by exact knowledge—eis epignosin—after the likeness of him who created him;” for “they are the Deity’s workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works” (Col. 3:10; Eph. 2:10). Ignorance of the truth in its effects and consequences is the reverse of all this. Gentiles of mere pious and religious feeling “walk in the vanity of their mind, having the understanding darkened (their foreheads, in other words, unsealed), being alienated from the life of the Deity through the ignorance that is in them, because of the insensibility of their heart” (Eph. 4:17).

The symbolical seal of the Deity, then, John saw in the possession of the Angel-sealers who had ascended, was something to be exactly known; in other words, it represented the truth—“the word of the truth of the Gospel.” This is the seal of the Deity—“his power for salvation to every one who believes: for therein is his righteousness by faith revealed for faith; as it has been written, The just shall live by faith” (Rom. 1:16); so that, in writing to Jews and Gentiles in Corinth, who, having heard from him “the Word of the Kingdom,” “believed and were immersed” (Acts 18:8), Paul says to them, in 2 Cor. 1:21 “Now he who stablisheth us with you in Christ, and hath anointed us, is Deity; who hath ALSO sealed us, AND given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts.” Here the sealing is additional to “the anointing” and “the earnest.” The three thousand on the day of Pentecost were first “sealed in their foreheads,” and when, as an evidence thereof, they inquired what they should do, they were commanded to “change their minds, and be immersed upon the Name of Jesus Christ into the remission of sins,” and then promised the gift of the Holy Spirit, or “anointing” and “earnest.” Where “the gift” was received (for it was not given to every one who was immersed, but only to such of certain qualifications, who were selected for “prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers”—1 Tim. 3:1–7; Eph. 4:11), they were sometimes said to be “sealed with the holy Spirit of the promise,” as, “Ye trusted in Christ after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom, also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of the promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, for redemption of the purchased possession, to the praise of his glory.” Here the sealing with Spirit is preceded by sealing with the gospel teaching. The power of the truth taught caused them to believe and trust; and after these results were evinced which showed that they had been “sealed in their foreheads,” they were sealed with holy spirit, as promised, and could exercise gifts which none have had access to since the Apostasy was enthroned. They could use these sealed gifts or “spirits,” or abuse them; for “the spirits of the prophets” were “subject to the prophets.” They were, therefore, exhorted to “grieve not the Holy Spirit of the Deity by which they were sealed for a day of redemption” (1 Cor. 14:32; Eph. 1:13; 4:30). The exhortation, however, was not generally heeded. They abused “the Spirits” or spiritual gifts, and therefore the consequences threatened were manifested in the withdrawal of the Spirit, or, symbolically speaking, on “removing the lightstand out of its place,” by which they were left in the “outer darkness” of the kingdom of “the Spirituals of the wickedness in the heavenlies” of the world.

The reader will perceive from these premises, that the traditions of “the Church” (in which we include all “the Names and Denominations of Christendom” that practise baby-sprinkling; and all others which practise immersion of adults, without their being first “sealed in their foreheads” with the gospel Paul preached as “the seal of Deity”) are altogether contrary to scripture. “The Church” has substituted sacramentalism for Christ. This was especially the feature of the times concurrent with the ministry of the Angel-Sealers. The Rev. Mr. Elliott, himself a baby sprinkler and signer of the cross upon their unsealed and unsealable foreheads, speaking of these times, says: “But what of the neophytes’ personal looking in faith to Jesus, as the soul’s life and light, whereby alone to secure the spiritual blessing shadowed out in the sacramental rite (baptism)? Of this and of the doctrine inculcating it, we read little. On the other hand, it is scarce possible for a student of the church history of the times not to be struck, as he reads, with the exaggerated and unscriptural notions then widely prevalent of the virtue attached to the outward baptismal rite as if in itself sufficient to secure them: that is, when duly performed by the ministering presbyter; or, as in Levitical phrase, and with Levitical functions attaching, he was now generally called, the ministering hiereus, sacerdos, or priest? Throughout the whole of the preceding (third) century, and even earlier, a preparation had been making for these views by the accumulation of titles of honor on it (baptism). Besides its earlier title of the loutron paliggenesias (‘laver of regeneration’ Tit. 3:5) it was now denominated, as Bingham tells us, sphragis seal, karakter kuriou, the Lord’s mark, photismos, the illumination, phylakterion, phylactery or preservative, aphtharsias enduma the investiture of incorruption, soterion, the salvation. In the language of an eminent (catholic) bishop of that day (Cyril): “It was the ransom to captives the remission of offences, the death of sin, the regeneration of the soul, the garment of light, THE HOLY SEAL indissoluble, the chariot to heaven, the luxury of Paradise, the procuring of the kingdom, the gift of adoption’ ... A magical virtue, as it has been expressed, was too generally thought to attach to the rite; and that not only were all sins ipso facto washed away by it, but all evils, as by an amulet, averted. The ceremonies now superadded to the simple form prescribed and practised at its original institution, added to this impression. The custom is recorded how the candidate turned to the West, while priestly words of exorcism were uttered, by which it was supposed that he was now at length delivered from the dominion of the Prince of Darkness; then to the East, as to receive, together with the baptismal immersion (Elliott’s own phrase, and equivalent to immersional immersion) the illumination of the Spirit. And then he was enrolled in the churchregister, as being of the number of THE CHRISTIAN ISRAEL. A crown was borne by him, in token of his victory over sin and the world; a white dress put upon him, as on one washed from sin, and robed for immortality: and moreover, as Gregory Nazianzen tells us, he was led up before the altar in token of the beatific vision of the life to come; and received with psalmody, as in foretaste of the hymnings of the blessed.”

Such was the ritualistic initiation of crowds renouncing idolatry into the catholic church in the days of Constantine, who figured in all the sixth seal, and in the half hour silence of the seventh. They claimed to have been marked with the Lord’s Seal and Mark upon their foreheads. But it was Mother Church’s seal, “impressed on them,” says Elliott, “by the officiating presbyter, and perfected by the chrism of the confirming bishop; this last being deemed an essential point.” and he might have added, constituting “the mark” which “the Beast” afterwards required all to receive upon pain of death if refused (Apoc. 13:16). The presbyter only baptized by permission of the bishop. The bishop’s confirmation, of which anointing was the sign, was then administered soon after baptism, or immersion; but now years after sprinkling, but without the oil. This was the origin of the idea of baptism being a christening, or anointing.

Thus, the sealed foreheads of the Church, were foreheads wetted with water, and greased with oil, by presbyters and bishops. This sealing, however, did not get below the skin. It did not reach the intellect and affections; and therefore effected no spiritual good. The Laodiceans thought otherwise. “The neophyte emerged from the waters of baptism,” say they, “in a state of perfect innocence. The dove (Holy Spirit) was constantly hovering over the font, and sanctifying the waters to the mysterious ablution of the sins of the past life. The water itself became, in the vivid language of the church, the blood of Christ”—Milman, Hist. Christ. With such “Holy Water” what need of understanding and belief? The church administers to its devotees its “sacraments” without regard to their quality. Though the seal of the Living one teaches, that “without faith it is impossible to please Him,” the Church pays no regard to the principle; but sacramentalizes all sorts, the only disqualification being, to be “sealed in the forehead by the seal of the living Deity,” which all her officials denounce as heresy not to be tolerated or endured. Thus, sacramentalism substitutes mere water, oil, bread, wine, and priestly ministration, for the faith that comes by hearing, and understanding the gospel Paul preached. According to the Church, a babe, or an idiot, is regenerated by sprinkling its face with sanctified water. The spirit held in solution by the water mysteriously ablutes original and actual sin. Hence, faith is superfluous; and if babes and idiots may be regenerated by sanctified water, and saved from the flames of hell, why may not benevolent and well meaning people, go up to heaven at death, who, like the quaker pietists, make no use of water at all? Yes, why not? And because the Church sees no valid objection, it recognizes these pious deists as christians! Thus, the Church having lost sight of the faith; having transmuted baptism of believing adults into rhanism of unconscious babes; and substituted priestism for the word; she was repudiated by the Spirit as an unbaptized apostate, “wretched, and pitiable, and poor, and blind, and naked.” As, therefore, she was no longer competent to teach “the words of eternal life;” and that He might still have a light in the world—a “name” and a “tabernacle,” in which heavenly place his sealed ones might dwell (Apoc. 13:6); and that an enlightened agency might be organized for the developing from succeeding ages and generations those, “whose names had been written (gegrammenoi) in the book of life”—He stirred up faithful men to an active and energetic testimony against “the Church,” who unveiled its imbecility and folly; and showed their contemporaries of the fourth century a more excellent way. They went forth mighty in the word with their faces westward, convincing and converting catholics from the error of their superstition; teaching them “the things concerning the kingdom of the Deity, and the name of Jesus Christ;” and then immersing the taught “both men and women” (Acts 8:12). Thus, many Laodiceans bought gold tried in the fire, and white raiment, and anointed their eyes with eyesalve, and became rich, clothed, and seeing; they heard the voice of the spirit in having the word preached, and opened to them, and “he dwelt in their hearts by faith” (Eph. 3:17); and thus, with this potent seal, they were sealed in their foreheads as the servants of the Deity to the number, symbolically expressed, of “144,000 of all the tribes of the sons of Israel.”

Between “the Church,” then, and the Ecclesia, an antagonism was established by the sealing, direct, uncompromising, and irreconcilable, on all points of faith, practice, discipline and policy, which has continued to this day; and will continue till “the Church” is abolished by the Ecclesia; and the homage of emancipated and enlightened nations be willingly and joyfully given to Jesus and the sealed. Had it not been for the sealing of the 144,000, at the period under consideration, real christianity would have soon become extinct. But by this divine interposition, the Ecclesia was extricated from her great peril; and enabled to maintain a testimony for the truth for many ages after.

4. Tribes of Israel's Sons

John says, that the servants of the Deity were sealed from among, or out, of every tribe of Israel's sons—ek pases fules huion Israel. This, of course, is metaphorical—a simile comprised in a phrase not according to the primitive meaning of the words. The real signification of the phrase, is the mystery it conceals from the eye of the unsealed—from the perception of the churchman, or “natural man.” The Seven Stars, and Seven Golden Lightstands, of ch. 1:20, were not to be taken literally, as what are vulgarly styled stars and lamps. They had “a mystery” hidden in the words; “star” being used to signify in that place, angels, or Spirit-anointed elderships, of the Ecclesia; and “lightstands,” the Ecclesias themselves. So in the sentence before us, Israel, tribe, sons, are words used apocalyptically in a metaphorical sense. They each contain a mystery, which is the literal apocalyptic import, or true meaning of their use in this place.

In the prophetic and apostolic writings, “Israel” is used in more senses than one. The first time it was used is found in Gen. 32:28. The divine man with whom Jacob wrestled said to him, “Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but also Israel; for thou hast power as a prince with Elohim, and with men, and hast prevailed.” In Exod. 4:22, it is applied to the whole of Jacob's descendants who came out of Egypt under Moses. “Israel,” said Yahweh to Pharaoh, “is my son, my firstborn.” Here it stands for a nation of twelve tribes, which comprised also “a mixed multitude,” who were not the fleshly descendants of Jacob (Exod. 12:38). Tried by a law of faith, this nation was partly believers of the promises, and partly not. The believing section, which was always a small number, were the real “Israel;” all the rest of the fleshly descendants were “not Israel;” as it is written in Rom. 9:6: “They are not all Israel who are of Israel: neither because they are the seed of Abraham are they all children: but in Isaac, O Abraham, shall thy seed be called. That is, they who are the children of the flesh, these are not the children of the Deity; but the children of the promise are counted for the seed.” Moses, Phineas, Joshua, Caleb, David, the prophets, and those of their school, were “Israel;” Korah, Dathan, Abiram, Saul, Ahab, Manasseh, and their class, though descended from Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, after the flesh, were “not Israel.” The difference between these two classes of the same nation, was purely a matter of faith. The Mosaic Law condemned both classes to death; for “by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified;” “for by the law is the knowledge of sin.” “The law was weak through the flesh,” in Which “dwells no good thing;” therefore the law which was good in itself, became death to those who lived under it: for it is written, “Cursed be every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them.” No Israelite ever escaped this curse; for, although Jesus was “without sin,” the law cursed him, saying, “Cursed is every one that hangeth upon a tree.”

From these premises it will be seen, that Israel, not only signifies the man Jacob, and the Twelve Tribes his descendants according to the flesh, but men of the nation who are Israel in the highest and noblest sense of the word—the metaphorical. Hence, in regard to the question, who are the seed of Abraham; who are the sons of Israel; who the sons of the Deity? Christ Jesus interposes, and says, “the flesh profits nothing.” Israelites will not inherit the blessing promised to Israel, because they descend from Jacob, they must be men of faith, “Israelites indeed in whom there is no guile”—Israelites, the sons of the Deity, who believe into his name; “who have been begotten, not of bloods, nor of the will of flesh, nor of the will of man, but of the Deity” (John 1:12, 13). Therefore it is that, because “the flesh profits nothing.” Israel after the flesh, are not now the people and sons of Deity. They are broken off because of unbelief in the gospel Paul preached. But, they will not always continue a faithless and stiffnecked generation; for “they shall be willing in the day of the power of David’s son and Lord” (Psa. 110): and then, “in the place where it was said to them, ‘Ye are not my people,’ there it shall be said unto them, ye are the sons of Ail the living one” (Hos. 1:10).

But, before they were broken off because of unbelief in “the truth as it in Jesus,” efforts were made by John the Immerser, Jesus Christ, and the Apostles; in other words, by the Spirit of the Deity through them; to manifest a generation of “Israelites indeed,” of the sons of Abraham and Israel, and therefore, of sons of the Deity, by faith, repentance, and immersion:—by faith in the promises covenanted to Abraham, and David, and in Jesus as their promised seed, delivered for the offences, and raised for the justification of all who believe the promises: by repentance, characterized by a thinking and disposition such as Abraham evinced: and by immersion, into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, for the remission of sins. Many “of Israel” became “Israel” after this method. They were begotten of the will of the Father of Lights by the word of truth, which they received with meekness as the engrafted word which was able to save their souls (Jas. 1:18, 21). But, after all done, compared to the whole nation this was but an election, and that only a remnant. It did not afford Israelites indeed in sufficient number for the kingdom of the Deity. They of Israel “who were bidden were not worthy.” Those servants, therefore, who had the seal in those days, were sent into the highways to gather people together of all sorts that the wedding of the King’s Son might be furnished with guests; and his house be filled.

This was quite a new crisis in Israelitish affairs. It consisted of nothing less than, as it were, raising up children to Abraham from stones—creating Israelites out of Gentiles upon the same principle that “Israelites indeed” were created out of mere natural Jews styled by Paul “Jews outwardly.” Peter, to whom the opening of the kingdom to the Gentiles was committed, went to the house of Cornelius upon this mission. He invited them to become Israelites in every respect except the accident of fleshly descent, which “profited nothing” in the begetting of sons to Deity. When he recounted what he had done to the brethren, he told them that “Deity put no difference between us and them, purifying their hearts by faith.” And afterwards, when writing to these newly created Israelites, he says: “Ye as lively stones are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to the Deity through Jesus Christ.” Again, he says: “Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a HOLY NATION, a purchased people; that ye should show forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light (‘the Gospel of the Kingdom’); who in time past were not a people, but are now the people of the Deity; who had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy” (1 Pet. 2:5–10). Paul also in treating of the same subject, says, that “he is not the Jew who is one outwardly; but he is the Jew who is one inwardly” (Rom. 2:28). That is, he is not the Jew who is the seed of Abraham in the sense of being heir of the promise, who is only a Jew by accident: to be the seed of Abraham, a man must be a Jew inwardly; he must be sealed in the forehead with the truth which is Deity’s seal: in other words, addressing both natural Jews and natural Gentiles, Paul says: “Ye are all sons of Deity in Christ Jesus through the faith,” and here follows the reason: “For as many as have been immersed into Christ, have put on Christ.” In whom “there is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male or female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus. And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise" (Gal. 3:26). "They who are of faith, the same," saith he, "are the children of Abraham."

And again likewise, addressing the Gentile element of the Ecclesia in Ephesus, Paul calls upon them to remember that in time past they were uncircumcised Gentiles in the flesh, and consequently, "without Christ, being aliens from the Commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of the promise, having no hope, and atheists (atheoi) in the world." But now, all this was reversed when they came to be sealed, and to be constituents of the New Man—"THE ISRAEL OF THE DEITY" (Gal. 6:16): "the One Body." They were now "no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens of the saints, and familiars of the Deity" (ch. 2:11–19). They had become the adopted citizens of Israel's Commonwealth or polity. They were Jews inwardly, "walking in the steps of that faith of their father Abraham which he had before he was circumcised." They differed from common Jews in not being of the same fleshly descent, which was a matter of no profit; and they differed from them also in being men of faith like Abraham. But the only difference between them and those noblest of all Jews, the prophets and their class, was the accident of birth. Ezekiel, Daniel, Cornelius, Crispus, Gaius, Erastus, and such like, though Jews and Greeks, were yet all "Israelites indeed" through faith—the Jews inwardly, living under the law before the faith came by Jesus, being justified "by faith" in the promises (ek pisteos); and the Jews inwardly, living after the faith came, being justified by one and the same Deity, "through the faith" dia tes pisteos, in the promises, or "the truth as it is in Jesus" (Gal. 3:23–25; Rom. 3:30; 4:12–16). Now, the citizenship of the Old Israelites commenced on earth; while the politeuma, or citizenship of the New Israelites begins in heavens, en ouranois huparchei. The citizenship of mere common, or outward Jews, begins with circumcision—with the flesh. If they omit this, the accident of birth from Jewish parents goes for nothing, they are regarded by the law as cut off from their people, having broken the covenant of Yahweh in the omission of the rite on the eighth day (Gen. 17:14). They are neither "Israel" nor "of Israel."

But the citizenship of the New Israelites, or Israelites of the New Covenant, begins in heavens, and also with circumcision—it begins with faith, with the truth believed and obeyed, with the Spirit. A Jew, or Greek, comes to "believe the things concerning the kingdom of the Deity, and of the name of Jesus Anointed;" and to fall in love with them above all other things; he acquires a "faith," in other words, that "purifies his heart," and "works by love"—he receives the doctrine of the kingdom of the Deity as a little child—with all humility and teachableness; and demands only to know what the Lord would have him to do, that he may do it. He is required, then to be circumcised in Christ, to "purify his soul in the obedience of the truth"—to "put off the body of the sins of the flesh in the circumcision of Christ." The churchman, or mere pious natural man, discerns not these "deep things of the Deity;" but such a Jew or Gentile as we are considering, being "filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding," knows that, by being buried with Christ in the one immersion, he puts on Christ; and that when thus invested with him as with a white robe, all his sins are covered over, remitted, or washed away; and that he stands "complete in him." Jesus was circumcised the eighth day, according to the law; he was a Jew; the son of Abraham, David, and the Deity; the Heir of all things; he was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners; he is king, priest, and so forth. Now, it is only those Jews and Gentiles, the eyes of whose understandings have been enlightened by the word of the truth of the gospel of the kingdom, who can by immersion get into Christ; for men are saved "through the faith," dia tes pisteos; and "without faith," which Paul defines as, "the confidence of things hoped for, the conviction of things not seen,"—"it is impossible to please the Deity." This, then, is the indispensable prerequisite for introduction into Christ, and completeness in him. Those who are thus qualified in the act of passing through the bath of water, pass into Christ. Before entering the bath, the truth believed has changed their minds, made them “dead to sin,” and “quickened them with Christ” (Rom. 6:2, 11; Eph. 2:5): when they are in the bath, and buried under the water, they are “buried with Christ by the immersion into his death,” which was for sin. Hence, this water burial is their investiture with Christ as with a white robe. The burial is, therefore, a clothing, or covering over by which their sin-nakedness is metaphorically concealed; and they are in that situation in which it may be said of them, in the words of the Spirit, “Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered over”—epekaluphthesan (Rom. 4:7). This is the point of time in which they are “circumcised with the circumcision made without hands;” and, as in the circumcision performed with hands, there was a cutting, or putting, off, of flesh, so in the circumcision made without hands, there is a metaphorical putting off of flesh, “in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh in the circumcision (en te peritome) of the Christ, being buried with him in the immersion” (Col. 2:11, 12).

Being therefore thus introduced into Christ’s circumcision by faith and burial, they are the subjects of “circumcision of heart in spirit, not in letter”—“the foreskins of their hearts are circumcised, and they are no more stiffnecked” (Deut. 10:16) like many that could be named. “We are the circumcision,” says Paul, “being servants to Deity by spirit (or by the sealing truth) and rejoicing in Christ Jesus, and having no confidence in flesh.” By this admirably devised scheme, Jews and Gentiles get into Christ, though at the right hand of Deity and they upon earth; and “their citizenship begins in heavens.” He, being the truth, dwells in their hearts by faith; and having got into him constitutionally by water burial, they continue to dwell in him; so that having come forth from the water-grave, the life which they live in the flesh, they live by the faith of the Son of the Deity, who loved them, and gave himself for them (Gal. 2:20).

Being thus circumcised in their water burial by the truth believed they become Jews in the noblest sense of the word. They went into the bath dead to Judaism and Gentilism, and were born of the water in coming out of it, Israelites indeed, sons of Abraham, David and the Deity; brethren of Israel’s King; heirs with him of all things; holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners; citizens of the commonwealth of Israel; kings and priests for the Deity—they become all this and more, because Christ is such, and they are “complete in him.”

Hence, circumcision of heart, in the sense explained, is as indispensably necessary to the Israelitish citizenship which begins where Christ now is, as circumcision of flesh was to Israelitish citizenship beginning the eighth day after birth. The two circumcisions developed two Israels—the carnal and the spiritual. While occupying Palestine, the Carnal Israel were the kingdom of the Deity under the Mosaic Constitution; and the throne upon which David and Solomon reigned in Jerusalem was “the throne of Yahweh.” Deity permitted them to continue in the land so long as the constitution was respected; and there were enough “Israelites indeed” among them, to preserve the nation from putrefaction. These were the real, spiritual, life of the nation—the salt of the land; and when they became insipid; or, when they, as the chosen generation, died off from the arena, the nation became “a carcase,” fit only for the talons of the Roman Eagle, according to the predictions of Moses, Daniel and Christ (Deut. 28:49; Dan. 8:10–12, 24; Matt. 24:28).

But, when the Israelitish Carcase was rent and devoured by “the Great Eagle,” “THE ISRAEL OF THE DEITY,” consisting of Jews and Greeks in other lands, or sections of the habitable, who were Jews in Christ, was still an organized and flourishing community, styled also by Paul, “the Ecclesia, his Body,” of which Jesus Christ is the Head; and the “One Body.” This new community figures in symbolic writing, as “The Seven Ecclesias which are in Asia;” these seven being representative of all Israelites, “circumcised with the circumcision made without hands,” in all the habitable. This Israel was rooted in Jacob’s twelve sons, as the patriarchs of the tribes. “First that which is natural,” says Paul, “and then that which is spiritual.” This is the order of the Deity’s developments in relation to body, world, and nation.

Hence, the spiritual body is developed out of the natural; the spiritual world out of the natural; and the spiritual Israelitish nation out of the natural, we Gentiles coming in by adoption through the King of Israel, who himself was first natural before he became spirit. The principle is fundamental, and perceived in the generation of all things—first, the naked grain, or body; then that which shall be fruit-bearing in the field.

Jacob was the wall of Israel, and his sons his twelve gates, in the beginnings of things. Jesus and the Apostles emerged from Jacob through these gates; being descended from Jacob in their line. But said the Spirit in Jesus, “before Abraham was I am.” He was “the Root” of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and David; and when He came to be manifested in Jesus, in this combination of flesh and spirit, he was “the Offspring” of those patriarchs. While, therefore Jacob was a wall enclosing the whole future nation in his loins, “the Root and Offspring of David,” and therefore of Jacob (Apoc. 5:5; 22:16), is the Jasper Wall, great and high, “in whom” is contained all “the Israel of the Deity.” At the natural gates of the twelve tribes, the apostles stood as so many Angels or messengers (ch. 21:12). They went forth inviting Jews and Gentiles to “enter in through the gates into the city,” enclosed within the Jasper Wall (22:14) to enter into Christ through adoption into the commonwealth of Israel; that in so entering, they might, as precious stones, garnish the twelve foundations which represent the twelve apostles of the Lamb.

“The Israelitish carcase was rent and devoured by ‘the Great Eagle’ ”—Eureka p. 317. Many national enemies of Israel used the symbol of the eagle, including Egypt, Rome and Germany! Shortly before 100 B.C., Marius ordered a likeness of the eagle to be affixed to the standard of each legion. It was the custom of standard bearers to throw the ensign at the advancing enemy, and the warrior who retrieved it was rewarded. The onyx relief above dates from about the time Rome took the Jewish people into captivity. By then the eagle had come to symbolise the power and majesty of imperial Rome.

The apocalyptic Jasper Wall, which constitutes the limit of the Holy City, is Deity manifested in flesh; who, in Zech. 2:5, saith “I will be unto Jerusalem a WALL OF FIRE round about her, and will be the glory in the midst of her.” The Chief Corner, or Prince, of this foursquare wall is Jesus. The Deity, before his manifestation in him, said unto him in prophecy, “Thou art my servant, O Israel, in whom I will be glorified ... It is a light thing that thou shouldest be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the desolations of Israel; I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my (Yeshua or JESUS) salvation to the ends of the earth” (Isa. 49:3, 6). Thus, the Deity manifested in Flesh is herein styled Israel; and in calling him, “my salvation,” He is also styled Jesus. Now, the spirit in Hosea 11:1, says of him, what is equally true of the whole nation in Moses, “When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt,” which saying, as a part of its mystery, Matthew says was fulfilled in the child Jesus (ch. 2:15).

Christ, then, being Israel, all who “wash their robes, and make them white in the blood of the Lamb,” become Israel also—the metaphorical Israel developed out of the outward, whose polity flourished two hundred and fifty years after the destruction of Jerusalem. This spiritual commonwealth, I have said, is symbolized during this period by the Seven Ecclesias, which were encamped in the territory of the Great Eagle, an imperium in imperio; and symbolized again, in the periods of the first four seals, by the Four Living Ones full of eyes. These all were the spiritual “tribes of Israel’s sons”—the Sons of Deity, and brethren of Jesus, constitutionally manifested as such by immersion, as the outward sign. Speaking of this honor, John saith: “Behold what great love the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called CHILDREN OF DEITY!... Beloved, we are now children of Deity, but it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is" (1 John 3:2). Then will be "the apocalypse of the sons of the Deity;" and the world that knows them not now, because it knows him not, will be brought into such practical acquaintance with them, that its knowledge of them will never again fade from its remembrance (Rom. 8:19).

But, after the apostles were withdrawn from the arena, it happened to the "Tribes of Israel's sons," as to the fleshly Israel after the decease of the elders who overlived Joshua, that they began to fall away from the institutions of the Deity. Immersionists, or as they would now be styled, "Baptists," began to teach "perverse things" to draw away disciples after them; and in so doing, to corrupt the way of the Lord, and to conceal it at length, under a cloud-capped mountain of "philosophy and vain deceit." As we have seen elsewhere, these evil men and seducers in Israel were denominated "Nikolaitanes," "that Woman Jezebel," "the Satan;" nevertheless, they pertinaciously claimed to be Jews. The Spirit, however, repudiated their claim, and denounced them for liars and blasphemers of the Synagogue of the Satan (Apoc. 2:9; 3:9). But as Paul predicted, they "waxed worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived," until they had succeeded in substituting SACRAMENTALISM for "the simplicity that is in Christ" (2 Cor. 11:3). They preached "another Jesus," "another Spirit," and "another gospel" than Paul preached, as the basis of their immersion; and therefore were "accursed" Israelites, and degraded to a level with mere formalists, who had "a form of godliness, but deny the power thereof: from such, saith the apostle, "turn away" (2 Tim. 3:5; Gal. 1:8, 9).

Here then, were two classes of Israelites in apostasy—the one class composed of men circumcised in flesh; the other, of men having the form, immersion, which introduces to the circumcision of Christ. These had the form or profession of christianity without the power; the others had the form of Mosaicism, but without faith in the promises made to Abraham. The apocalyptic "tribes of Israel's sons" had substituted abstract spirit for belief of the truth—abstract spirit was the power, or virtue, that accomplished everything for them. It entered the water they used, and made it holy, and purifying, to every faithless ignoramus they put into it; it entered the hypocritical and spiritually dead carcasses of the "seducers" they ordained to "holy orders," and made them sanctifying administrators of ordinances; it entered the bread and the wine, and made them spiritual meat and drink: in short, this abstract quiddity mesmerized everything, as in all "the names and denominations" of our day, being the very essence of sacramentalism, as opposed to the "form of godliness" and its true "power." The Tribes of Israel's sons had degenerated into mere ritualists, who, in practising religious ceremonies, regarded them as both the form and power of christian godliness. The Jews of our time practising the mummeries of the synagogue; or papists genuflecting with their priests before images; or snoozing protestants dosing under the vaporous emissions of pulpit drones and imbeciles—are legitimate and life-like representatives of "Israel's sons," established by Constantine the First as "the lords spiritual" of the Great Eagle of the earth.

The following extracts from ecclesiastical writers on the times of Constantine, will afford the reader some idea of the condition of things in the apocalyptic "tribes of Israel's sons," called "the Catholic Church."

"In the new order of things," says Jones, "which took place under the Emperor Constantine and his clergy, one of their first objects was to remodel the form and order of the christian church, the administration of which was, as far as possible, arranged conformably to the government of the state. The emperor himself (unimmersed as he was) assumed the episcopal functions, and claimed the power of regulating its external affairs—in other words, he was constituted HEAD OF THE CHURCH"—the new-born Man of Sin. "He and his successors convened councils, in which they presided, and determined all matters of discipline. The bishops corresponded to those magistrates, whose jurisdiction was confined to single cities; the metropolitans to the proconsuls, or presidents of provinces; the primates, to the emperor's vicars, each of whom governed one of the imperial provinces. Canons and prebendaries took their rise from the societies of ecclesiastics, which Eusebius, Bishop of Vetceil, and after him Augustine, formed in their houses, and in which these prelates were styled their fathers and masters." Scarcely any two things can be more dissimilar than this new order of things, and the order instituted by the Apostles nearly 300 years before. Mosheim speaking of the episcopal presbyters, or overseeing elders, of the apostolic ecclesias and those of the second century, says: "Let none confound the bishops of this primitive and golden period of the ecclesia with those of whom we read in the following ages. For though they were both designated by the same name, yet they differed extremely in many respects. A bishop during the first and second centuries was a person who had the care of one christian assembly, which at that time was, generally speaking, small enough to be contained in a private house. In this assembly he acted not so much with the authority of a master, as with the zeal and diligence of a faithful servant. The ecclesias, also in those early times, were entirely independent; none of them subject to any foreign jurisdiction, but each of them governed by its own rulers and its own laws. Nothing is more evident than the perfect equality that reigned among the primitive ecclesias; nor does there ever appear in the first century, the smallest trace of that association of provincial ecclesias from which councils and metropolitans derive their origin." "Nothing," adds Jones, "could be more abhorrent to the first churches than to acknowledge any earthly potentate," and he not even a christian, "as their head." "Be not ye called Rabbi," said Jesus to the apostles, "for one is your guide, even Christ, and all ye are brethren. Neither be ye called guides; for one is your guide who is Christ. But he that is greatest among you shall be your minister; and whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted." These divine maxims, which are constituent principles of the christian ecclesia, were lost sight of by the ecclesiastics who undertook to remodel the churches under the auspices of the Emperor Constantine, whom they, as a matter of courtesy, condescended to make their earthly head"—the Head of every "Tribe of Israel's sons."

In proportion as these Sons of Israel enjoyed any intervals of exemption from persecution, they became more litigious in their tempers, and more worldly minded. But now that the restraint was entirely removed by Constantine, the churches endowed, and riches and honors profusely heaped upon the clergy; when he authorized them to sit as judges upon the consciences and faith of others, he confirmed them in the spirit of this world—the spirit of pride, avarice, domination, and ambition. The glaring delinquency that marked the conduct of the leading ecclesiastics, in professing a religion of humility and self-denial, and at the same time pursuing the pleasures and aspiring after the honors of this world, seems to have struck the very heathen themselves. Hence, a pagan historian who lived shortly after the days of Constantine, named Ammianus Marcellinus, remarked concerning some of the leading bishops: "It would be well if, despising the magnificence of the city, they would copy the example of some of the bishops of provincial towns, whose temperance, plainness of dress, and heavenly-mindedness, must recommend them to the Deity as his sincere worshippers." These to whom he refers were probably some of the sealed ones with whom he happened to be acquainted.

These testimonies may serve to show us how "the Mystery of Iniquity" was then busily working in "every tribe of Israel's Sons," developing the already gendered Man of Sin Power, as well as the powerful hand the clergy, so-called, had in it. Restored to the full possession of their liberty, the places of worship rebuilt and secured to them, and the imperial edicts everywhere published in their favor, these new bishops soon gave the emperor convincing proof what manner of spirit they were of! As their several revenues became augmented, they grew more and more ambitious, less disposed to endure contradiction, more arrogant and haughty in their behavior, more litigious, and more reckless of the simplicity and gravity of their character and profession. Constantine's letters afford ample proof of the jealousies and animosities which reigned among them. Adverting to a quarrel that had arisen between Miltiades, Bishop of Rome, and Coecilianus, Bishop of Carthage, in which the principals had enlisted a host of their colleagues as auxiliaries, he tells them that it was a very grievous thing to him to see such a number of persons divided into parties, and even bishops disagreeing among themselves. He earnestly wished to compose their differences; but, in defiance of all his efforts, they persisted in their quarrels, which drew from him a feeling complaint, that those who ought to have been the foremost in maintaining a brotherly affection and peaceable disposition towards each other, were the first to separate from one another in a scandalous and detestable manner, giving occasion to the common enemies of Christianity to scoff at and deride them. To put an end to such disgraceful proceedings, Constantine summoned a council to meet at Aries, in France, in order, if possible, to bring to a friendly and Christian compromise this long pending altercation, at which the emperor condescended to be present, and there exerted all his influence to restore peace and harmony between them; but it proved to be with little effect. He had to do with the men Paul predicted, in 2 Timothy 3:1–13, would appear in “the Israel of the Deity,” making the times perilous to his sealed servants. “Men,” said he, “shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, implacable, devils, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those who are good, betrayers, heady, highminded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of the Deity; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof.” Constantine had sown fresh seeds of strife and contention among these mere ritualistic and sacramentarian Israelites, by his liberal endowment of their churches, and by the riches and honors he had conferred upon the bishops; and he was now reaping the fruit of his own folly.

From this and much more that might be adduced from history, it is evident that the Wild Olive Branch, which had by “the engrafting word” been grafted into the good Israelitish Olive Tree, was in a perishing condition. In Romans 11, Paul, speaking to the Gentile element of Israel, exhorts them not to boast against the branches of the good olive tree, broken off because of unbelief in the word of the kingdom; and adds, “Thou standest by faith; be not highminded, but fear: for if the Deity spared not the natural branches” of the good tree, “take heed lest he also spare not thee.” The goodness of Deity had been manifested to the pagan Gentiles in inviting them to fellow-citizenship with those Israelites who had already become Christians—in offering them repentance and remission of sins, and a right to incorruptibility and life in the kingdom of Christ and of the Deity, on the same terms. It was, nevertheless, possible to place themselves in a position such as the Jews were in at the time of the breaking off by the Roman power. They had become faithless, and were broken off in consequence. If the New Israelites by adoption through Jesus, became faithless of the Word, the same fate awaited them; for they only stood in the favor of Deity by faith. Therefore, Paul adds, “if thou continue not in his goodness, THOU ALSO SHALT BE CUT OFF.” The “goodness” he refers to is, the exhibition of the goodness of the Deity set forth in the gospel of the kingdom, the belief of which “leads to repentance.” We have seen that they did not continue in his goodness, but had turned their backs upon it, and bartered off faith in that goodness for irrational sacramentalism, and the wealth and honor of the state. The gospel, which is the “Deity’s power for salvation,” had no power over them. They had failed to continue “to stand” in it, and to hold fast to it, or keep it in mind. That “certain word” Paul preached was forgotten, and buried under those piles of rubbish, taught as orthodox theology by their descendants, in the schools, colleges and pulpits of our modern Laodicea. They could no more “handle the word” as skilled workmen, than the benighted spirituals of our “glorious and enlightened 19th century!” A “strong delusion had come over them, a vail had overspread them, the spirit of the world had “made them drunk,” and, instead of the truth, “they believed a lie” (2 Thess. 2:11; Isa. 25:7; Apoc. 17:2, 6; 18:3). What was to be done with such unprofitable, blasphemous, faithless, and disgusting Israelites as these?—these ancestors of modern Christendom? What but to pronounce upon them the sentence that awaits all such—“Lo-ruhamah and Loammī”; “thou art not my people, and shalt obtain no mercy.” This sentence is embodied in the words, “thou shalt be broken off.” They had come into the situation they were warned against—a state of unbelief—and, as the Deity always fulfils his threats, as well as his promises of good, the time had almost arrived to do execution upon the guilty.

But, there were many centuries and generations to come and pass away before “the Mystery of the Deity should be finished, as he had declared the glad tidings to his servants the prophets” (Apoc. 10:7); and he did not intend in breaking off the unbelieving tribes of Israel’s sons, to leave himself without witnesses and a testimony against Loammi the Apostate. For this reason, the symbolic sealing angel proclaimed an arrest of judgment, that time might be afforded for taking out from the apostate tribes a “REMNANT,” which would be more and longer faithful to the commandments of the Deity, and the testimony of Jesus Christ (Apoc. 12:17). To afford scope for this, he said to the four angel-powers, standing ready for the work of judgment at the four corners of the earth, holding back the four winds, “Injure ye not the earth, neither the sea, nor the trees, while we may seal the servants of our Deity in their foreheads.” This sealing work accomplished, and there would be no cause for longer restraint upon the howling, and sweeping, and uprooting tempests, which were to signalize the breaking off of the decayed and sapless branch apocalyptically styled the tribes of Israel’s sons. The judicial visitations of the first six seals were against the worshippers of the gods; while the more terrible judgments of the trumpets and vials, and thunders, were and are the indignation and wrath of the Lamb upon the apostate symbolical “tribes of Israel’s sons,” repudiated by the Spirit as “men of corrupt minds, reprobate, or of no judgment, concerning the faith,” and therefore no longer the people of the Lord.

5. The 144,000 Sealed.

John says: “I heard the number of them who had been sealed;” and then informs us that the number amounted to 144,000. As we are expounding a revelation hieroglyphically communicated, we must not suppose that this is the literal number of the sealed. Like all other numbers in the apocalypse, it is symbolical or representative; and subject to the like rule for its interpretation. They do not represent less numbers than themselves, but more. This remark, however, does not include the thousand years, which is the numerical symbol representative of “the Day of Christ,” comprised between the binding of the Dragon, and his release for a little season.

The 144,000 represent the whole number of the redeemed. This appears from ch. 14:3, where they are styled hoi egorasmenoi, “the redeemed” (or those acquired by the Lamb by a ransom or price paid, his blood) “from the earth.” The real, or exact, number of the “redeemed with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish, and without spot” (1 Pet. 1:18, 19), we are told in Apoc. 7:9, is “a great multitude which no man could number.” Abraham was invited to number the stars, if he were able, which, of course, he was not able to do; upon which he was told, “So shall thy seed be” (Gen. 15:5). Paul tells us, we are Abraham’s seed, if we be Christ’s; otherwise, we are not; and in Rom. 4:18, informs us, that the promise embraces whole nations of mankind, which, in the day of Christ, when he dwells in the midst of Zion, will “be joined to Yahweh and be his people” (Zech. 2:11; Apoc. 15:4). The number of the redeemed, saved, or sealed, it is impossible for any but the Deity to define. He has chosen to be reticent upon this point—to conceal it by saying nothing about it, further than to let us know that no man can count them. It is clear, then, that 144,000 is only a definite number representative of a much larger multitude, which the Deity himself alone can define to a man; for “known unto him are all his works from the beginning of the world” or aion (Acts 15:18) and every redeemed man is one of his works, as saith Paul, “we are his workmanship” (Eph. 2:10). In this counting up the number of the saved, he will, therefore, remember exactly how many he has created after the likeness of his Son Jesus. We must, then, be content to know simply the number by which he has thought proper to represent the unknown, and the mystery that number secretes, from all who have not the wisdom to “see” and understand.

Thus, then, the 144,000 being a miniature representation of an unknown predetermined original, it cannot be interpreted by what is called the literal; a rule which, when applied to the Apocalypse, reduces it to an unintelligible absurdity, which commends itself only to the mind of a “churchman,” or of one hopelessly spoiled by “philosophy and vain deceit.”

But what is the mystery of the Deity secreted in this number? Why should the number representing the redeemed be 144,000? Why might not 121,000, or any other number, have sufficed? I reply, because 12 and not 11, is the square root of “that great city, the Holy Jerusalem,” which is the Bride of Christ (ch. 21:2, 9, 10). The holy root of the Good Olive Tree is 12; which, when multiplied into itself, produces 144, thousands, furlongs, or cubits, as the number or mensuration may be in the premises. If, in the Holy Root, there had been only 11 sons of Israel, “the Urim and the Thummim” would have consisted of no more than eleven precious stones; the foursquare breastplate of judgment would have been defective in one of its rows, a twelfth stone would have been wanting; there would have been only eleven oxen under the laver, and eleven tribes of Israel; only eleven lions on the steps of Solomon’s throne; there would not have been a double 144, “instructed in the songs of Yahweh” (1 Chron. 25:7); nor a double 144,000, under twelve captains, or princes (1 Chron. 27:15): there would have been only eleven thrones of the House of David, which would have required only eleven apostles to occupy them in the regeneration (Matt. 19:28). Had 11 been the square root, and not 12, there would have been only twenty-two elders, and 121,000 sealed, 11,000 from each of 11 tribes; there would have been only eleven gates to the Holy Jerusalem, and at the gates only eleven angels standing; there would have been only eleven foundations to the city on which only eleven names of apostles would have been inscribed. The city would have been only 11,000 furlongs, and the encircling wall but 121 cubits; and lastly, the Wood of Life would produce only eleven fruits. From this, the reader may see how the difference of a unit in the root of the Holy Square would have affected the divine numerical system from Genesis to the end of the Apocalypse.

Any number multiplied into itself will produce a square. In 144,000 we have a square number given, from which the square root is extractable according to rule. The extraction is the finding of the number, which, multiplied into itself, will make the given number. Thus, $12 \times 12 = 144$ —thousands, furlongs, or cubits, as the case may be. It is the square of twelve, and, as the symbol of a commonwealth, polity, or city, applicable only to a community all of whose citizens are based upon a square root of 12. In the Apocalypse, this root is doubled in ch. 4:4, there being “twenty-four elders;” and in ch. 21:12, there being twelve gates and twelve angels at the gates. The reason of this is, that the Holy Square, styled Jerusalem “holy” and “new,” and “above the Mother of us all,” both Jews and Gentiles in Christ, consists of two classes; the one, based upon the prophets; and circumcision of flesh, which made them citizens of the polity founded on the twelve sons of Israel—their faith in promises made and covenanted to the fathers, giving them citizenship in the Holy Square; one 12, therefore, is their symbol: the other class, without regard to flesh, are adopted into the Foursquare Polity, and partake of the square root 12 with those under the law; and are also based upon another 12, the apostles of the Lamb, with whom the believers before Christ came as yet had no acquaintance. Hence, to represent these two classes united in one and the same square, the square root is doubled in the elders, and the gates and their angels; and in Chronicles both the root and its square, where the numbers are 24 and 288, the last being a double 144. The 24 has been transferred to the apocalypse, where the 288 has been halved, 12 being the square root of neither 24 nor 288.

6. The Apocalyptic Urim and Thummim

The apocalyptic 144,000, 144 furlongs, and 144 cubits, are the Breastplate of Judgment; that is, the thing signified in that splendid decoration worn on the breast of Aaron in the holy place, is fulfilled in those who are the units of the Holy Square.

To understand this, the reader must first comprehend the Aaronic symbol itself. The first place mention is made of it is in Exod. 28:15. It was not a plate of metal, but a texture wrought of gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen. It was foursquare and of equal sides. It was filled in with settings of precious stones; four rows of them, and three in a row, and each stone set in gold. Upon these twelve stones were engraved, as upon a seal, the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, thereby showing that these tribes were represented by them; so that symbolically speaking, the whole nation of Israel was contained in the square ornament, and borne upon the breast or heart of the High Priest in the holy place. This ornament, styled khoshen mishpat, and in our version, “the breastplate of judgment,” was attached to the aiphod, a robe called ephod, or the overall, because it was put on over all other vestments. Having prepared the foursquare texture, Moses was commanded to put into it the Urim and the Thummim; that is, the twelve precious stones: not that the stones abstractly were the Urim and the Thummim, but were indispensable to its manifestation. The Urim were the glistering of the stones—the lights refracted and reflected from their cut and polished surfaces, and developing lights of divers colors. These were styled, urim, lights; and the twelve stones themselves, thummim, fulnesses, that is, of number and measure—fulness of number, and fulness of measure; or 144,000 and 144 cubits and furlongs; because these are the perfections, or square of 12.

The next remarkable place where the Urim and Thummim are named is in Deut. 33:8. There Moses speaks of them prophetically. He addresses the tribe of Levi, whose chief pontiff wore the ornament, or as it is allusively termed by Paul, “the breastplate of righteousness,” and saith, “Thy Thummim and thy Urim be of the Man thy Holy One, whom thou didst prove at Massah, and with whom thou didst strive at the waters of Meribah.” In Exod. 17, the particulars of this strife are recorded. The question in debate was “Is Yahweh among us, or not?” This was affirmatively proved by his saying to Moses, “I will stand before thee there upon the rock in Horeb; and thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come water out of it, that the people may drink:” and by his doing what he said. Now, in all this there was a mystery hidden, which they did not see into, nor Moses, nor the Elohim themselves; but which we may discern: for, in “the revelation of the mystery” taught by Paul, referring to this strife in 1 Cor. 10:4, he says: “They did all drink the same spiritual drink; for they drank of that Spiritual Rock that followed them; and that Rock was Christ.” The Holy man, ish khasid, with whom they strove, stood upon the rock, and thus, in a figure, made the rock a part of himself; and representative of something afterwards to be smitten by certain, who, like Moses, should speak unadvisedly with their lips. In that way, it became a “spiritual rock.” Paul says, “the Rock was Christ;” that is, it was representative of him. The Holy Man upon the rock was the Elohist representative of the Deity dwelling in light whom no man hath, or can see (1 Tim. 6:16). He spoke the words of the Invisible One, by whose power, placed at his disposal, water was made to flow. Hence, Eternal and Almighty Power pervaded the rock in Horeb so long as the water gushed forth and followed them in their wanderings. The Holy Man himself was an embodiment of this power; and as the same power was afterwards to be manifested in the nature of Abraham, and thus become his Seed, the Rock became highly typical of Christ. Hence, the Power, of which the Holy Man on the rock was an expression, was Yahweh, or “He who shall be,” first in Christ Personal, or Jesus; and afterwards, in Christ Mystical, or the Square of Twelve.

In Moses’ prophecy of Levi, he says: “They have observed thy word, and will keep thy covenant.” The second generation of Levi in the wilderness had observed the divine word, but the covenant referred to they have not yet kept. Levi after the flesh has been in apostasy for ages, and will continue to be so until “Yahweh, the Messenger of the Covenant,” shall come. When the time appointed arrives, he will suddenly come in, and proceed to the work of purifying the sons of Levi, that they may offer unto Yahweh an offering in righteousness (Mal. 3:1–4). From this future time, “they will keep the covenant,” even the New Covenant, of which Jesus, not Moses, is the Mediator. Then, when Yahweh-Christ, the Branch of Righteousness, shall sit upon the throne of his father David, and execute judgment and righteousness in the land of Israel, “the priests the Levites shall not want a man before me,” saith the Spirit by Jeremiah, “to offer burnt-offerings, and to kindle meat offerings, and to do sacrifice continually” (ch. 33:15–18).

When Levi, then, is in this purified condition contemporary with the reign of the Lamb and the 144,000, Levi’s Urim and Thummim will be, as Moses testifies, “of the Holy Man,” who will then be their High Priest after the order of Melchisedec. He will not need to wear on his breast such Urim and Thummim as Aaron wore. The Lights and Fulnesses will be of himself, He being Deity Incarnately Manifested; for “it pleased the Father that in him all fulness dwell” (Col. 1:19).

Ezra and Nehemiah, doubtless, understood that a priest was to stand up, in and from whom the reality signified by the Aaronic Urim and Thummim should proceed. This appears from Ezra 2:63; Neh. 7:65. In these places we learn that certain priests sought their genealogy in the register, but it could not be found; “therefore were they, as polluted, put from the priesthood; and the Tirshatha said to them, that they should not eat of the most holy things until there stood the Priest kakkohain, for Urim and Thummim.” Although they were thus excluded from the priesthood, yet, if they were Israelites of faith, when the Priest who shall himself be Urim and Thummim shall stand in the temple Ezekiel describes, they, having risen from the dead, will be permitted to eat of the most holy things in the Paradise or kingdom of the Deity.

It has been remarked that, where the precious stones are mentioned, there is no mention of Urim and Thummim, as in Exodus 39:10; and that, where the Urim and Thummim are mentioned, there is no mention made of the stones, as in Lev. 8:8, which seems to show they are one and the same thing. The reader, however, will have perceived that they are not exactly the same—that the difference between the Urim and the stones is the difference between various colored lights and the stones reflecting them; and yet, without the glistering gems there would be no light; so that the lights imply the stones, and the stones the lights, and the presence of the one argues that of the other. As to the Thummim, the difference between them and the stones is not a matter of lights, but of number and measure. If, by some accident, the filling in were deficient of one or more of the twelve stones, the Four-square Ornament would not have been Thummim, however bright the Urim of the gems present might have been. The deficient stones must have been supplied, and then Thummim would have been restored to the Holy Square.

From this scriptural identification of the Urim and Thummim with the Expected Priest after the Order of Melchisedec, we have one of a multitude of instances in which, as Paul teaches, “the Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believes” the gospel of the kingdom. But he is the beginning also, therefore he styles himself “the Beginning and the Ending” (Apoc. 1:8); hence, as it is written, “Out of him, and through him, and into him, are all things” (Rom. 11:36). The Mosaic law, in all its “weak and beggarly elements,” compared with the things they represented, was all of or from Christ, and through Christ, and into or for Christ. He invented these “elements of the world,” which “made nothing perfect;” through the Christ-Spirit he showed them to Moses, and taught him, and the prophets and apostles that they were a foreshadowing of “heavenly things,” which were to soma tou Christou, the Body of the Christ (Col. 2:17), of which body Jesus is the head—the Body, “the fulness of him who filleth all” the saints “with all things” (Eph. 1:23).

In Hebrews 8:5, Paul tells us that the priests of the law served for an ocular representation and shadow of the heavenlies; that is, that Aaron and his priests, in their service, vestments, and relations to the Deity and Israel, submitted to the eyes of observers a shadowy representation of things pertaining to Jesus and his Brethren, the saints—Christ personal and Christ mystical. These constitute “the heavenlies,” “in the heavens,” en tois ouranois, not in “the heaven,” ton ouranon, where Jesus now is, but in the heavens in which they enjoy their great reward, when he shall sit upon the throne of his glory in Jerusalem, and they shall “reign with him upon the earth” over Israel and the nations, as the kings and priests of the Deity (Apoc. 5:10; 20:4). The law, in all its details, was a pattern—a system of figurative righteousness, which represented a system of real righteousness, termed “the righteousness of the Deity.” The figurative was prophetic of the real; so that, until the real was developed, no one could fulfil the righteousness of the law. When Jesus was about to be immersed by John, he said: “Thus it is becoming for us to fulfil all righteousness;” and what was becoming for him is deemed so by the Spirit for all who would become constituents of the Holy Square of Twelve. The Deity condemned sin in the flesh of his Son, says Paul, “that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit,” or the truth (Rom. 8:4). This was a most remarkable development, that the prophets and priests under the law could not fulfil its righteousness. The High Priest might put on the ephod decorated with its sparkling jewels, and thus be invested with a holiness and brightness and perfection which, when put off and suspended in the wardrobe, left him in all the unholiness, dulness, and imperfection of a natural man. A man whose righteousness is in his dress fulfils not the righteousness of the Deity represented by the dress. This can only be fulfilled by those “who walk after the Spirit;” and they only so walk, who, whether Jews or Gentiles, it matters not, understand the gospel of the kingdom and the truth as it is in Jesus; who believe heartily what they understand, and obey the truth by immersion into the Christ, and a patient continuance in well doing. These, who were never under the Mosaic law, do what the priests and prophets could not do. By their intelligent obedience to the law of faith, they show the work of the Mosaic law written in their hearts, whereby they do the things contained in the law, and so fulfil its righteousness.

Now, the Ephod, with its Foursquare of precious stones, represented to soma tou Christou, the Body of the Anointed. “By one Spirit we all into one body were immersed, whether we be Jews or Gentiles.... and all into one Spirit have been made to drink; for the body is not one member, but many” (1 Cor. 12:13). For the development of this body, the Deity set forth Jesus as a Propitiatory or Mercy Seat in his blood. He was of the curiously wrought texture of the ephod, in common with all those who should become his brethren. “My body,” said the Spirit in David, “was not hid from thee, when I was made in the hiding-place, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth” (Psa. 139:15). The Ephod was of the same material and workmanship as the Vail, with the addition of gold; and the vail, we know, from its being rent when the body of the Spirit was broken on the cross, and from the teaching of Paul (Heb. 10:20)—represented the flesh, which, in Psa. 16:9, the Spirit styles “my flesh.” The embroidering in of gold thread, in addition to the “blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen” of the Vail, indicated purity of the flesh after trial—“when he hath tried me, I shall come forth as gold.” While Jesus, then, was living, and afterwards in death, he was typified by the Vail, whole and afterwards rent; but when he lived again, and ascended to the Divine Nature, and became Son of Deity with power by “Spirit of holiness,” he was typified by the “curiously wrought” ephod, or Jewelled Overall and Robe put on by Aaron when standing before the Deity. As the living embroidered Ephod, he stands in the presence of the Father with the names of the twelve tribes of the “HOLY NATION” engraven on his heart. He is set forth “for all,” as an ephod to be put “upon all” who would enter the Divine Presence, that they die not. This ephod may be put on after the manner in which Jesus became the ephod—by being born of water and Spirit. When the ephod is thus assumed, the immersed and resurrected believer is not only regarded as in it, but a part of it, and, consequently, as one of the Urim and Thummim—one of the lights—and, therefore, one of the elements of the twelve precious stones, or Thummim; for, as each stone in the type represented a tribe, a multitude of individuals must have been signified by a separate stone.

It may be remarked here that the Apocalyptic Urim and Thummim, or 144,000, are presented before us in two states. In the present state, in which they are being sealed, and in the future state, with the Lamb on Mount Zion (Apoc. 7 and 14). The two states are divided by the resurrection. As the gold wire has been twined and interwoven with the blue, and the purple, and the scarlet, and fine twined linen of the Vail, as far as the Lord Jesus is concerned, the Ephod is perfected; but, in relation to his brethren, the gold is in their moral texture only as a principle—a tried faith; but when by Spirit of holiness they are quickened, a golden thread of incorruption, as it were, will be interwoven throughout all their material substance, and they will be like Jesus, immortal. By being born of water, then, the true believer, and only such, is even now invested with the Ephod, and a light of the Urim and the Thummim of the Square of Twelve.

The following testimonies will identify the saints as the Urim and Thummim of the foursquare of the Body of the Christ. The Spirit by Isaiah addressing the widowed Jerusalem, which shall hereafter be married to the Elohim of the whole earth, saith, “I will lay thy stones with fair colors, and lay thy foundations with sapphires. And I will make thy windows of agates, and thy gates of carbuncles, and all thy borders of pleasant stones. And all thy children shall be taught of Yahweh; and great shall be the peace of thy children” (ch. 54:11). In this, the children of Jerusalem the exalted, “the Mother of us all,” are compared to precious stones of fair colors, or lights, Urim, without defining the Thummim, or full number of them.

Peter styles the saints “living stones;” and all that are built upon the foundation that Jesus is the Christ, and stand firm by the truth, Paul calls “gold, and silver, and precious stones.” And when he teaches, that they are citizens of the commonwealth of Israel, he says in effect, that they are Thummim, or individual elements of the precious stones, whose rootfulness of number is twelve, and its symbolical square 144,000.

In Zech. 14:7, the saints who come in with Yahweh Elohim are styled yekaroth, the splendid shining or glorious ones. The word is used of stones, gems, and stars. Their splendor constitutes them Urim. They are the gems and stars through which the brightness of the Spirit enlightens the nations of the earth, when Jesus and his Brethren inherit all things. This reference to the Urim is very remarkable, and in the English Version very imperfectly translated. As it stands in verses 6 and 7, no sense can be made of it. It may be seen by the margin, which deepens the obscurity of the text, that “the authorities” do not know what to do with it. There is no obscurity, however, in the original to one whose mind is not darkened with clerical traditions, and who understands the glory, to which the saints are called in the gospel of their salvation. The passage should read thus: “Yahweh my Elohim (He who shall be my Mighty Ones, or righteous governors) shall come in, all the saints with thee. And it shall be in that day there shall be no brightness, the splendid drawing in. And it shall be one day that shall be made known by Yahweh; not day nor night, but it shall be in time of evening there shall be brightness,” or Ur. From this we learn, that when the Lamb and 144,000 enter upon their work of judgment at eventide, they will not “shine as the brightness of the firmament and as the stars” (Dan. 12:3) they will not be manifested as Urim; but, though capable of so doing, they will draw in their brightness, and appear as men: but, when the judgment is over, and the kingdom established, and the time is come for them to rest from their labors, then they will no longer draw in their splendor, but “shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father” (Matt. 13:43); not in the “day” of Jerusalem under the law; nor in the “night” of her widowhood, “not day nor night;” but at eventide, which begins the seventh, or great sabbatic day.

In the present state, the believers, who are constitutionally in the Christ-Ephod, and therefore citizens of the Foursquare Polity which decorates it, are Urim, and addressed as such by Paul in Phil. 2:15, in the words, “in a crooked and perverse generation, ye, the sons of the Deity, shine as lights,” or Urim, “in the world:” and in Eph. 5:8, “ye were formerly darkness, but now light in the Lord; walk as children of light.” Being in the Lord, they are the lights and precious stones of his breastplate—the Urim and Thummim of his Ephod. They became such by the law and the testimony dwelling in them richly. This gives them their polish, and enables them to “shine as lights.” Where the law and the testimony are not in the understanding, there is no light there. In such only darkness reigns; and while this continues, they can be neither Urim nor Thummim, nor in Christ.

It was because of the darkness, or “strong delusion Deity had sent” the apocalyptic twelve Tribes of Israel, “that they should believe a lie; and all be damned who believed not the truth”—sent by him as a punishment upon them for not continuing in the love of the truth he had given: because of this, he commissioned the sealers to make proclamation among them, that, if there were any disposed to return to first principles, they might be “sealed” with these principles “in their foreheads;” and thus polished and filled in, might shine as the Apocalyptic Urim and Thummim—as the Lights and Fulness of the Body of Christ.

All exterior to the sealed community, the Holy Square of Twelve, are mere denizens of the unmeasured Court without the Temple (Apoc. 11:2). These are mere Gentiles, who hold a like relation to the Foursquare Community, that mere Jews do to “the Israel of the Deity,” constituted of Israelites under the law who were sons of Abraham by faith. Blindness has happened to these mere Gentiles of the Court, as it has to mere Jews. The mission of the Angel-Sealers in sealing the 144,000, was to preserve the faith from extinction. Had they not been stirred up by the Lamb through an intelligent belief of the truth, to “spue,” or throw up a flood of words of evil against the apocalyptic tribes of Israel’s sons, the catholics would have had everything their own way; and there would have been no Holy City for them to tread under foot for forty-two symbolic months; there would have been no Witnesses to prophesy in sackcloth a thousand two hundred and sixty symbolic days; there would have been no woman in the wilderness for a like period; there would have been no Remnant keeping the commandments, and having the testimony of Jesus Christ; there would have been no war between the Beast and the Saints resulting in their being conquered; and there would be none now to watch and keep their garments in expectation of the Lamb. In all the past fifteen hundred years and upwards, Deity would have had no Urim and Thummim to stand as embodied lights before him. The Body of the Christ would have perished the while; and nothing but “a wretched, and pitiable, and poor, and blind, and naked,” world of apostate “tribes,” calling themselves “the people of God,” would have remained. But, the labors of the Angel-Sealers altered all this. By them, the Lamb “spued out of his mouth” those in place and power with all their adherents, “who said they were Jews, but,” in so saying, “lied;” and organized anew the Holy Nation of Israel’s sons.

7. The Tribes of the Apostasy

That the tribes from which “the Remnant of the Woman’s Seed” was to be separated were not the tribes of Israel after the flesh, appears from the specification of them. The reader will see from the following table, that the lists enumerating and specifying their names, vary according to the speaker or writer passing them in review. Thus:

Apocalypse
Ezekiel
Jacob
Moses

1. Judah
1. Dan

1. Reuben
1. Judah

2. Reuben
2. Asher
2. Simeon
2. Issachar

3. Gad
5. Nephtail
3. Levi
3. Zebulun

4. Ashr
4. Manasseh
4. Judah
4. Reuben

5. Nepthalim
5. Ephraim

In the apocalyptic specification Levi and Joseph are inserted, and Ephraim and Dan omitted. Ephraim and Dan are both inserted in Moses' distribution of the tribes into Four Camps. This diversity shows that two different organizations called Israel are signified; nevertheless, though diverse, yet related according to the principles I have before explained. In the apocalyptic Israel, the tribe of Levi is not Yahweh's especial inheritance, lot, or clergy, as in the natural Israel; although, after the destruction of Jerusalem, the "Jews of the Satan's synagogue," who set up for apostles, and by the saints in Ephesus were found to be "liars," claimed to be the Lord's clergy, as at this day, in place of the natural tribe of Levi. "Yahweh's inheritance is his people;" not a particular tribe of them. Joseph is inserted instead of Ephraim in the apocalyptic polity by which the division of the natural Israel into two nations and kingdoms under Judah and Ephraim is repudiated. The future union of the natural Israel under Jesus and his Brethren is foreshadowed in the union of the symbolic Israel. In the regeneration, when the apostles sit on the twelve thrones of the House of David ruling the twelve tribes, there will be but one nation and kingdom in the land upon the mountains of Israel, with Yahweh's servant as their Prince for ever (Ezek. 37:15–28).

In Ezekiel 48, the two tribes omitted by John are inserted, because Ezekiel is treating of the allotment of the land of Israel among the natural tribes restored from their long dispersion. Levi has no allotment of territory as under the Mosaic law.

The 144,000 sealed ones being separated by the truth believed and obeyed from the apocalyptic tribes of apostate sons of Israel, become themselves exclusively the Foursquare Community, or "Israel of the Deity." They are not his kingdom, but "the Heirs" of it, through the gospel thereof they believe. They constitute the only temple, or habitation, he has upon earth. He dwells in them, and walks in them, by the truth believed, which is his moral power, or spirit. The Spirit in Jesus said, "I am the way, the truth, and the life." Hence, in the individual, or community, in which the truth dwells, the Deity dwells. It is a body anointed with the truth, and therefore the Body of the Anointed, or Christ. Being founded upon the Square Root—upon the Root and Offspring of Israel—it is regarded as consisting of twelve tribes, though no fleshly, territorial, or political divisions among the faithful exist; for "they are all one in Christ Jesus."

8. Historical Testimony

The materials for a complete history of the community sealed during the interval from A.D. 325 to A.D. 396, are very scanty. All that can be done is to glean a few scattered hints, principally to be found in the writings of their catholic adversaries, who maligned them as heretics and schismatics.

We find that in this period the Novatianist societies, which, as we have seen, originated in the middle of the third century, were numerous; and maintaining their original distinctiveness from what had now become the Religion of Rome by law established. The following incident shows this. The historian Socrates informs us that Constantine, anxious for peace and desirous to procure the concord and harmony of the churches of his empire, invited Acesius, one of the Novatianist bishops, to attend the Council of Nice, A.D. 325, which he did. When the Nicene creed had been composed and subscribed by the synod, Constantine appealed to Acesius, and asked him whether he assented with them to the creed? He replied: "The Synod has determined nothing new, my prince; for thus heretofore, even from the commencement and times of the apostles, I traditionally received the definition of the faith, and the time of celebrating Easter." When therefore the emperor further asked him, "For what reason then do you separate yourself from communion with the rest of the church?" he related what had taken place during the persecution under Decius; and referred to the rigidity of that canon which declares, that it is right to account unworthy of participation in the divine mysteries persons who, after immersion, have committed a sin, which the sacred scriptures denominate "a sin unto death" (1 John 5:16): that they should indeed be exhorted to repentance, but were not to expect remission from priests, but from the Deity, who is alone able and has authority to forgive sins. When Acesius had thus spoken, Constantine said to him, "Place a ladder, Acesius, and climb into heaven alone."

The Novatianists had now been before the public about seventy five years. They were very numerous, but seem to have abounded most in Rome, Constantinople and Asia Minor. Morally, they were a considerable improvement upon the adherents of the State Church, being careful to retain none among them whose characters were not reputable in the estimation of good men. Doctrinally, however, they do not appear to have differed materially from the so-called "orthodox." Indeed their close agreement with state-churchmen in opinion concerning the Deity, and the time of observing the Passover, exempted them from persecution in common with other sects. Persecution, however, sometimes afflicted them; but it does not appear to have befallen them because of their testimony for Jesus Christ against iniquity in high places, but, because of their sympathy with the Homoousians, or Consubstantialists, who were sure to come to grief when the Arians became the guardians of the imperial conscience.

The reply of Acesius to Constantine shows a unity of faith between the Novatianist Dissenter and the national Religionist, quite incompatible with the required intelligence of an angel-sealer of the servants of Deity in their foreheads. Had Acesius, as a type of his brethren, been "sealed in his forehead," he certainly could not have assented to the Nicene Creed as a scriptural definition of "the faith" taught by the apostles, nor would he have troubled himself about the celebration of Easter. The apostolic faith was as little comprehended by church and dissent at this crisis, as by their representatives in our day. Hence, the statement of it by the Nicene Fathers was poor and meagre in the extreme; and, as the symbol of their spiritual intelligence, justifies in a great degree the judgment of Sabinus, a bishop of the Macedonian sect contemporary with the council, who styles all that were convened there "idiots and simpletons," and "such as had no intelligence in the matter." The historian Socrates, however, is quite restive under this opinion, and cites the declaration of Eusebius Pamphilus who was present, that "some were eminent for the word of wisdom, others for the strictness of their life; and that the Emperor Constantine himself being present, leading all into unanimity, established unity of judgment, and conformity of opinion among them." But, with all deference to Socrates, the testimony of Pamphilus rather confirms the judgment of Sabinus; for, if the Nicenists had been truly wise in the word, it would not have required the superior wisdom of an unbaptized semi-heathen emperor to lead them into unanimity, and to establish unity and conformity among them. Imperial sunshine had more to do with the creed than "the wisdom from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy" (James 3:17): which Constantine to his sorrow found was by no means characteristic of the three hundred and eighteen fathers of this Council of Nice.

It was the year next ensuing the termination of the Sixth Seal that Constantine convoked this first Ecumenical Synod. He hoped by it to quiet and discord in his church then in full blast between Alexander and Arius; and to allay the incessant strife and tumult among his catholic people. The emperor had great expectations from the council, which Pamphilus in his life of Constantine, styles, “a sacred edifice, dilated as it were by the Deity”—“a convocation in imitation of the Apostolic Assembly” on Pentecost; which, he says, was inferior in this respect, that all present were not ministers of the Deity: whereas at Nice the number of bishops exceeded three hundred; while the number of the presbyters, deacons, and acolyths, (or young priests) who attended them was almost incalculable.” Many of the laity were also present, who were practised in the art of reasoning,” or of darkening counsel by words without knowledge; “and each prepared to advocate the cause of his own party. For a short time previous to the general assembling of the bishops, the disputants engaged in preparatory logical contests with various opponents: and when many were attracted by the interest of their discourse, one of the laity who was a man of unsophisticated understanding, and had stood the test of persecution in his confession of faith, reproved these reasoners; telling them that Christ and his apostles did not teach us the dialectic art, nor vain subtleties, but simple-mindedness which is preserved by faith and good works.” This man spoke like one of the Angel-sealers, the words of truth and soberness. “All present,” continued Socrates, “admired the speaker, and assented to the justness of his remarks; and the disputants themselves, after hearing his ingenuous statement of the truth, exercised a far greater degree of moderation; and thus the disturbance caused by these logical debates was suppressed.

In the second chapter of the Acts, the reader may find the Pentecostian declaration of faith proclaimed by the Spirit through the Twelve Apostles. He can compare this with the creed concocted and published by the episcopal fathers of the Nicene Pentecost, and then say, if it would not have been more demonstrative of the alleged wisdom of these Constantinian Catholics to have reaffirmed “the Spirit’s” simple declaration; than to have given utterance to the Nicene speculations of their “great and holy synod.” A comparison of the two is sufficient to convince any sealed servant of the Deity, that the opinion of Sabinus is correct; and that, clearly, “they had no intelligence in the matter.” As many of our readers may have no acquaintance with this celebrated symbol of the Apostasy, by the unintelligible jargon of which, the minds of beclouded bishops, presbyters, and peoples, were distracted, and the peace and safety of society fatally impaired, I have concluded to insert it in this place, as the declaration of

9. The Faith of “the Woman Clothed with the Sun.”

“We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of all things visible and invisible:—and in our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the only begotten of the Father, that is, of the substance of the Father; God of God, and Light of Light; true God of true God; begotten, not made, consubstantial (homoousion) with the Father: by whom all things were made, both which are in heaven and on earth: who for the sake of us men, and on account of our salvation, descended, became incarnate, and was made man; suffered, arose again, the third day, and ascended into the heavens, and will come again to judge the living and the dead. We also believe in the Holy Spirit.

“But the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church anathematizes those who say, that there was a time when the Son of God was not, and that he was not before he was begotten; and that he was made from that which did not exist; or who assert that he is of other substance or essence than the Father; or that he was created, or is susceptible of change.”

Such was the rattling skeleton enthroned in the temple of the Imperial Mother of the Man of Sin. All who desired court favor were required to glorify it as the orthodox definition of what they styled “the Unity of the Holy Trinity.” By the philosophy and vain deceit with which they were spoiled and deluded, they had lost the knowledge of the great mystery of godliness exhibited by Christ and the Apostles, “Deity manifested in flesh;” and, under the inspiration of what the Greeks called wisdom and logic, substituted this shallow conception which resulted in a furious and sanguinary strife about the words ousia, substance; homoousion, consubstantial, or of the same essence; homoiousion, of the like substance; and so forth. The apostates in favor of the creed were styled Trinitarians, and the apostates opposed to it, Arians, all “men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith,” as their writings and practices abundantly show.

Having thus presented the reader with “the Faith” of the Catholic Mother, on account of which her fractious and ill-mannered offspring afflicted one another with pains and penalties more sanguinary and brutal than they had formerly experienced from the pagans, it will, I conceive, be perfectly in point, by way of contrast, and as an illustration of “the Seal of the Deity,” brought into renewed and active operation by his providence at this crisis of affairs, to present also “the faith once for all delivered to the saints” in luminous simplicity by the Holy Spirit, in whom the Homooousians said they believed, but whose teaching had no more weight with them than with the hierarchists of modern times.

10. The Faith Apostolically Declared

“Ye men of Israel, hear these words: Jesus of Nazareth, A MAN approved of the DEITY among you, by powers and wonders, and signs which the Deity exhibited THROUGH HIM in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know; Him, being delivered by the predeterminate counsel and foreknowledge of the Deity, ye have taken, and through lawless hands have crucified and slain: whom the Deity hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death: because it was not possible that He should be holden by it.

“For David (by Spirit) speaketh concerning him (Christ), ‘I foresaw Yahweh always before me. Because he is at my right hand I shall not be moved. Therefore did my heart rejoice, and my tongue was glad: moreover also my flesh shall rest in hope; because thou wilt not allow my soul to remain in the grave, nor wilt thou permit thy holy one to see corruption. Thou wilt make me to know the path of lives; thou wilt make me full of joy with thy countenance.’

“Men and brethren, let me speak freely to you concerning the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us until this day. Being a prophet, therefore, and knowing that the Deity with an oath had sworn to him that out of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up the Christ to sit upon his (David’s) throne: foreseeing this, he spake concerning the resurrection of the Christ, that his soul should not be left in the grave, nor his flesh see corruption.

“This even Jesus the Deity hath raised up, of which all we are witnesses.

“Being therefore exalted to the right hand of the Deity, and having received from the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit, He hath shed forth this, which now ye see and hear.

“For David has not ascended into the heavens: but he himself saith, ‘Yahweh said unto my Lord, Sit at my right hand until I make thine enemies a footstool of thy feet.’

“Therefore, let all the House of Israel know assuredly, that the Deity hath made that same Jesus whom ye crucified both Lord and Christ.”

“Let your mind (therefore) be changed, and be immersed every one of you upon the name of Jesus Christ into remission of sins: and YE shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit. For the promise is to you and your children, and to all afar off, as many as the Lord our Deity may invite.”

Here, then, are two faiths: the one, the faith of the Catholic Apostasy; the other, the faith dictated and confirmed by Deity himself. By this, the servants of the Deity were being sealed; while Arians and Trinitarians were splitting hairs about homoousion and homoiousion, and making themselves ridiculous and hateful on every side. “One saw,” says Socrates, “confusion everywhere prevailing; for not only the prelates of the churches engaged in contention, but the people also divided, some siding with one party and some with the other. To so disgraceful an extent was this affair carried, that Christianity became a subject of popular ridicule, even in the very theatres.”

I have searched through Socrates, Sozomen and Theodoret, the Greek ecclesiastical historians of the period of the sealing, but have been unable to find any footsteps of Angel-sealers contending for the faith delivered on Pentecost, and standing aloof from, and in opposition to, both Trinitarians and Arians. All in the East seem to have been occupied on one side or the other of Homoousianism, evincing thereby the absence of any divine sealing operation in their foreheads. The countries whose vernacular was the Greek tongue seem to have been abandoned of Deity to the darkness of superstition, which was rapidly intensified by the controversialists of Nice. I turn therefore from these to those parts of the Empire where the Latin was the prevailing language of the people—the Roman West, in which John saw the sealing Angel in operation.

In the Roman Africa, then, in one of the wings of the Great Eagle, there appeared, in the early part of the fourth century, an intensely anti-catholic people, a people who, as the faithful agents of the Lamb, “spued them out of their mouth.” They denied the Christianity of Catholics, and would have no fellowship with them, regarding all religious contact with them as defiling. They rejected their immersion as null and void, and repudiated their bread-breaking as a profane thing, and “spued out” their consecrations, unctions, and ordinations, as nauseating abominations. These were just the sort of people John’s symbolization requires, as any one who knows what Catholicism was at that time, and how the Scripture reprobates all they called sacred, will readily perceive. These anti-catholics were enlightened people, or they would have gone with the multitude, and have glorified Constantine and his ambitious and worldlyminded clergy. But they were opposed to all their dogmas, and schemes of aggrandizement. They contended for “the simplicity which is in Christ,” as exhibited in the word. They were uncompromisingly hostile to all things not according to the testimony of Jesus Christ and the commandment of the Deity. They would be styled, by the milk-and-water respectables and liberals of our day, ironical, sarcastic, uncharitable, and bitter! There might be some among themselves who would wince at the tone of their testimony, on the specious plea that it would “do harm,” or “do no good,” or that the public would not bear it! But these Roman-African believers were not generally of this punctilious and faint-hearted description. This sort of anti-catholics were few in the fourth century. The exigencies of the crisis, then as now, required earnest men, who feared neither Constantine, his clergy, nor their public, and who had sense and boldness enough to “cry aloud and spare not” any thing that exalted its corrupt self against the knowledge with which the servants of the Deity were being sealed in their foreheads. The crisis required men who were not afraid to stigmatize a blasphemy by the word blasphemy, and to nail a counterfeit to the board, and to proclaim it such, wherever they encountered it. They used the sword of the Spirit trenchantly, so that wherever they fleshed it, it made the victim writhe, and left behind its mark. They declared to their contemporary professors that they were not Christians, and could not be saved so long as they continued members of Constantine’s church. They knew what the truth was, and what the Deity commanded; and, being logical and sensible men, they knew that whatsoever was not of the truth was a lie, and that obedience to the commands of the Deity alone could impart life. The piety and grace of their dominant opponents were intense. They were of the very cream of orthodoxy, and their silver-tongued eloquence unquestionable. But these blandishments of the devout were lighter than vanity with the angel-sealers of that day. Weighed in the balances of truth, they were found utterly wanting; and food only for the indignant sarcasm, and pungent irony, which was practically developed in burning and scraping catholic altars, and breaking their communion cups!

Ecclesiastical historians take little notice of this terrible people, on whose account the four angels at the four corners of the habitable or Roman earth were commanded to restrain those awful tempests, which, in due time, swept the Latin world with hurricanes of wrath. What has come down to us concerning them is derived principally from Optatus and Augustine, who wrote against them, and denounced them as schismatics and puritans. The learned Du Pin has noticed them, and, though an adversary, seems to have spoken of them without prejudice. "Hitherto," says he, "we have only represented the Donatists as a faction that separated from the (catholic) church, without taking notice of any particular doctrine whereby they were distinguished. Indeed, they did not teach any thing that was contrary to the (apostle's) creed; but they were so rash as to affirm that all the churches everywhere which had embraced the communion of Coecilianus (bishop of Carthage) and his party, ceased to be the true churches of Jesus Christ; that thus the catholic church was only found among themselves, having ceased to exist in other parts of the world. Besides which, being very fond of the ancient doctrine of the African Ecclesias, that immersion and the other sacraments conferred out of the ecclesia were null and void, they reimmersed such as had been immersed by the Catholics, trampled upon their eucharist as a profane thing, and maintained that the consecrations, unctions, and ordinations performed by the catholics were of no avail. They burned or scraped the altars which the latter made use of, as being polluted by impure sacrifices, and broke their (communion) cups. They looked upon the vows made in their communion as of no value; in a word, they would not communicate with them. They maintained that the ecclesia ought to be made up of just and holy men, or, at least, of those who were such in appearance; and that, although wicked men might lurk in the ecclesia, yet it should not harbor those who were known to be such."

Thus testifies Du Pin concerning the Angel-sealers of the century preceding the sounding of the First Trumpet. He bears testimony to the soundness of their faith; but, while it was doubtless so, his testimony thereto is of no more value than would be that of Bishop Colenso, Professor Renan, or the Archbishop of Canterbury, for the simple reason that he, no more than these "divines," is able to define the truth. Their faith was not catholic, but apostolic, and a living protest ing to the apocalypse, no other judgment can be given than that, at this crisis, a people of such rigid and sweeping exclusiveness was to exist. For, when the woman should repudiate an adulterous alliance with the against every thing called christian which did not stand out before the world in fellowship with themselves. This was the only ground they could take consistently with their Apocalyptic position of assessors with the Lamb in spuing the Laodiceans out of his mouth. They proclaimed that the true church had ceased to exist in all parts of the world where they themselves were not. This would be styled arrogant assumption by the Nicene Fathers and the catholic sects; but, according to the apocalypse, no other judgment can be given than that, at this crisis, a people of such rigid and sweeping exclusiveness was to exist. For, when the woman should repudiate an adulterous alliance with the State, and fly for refuge and nourishment into the two wings of the Great Eagle, what would that so-called "christianity" be in all "other parts of the world" but the apostasy "spued out of the Spirit's mouth." They shook their heads, and heaved with nausea and disgust at the wretched, pitiable, poverty-stricken, blind, and naked abortion basking in the sunshine of imperial grace, and glorifying itself with fulsome flattery and courtly phrase. The sealed servants of the Deity are always exclusive; for, being enlightened by the word and ruled by its principles, their liberality, toleration, and charity, transcend not the line which they describe—"to the law and the testimony, if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Tried by this rule, they found the whole world condemned except themselves, and boldly and bravely proclaimed the truth.

Behold, too, how energetic their testimony against the barren formality or sacramentalism which reigned on every side. They repudiated it as abhorrent to spiritual purity. Did a courtly bishop consecrate an altar for the exposition thereon of the bread and wine? If that piece of ecclesiastical furniture came into their possession, they regarded the thing as polluted by impure sacrifices, and either burned it as church trumpery, or, if deemed convenient as a table, they scraped it clear of all imaginary sacramental unction ere they recognized it as fit for the use of those “who worship Deity in spirit and in truth.” Du Pin’s is a noble testimony to the purity of their discipline. They maintained that an ecclesia of Christ should be constituted of just and holy men, or, at least, of those who appeared to be such; and that, although wicked men might lurk in the ecclesia, yet, when professors manifested themselves to be wicked, the brethren should put them away. This was the principle of the so-called Donatists—a principle fully supported and sanctified, or enjoined rather, by the New Testament. But it was scouted by the catholic church, which tolerated the notoriously wicked of all shades of abomination, and gloried in the presidency of an emperor who, from jealousy, murdered his own son, and was not immersed, though professing christianity for twenty years, till three days before his death. Need there be, then, any special wonder that the catholic church should have become “the habitation of demons, the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird?” (Apoc. 18:3).

The Donatists were a very numerous body in the Roman Africa, and, indeed, seem to have been almost as multitudinous there as the catholics themselves, which, considering the strictness of their discipline and their firm adhesion to the laws of Christ’s house, is gratifying to contemplate. There was scarcely a city or town in the Roman Africa in which there was not an ecclesia of these believers. A public conference was held at Carthage, A.D. 411, at which 286 bishops belonging to the catholics were present, and of the Donatists 279; and when we take into account, not only their rigid discipline, but also that they were a proscribed sect, and frequently the subjects of severe and sanguinary persecution from the catholic rulers, there is good reason to conclude that we have before us in the Donatists the very people foreshadowed in the servants to be sealed. They must have been energized by an enlightened faith, which gave them an intellectual and moral superiority over the imbecile and drowsy sacramentalists of the time. Their increasing numbers attracted the attention of the authorities, who were anxious, if possible, to conciliate them, and form a union between them and the catholics. The emperor Constans, A.D. 348, ten or a dozen years after the death of his father, Constantine, deputed two persons of rank to try to bring about a reconciliation between the two parties. When it was urged upon them that it was their duty to study the peace of the church and to avoid schism, they urged the unscriptural nature of the alliance which had recently taken place between church and state. “Quid est imperatori cum ecclesia?” said they—in plain English, “What hath the emperor to do with the church?” A more important and pertinent question could not have been propounded. Had civil rulers known their proper sphere, they would have accorded protection to citizens in all their rights, and have left them to their own convictions in matters of faith and practice. The civil power would then have restrained all ecclesiastics within the sphere of their own pales; and we should have had no “Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots, and Abominations of the earth.” The atrocities of the Roman Church would not have soaked the soil with the blood of the saints and witnesses of Jesus for hundreds of years, until she became drunk with their gore. Little was Constantine aware of the consequences that would follow his conferring wealth, and honor, and power upon the bishops, presbyters, and so forth, of the Laodicean Apostasy, which, in the ignorance of all concerned, was mistaken for the Spouse of Christ. Could he have foreseen the racks, the fires, the massacres, the butcheries, that were to follow his misplaced liberality, he would, doubtless, have thrilled with horror and disgust at the iniquity he had unwittingly evoked.

Another maxim illustrative of the principles of these angel-sealing brethren, of “Donatus the Great” is exhibited in the question they used to put, according to Optatus,—“Quid christianis cum regibus, aut quid episcopis cum palatio?” “What have christians to do with kings, or what have bishops to do at court?” They had learned from the scriptures that the principles of the doctrine of Christ were pure, peaceable, impartial, without hypocrisy, and full of good fruits; and that the rulers and courts of the nations were the concentrics of spiritual wickedness and political abomination; and that the overseers, or shepherds, of Christ's flock had no divine call within those circles but to reprove them. They held with James, that "the friendship of the world is enmity against the Deity;—and that whosoever therefore is a friend of the world is the enemy of the Deity;" and every true believer, in all ages and generations since knows well, that those ministers of religion only obtain access and favor with the authorities and their recognized public, who prophesy smooth things and pervert the truth. They rebuke sin at a distance, rage against the transgressions of the lower orders, speculate upon remote abstractions, amuse and satisfy the well to do, and are recompensed with a fading crown of rejoicing in the abounding gifts and honors of a world lying under the wicked. Donatus and his brethren knowing this, as we know it, and all generations of the righteous since the days of Christ, sent out their Agonistici, or combatants, into the fairs, and markets, and other public places, to inquire of their contemporaries, "what christians have to do with kings, or what have bishops to do at court?" They contended against their presence there, and sought to subdue the people to the conviction, that an imperial and courtly christianity, endorsed by Nicene Fathers and Arian philosophers, was no part of "the faith once for all delivered to the saints." In this truly orthodox, but dangerous, enterprise, they were sufficiently successful to be brought into collision with the so-called "First Christian Emperor," who in council assembled at Milan, A.D. 316, condemned them to lose their conventicles, sent their shepherds into banishment, and punished some of them with death! Constantine's son and successor Constans, also exiled Donatus and many of his brethren, whom he severely afflicted. This was the kind of treatment they experienced at the hands of "christian emperors," who smiled with the benignant and genial sunshine, irradiable only by worldrulers in the darkness of high places, upon the metaphysical and courtly episcopal sycophants, who constituted "the tail"—the lying prophets (Isa. 9:15) who caused the people to err; the tail of "the Serpent, who cast out of his mouth water as a flood after the Woman, that he might cause her to be carried away thereby" (Apoc. 12:15). Donatus and his brethren, however, were not so easily to be swept away; for the more friendly "earth helped the woman, and opening its mouth, swallowed up the flood." The enemies of the truth are not omnipotent, and rarely wise. Sooner or later retribution comes upon them; for "precious in the eyes of Yahweh is the death of his saints." The cruelties and injustice of the Constantine Family upon the Angel-Sealers of the Deity's servants; and the blasphemies of their catholic parasites, returned upon their own heads in the massacre of the imperial princes, and their eclipse by Julian; who, disgusted with their wickedness and hypocrisy, apostatized from the Apostasy to the more decent philosophy of the Antonines. This same "apostate," who rightly expelled all bishops from court, and sent them to look after their flocks at home, recalled the real servants of the Deity from exile in A.D. 362, and bid them enjoy the rights and privileges which their hypocritical persecutors had wrested from them.

But, when the apostasy had recovered its position in the state, and was again clothed with imperial sunshine, persecution revived against them. The emperor Gratian published several edicts against their peace, and A.D. 377, deprived them of their conventicles, and prohibited all their assemblies. This severity is in itself a testimony in their behalf. Had they been sycophants and hypocrites, ignorant and fanatical fools, bringing forth the fruit of their iniquity in "walking after the flesh," the catholic government, always inspired by bishops and their satellites at court, would not have inflicted on them disabilities and pains. But their testimony which they sealed upon the people whom they detached from the apostasy; their uncompromising denunciation of the Eusebiuses, Athanasiuses, Ariuses, and Augustines of Roman Ecclesiasticism; their zealous advocacy of the Pentecostian Faith to the utter subversion of all other conceivable creeds—brought down upon their devoted heads imperial and clerical wrath, which, in its tenderest manifestations, is always cruel. Notwithstanding, however, the severities they endured, the number of their ecclesias was very considerable towards the close of the sealing period limited by the sounding of the first trumpet. But, at this time history testifies that their efficiency began to decline. Their mission, or angelism, antecedent to the loosing of the winds against the Catholic Apostasy of the Roman West, was nearly accomplished; and the 144,000 almost sealed. Historical romances attribute their obscuration very principally to the zealous opposition of a catholic saint, named Augustine, who is the type of the Rev. E. B. Elliott's "true apostolic line and ministry"—Saint Augustine, bishop of Hippo, the apostle of that fashionable "divine sovereign grace," which elects, prevents, quickens, illuminates, adopts, saves, and leaves men as ignorant of Moses and the prophets, and the teachings of Jesus and the Apostles, as if the Word were indeed "a dead letter," which, though without life itself, effectually "kills!" The decline of these angel-sealers effected by the logic of a catholic saint, who taught that the twelve apostles are now sitting on twelve thrones of judgment in heaven; and who taught, also, the justification of infants from birth—sin derived from Adam, its guilt, and condemnation, in their baptism!! This is too ridiculous for serious refutation. A writer who can affirm such nonsense in the very statement proves that he, and all who endorse him, are grossly ignorant of the first principles of the oracles of the Deity.

The Emperor Honorius, stirred up against them by two clerical councils, the one A.D. 404, and the other A.D. 411, adopted violent measures against them. Many he fined, banished their pastors, and some he put to death. This was the policy of the party, of which this Elliott-type of the 144,000, was a bright and dazzling light, or miasmal meteor seductive of the unsealed into the way of death. The sanguinary tyranny of the Augustinians, and not the logic of their adversaries, caused their decline. But, the Deity was not unmindful of them in trouble. He had prepared the winds to blast their profligate oppressors. He "hurled a great mountain burning with fire into the sea" (Apoc. 8:8), which stained it with the blood of their enemies, and subverted their rule over the Roman Africa. Under the protection of the Vandals, who invaded that country A.D. 427, they revived and multiplied, and flourished for a hundred and four years. In 534, the power of their protectors was overturned, and left them again exposed to catholic malignity. Nevertheless, they remained a separate body until the close of the sixth century, when Gregory, the Roman Pontiff, used various methods for suppressing them. After this, but few traces of them under the name of Donatists, are to be found in history. The testimony against the catholic apostasy remained, but the Remnant of the Woman's Seed that held it, became pricks in its eyes and thorns in its side by other names.

In concluding this account of the missions, or apocalyptic angelism, of these sealers of the 144,000, it may be remarked, that the relation of Donatus and his brethren to the reigning apostasy is precisely that of the author of this work, and of all Christadelphians, who understand themselves and the truth they have confessed. Christadelphians are neither Arians, Socinians, nor Trinitarians; but believers in the "great mystery of godliness, Deity manifested in Flesh," as set forth in "the Revelation of the Mystery," preached by the apostles. Our faith embraces "the things of the kingdom of the Deity, and of the Name of Jesus Christ," as outlined in Acts 2 and 3; and we recognize none as christians who have not first believed the Gospel of the Kingdom and Name,; and after so believing been immersed "into the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit." Having made this good beginning, we regard such as being "sealed in their foreheads;" as "the servants of the Deity;" as being in Christ, by whom they are covered over as with a white robe, circumcised with his circumcision, and pardoned for all sins committed to the time of their immersion. We recognize no immersion as the "One Baptism," the subject of which has not been previously enlightened in the "One Faith" and the "One Hope of the Calling." We regard all enlightened believers of the gospel of the kingdom, who have been immersed, as "citizens of the Commonwealth of Israel," whose symbols are the square of twelve, as previously explained. During the absence of Christ, we hold these in all ages and generations, by whatsoever name they may be called, to be "the Israel of the Deity," "the Temple of the Deity," and "the Holy City;" and none else.

Furthermore, we hold, that all such immersed believers are “the workmanship of the Deity,” and the “taught of him;” not by Augustinian “sovereign grace,” which is the mere epidemic infection of the apostasy; but by the formative power of “the truth as it is in Jesus,” studied and understood. We hold, that the knowledge of this is renewing after the Christ-image of the Deity; and sufficient to make them partakers in his moral nature, without which no one can see him in peace and safety.

But, while we believe That we are justified by faith from all past sins in the act of putting on the Christ-robe by immersion, we hold that those only of the immersed will be saved in the kingdom of the Deity, who “by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, and honor, and incorruptibility and life.” In other words all the baptized “who walk after the flesh shall die” the Second Death. We reject as pure heathenism, the dogmas taught by the clergy, and popularly assented to, on the topics of heaven, hell, souls, and the devil. We hold, that the Roman Catholic Church is “Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots, and Abominations of the earth;” and that all the Names and Denominations of the Fourth Beast dominion, vulgarly styled “Christendom,” which practise infant sprinkling, or sanction the immersion of sinners ignorant, and therefore, faithless, of the truth, are “the Harlots and Abominations”—the “Names of Blasphemy of which the scarlet-colored beast is full” (Apoc. 17:3). In the days of Donatus and his brethren, the apostasy had not expanded itself into that ample development with which we are but too familiar. Like the malarious upas, it infects and deadens every thing beneath its shade. We repudiate it in all its details of theory and practice, as irremediably corrupt, and fit only for capture and destruction by the hand of Deity—by Christ and the Saints. Hence we reject all its institutions—its baptisms, “sacraments,” ordinations, consecrations, unctions, and so forth, as null and void, profane, polluting, and of no avail. We detest the system even to nausea, and “spue it out of our mouths.”

But, while words sufficiently significant fail to express our utter detestation of the hideous spectacle of spiritual rottenness, which seethes and festers in dying putrefaction on every side, we have nothing but kindness in our hearts towards the persons of our contemporaries. We thunder in their ears, and flash before their eyes, the sharp, bright, and rattling words of plain unvarnished truth, to awake them, if it be possible, from that deep sleep, which numbs them with the potency of death. We urge upon our fellow men, that unless they be sealed with the Pentecostian Faith, they cannot be saved. The preaching of the clergy and ministers of the day, is a mere darkening of counsel by words without knowledge. They preach “another Jesus, another Spirit, and another Gospel,” than Paul preached; and upon such, though the preachers might come direct from heaven, he imprecates a curse; and proscribes them from the fold of Christ as deceitful workers, transforming themselves into his apostles; but really like their master Satan, who long since transformed himself into an angel of light, mere ministers of righteousness in outward show (Gal. 1:8; 2 Cor. 11:4, 13).

We therefore invite all who have ears, to lend their ears to what the Spirit hath said of old to the children of men. We are all by nature and practice dead in trespasses and sins, and therefore the children of wrath. Made subject to vanity, but not willingly, the Deity commiserates our helplessness, and invites us into his favor. Why should we not, as the Anglican Harlot in her “Common Prayer” expresses it, “renounce the Devil and all his works;” and in so doing, renounce her and all her sister-prostitutes; whose touch uncleansed, defiles to hopeless exclusion from the Virgin-Community of the Holy Square (Apoc. 14:4). “Come out of them, my people, that ye partake not of their sins, and receive not of their plagues;” for, if ye partake of the one, there is no escape from the infliction of the other. Be sealed, then, in your foreheads with the truth; and “henceforth walk no more as others walk, in the vanity of their minds, having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of the Deity through the ignorance that is in them because of the hardness of their hearts.”

11. "After these Things."

The eighth verse of ch. 7 concludes the section which treats of the sealing; and the ninth verse begins a new section of the prophecy, yet not unconnected with the former, with the words meta tauta, which in the Common Version are inaccurately rendered "after this." The correct translation is "after these things." It is the same phrase with which the chapter opens; and there it is properly rendered; but why it is not similarly given in v. 9, it is not easy to divine.

The reader is referred to ch. 7:9, at the beginning of our chapter. There he will see in ver; 9 that John says, he saw "a great multitude" all of them assembled in a general convention before the Lamb; or, as Paul expresses it in 2 Thess. 2:1, "our gathering together unto our Lord Jesus Christ," as "the Glorious and Fearful Name, Yahweh Elohim" (Deut. 28:58). The multitude, John says, no one is competent to compute. It is the multitude of "the redeemed from among men, the first-fruits unto the Deity and to the Lamb" (ch. 14:4) the incorruptible and deathless seed promised to Abraham, who should be countless as The stars (Gen. 15:5). This human incompetency for the calculation shows that the number 144,000 is not the real, but only the representative, number of the redeemed. Every saved individual of the unknown number redeemed will be one of the 144,000 sealed ones; he will be an element of the 144 cubits; which embrace within their limits the 144,000 furlongs; for these are the square of the root within which the innumerable multitude is enclosed.

"After these things;" but how long after the sealing in the days of "Donatus the Great," till A.D. 395, before what John saw in vision, shall be seen in fact? The answer to this question is not here expressed in time how long. The time when is indicated by certain characteristics of the great multitude beheld. These are signified by the words, "having been clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands." The word clothed is in the perfect participle passive, showing that when they shall be seen in fact, in the palm-bearing attitude, they will have been raised to the divine nature, as Christ now is. This is the pure, incorruptible, and spotless, white robe which they receive who, in a doctrinal and moral sense, have, in the present state, "washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." The scene is postadventual and postresurrectional; and furthermore, it belongs to the epoch when the resurrected shall celebrate their first Feast of Tabernacles. This is indicated by their having "palms in their hands; for palm-bearing belongs to the celebration of that festival in type and antitype. Let us look, then, for a little at the

12. Feast of Tabernacles

Israel were commanded to keep their annual feasts: first, the Feast of Unleavened Bread; second, the Feast of Harvest: and third, the Feast of Ingathering, at the end of the year. The first began the day after the Passover; the second, fifty days from the morrow after the first sabbath following the passover; and the third, the fifteenth day of the seventh month. This last was the Feast of Tabernacles. It continued seven days, and was so called, because Yahweh "made the children of Israel to dwell in tents when he brought them out of the land of Egypt." It celebrated the ingathering of the fruit of Israel's land; and when the seven days of celebration had expired, the next day, the Eighth, was a sabbath, or Day of Rest. In the celebration, they took the boughs of goodly trees, branches of palm-trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook, and rejoiced before Yahweh their Elohim.

Now, we learn from the prophets that the Feast of Tabernacles had a more recondite signification than a mere memorial of the past. In other words, that it was emblematic of things to come in relation to Israel and the nations of the earth. The Spirit said by Hosea to Ephraim, "I, Yahweh thine Elohim from the land of Egypt, will yet make thee to dwell in Tabernacles, as in the days of the solemn feast." This shows that it is connected with the ingathering of Ephraim, or the Ten Tribes, into their land, where alone the feast can be lawfully celebrated. The Christ-Spirit also in Zechariah, declares that the nations generally shall come up yearly to Jerusalem to keep the Feast of Tabernacles, and to do homage to the Royal Name enthroned there (ch. 14:16). This indicates the ingathering of a joyous multitude before the King; for the feast is a rejoicing before the Lord. The sanguinary execution of judgment will have been perfected; and the nations under a new organization and administration, will be “blessed in Abraham and his Seed”—“the Glorious and Fearful Name, Yahweh Elohim.”

This great national celebration of the Feast of Tabernacles, then, argues the previous cessation of judgment; and consequently, the resting of the Saints from their labors in the execution of it. There will be festive rejoicings while the events symbolized in ch. 14., are in no manifestation; neither will there be any national rejoicing which is not celebrative of their glory. When Jesus and his Brethren, the incorporation of the Eternal Father’s Spirit, the Yahweh-Elohim Name, “rest from their labors,” they do so because they have “gotten the victory over the Beast, and over the Image, and over his Mark, and over the number of his name” (ch. 15:2). Israel, whom they will have gathered into their own land, and the nations, will all rejoice with them in this great victory of the day—a victory, pregnant with political, social, and moral results, which only Omnipotence could gain. Never before will such a Feast of Tabernacles have been observed. World’s Fairs, and Fourths of Julys, and the Birthdays of Queens and Washingtons, will fall into eternal insignificance and oblivion before it. “The First in War, the First in Peace, and the First in the hearts” of the peoples, will not be these idols of the heathen, but the Lamb in the midst of this great palm-bearing multitude, which will make the welkin ring with their “Hallelu-YAHS,” ascribing, “the salvation to him who sits upon the throne of our Deity, and to the Lamb!” The Elohim of this celebration will be the stars of divers magnitudes, represented by “the Elders and the Four Living Ones,” who themselves fall prostrate before the throne and worship the Deity, saying, “Amen: Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honor, and power, and might unto our Deity for the aions of the aions,” or during the Millennium and beyond, “Amen!” These palm-bearing Elohim are the goodly trees, the palm trees, the fig trees, and the willows of the brook; the Trees of Righteousness, whose leaves are unfading; “the planting of Yahweh on either side of the pure river of water of life clear as crystal;” the great forest of evergreens filling the earth with their perfume, to the glory of his Name (Isa. 61:3; Psa. 1:3; Apoc. 22:1, 2).

But, before they could figure, as stately palm trees in the concourse of nations, they had to “drink of the brook by the way.” In this relation of things they were “willows of the brook;” and this is the reason why afterwards, they exalt their heads above the peoples in this great Feast of Tabernacles, as lofty palms. The Captain of their salvation who leads them to glory, was himself once “a willow of the brook”—a weeping willow—“a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.” As the Christ-Spirit in David predicted in Psa. 110:7, concerning David’s Son and Lord, so it was verified in Jesus—“he drank of the brook by the way, THEREFORE he shall exalt the head:” “He was obedient unto death, therefore he was crowned with glory and honor.” But, in the scene before us, though like their chief, they had been “willows of the brook,” John did not see them bearing willow boughs. He saw them only with “palms in their hands.” Had he seen willows in their hands instead of palms it would have indicated that they were still a suffering community.

That they had been a community of sufferers in a former state, is certain by the question put to John, and answered by the Elder He asked John, who the palm-bearers were, and whence they came? To which John replied, “Sire, thou hast known”—kurie, su oidas. He knew experimentally, for he was one of them; inasmuch as the elders and living ones are representative of the whole company of the redeemed. “These are they,” said he, “who came out of the great tribulation, and washed their robes, and made their robes white in the blood of the Lamb.” Out of the great tribulation which precedes their resurrection from the dead. And, because they held fast the Name and the Faith, and defiled not their garments, and were faithful unto death; “therefore they are before the throne of the Deity, and serve him day and night in His temple.” Yahweh Elohim the almighty, is the temple, even the Lamb (ch. 21:22): being, therefore, constituents of Yahweh Elohim, they are living stones of the temple, and serving the Father continually, “who hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their Deity, and they shall be my people” (2 Cor. 6:16): and because it is so written, the Elder added, “and he that is sitting on he throne shall pitch his tent over them. They shall hunger no more, neither shall they thirst any more, neither shall the sun,” with which the Woman was clothed, “smite them, nor any heat,” or oppression. “Because the Lamb in the very midst of the throne shall tend them, and lead them to living fountains of waters, and the Deity shall wipe away every tear from their eyes.”

From these considerations the reader may, perhaps, be able to “see,” that this seventh chapter of the apocalypse presents before him two great epochs, with a long intervening period of tribulation extending from the one to the other. The first is the epoch of the sealing, ending A.D. 395; the last, the epoch of the festive celebration of the ingathering of the world’s fruit unto Yahweh Elohim, marked, probably, by the joyful observance of the first Feast of Tabernacles (for the feast will be celebrated annually) A.D. 1908 “He shall cause them that come of Jacob to take root: Israel shall blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit” (Isa. 27:6). This, with the gathering together of the saints unto Christ, is the fruit, the ingathering of which is then celebrated.

13. The Intervening Period

The interval, therefore, is long, 1513 years elapsing between the end of the sealing scene, and the manifestation of the “great multitude” as palm-bearers.

The reader, however, is not to suppose, that there was no sealing of servants for the Deity in their foreheads after A.D. 395. The sealing continued in all subsequent generations, and will continue until the Ancient of Days comes; when “the door will be shut,” and entrance into his presence as a glorified constituent of the Royal Name, will be denied to every applicant (Matt. 25:1–13). In the chapter before us, the initial and terminal epochs only were exhibited to John, the first described in the first eight verses; the last in the concluding nine; the interval being about to be unfolded in symbolic detail in other scenic representations. The sealing and the palm-bearing are two piers, from which springs an aionial arch, which bridges over the times of the trumpets, vials, and seven thunders; and consequently spans the aion of the Woman in the wilderness; the partly contemporary aions of the two witnesses, the Beast of the Sea, the Beast of the Earth, the Imperial Image; and the aion of the judgment of the Scarlet-colored Beast and its drunken ecclesiastical rider. When all these aions, or cycles, have described their appointed circuits, we shall have traversed the grand aionial arch; and have reached the festive celebration which introduces the nations to the Eighth Day of Holy Convocation—the Millennial Sabbatism, or Rest, that remains for the people of the Deity (Heb. 4:9).

CHAPTER 8

II. THE SEVENTH SEAL OPENED

THIS SEAL COVERS THE WHOLE PERIOD FROM A.D. 324 TO A.D. 1908, AN INTERVAL OF 1584 YEARS. IT THEREFORE EXHIBITS THE JUDGMENTS SPECIALLY ALLOTTED TO THE SEVEN TRUMPETS, SEVEN VIALS, AND SEVEN THUNDERS.

It treats of the development of the Imperialized Laodicean Apostasy into “the Powers that be” of the Greco-Latin, or Roman Habitable, under the forms of the Beast of the Sea, the Beast of the Earth (Apoc. 13), the Scarlet-colored Beast and Drunken Babylonian Rider (Apoc. 17:1–6), and the Image of the Beast (Apoc. 13:14–18; 15:2); and of the relation of these powers to the Fugitive Woman, and to the Remnant of her Seed, “who keep the commandments of the Deity, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ” (Apoc. 12:17). They are prevailed against; (Apoc. 13:7; 11:2; Dan. 7:21); but the Ancient of Days comes to their relief; the tide of adversity is turned; the Saints become victorious; the Apostasy, incorporated in the blasphemous Names and Denominations of “Christendom” is abolished; and they take possession of the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven (Dan. 7:27) of Daniel’s Four Beasts.

APOC. 8

1. And when he opened the Seventh Seal, silence ensued in the heaven about half an hour.
2. And I saw the seven angels, who stood in the sight of the Deity, and seven trumpets had been given to them.
3. And another angel came, and stood by the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given to him many odors, that he might cast for the prayers of all the saints upon the golden altar which is in the sight of the throne. 4. And the smoke of the perfumes for the prayers of the saints ascended from the hand of the angel in the presence of the Deity. 5. And the angel took the censer, and filled it from the fire of the altar, and cast into the earth, and there were voices and thunders and lightnings, and an earthquake.
6. And the seven angels having the seven trumpets prepared themselves that they might sound.
7. And the first angel sounded, and there was hail and fire which had been mingled with blood, and it was cast into the earth: and the third of the earth and the third of the trees was consumed, and every green blade was burned up.
8. And the second angel sounded, and as it were a great mountain burning with fire, was cast into the sea; and the third of the sea became blood. 9. And the third of the creatures in the sea having souls, died; and the third of the ships was destroyed.
10. And the third angel sounded, and a great star blazing as it were a torch fell out of the heaven; and it fell upon the third of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters.
11. And the name of the star is called the Apsinthian; and the third of the waters became undrinkable; and many of the men died out of the waters, because they were made bitter.
12. And the fourth angel sounded, and the third of the sun, and the third of the moon, and the third of the stars, was smitten; so that the third of them was darkened, and the day shone not the third of it, and the night likewise.
13. And I saw, and heard from one, an eagle flying in mid-heaven, saying in a loud voice, “Woe, woe, woe, to the dwellers upon the earth, from the remaining voices of the trumpet-call of the three angels hereafter to sound.”

EXPOSITION

1. SILENCE IN THE HEAVEN

John was informed, that the opening of the seventh seal would be marked by silence coming into existence in the heaven—egeneto sige en to ourano. This implies, that before the opening of the seventh seal there was the absence of silence; in other words, that there was noise or tumult in the heaven. The uproar must have been very great, from the fact, that the silence ensuing was deemed worthy of prophetic annunciation. When we are reminded of the events of the sixth seal, there is no difficulty in conceiving the nature of the uproar. The “great red Dragon” of paganism was then in the heaven, and the Michael-Power also. These were two antagonist forces which could not dwell together in unity: so war broke out between them, and they contended for the throne of Deity in the heaven. And so it is written. “There was war in the heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the Dragon; and the Dragon fought and his angels, and prevailed not; neither was a place found of them still in the heaven” (ch. 12:7, 8).

This expulsion of the Pagan Dragon-Power from the heaven left the Michael-Power sole occupant of the throne in the heaven; so that the final victory over the Dragon-Power placed the Michael-Chieftain, who was the new born Son of the Woman, upon the apocalyptic throne of the Deity, to which he had been “caught up” by a career of conquest during eighteen years, in which he never lost a battle. Being therefore, only one supreme power in the heaven, all uproar between powers in the heaven would necessarily cease, and “silence” would ensue. Hence, “silence in the heaven” was peace in the political aerial—the stillness and quietude of a calm after one storm; and before the outburst of another. As one of the idol-poets of the heathen sings:

’Twas as we often see against some storm,
A silence in the heavens; the rack stand still,
The bold winds speechless, and the orb below
As hush as death: anon the dreadful thunder

Doth rend the regions.

The “silence in the heaven” then, was a period of tranquility in the region of government, extending from the terminus of the sixth seal, signaled by the decisive battle of Chrysopolis, A.D. 324; and reaching to “the voices,” which resulted from the “fire cast into the earth,” by the Angel-Priest of the Apocalyptic Temple (ver. 5). Between these two epochs, the reign of the conqueror was undisturbed by rivals or usurpers; and he was enabled to bequeath to his own family the inheritance of the Roman world. “The general peace,” says Gibbon, “which he maintained during the last fourteen years of his reign, was a period of apparent splendor rather than of real prosperity; and the old age of Constantine was disgraced by the opposite yet reconcilable views of rapaciousness and prodigality.” Having no competitor to dispute his authority, he might have been the happiest of rulers, but for the corrupting influence of prosperity; and the quarrels of the Arian and Trinitarian factions of his new religion. He condescended to beseech these ignorant fanatics not to disturb the general tranquility of the times. “The favor which I seek,” said he, “is that you examine the causes of division, and bring the controversy to a close, and that you thus restore peace and unanimity among yourselves; so that I may triumph with you over our enemy the Devil, who excited this internal strife because he was provoked to see our external enemies subdued and trampled upon beneath our feet”—as symbolized by “the moon under the Woman’s feet.” While then, there was silence in the government, there was uproar in the Church characterized by every evil work, which at length became the cause of the providentially retributive “voices, and thunders, and lightnings, and earthquake” which preceded the preparation of the angels to whom the sounding of the seven trumpets was assigned (ver. 6).

2. Half an Hour

Tranquility reigned in the newly constituted government of the Roman Dragon hos hemiorion, about half an hour. This is symbolic time, or time in miniature. The apocalypse in the general is a miniature representation of an original conception of Divine Wisdom, which, when manifested in the accomplished facts will vastly exceed in magnitude the terms in which the conception is expressed. Hence, all its particulars partake of this general character, as parts partake of the nature of the whole. Thus, in respect of number, the 144,000 is a miniature representation of an undefined multitude vastly in excess of that numerical square of twelve thousand; and in respect of person, an angel represents a class of agents; so also it is with time; the times of the apocalypse are upon a miniature, but proportional scale; and suited to the nature of the subject in hand.

The longest period in the apocalypse in reference to the affairs of the saints is 1,260. It is transferred from the book of Daniel, ch. 7:25, and 12:7, where it is given in the formula “a time, times, and the dividing of time.” This formula is itself reproduced in Apoc. 12:14, as representative of the period during which the Fugitive Woman was to be nourished in the two wings of the Great Eagle. The question, how should these “times” be expressed in figures? is answered in the sixth verse of this chapter, where the period of the nourishing or feeding is stated at 1260 days. This, therefore, gives us certainty, that “a time, times, and the dividing of time” is a period equal to 1260. This 1260 is a whole number constituting the numerical expression of the aion or cycle pertaining to the saints, in their hostile relations to that blasphemous power into whose hands they were to be given (Dan. 7:21–25; Apoc. 13:6).

The shorter times of the apocalypse are proportional parts of 1260; which is itself the half of 2520, or SEVEN TIMES, allotted to “the Kingdom of Men,” styled by Paul, “the powers that be.” Between these and the saints in Christ Jesus, there was to be war. The saints were to be overcome till their aion expired; and then they are to conquer, and their conquest will be complete, when the aion of “the Powers that be,” the 2520, shall be full (Dan. 4:16, 23). The apocalypse has to do with the second half of the 2520; the former half in the first six centuries and half of it pertaining to Israel according to the flesh exclusively; and in its last six centuries, to the faithful in Christ in their conflict with paganism and catholicism before the legal and constitutional establishment of POPERY. The second, or latter, half of the 2520, is the aion of the saints running parallel with popery; and terminating with the manifestation era of the Ancient of Days, or Time of the End, which ends with the end of the 2520.

But, what are these Seven Times of 2520? Are they so many of what the Gentile speculators term “literal days” of twenty-four hours each; or literal years? When we consider the subject of which the 2520 is the aion, or cycle, we shall see that it can only be a cycle of years. It is the Cycle of a Tree representing the loftiness and extension of the Kingdom of Men. This umbrageous dominion existed in great glory; and was symbolized by the majesty of Babylon, styled, in the days of Nebuchadnezzar, “the house of the Kingdom.” Nebuchadnezzar being the reigning monarch, was the representative for the time then present of this Tree-Dominion, as was Cyrus after him; and Alexander the Great many years after Cyrus. Over this kingdom 2520 were to pass in the line of its gold, silver, brass, iron, and clay dynastic constitutions. What happened to Nebuchadnezzar was typical of what should happen to the Tree. He was hewn down from his loftiness, deprived of reason, and made to herd with the beasts for 2520 “literal days,” or seven times of days. This was the sign, or type; and a sign, in its times, persons, actions, &c., always represents something, analogous indeed, but different from itself. According to the sign, then, so it was to come over the kingdom of men, at that time overshadowing the nations to the end of the earth, like a tree whose height reached to heaven, and the sight thereof to all the earth. Its loftiness was to be hewn down, as it was by Cyrus; but it was not then to be uprooted: the stump of its roots was to continue in the earth, banded with iron and brass; and 2520 was to pass over it. Now the Kingdom of Men undeniably exists in our time; and has continuously existed from the days of Nebuchadnezzar, who began his reign over it about 2478 years ago. It is now the stump banded with a Greco-Latin band; and will continue so banded until it shall have been completely eradicated by Christ and the saints at the end of 2520.

The reader will perceive, then, that the Kingdom of Men being the subject to be passed over by the 2520, the limitation of this period to “literal days” is out of the question. It can only signify 2520 years; and this being so, the 1260 of the apocalypse, being the latter half of it, must be years also.

But this apocalyptic aion of 1,260 years is expressed in months as well as days. Divided by 30, the number of units in the twelfth of a time, the product is 42. These, in Apoc. 11:2, and 13:5, are termed “forty-two months,” during which the saints, or Holy City, are trodden under foot by the Gentiles of the unmeasured court, and symbolized, in their civil and ecclesiastical constitution by the Beast of the Sea and his Mouth of Blasphemy. By this example, we learn, that a symbolic month is equal to 30 years.

Now, a moon or month is the twelfth of a cycle. If the cycle be of 360 days, it will be 30 days; but if the cycle be of 360 years, then the month will be 30 years. Month is used six times in the prophecy; twice in the singular. Except in Apoc. 22:2, it always stands for 30 years, or the twelfth of a time.

Being, then, the twelfth of a cycle, it is also the Hour of that cycle. The small cycle of light, called a day, which is the root of all the greater cycles, was divided by the Jews into twelve equal parts; and the night into other twelve. If they had divided their day-cycle into twenty-four hours, as we do, a month and an hour would not be equivalent. But their division, which is the scriptural one, makes a month and an hour representative of twelfths of a whole to be determined by the subject treated of. In Apoc. 9:15 there is a notable proportional use of a symbolic hour, day, month, and year. Here hour is proportional of day; and month similarly proportional of year. The nature of the subject excludes the idea of “day” signifying a day; and “year” signifying 365 days, or year; besides that symbolic time, which is time in miniature, always represents time longer than itself. Here, “day” stands for year; and “year” for a term of years; so that the “hour” is the twelfth of the “day” or 30 days; and the “month,” the twelfth of the “year,” or time of years, and therefore equal to 30 years.

This is the only place in the apocalypse where hour stands for thirty days. It occurs in seven other places after this; but in all these it stands alone, and represents a judicial period of thirty years, or the twelfth of a time.

But, in ch. 8:1, are we to understand the Half-hour, as fifteen days or fifteen years? or, as the literalist theory of thirty minutes? The literalist notion is too ridiculous for a serious refutation. A silence of fifteen days would be no novelty, or new thing to predict; for during the uproarious period of the sixth seal, there were many “fifteen days” of silence; but there was no “silence in the heaven as it were fifteen years.” This was peculiar to the opening of the Seventh Seal. We conclude, then, that the half-hour in the text, and it is the only half-hour specified in the New Testament, is a period of fifteen years. The silence continued about that time. It may have fallen a little short. If it had been written in the text egeneto sige hemiorion, silence ensued half an hour, then we should expect to find that it continued exactly fifteen years; but the insertion of hos, about, before hemiorion, leads us to expect the probability of the silence not being prolonged to the full measure of half an hour. What, then, is the

In the case? It is that the decisive battle that ejected the “Great Red Dragon” out of the heaven, in which he had been carrying on war against the Michael-Power, was fought at Scutari, or Chrysopolis, A.D. 324. “By this victory of Constantine,” says Gibbon, “the Roman world was again united under the authority of one emperor, thirty-seven years after Diocletian had divided his power and provinces with his associate Maximin.” Constantine reigned after this battle till A.D. 337, in which he died on May 22. This gives a little over thirteen years to his death. But to these thirteen years there are four months to be added, as the silence continued so long after the emperor's death. It may, therefore, be said that the silence was unbroken for nearly fourteen years. As I have already quoted, Gibbon characterizes the last fourteen years of Constantine's reign as peaceful; "the general peace," says he, "which he maintained during the last fourteen years of his reign." I cannot, however, make it quite so long. If he is correct, then, it would be over fourteen, and in the fifteenth year of silence to the first voice. At all events, the "silence in the heaven" fell short of the full half-hour, by some months. It was therefore as the text declares, not exactly, but "about half an hour."

4. The Apocalyptic Temple

The sealing of the 144,000 being inaugurated at the opening of the Seventh Seal, by which sealing process the Spirit "spued out of his mouth" the Laodicean Catholicism of the Nikolaitans of the day—the Ariuses, Athanasiuses, Eusebiuses, Lactantiuses, and their coreligionists of the fourth century—the Temple, or Tabernacle of the Deity, in which he would condescend to sojourn upon the earth, must be sought for in connexion with a community to which these ecclesiastics, whether Arian or Athanasian, were opposed.

The reader will understand that during that Half-hour Period of the Seventh Seal, there were TWO TEMPLES in the Greco-Latin, or Roman, world. They were two hostile establishments which would tolerate no fellowship between their respective members. The one was constituted of all who styled one another Arians and Athanasians; of all who professed a religion of sacraments; worshipped the ghosts of martyrs; venerated relics; practised celibacy and monachism; commanded to abstain from meats; and gloried in their alliance with the State. This was the temple in which Paul in 2 Thess. 2:4, predicted "the Man of Sin, the Son of Perdition," would appear. That he would set himself up above all that is called god, or a power to which homage is paid; and that as a supreme power he would sit in the Temple of the Power, showing himself that he is a supreme power or god. The nucleus of this power had just been born, as the Man-child of the Catholic Woman; and, although an unbaptized emperor, sat in the temple and exhibited himself there as the supreme power, or god. He presided in the Nicene and other Councils, and made laws for his church; and punished with severe pains and penalties those who conscientiously refused submission to his decrees. He was constituted "Head of the Church," and determined all matters of discipline; and acted in all respects as the spiritual viceroy of the Deity. He confiscated the buildings in which the Donatists assembled; and sent many of them into banishment, which he ultimately revoked. He ordered the observance of martyr-festivals; dedicated churches with great solemnity; preached discourses in them; ordered the sacred observance of Sunday, to which he added that of Friday also, as the week-day of the crucifixion; and taught the soldiers of his army to pray by a form made for their use. But, sound principle being wanting, all this was mere superstition. His sermons had as little scriptural teachings of the truth, as those of the clerical speculators of our own time; they were rhetorical and indistinct, so that no determinate propositions can be extracted from them. He was the living incarnation of the spirit inhabiting the temple in which he sat enthroned. The worst of Constantine's character came out in the half-hour of this seal. "The conclusion of his reign" says Gibbon, "degraded him from the rank which he had acquired among the most deserving of the Roman princes. In the life of Constantine, we contemplate a hero, who had long inspired his subjects with love, and his enemies with terror, degenerating into a cruel and dissolute monarch, corrupted by his fortune, or raised by conquest above the necessity of dissimulation. An impartial narrative of the executions, or rather murders, which sullied his declining years, will suggest to our most candid thoughts, the idea of a prince who could sacrifice without reluctance the laws of justice, and the feelings of nature, to the dictates either of his passions or of his interest."

Maxentius, the ruler defeated by Constantine at the battle of Milvian Bridge just outside Rome (312). Just before this battle, he claimed to have seen the cross superimposed on the sun—thus his veneration of Sol Invictus the Sun god and toleration of Christianity. He treated the sun and the Christian God as one. As late as 318 he was issuing coins with the legend Sol Invictus Comes Augusti, and his edict enforced Sunday as a day of rest. His victory resulted in his domination of Rome, capital of the Empire.

Constantius is portrayed entering London in the year 296; as Caesar he was responsible for Spain, Gaul and Britain. He was the father of Constantine.

Licinius for a time shared the rule of the Empire with Constantine but was in turn defeated and ousted at Chrysopolis in 323. This left Constantine in sole command. On 18 Sept., 324 Constantine crossed the Bosphorus to receive the submission of Byzantium, which two years later he commenced to rebuild. He renamed it New Rome, or Constantinople as it came to be called.

Such was the Imperial Bishop of the Catholic Temple, in which superstition and self righteousness flourished vigorously; while “the truth as it is in Jesus” was utterly unknown, or disregarded. The patience of Deity, however, waited until about the end of the half-hour, when he began to visit upon the family of Constantine, “voices and thunderings and lightnings and earthquake,” in retribution of his crimes against the guiltless, his spiritual usurpation, and his blasphemy against heaven.

The medallion, (left) issued by Constantine depicts the Emperor on one side, his left shoulder covered by a shield on which can be seen the Wolf and Twins; his right hand holds the bridle of a horse, and behind a shield is a standard. On the imperial helmet in front of the plume is a Christogram. The reverse side shows the Emperor addressing his cavalry. The detail of the helmet indicates the dual commitment of Constantine to both Sol the sun god, and Christ. The standard visible behind Constantine’s shield recurs later as a specifically Christian object.

The medallion, (right)—This coin depicts an early form of the imperial “labarum”, the standard adopted by Constantine. It is significant that the standard is depicted as being thrust into a serpent. See Apoc. 12:9, 15.

But, in opposition to all this, the Deity was building for himself a habitation, in which his Word should be enthroned. Illustrative of this, we may remark, that Paul, in writing to the ecclesia of saints in Corinth, says in 1 Cor. 4:15, “I have begotten you in Christ Jesus through the gospel.” This was the prime agent of their introduction into Christ—the gospel ministered by the apostle; so that when, through a hearty belief of it, they came to be immersed for the putting on of him in whom they believed, he says to them in 1 Cor. 12:13, “By one Spirit are we all immersed into One Body, whether Jews or Gentiles.” The many members of this One Body being all the servants of the Deity sealed in their foreheads by the gospel, the apostle tells them in 1 Cor. 3 that they are “a building of Deity;” “built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the foundation-corner; in whom, all the building fitly framed together groweth into a HOLY TEMPLE in the Lord; in whom ye are builded together into a Habitation of the Deity through spirit,” or the truth (Eph. 2:20).

Thus, “the Deity dwelleth not in temples,” or “churches,” “made with hands,” but in a Holy Temple built by the formative power of the truth understood, believed, and obeyed. Every stone of this temple is living, and precious, and bought at the high price of the blood of Jesus Christ. Peter says, they are “lively stones built up a spiritual house,” or temple (1 Pet. 2:5; and in 2 Cor. 6:16), Paul repeats the idea, saying to the true believers, “Ye are the temple of the living Deity.” After such plain and pointed declarations as these, no one being acquainted with them, and comprehending them, can possibly believe, that the temples of the “religious world,” whether the term be affirmed of a name, or denomination, or of all names and denominations collectively, or of cathedrals, churches, chapels, and conventicles,—are temples of the Deity. These are none of his buildings. The impress of his workmanship is upon none of them; and therefore in none of them doth he reside, either by the truth, or spiritual gift.

The temples styled by the clericals “Houses of God,” are what Daniel’s prophecy denominates mivtzahrai mahuzzim, “Bazaars of the Guardians;” or ecclesiastical edifices dedicated to angels and the ghosts of saints, which are regarded in the mystery of spiritual sorcery, as “guardian spirits,” or protectors of those who honor them. In these church-bazaars are deposited “sacred” images and pictures of “saints.” They are Demon-Temples, wherein are placed shrines for the repose of relics, supposed to have belonged to the demon, or ghost, when a dweller upon earth; also silver, gold, and ivory crucifixes; old bones, and divers junk-store odds and ends, and various kinds of votive trumpery. They are literally “dens of thieves,” without ever having been houses of the Father—dens where people are robbed of their money under divers false pretences. They are places where pews are sold by auction, the proudest sittings being knocked down to Mammon’s greatest favorites; places where fairs of vanity and deceit are beheld for “pious objects;” and where spiritual empirics pretend to “cure souls” in consideration of so much per annum. In view of these facts, the scriptural epithet bestowed upon the ecclesiastical edifices of the Apostasy is most appropriate. They are truly Bazaars of spiritual merchandize; and the prospering craft, “the great men of the earth” made rich by trading in their wares, are the Bazaar-men who extort all kinds of goods from their customers by putting them in fear, and comforting them with counterfeits upon some fictitious bank in the world to come. They “buy and sell” under license from the Ecclesiastical Power, having received its mark in their right hand or in their foreheads, or the name of the beast, or the number of its name (Apoc. 13:16, 17). The catalogue of their merchandize is exhibited in Apoc. 18:12, 13. Among the articles of trade are tithes, bodies, and souls of men. But the trade of those soul-merchants is in any thing but a satisfactory state at present. Great numbers of their customers have discovered that the profit is all on one side; nor are they backward in proclaiming that when a favorable opportunity presents they will break up the iniquitous concern, and make the cheats disgorge their unhallowed gains. This will be a sad day, a day of universal bankruptcy for the weeping and wailing merchants of “Babylon the Great”—the temple of the Man of Sin; “for no man buyeth their merchandize any more.” When the man’s trade is thus broken up, nothing but ruin stares the shattered tradesman in the face. This is the fate that awaits the preachers of all the gospels of the Bazaars—gospels other than Paul preached, and which leave men in ignorance and disobedience; gospels which make them zealous partizans of human crotchets and traditions; and the apologists of anything sincerely professed as a substitute for the truth.

It is a remarkable characteristic of this designation, that the bazaars for priestly and clerical wares, are distinguished from houses or stores of fair and honorable trade, by the word Mauzzim, being styled Bazaars of Mauzzim. When jewelers, bakers, hardwaremen and such like, open stores, they emblazon their signs with their own names; but when the clergy open houses for the sale of their “spiritual things,” they impose upon the ignorant public the idea that the houses belong to the apostles, and to those whom the apostles fellowshiped as saints and brethren! They make their dupes believe that these ancient christian worthies are not dead, but alive in heaven, and greatly interested in human affairs, especially in church-edifices, and the spiritual things vended therein by clerical and ministerial auctioneers! Hence, they put their statues in niches and on parapets, and make them presents of the “sacred buildings” in dedicating them, as is clear from the names they bear; as the “church of the Holy Apostles,” and St. Sophia, at Constantinople, St. Peter’s at Rome, Our Lady’s at Paris, St. Paul’s at London, New York, and Richmond, and so forth, in all cities and countries of the Gentiles. The grossness of the imposition, however, is not confined merely to the dedication of their auctionrooms to nonentities as if really in being; but, while they give them to their alleged “departed spirits,” they will not permit the gospel the apostles preached, and the institutions they ordained, to be announced within their walls; but perversely persist in excluding it, and in making it of none effect by their vain and foolish traditions. But the whole system is a cheat, and a very profitable one for the present to those that live by it. It is ecclesiastical craft caused to prosper by the civil and military power; witness Rome, for instance, in the occupation of the French; what would become of church-craft, if the military power of France were withdrawn? Nay, what would become of it anywhere, but for the protection of the State? But this is emphatically the hour of church imposture and hypocrisy; which will certainly continue to prosper, until Israel's Commander shall appear; and by his energy cause the mightiness of the truth to prevail, to the disruption and annihilation of all unprofitable and lying vanities.

But to return. The temple of the Deity has no community of faith, interest, or practice with the spiritual bazaars of "the religious world." The apocalyptic temple is founded upon intelligence of the word, and is undefiled by the impostures and superstitions of the Apostasy. This is a temple the purity of which must be maintained, and he that defiles it by word or action will be certainly destroyed; as saith the apostle to the faithful in Christ Jesus, "If any man defile the temple of the Deity, him shall the Deity destroy; for the temple of the Deity is holy, which temple ye are" (1 Cor. 3:17).

Now this temple of the Deity is apocalyptically manifested in two states. In the first state, the "Tabernacle of the Testimony" alone is visible, and that not in the heaven, though in heaven in a certain sense (ch. 8:3; 13:6); but, in the second state, "the temple of the Tabernacle of the Testimony" becomes visible; and its interior even is opened, and the Ark of the Covenant is seen therein; and the whole developed in the heaven (Apoc. 3:12; 11:19; 15:5; 21:22).

These apocalyptic temple states answer to the Altar-Court, the Holy Place, and the Most Holy within the Vail of the Mosaic Building. The apocalyptic Altar-Court and the Holy Place are what Paul styles in Eph. 1:3, "the Heavenlies in Christ." They are constituted of "the saints and faithful in Christ Jesus," who are partakers with the Altar, and worshippers therein (1 Cor. 9:13; 10:18; Heb. 13:10; Apoc. 11:1). An Ecclesia of Christ is, apocalyptically speaking, "the Altar and them that worship therein." They who constitute it have all been "cleansed in the Laver of the Water with doctrine;" and in passing through the water have passed into the Christ-Altar, and become one with it. When they die, they lie under the Altar, or "sleep in Jesus;" when they are slain for the word of the Deity and for their testimony, they are blood-souls under the Altar, crying for vengeance. But while they are living in the present state of tribulation and patience waiting for Christ, they are Altar-worshippers "having access by faith into" the heavenlies where Christ sits at the right hand of Power (Eph. 1:20; Rom. 5:2).

But, being constituents of the Altar, they are "a Holy Priesthood," consecrated for the purpose of "Offering up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to the Deity through Jesus Christ" (1 Pet. 2:5). Now these sacrifices have to be offered both in the Altar-Court and in the Holy Place, where are the Bread and the Wine, and the ministry of the word, prayer, praise, and fellowship. As a community of priests, the faithful come together on the First Day of the Week, and in their session are manifested as a Heavenly; as a Holy Place; as the Tabernacle of the Testimony, "showing forth the praises of Him, who hath called them out of darkness into his marvellous light" ver. 9. In their ministrations and worship they stand, as it were an angel at the altar in the court, with the golden frankincense bowl of prayer. They are themselves this golden bowl, in which is much incense of prayers and praises, which they offer upon the golden altar. Their petitions and thanksgiving are kindled into odors of acceptable perfume by the fire taken from the altar of the court; and as constituents also of the golden altar of the Holy Place, the perfumes ascend before the Deity as it were out of the angel's hand.

The Triumphal Arch of Constantine near the Colosseum, Rome

A monument to the changing times, the arch is famous for the inscription in the middle of the attica. An English translation reads: "To the Emperor Caesar Flavius Constantine the Great pious, happy, Augustus, since he, inspired by the Godhead and by greatness of spirit, with his army, with lawful weapons and with one blow, avenged the State upon the enemy and upon his whole troop, the Senate and the Roman people dedicate this arch as a sign of his triumph."

The reference to the Godhead was a neutral expression acceptable to both pagans and Christians!

The reader will perceive that we are now in view of the scene dramatically exhibited in ch. 8:3–5. In this the angel, the altar, the golden censer, and the golden altar, are all symbolical of one body—the temple of the Deity; or the saints in their spiritual apparatus of worship. They were the thousands being sealed in the half hour, whose prayers against Constantine and his Clergy, in their perversions of the truth and blasphemies against heaven, were answered when the half hour was about expiring, by the "voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and earthquake," which retributively scourged their enemies, the family of the emperor, and the excessively corrupt and vicious Catholic Church. The answer to the prayers from the Divine Temple is dramatized by the angel filling the censer or frankincense bowl with fire of the altar of sacrifice and casting it into the earth. This scene indicates that the judgments inflicted upon the church-peoples or Gentiles of "Christendom" are in the interest of the true believers. In writing to these, Paul says, "All things are for your sakes" (2 Cor. 4:15). These voices, and thunders, and lightnings, and earthquake, were for the sake of those "whose prayers ascended before the Deity out of the angel's hand." The voices, and so forth, would work no harm to them, provided they "loved the Deity, and were the called according to his purpose" (Rom. 8:28). The sealed of the 144,000 Foursquare Community prayed, and, in so doing, sent up many perfumes from their burning hearts, which smoked before the Deity. In his presence is their Forerunner, the Head and Chief of their community, no longer like themselves, "compassed with infirmity," but perfected, and, as the Quickening Spirit, makes intercession for them according to the Divine Will (Rom. 8:26, 27). He returned the answer to their prayers; for to him is given all power in heaven and in earth (Matt. 28:18). The judicial fire, therefore, went forth from the Christ-Altar, and kindled judgment upon the Arians and Athanasians of the Laodicean Apostasy, styled "the earth," illustrating the saying of Paul, "our Deity is a consuming fire."

The reader will observe that, during this half-hour of silence in the heaven in which the prayers of the sealed saints are odoriferously and fragrantly ascending, the Seven Angel-Trumpeters are standing inactive before Deity. They are represented, in ch. 8:2, as having received their trumpets, but they are not in the attitude of sounding. The powers they represent are quiescent; for, in ch. 7:1–3, four of them—the first four to sound—were commanded not to operate until the sealing was effected to a due degree. They stand by, therefore, waiting during the half-hour of incense-burning, during the "voices, and thunders, and lightnings, and earthquake," and during all the years elapsing between the earthquake and the consummation of the sealing, when they "prepare themselves to sound" (ch. 8:6).

The temple and altar of the Deity are measured, which is equivalent to saying that the saints who constitute the temple and altar are measured. Their measurement is 144,000 furlongs, or 144 cubits. This is the "measurement of the Man, that is, of an Angel" (Apoc. 21:17). None are included in this measurement who are not in the Man, who have not believed into Christ, and are, consequently, not members of the One Body, which is the almighty angel or Messenger of the Apocalypse. All not of this measured community constitute "the Court which is without the temple." This is cast out unmeasured and given to the Gentiles (Apoc. 11:1, 2)—who, in relation to the temple of the Deity, are mere outside barbarians, "walking after the imaginations of their evil hearts." This ejected Court of the Gentiles is wholly occupied by those symbols of their civil and ecclesiastical organization, the beast of the sea, the beast of the earth, and the image, and the scarlet-colored beast and drunken woman that sits thereon. What are termed "the Names and Denominations of Christendom," all belong to this outside arena or court, reeking with pollution, and with the blood of the saints and witnesses of Jesus (Apoc. 17:6). No fragrant perfumes ascend from this court before the Deity. It is the arena of “philosophy and vain deceit;” of “science falsely so-called;” of “voluntary humility and worshipping of angels;” of “ordinances after the commandments and doctrines of men, which are a mere show of wisdom in will-worship;” of vain heathen repetitions, in which they think they will be heard for much and loud speaking; of professional prayer-making and sermon-mongering; of “seducing spirits and teachings of demons, who speak lies in hypocrisy with a seared conscience, forbidding to marry and commanding to abstain from meats;” of pietistic riotings for religion-getting; it is the arena of all these abominations and blasphemies, and yet more than we have time or space to set forth. These are the pestiferous odors that ascend to heaven from this “court without the temple.” They are a thick and heavy fog, too dense to transmit a ray of light from the anointing that shines within the Tabernacle of the Testimony. “Darkness,” therefore, “covers the earth, and gross darkness the peoples.” The worship of this court, according to the rituals of the Greeks, Latins, and Teutons, is mere will-worship. The Deity has not required it of them; and that which he has required they will not observe to do. Catholics and Protestants, churchmen and dissenters, are all outer court worshippers of Deity “according to the dictates of their own consciences,” not according to his appointment. Their worship, therefore, is vain, and not a spiritual sacrifice. “Spiritual sacrifices acceptable to the Deity through Jesus Christ,” do not belong to this ejected outer court. Worship in spirit and in truth (and the Father-Spirit seeks only such (John 4:23, 24) belongs exclusively to the Altar and Holy Place—to the Tabernacle of the Testimony. In this only are spiritual sacrifices offered according to the truth. The sacrifices of the Names and Denominations of the Outer Court are offensive abominations; for “the sacrifice and way and thoughts of the wicked are an abomination to Yahweh; he is far from them, and heareth not their prayer” (Prov. 15:8, 9, 26, 29). And that they are wicked, though professors of piety, they themselves confess in their liturgy, saying “Lord have mercy upon us, miserable sinners! We have done those things we ought not to have done, and we have left undone those things we ought to do; and there is no health in us!” Miserable sinners in whom there is no health are unquestionably the wicked. The Outer-Court Church, or “Religious World,” is constituted of the wicked; who confess that the charge made against them by the Spirit is true—that they “are wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked” Laodiceans. Now the scripture saith, “the Deity heareth not sinners”—“they cry unto Yahweh, but he heareth them not;” but of the true worshippers of the Tabernacle of the Testimony it saith, “if any man doeth his will, him he heareth;” and “the eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears are open to their prayers.”

The faithful in Christ Jesus are styled apocalyptically, “His Tabernacle,” because they constitute the only habitation the Deity has on earth. “He dwells not in temples made with hands,” but in the hearts of his worshippers in spirit and in truth. In writing to these, the apostle saith, “Let Christ dwell in your hearts by faith;” and Christ said, “I am the truth.” When the truth, therefore, dwells or tabernacles in a man, the Deity dwells there. Hence, an ecclesia of such men is the Deity’s Tabernacle preeminently.

It is furthermore styled the Tabernacle of the Testimony, because the faithful in Christ are the community of saints “who keep the commandments of the Deity, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ” (ch. 12:17); and “the testimony is the spirit of the prophecy” contained in the apocalypse (ch. 19:10). The apostle John was one of this tabernacle, for he bare record of the testimony and suffered for it in Patmos (ch. 1:2, 9). The souls were laid under the altar in blood because of their faithfulness to this testimony (ch. 6:9). The tabernacle overcame the Dragon, red with their blood, by the word of their testimony (ch. 12:11). It is synonymous with “the Name,” and “them dwelling in the heaven;” for all the constituents of the tabernacle are constituents of the Name, having been all immersed into the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, and they “dwell in the heaven,” in the sense that “the Deity hath made them to sit together in the heavenlies in Christ Jesus” (Eph. 2:6). Saints walking in the truth, and being in fellowship with the apostles, and therefore with the Father and the Son (1 John 1:3), are a holy, heavenly community; and, being all in Christ, when they sit down to break bread and to drink wine, as Aaron and his sons did in the typical heavenly place, and to be instructed by the exposition of the word, which shines into their understanding and illuminates them, after the type of the seven branched lamp enlightening Aaron and his sons, the faithful sit down together in Christ, and apocalyptically “dwell in the heaven” (ch. 13:6).

But, though the Tabernacle of the Testimony is visible on earth and may be discerned by all who have spiritual understanding; and though it is now the temple of the Deity, it is not the tabernacle and temple as it will be in the future state. The whole temple of the Deity consists of the Altar-Court, the Holy Place or Tabernacle, and the Most Holy Place or naos. These are the apocalyptic divisions, and answer to like divisions in Solomon’s building. The word naos is applied in Greek to the inmost part of a temple occupied by the Deity worshipped. In ch. 15:5, the whole divine habitation is styled ho naos res skenes tou marturiou en to ourano, the Nave of the Tabernacle of the Testimony in the heaven, understanding by nave the place where “Deity manifested in Flesh justified by spirit” dwells. In this sense, the apocalyptic nave is separated from the tabernacle by the Veil of flesh. That is, those who constitute the tabernacle are believing men and women, in the flesh and mortal; while those who constitute the nave will be flesh and bones incorruptible and deathless, that is, spirit, as Jesus Christ is now. The way into “the Nave of the Deity” has been demonstrated by him—first, wash in the Laver of immersion, through which the Altar is approached; then the Tabernacle is entered; death places under the Altar, and the Veil is rent; but, secondly, resurrection to incorruptibility and life constitutes the subject who had been a constituent of the Tabernacle a constituent also of the Nave. At present, the Nave is not opened. It is not yet in manifestation as the Tabernacle is. Jesus is the Nave, being a quickened as well as a Quickening Spirit; and true believers have the promise that “they shall be like him.” They, therefore, now enter within the veil where he is, not in person, but by faith; for now they “walk by faith, not by sight.”

The grand difference between the Tabernacle and the Nave is the difference between flesh and spirit. When the true believers shall be perfected, they will have been both flesh and spirit. As flesh, they are the Tabernacle of the Testimony, witnessing for Jesus against the Apostasy enthroned in the Outer Court; and, as spirit, they are the Nave of the Deity with “the Ark of his Covenant” in their midst, ready to consummate the wrath of the Deity in developing “the lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and earthquake, and great hail,” by which the lies, superstitions, and institutions of the Outside Arena will be utterly swept away.

The opening of the Nave is “the apocalypse of the Sons of the Deity” (Rom. 8:19). “We are now the sons of the Deity,” says John, “but it doth not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when He (Christ) shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is” (1 John 3:2). This is apocalyptically expressed by the words, “The Nave of the Deity was opened in the heaven, and the Ark of his Covenant was seen in his Nave.” It is nowhere seen in the Tabernacle of the Testimony in the apocalyptic visions, because the Ark belongs to the Most Holy, not to the Holy, heavenly ecclesia. These words of Apoc. 11:19, are interpreted in ch. 14:1, by “the Lamb standing on Mount Zion, and with him an 144,000.” The Lamb of this vision is the Ark of that, and the 144,000, in the midst of whom he dwells, the Nave of the Deity.

But, when the Nave is apocalysped, it is accessible only to the glorified community of the saved, each of whom is a pillar in the Nave (ch. 3:12). When opened in the heaven of the apocalypse, it is “filled with smoke from the glory of the Deity, and from his power.” The door of admission into it is closed against all occupants of the Outside Arena. Only those who are ready enter into the marriage, and, against all who are without light, “the door is shut” (Matt. 25:8, 10). This exclusion, however, is not perpetual. “No man is able to enter into the Nave TILL the Seven Plagues of the Seven Angels are fulfilled” (ch. 15:8).

When the judgment given to the saints is fully executed, and they have possessed themselves of the kingdom and dominion under the whole heaven (Dan. 7:18, 26, 27), then the smoke of the power of Deity in wrathful exercise will be dispelled; and the nations shall walk in the light of it, being “blessed in Abraham and his Seed,” and “the kings of the earth shall bring their glory and their honor into it” (ch. 21:24).

Though this is especially affirmed of the Holy City, it is also affirmable of the Nave; for the glorified saints who constitute the one also constitute the other. But, in respect to the saints in their relation to Deity, the Nave, as distinct from the Holy City, no longer obtains. While judgment is being executed by the saints, as the Most Holy smoking with wrath, the Kingdom is being set up; when this is established, the smoking Nave becomes quiescent, and the Holy City is apocalypsed in all its glory. “I saw no Nave therein,” says John. If he had seen a nave in the Holy City, he would have seen a community higher in dignity, glory, honor, and nature, as the peculiar habitation of the Father, than the Holy Municipality constituted of the Lamb and his Bride, the saints glorified together with him (Rom. 8:17, 32). He saw “no nave therein,” for Jesus and his Brethren glorified are the incorporation of the Spirit of the Father, between whom and them there are no intermediates in whom he dwells. Between him and the Tabernacle of the Testimony there is intermediation, because the Nave is not yet opened in the apocalyptic heaven, and that intermediate personage is the Forerunner into the Nave-state, even the Lord Jesus; but when the Forerunner and the runners after him shall meet in the glorious Nave-Convention, all intermediation between them and the Father will have been done away, and he will be epi panton, kai dia panton, kai en pasin, “over all, and through all, and in all,” or ta panta en pasin, “the all things in all” (Eph. 4:6; 1 Cor. 15:28); so that this “all” will be a DIVINE UNITY, or Deity manifested in Flesh, justified or perfected by spirit. This is the great, glorious, and omnipotent “e Pluribus Unum” of the apocalypse—a Nave or Unum, constituted of a Multitude “which no man can number.” It is in direct and intimate union with the Deity, as Jesus is at the present time. Between the Father and Son there is no intermediate, neither will there be between the Father and all his Sons—Jesus and his Brethren—when the Nave is “opened in the heaven.”

But John’s declaration that he saw no Nave in the Holy City is immediately followed in the Common Version by the intimation causatively expressed, to wit, “For the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it” (ch. 21:22). But what John penned is preferable to this version of it; as, “For the Lord the Deity, the Almighty, is the Nave of it, even the Lamb.” This, presented in harmony with the Mosaic teaching, would read, “For Yahweh Elohim, the Almighty, is the Nave of it, even the Lamb.” “Not by army, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith Yahweh Tz’vaoth.” Now, the Lamb with Seven Horns and Seven Eyes is the symbol of the Seven Spirits of the Deity, or omnipotence, that is, of the Eternal Spirit. Yahweh Elohim is the multitudinous apocalypse of this the “One Spirit,” apocalypsed or manifested in Jesus and his Brethren “glorified together.” They, in “the Time of the End,” and in all subsequent aions, will be “Yahweh Elohim, the Almighty, the Nave of the Holy City,” in which John saw no Nave; for the Holy City, being a sinless, guileless, faultless, incorruptible, and deathless municipality in all its constituents, is no longer in need of temple arrangements. The Ezekiel temple is a “house of prayer for all nations,” in which the “Yahweh Elohim Almighty” will officiate as the sacerdotal intermediation between him who dwells in light, whom no man can see and live, and all the enlightened, justified and regenerated nations of the Millennial Age (Exod. 33:20, 1 Tim. 6:16).

INDUCTION OF THE JUDGEMENTS OF THE SEVENTH SEAL

THOUGH CAST OUT OF THE THIRD OF THE HEAVEN, AS INDICATED BY HIS TAIL DRAWING THE THIRD OF THE STARS OF THE HEAVEN, AND CASTING THEM INTO THE EARTH (APOC. 12:4), THE DRAGON STILL RETAINED POWER IN “THE EARTH AND SEA”

OF THE GRECO-LATIN POLITY (APOC. 12:12, 13, 15, 16; 7:3). HIS POWER THERE WAS A “WOE” TO THEIR INDWELLERS, NOT EXCEPTING THOSE WHO PROFESSED THE FAITH OF JESUS. RETRIBUTION, HOWEVER, FOLLOWED IN HIS ENTIRE EXCLUSION FROM THE HEAVEN, A.D. 324 (APOC. 12:8); UPON WHICH THE SEALING OF THE 144,000 SERVANTS OF THE DEITY, AND THE PERIOD OF “SILENCE, ABOUT HALF AN HOUR,” BEGAN. FURTHER RETRIBUTION WAS SUSPENDED DURING THE SILENCE; BUT THIS BEING ENDED, THE PRAYERS OF ALL THE SAINTS, WHICH ASCENDED DURING THE SILENCE AS A CLOUD OF INCENSE FROM THE GOLDEN ALTAR OF THE TABERNACLE OF THE TESTIMONY, BEFORE THE DEITY (APOC. 8:3, 4), WERE ANSWERED BY “VOICES, AND THUNDERS, AND LIGHTNINGS, AND EARTHQUAKE,” (APOC. 8:5); WHICH PRECEDED THE PREPARATION OF THE SEVEN TRUMPETERS TO SOUND AGAINST THE EARTH AND SEA (APOC. 8:6).

1. “And there were Voices.”

The Angel of the Golden Altar, as we have seen, represents a community—a community consisting of all the saints, with their Chief within the Veil, contemporary with the generation existing in the days of the silence, the voices, the thunders, the lightnings, and the earthquake. These saints were the sufferers by the persecutions of Constantine and his clergy; their prayers would therefore be for deliverance, and divine retribution upon the oppressor who was ruling them unrighteously with a rod of iron (ch. 12:5). “And shall not the Deity avenge his own elect, who cry day and night unto him, though he bear long with them? I tell you, said Jesus, that he will avenge them speedily” (Lk. 18:7). This was verified in the instance of these saints. Before the half hour of silence was fully expired, their frankincense bowl was dramatically filled with fire of the sacrificial altar, and it was cast into the earth. This symbolic action indicates the nature of their prayers. Fire is the symbol of judgment against those upon whom it falls; and it was cast in answer to the prayers of all the saints; by which therefore we may know that they had been praying for the avengement of their wrongs upon the heads of their enemies. It was dramatically cast out of the heaven into the earth. We have seen that the saints who constitute the tabernacle and its apparatus of worship, “dwell in the heaven”; because they constitute the holy and heavenly corporation. In relation to them, the Gentiles of the outside arena, or world, whether they be rulers or nations ruled, are “the earth” and “the inhabitants of the earth”; while these, in relation to affairs peculiarly heathen or gentile, have a heaven, and earth and sea special to themselves. The judicial fire being cast at the prayerful instance of “them who dwell in the heaven,” it is represented as falling thence “into the earth,” although it especially affected those who dwelt in that other heaven where the silence reigned. The saints did not dwell in this heaven. The Imperial Bishop of the Laodicean Apostasy, and his Hierarchy of Arian and Athanasian Priests, dwelt in the heaven out of which the Great Red Dragon had been cast, and from which silence was about to depart. The saints lived under this heaven, not in it; and were sun-stricken and scorched by the day-star of its firmament (ch. 7:16). Voices were the first results of the Lamb’s response to the prayers of his saints. The offering of perfumes in the tabernacle being ended, the noise began in the court without. They were the voices of the Lamb rendering recompense to his enemies. On the twenty-second of May, A.D. 337, death terminated the life of Constantine, at the age of sixty-four. The demonstrations of mourning were excessive. His body, adorned with the vain symbols of greatness, the purple and diadem, was deposited on a golden bed, in an apartment of his palace at Constantinople, splendidly furnished and illuminated for the purpose. The forms of the court were strictly maintained. Every day, at the appointed hours, the principal officers of the state, the army, and the household, approaching the person of their dead emperor with bended knees and a composed countenance, offered their respectful homage as seriously as if he had been still alive! From motives of policy, this theatrical representation was for some time continued; and, in the language of Laodicean flattery, it was remarked that Constantine alone, by the peculiar indulgence of heaven, had reigned after his death.

But this reign could subsist only in empty pageantry, and therefore by the favor, not of heaven, but of fools and assassins; who, while they were performing their idolatrous antics before the corpse of their deceased sovereign, were intriguing against the welfare of his kindred. His ministers and generals conducted their intrigue with zeal and secrecy till they had obtained a loud and unanimous Voice from the soldiery, that they would suffer none except the sons of Constantine, to reign over the Roman empire. These military factions continued above four months; and, if they had proceeded no further than to make this loyal declaration, Constantine's three sons, Constantius, Constantine and Constans, would have entered peaceably into the possession of the empire, and the silence in the heaven would have remained unbroken. But this was not the purpose of the Deity. His name had been blasphemed, His truth perverted, His worship superseded by theatricals, and His saints oppressed, and therefore vengeance must be executed upon the guilty. It was destined to begin in the heaven by putting an end to the silence there with a voice of the cry of shepherds, and a howling of the princes of the imperial house. Astonished and overwhelmed by the tide of popular fury, they remained without the power of flight, or of resistance, in the hands of their implacable enemies. Their fate, however, was suspended till the arrival of Constantius, who, according to Athanasius, made oath for the security of his kinsmen.

But the oaths of princes are mere matters of convenience. Having allayed their apprehensions by an imperial promise, his next business was to trump up some specious pretense by which he might release himself from its obligations. The arts of fraud were made subservient to the designs of cruelty; and a manifest forgery was attested by Eusebius, the catholic bishop of Nicomedia. He handed to Constantius a fatal scroll, affirmed to be the genuine testament of his father; in which the emperor expressed his suspicions that he had been poisoned by his brothers; and conjured his sons to avenge his death, and to consult their own safety by the punishment of the guilty. The spirit, and even the forms, of legal proceedings were violated in a promiscuous massacre; which involved the two uncles of Constantius, seven of his cousins, of whom Dalmatius and Hannibalianus were the most illustrious, the patrician Optatus, who had married the sister of the late emperor, and the praefect Ablavius, the proud favorite of Constantine, who had long directed his counsels and abused his confidence, and whose power and riches had inspired him with some hopes of obtaining the purple. "If it were necessary," says Gibbon, "to aggravate the horrors of this bloody scene, we might add, that Constantius himself had espoused the daughter of his uncle Julius, and that he had bestowed his sister in marriage on his cousin Hannibalianus. These alliances, which the policy of Constantine, regardless of the public prejudice, had formed between the several branches of the imperial house, served only to convince mankind, that these princes were as cold to the endearments of conjugal affection, as they were insensible to the ties of consanguinity, and the moving entreaties of youth and innocence. Of so numerous a family, Gallus and Julian alone, the two youngest children of Julius Constantius, were saved from the hands of the assassins, till their rage, satiated with slaughter, had in some measure subsided. The Emperor Constantius, who, in the absence of his brothers, was the most obnoxious to guilt and reproach, discovered, on some future occasions, a faint and transient remorse for those cruelties which the perfidious counsels of his ministers, and the irresistible violence of the troops, had extorted from his inexperienced youth."

The massacre of their kindred was succeeded by a division of the empire between the three brothers. Constantine, the eldest, ruled Gaul, Spain, and Britain; Constantius, Thrace, and the countries east; while Italy, Africa, and the Western Illyricum, acknowledged the sovereignty of Constans. But, after this partition, three years had scarcely elapsed before these unnatural brothers seemed impatient to convince the world of their total unfitness for their position. Constantine soon complained with a voice of discontent, that he was defrauded of his just proportion of the spoils of their murdered kinsmen. He therefore demanded of Constans the cession of the African provinces, as an equivalent for Macedonia and Greece, which he had acquired by the death of Dalmatius. Constans' want of sincerity in the negotiation which proved tedious and fruitless, exasperated the fierceness of his temper; and he eagerly listened to his favorites who suggested that both his honor and interest were concerned in the prosecution of the quarrel. At the head therefore of a tumultuary band, suited for rapine rather than for conquest, he suddenly broke into the dominions of Constans, who, on the voice of this invasion reaching his ears, detached some Illyrian troops against him. The conduct of his lieutenants soon terminated the unnatural contest. By artful appearances of flight, Constantine was betrayed into an ambuscade concealed in a wood, where, with a few attendants, he was surprised, surrounded, and slain.

The fate of Constans himself was delayed about ten years, and the revenge of his brother's death was reserved for the more ignoble hand of a domestic traitor. The vices and weakness of Constans had lost him the esteem and affections of the people. The public discontent encouraged Magnentius, an ambitious soldier, to assert the honor of the Roman name. Aided by the friendship of Marcellinus, count of the sacred largesses, he was enabled to persuade the soldiery to break the bonds of hereditary servitude, and to salute him as emperor in the place of the degenerate Constans. In February of the year 350, Magnentius became master of the troops and treasure of the palace and city of Autun. The voice of the desertion of his soldiers and subjects, left no alternative to Constans but flight or instant death. He fled for a seaport in Spain, but ere he could reach it, he was overtaken near Helena at the foot of the Pyrenees, by a party of light cavalry, whose chief, regardless of the sanctity of a temple, executed his commission by putting him to death.

The usurpation of the sceptre of the West by a perfidious barbarian, excited the indignation of Nepotian, a rash youth, son of the princess Eutropia, and nephew of Constantine. Arming a number of desperate slaves and gladiators, he overpowered the feeble domestic guard of Rome, received the homage of the Senate, and assuming the title of Augustus, precariously reigned during a tumult of twenty-eight days. The march of some regular forces put an end to his ambitious hopes; the rebellion was extinguished in his blood, in that of his mother Eutropia, and of his adherents; and the proscription was extended to all who had contracted a fatal alliance with the name and family of "Constantine the Great."

Another voice that disturbed the tranquility of "the heaven" was the ferocious administration and tragical death of the Caesar, Gallus A.D. 354. Gallus, and his half-brother Julian, afterwards styled "the Apostate" by Arian and Trinitarian Laodiceans, were the two nephews of Constantine, who were saved from the fury of the catholic soldiery when they massacred his kindred. Gallus was then about twelve, and Julian about six, years of age. The jealousy of Constantius consigned them to the strong castle of Macellum, near Caesarea, an ancient palatial residence of the kings of Cappadocia. Carefully educated in the philosophy and science falsely so-called of the day, they passed six years of their existence there, deprived of fortune, of freedom, and of safety, in the company of slaves, devoted to the commands of a tyrant, who had already injured them in the murder of their kin beyond the hope of reconciliation. At length, however, the emergencies of the state compelled Constantius to invest him with the title and authority of Caesar, and to cement the political connection, to give him the princess Constantina, the cruel and ambitious daughter of Constantine, for wife. His residence was fixed at Antioch, from whence he ruled with delegated authority the eastern prefecture during three years; while his brother Julian obtained an appearance of liberty, and the restitution of an ample patrimony.

But he soon proved himself incapable of reigning. A temper naturally morose and violent, instead of being corrected, was soured by solitude and adversity; and the ungoverned sallies of his rage were often fatal to those who approached his person, or were subject to his power. Constantina, his wife, is described as one of the infernal furies tormented with an insatiate thirst of human blood. She exasperated the fierce passions of her husband whose cruelty was sometimes displayed in the undissembled violence of popular and military executions; and was sometimes disguised by the abuse of law, and the forms of judicial proceedings. A general consternation was diffused through the capital of Syria, the provinces, and among his own courtiers. But he forgot that he was depriving himself of his only support, the affection of the people; whilst he afforded the unnatural and timid emperor the fairest pretence of exacting the forfeit of his purple and of his life.

As long as the lightning of internal war was flashing between Constantius and Magnentius, the emperor dissembled his knowledge of the weak and cruel administration to which his choice had subjected the East. But when victory was decided in his favor, Constantius privately resolved, either to deprive Gallus of the purple, or at least to remove him from the indolent luxury of Asia to the hardships and dangers of a German war. Two ministers of illustrious rank, Domitian and Montius, were empowered to visit and reform the state of the East. The rashness of these commissioners hastened their own ruin, as well as the Caesar's. Discarding all prudence, Domitian delivered a concise and haughty mandate, importing that the Caesar should immediately repair to Italy, and threatening that his delay or hesitation should be punished, by suspending the usual allowance of his household. Gallus replied to this by delivering Domitian to the custody of a guard. Upon this, Montius aggravated the situation by his reproaches; and by requiring the civil and military officers, in the name of their sovereign, to defend the persons and dignity of his representatives. By this rash declaration of war, Gallus was provoked to embrace the most desperate counsels. He ordered his guards to stand to their arms, and appealed to the populace for safety and revenge. His commands were fatally obeyed. They seized on Domitian and Montius, and tying their legs with ropes, dragged them through the streets of Antioch, and precipitated their mangled and lifeless bodies into the Orontes.

The arrest of Gallus in his capital from this voice appearing to be dangerous, the slower and safer policy of dissimulation was practised with success. He was deceived by the affected tranquility, and frequent epistolary professions of confidence and friendship from "the Head of the Church." After so many reciprocal injuries, Gallus had reason to fear and distrust. But he had neglected the opportunities of flight and of resistance; and being deprived of the credit of his wife by her unseasonable death, the ruin in which he had been involved by her impetuous passions was completed.

After a long delay, the reluctant Caesar set forwards on his journey to the imperial court. Having arrived at Hadrianople, he received a mandate, expressed in the most haughty and absolute style, that his splendid retinue should halt in that city, while the Caesar himself, should hasten to the imperial residence at Milan. The dissimulation which had hitherto been preserved, was laid aside at Petovio in Pannonia. He was conducted to a palace in the suburbs, where the general Barbatio awaited the arrival of his illustrious victim. In the evening, he was arrested, ignominiously stripped of the ensigns of Caesar, and hurried away to Pola in Istria. His horror was increased by the appearance of his implacable enemy the eunuch Eusebius, by whom, with the aid of a notary and tribune, he was interrogated concerning the administration of the East. Sunk under the weight of shame and guilt, he confessed everything with which he was charged. Constantius was easily convinced that his own safety was incompatible with the life of his cousin. The sentence of death was signed, despatched, and executed; and the nephew of the great Constantine, with his hands tied behind his back, was beheaded in prison like the vilest malefactor. Such were the VOICES by which silence was excluded from the heaven; and the family of "the First Christian Emperor" nearly exterminated from the earth! How true it is that "the seed of evil-doers shall not be renowned to the Olahm. Prepare slaughter for his children for the iniquity of their fathers, that they may not rise, nor possess the earth, nor fill the face of the world with cities" (Isa. 14:20). This was said of Belshazzar in whose kindred it was verified, as it was afterwards so notably in Constantine's. Constantius was the only one of them who died a natural death. Why was slaughter prepared for Constantine's kindred? The only scriptural answer that can be given is that he was preeminently an evil-doer. He was the Antichrist of his day, the newly born Man-Child of Sin, and Son of Perdition; "who opposed and exalted himself above all that is called Power, or an object of veneration; so that he as a supreme power sat in the temple of the Power, showing himself that he is supreme." The bloody fate that befell his family by "the voices" is significant of the like consummation that awaits the family of Antichrist by the "lightnings, thunders, and voices" which are to "proceed out of the throne" at the approaching "apocalypse of the sons of the Deity." The sanguinary extermination of the modern family of the Antichrist, will be as complete as that of Constantine. The Voices of the Deity are terrific to all evil-doers. They spared Gallus and Julian in childhood; but when their characters were developed, and they proved themselves evil as their catholic fathers were, voices were uttered against them also, and they too were swept from among the living.

2. "And there were Thunders"

The twenty-four years of the reign of Constantius were a period of "voices, and thunders, and lightnings," ending in "earthquake." The whole period was characterized by these, which, affecting the so-called "christian church," evinced the displeasure of Heaven, and the indignant contempt of the Deity for its unholy and blasphemous speculations on the consubstantiality or likeness of his Son. "The christian religion, which, in itself," says Ammianus truly, "is plain and simple, Constantius confounded by the dotage of superstition. Instead of reconciling the (Arian and Athanasian) parties by the weight of his authority, he cherished and propagated, by verbal disputes, the differences which his vain curiosity had excited. The highways were covered with troops of bishops galloping from every side to the assemblies which they called synods; and while they labored to reduce the whole sect (of catholics) to their own particular opinions, the public establishment of the posts was almost ruined by their hasty and repeated journeys." This remarkable passage justifies the reasonable apprehensions of Athanasius, that the restless activity of the clergy, who wandered round the empire in search of the true faith, would excite the contempt and laughter of the unbelieving world.

When we consider the impiety and profanity of the church, and the blind impulsiveness of Constantius, the Head thereof, whom its spirituals distinguished by the acceptable and lofty title of "BISHOP OF BISHOPS"—a title well befitting the Antichrist of the day—there is no room for surprise at the "thunders and lightnings" that shook and rent the firmament of the heaven. On the frontier, between the Roman and Persian empires, there was a continued roar of conflict between the two nations from the death of Constantine through all the reign of Constantius. The irregular incursions of the light troops alternately spread terror and devastation beyond the Tigris and Euphrates, from the gates of Ctesiphon to those of Antioch. This active service was performed by the Arabs of the desert, who were divided in their interest and affections; some of their independent chiefs favoring the King of Persia, whilst others had engaged their doubtful fidelity to the Roman emperor. The more grave and important operations of the war were conducted with equal vigor; and the armies of Rome and Persia encountered each other in nine bloody fields, which, with the campaign of Julian, resulted in the slaughter of thousands of catholics and pagans; and the restoration of five provinces beyond the Tigris, the impregnable city of Nisibis, and certain places in Mesopotamia, to the Persians.

But beside this long war in the East, there were thunders also in the West, that uttered their voices with terrible effect. While the lightning of civil discord was illuminating the heaven with its glare, a numerous swarm of Franks and Allemanni crossed the Rhine, and inflicted upon the catholics of the empire incalculable misery. Forty-five flourishing cities, Tongres, Cologne, Treves, Worms, Spire, Strasburg, &c., besides a far greater number of towns and villages, were pillaged, and for the most part reduced to ashes. The scenes of their devastations were three times more extensive than that of their conquests. At a still greater distance the open towns of Gaul were deserted, and the inhabitants of the fortified cities, who trusted to their strength and vigilance, were obliged to content themselves with such supplies of corn as they could raise on the vacant land within the enclosure of their walls.

Under these melancholy circumstances, Julian, the brother of Gallus, was appointed Caesar, A.D. 356, and sent to Gaul, as he expressed it himself, to exhibit the vain image of imperial greatness. Though profoundly ignorant of the practical arts of war and government, the active vigor of his own genius, aided by the wisdom and experience of Sallust, an officer of rank, enabled him soon to acquire a reputation in both departments in advance of his contemporaries. In Aug. A.D. 357, he encountered thirty-five thousand of the bravest warriors of Germany under the fierce Chnodomar, and with a small army of thirteen thousand men gave them a signal overthrow in the obstinate and bloody battle of Strasburg. Chnodomar was made prisoner, six thousand of the Allemanni slain, and the country relieved by the retreat of their compatriots across the upper Rhine.

After repulsing the Allemanni, he thundered against the Franks, who were seated nearer to the ocean on the confines of Gaul and Germany. In the spring of A.D. 358, he attacked these barbarians, the most formidable and warlike of the German tribes, dispersed in predatory hordes from Cologne to the ocean. While they supposed him to be in his winter quarters at Paris, he appeared among them with his legions; and by the terror, as well as by the success, of his arms, soon reduced their suppliant tribes to implore the clemency, and to obey the commands of the conqueror. Thus, in 359, the thunders ceased to roll, and the victories of Julian suspended, for a short time, the inroads of the barbarians, whom he had expelled and thrice invaded, and delayed the ruin of the Roman empire in the West.

3. And there were Lightnings

Thunders are international wars, whose echoes reverberate through the heavens of the respective states; while lightnings denote civil discord and revolutions in the government.

The tragic voice which announced the murder of the Emperor Constans by the agents of Magnentius A.D. 350, developed an important revolution. The authority of the regicide was acknowledged through the whole extent of the two great praefectures of Gaul and Italy; and the usurper prepared by every act of oppression, to collect a treasure to supply the expenses of a civil war.

The intelligence of this revolution which so deeply affected the honor and safety of the House of Constantine, recalled the arms of Constantius from the inglorious prosecution of the Persian war. He consigned the East to his lieutenants, and afterwards to his cousin Gallus, whom he raised from a prison to a throne; and marched toward Europe, with a mind agitated by the conflict of hope and fear, of grief and indignation. He rejected the ignominious terms of peace that were offered to him, with disdain; put the usurper's ambassadors in irons, and prepared to wage implacable war, as became the Chief Bishop of the Apostasy!

The contest with Magnentius was serious and sanguinary. He advanced with rapid marches to encounter Constantius, at the head of a numerous army of Gauls, Spaniards, Franks, and Saxons. During the greater part of the summer he operated in the fertile plains of the lower Pannonia, between the Drave, the Save, and the Danube, where he showed himself the master of the field. The humbled pride of Constantius condescended to solicit a treaty of peace, which would have resigned to Magnentius the sovereignty of the provinces beyond the Alps. But the haughty usurper replied by detaining the ambassador in captivity, and despatching an officer to reproach Constantius with the weakness of his reign, and to insult him by the promise of a pardon, if he would instantly abdicate the purple. This, however, he declined to do, and answered that "he should confide in the justice of his cause, and the protection of an avenging Deity."

The two armies were confronted in order of battle upon a naked and level plain round the city of Mursa, which has always been considered as a place of importance in the wars of Hungary. On this ground, Sep. 28, A.D. 351, the army of Constantius formed, with the Drave upon its right; while the left extended far beyond the right flank of Magnentius. Upon this host the son of Constantine bestowed an eloquent speech, and then retiring into a church at a safe distance from the battle-field, committed to his generals the conduct of this decisive day. They deserved his confidence by the valor and skill they exerted. Once began, the engagement soon became general, and was scarcely ended with the darkness of night. Victory declared for the imperialists. The number of the slain was computed at fifty-four thousand men, and the slaughter of the victors was more considerable than that of the vanquished; a circumstance that proves the obstinacy of the contest, and justifies the remark of an ancient author, that the forces of the empire were consumed in the fatal battle of Mursa, by the loss of a veteran army, sufficient to defend the frontiers, or to add new triumphs to the glory of Rome.

After this fatal overthrow, the pride of Magnentius was reduced by repeated misfortunes, to sue, and to sue in vain, for peace. On Aug. 10, A.D. 353, the bloody combat of Mount Seleucus completely broke the usurper's power. He was unable to bring another army into the field; the fidelity of his guards was corrupted; and they saluted him with shouts of "Long live the Emperor Constantius!" Perceiving by this that all was lost, he prevented their design of delivering him up to his enemy, by the easier and less ignominious death of falling upon his sword. Magnentius being removed, the public tranquillity was confirmed by the execution of the leaders who survived. A severe inquisition was extended over all, who either from choice or compulsion, had been involved in the rebellion. The most innocent subjects of the west were exposed to exile and confiscation, to death and torture; and as the timid are always cruel, the mind of Constantius, the Bishop of Bishops, was inaccessible to mercy.

These lightnings having ceased to scatter their deadly bolts, the international thunders between the catholic empire and the barbarians of Germany, began to roll as we have already related. They were the echoes of these lightnings; for during the civil war, in the blindness of his fury, Constantius abandoned to the Franks and Allemanni the countries of Gaul, which still acknowledged the authority of his rival. He invited them to cross the Rhine, by presents and promises, by the hopes of spoil, and by a perpetual grant of all the territory they might be able to subdue. The rapacity of his barbarian allies being thus excited, when he had no further use for them he discovered and lamented the difficulty of dismissing them, after they had tasted the richness of the Roman soil. They refused to retire, and treating, as their natural enemies, all the subjects of the empire, pillaged and destroyed at pleasure. To relieve the country of this scourge, Julian was sent to Gaul to thunder upon them, as already related in section 2.

While the Gallic legions and barbarians were thundering upon the Rhine, the Quadi and Sarmatians, against Constantius and his Illyrian forces, were thundering upon the Danube. Thus, at the same time, "there were thunders" on the Rhine, the Danube, and the Euphrates. Julian and Constantius were both victorious in Gaul and Illyricum; and the praises of Julian were everywhere repeated, except in the palace of Constantius, who was jealous of his popularity, and determined, if possible, to deprive him of his power.

In April A.D. 360, while attending to the public affairs in Paris, Julian was surprised by the hasty arrival of a tribune and a notary, with positive orders from the emperor, that four entire legions, and three hundred of the bravest from each of the remaining bands, should instantly begin their march for the frontiers of Persia. This numerous detachment constituted the strength of the Gallic army, which loved and admired Julian; despised, and perhaps, hated Constantius; and dreaded the laborious march, the Persian arrows, and the burning deserts of Asia. If Julian complied with the orders he had received, he subscribed his own destruction, and that of the people, who would again be exposed to the invasion of the Germans. But a positive refusal was an act of rebellion, and a declaration of war.

After a painful conflict he ordered the troops to march. A scene of general distress ensued. But the grief of an armed multitude is soon converted into rage. Their line of march was through Paris, in the suburbs of which they were to be reviewed by Julian. On their approach he went out to meet them. He addressed them in a studied oration, and then dismissed them to quarters. At the hour of midnight their discontent became furious. With sword, and bows, and torches in hand they rushed into the suburbs; encompassed the palace; and careless of future dangers, pronounced the fatal and irrevocable words, JULIAN AUGUSTUS! He earnestly protested against their treason, but it was useless; they repeatedly assured him, that if he wished to live, he must consent to reign.

Thus, the lightning of revolution and civil discord again began to flash its fires in the political aerial. Julian was a worshipper of Jupiter, the Sun, Mars, Minerva, and all the other deities of the old superstition; while his cousin Constantius was the Chief Bishop of the Apostasy. Hence, they were rival champions of the old and new superstitions of the empire, which were now about to contend for the dominion of the world.

While offering peace to Constantius, he made the most vigorous preparations for war. The cruel persecution of the adherents of Magnentius had filled Gaul with outlaws and robbers. These flocked to the standard of Julian. Several months were ineffectually consumed in negotiations at the distance of three thousand miles from Paris to Antioch; at length, perceiving that his adversary was implacable, he boldly resolved to commit his life and fortune to the chance of a civil war; and though some weeks before he had celebrated the catholic festival of the Epiphany, made a public declaration that he committed the care of his safety to the Immortal Gods; and thus publicly renounced the religion, as well as the friendship of Constantius.

4. And there was an Earthquake

The storm of thunders and lightnings being expended, the earth into which the fire from the angel's frankincense bowl was cast, began to shake. The seasonable death of Constantius A.D. 361, delivered the Roman Empire from the calamities of civil war, which had hitherto progressed without serious effusion of blood. Julian was now acknowledged as emperor by the whole empire. His throne was the seat of philosophy and science, falsely so-called, heathen piety, and vanity. He despised the honors, renounced the pleasures, and discharged with incessant diligence the duties of his exalted station.

The reformation of the imperial court was one of the first and most necessary acts of Julian's revolutionary government. Soon after his entrance into the palace of Constantinople, he had occasion for the service of a barber. An officer magnificently dressed presented himself. "It is a barber," exclaimed Julian, with affected surprise, "that I want, and not a receiver general of the finances." He questioned the man concerning the profits of his employment; and was informed that besides a large salary and some valuable perquisites, he enjoyed a daily allowance for twenty servants, and as many horses. A thousand barbers, a thousand cupbearers, a thousand cooks, were distributed in the several offices of catholic luxury; and the number of the eunuchs of this "christian" establishment could be compared only to the insects of a summer's day. The "BISHOP OF BISHOPS" was distinguished by the oppressive magnificence of his dress, his table, his buildings, and his train. The domestic crowd of the palace surpassed the expense of the legions. The monarch was disgraced, and the people injured, by the creation and sale of an infinite number of obscure and even titular employments; and the most worthless of mankind might purchase the privilege of being maintained, without the necessity of labor, from the public revenue. The waste of an enormous household, the increase of fees and perquisites, which were soon claimed as a lawful debt, and the bribes they extorted from those who feared their enmity, or solicited their favor, suddenly enriched these haughty menials. Their rapine and venality could be equalled only by the extravagance of their dissipations. Their silken robes were embroidered with gold, their tables were served with delicacy and profusion; and the most honorable citizens were obliged to dismount from their horses, and respectfully to salute any eunuch they might meet on the public highway. All this excited the contempt and indignation of the philosophic Julian, who despised the pomp of royalty, and was impatient to relieve the distress, and to appease the murmurs of the people. By a single edict, he reduced the palace of Constantinople to an immense desert, and dismissed with ignominy the whole train of slaves and dependents. The splendid and effeminate dress of the Asiatics, the curls and paint, the collars and bracelets, which had appeared so ridiculous in the person of "the first christian emperor," CONSTANTINE, were rejected with contempt by his philosophic and pagan nephew, Julian.

But the "earthquake" would have only slightly shaken the Apostasy, if Julian had only corrected the abuses, without punishing the crimes, of his catholic predecessor's reign. "We are now delivered," says he, in a familiar letter to one of his intimates, "we are now surprisingly delivered from the voracious jaws of the many-headed Hydra. I do not mean to apply that epithet to my brother Constantius. He is no more; may the earth be light upon his head! But his artful and cruel favorites studied to deceive and exasperate a prince, whose natural mildness cannot be praised without some efforts of adulation. It is not, however, my intention, that even those men should be oppressed: they are accused, and they shall enjoy the benefit of a fair and impartial trial." To conduct this inquiry, Julian named six judges of the highest rank in the state and army; and as he wished to escape the reproach of condemning his personal enemies, he fixed this extraordinary and inexorable Chamber of Justice at Chalcedon, on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus; and transferred to the commissioners an absolute power to pronounce and execute their final sentence without delay and without appeal. The office of president was exercised by the venerable praefect of the east, a second Sallust, whose good qualities conciliated the esteem of Greek sophists, and catholic bishops. He was assisted by the eloquent Mamertinus, one of the consuls elect. But the civil wisdom of these two magistrates was overbalanced by the ferocious violence of four generals. One of these, Arbetio by name, more fit for the prisoners' bar than the bench, was supposed to possess the secret of the commission; the armed and angry leaders of the Jovian and Herculean bands encompassed the tribunal; and the judges were alternately swayed by the laws of justice, and by the clamours of faction.

A devout and sincere attachment for the gods of Athens and Rome constituted the ruling passion of Julian; and the superstitious phantoms which existed only in his mind, had a real and judicial effect through the government of the empire. The vehement zeal of the catholics, who despised the worship, and overturned the altars, of those heathen rivals of the martyrs, engaged their imperial votary in a state of irreconcilable hostility with a very numerous party of his subjects. The subsequent triumph of this party, which he deserted and opposed, has fixed a stain of infamy on the name of Julian; and the unsuccessful "apostate has been overwhelmed with a torrent of Arian and Trinitarian invectives, of which the signal was given by the sonorous trumpet of Gregory Nazianzen.

The catholics, who beheld with horror and indignation the apostasy of Julian from their superstition, had much more to fear from his power than from his arguments. The pagans, who were conscious of his fervent zeal, expected that the flames of persecution should be immediately kindled against the enemies of the gods; and that the ingenious malice of Julian would invent some cruel refinements of death and torture, which had been unknown to the rude and inexperienced fury of his predecessors. But the hopes, as well as the fears, of the rival religious factions were disappointed by one who was persuaded that neither steel nor fire can eradicate the erroneous opinions of the mind. Influenced by this conviction he extended to all the inhabitants of the Roman world the benefits of a free and equal toleration; and the only hardship he inflicted on the catholics, was to deprive them of the power of tormenting their fellow-subjects whom they stigmatized as idolators and heretics. Among these so-called "heretics," were those who in the reigns of Constantius and Julian were being sealed in their foreheads with the seal of the Deity as the 144,000. The pagans were expressly ordered to reopen all their temples; and they were at once delivered from the oppressive laws, and arbitrary vexations they had sustained under the reign of Constantine and his sons. At the same time the trinitarian bishops and clergy, who had been banished by the Arian emperor, Constantius, were recalled from exile, and restored to their respective conventicles; also the Donatists, Novatians, Eunomians, and so forth. Julian, who understood and derided their theological disputes, invited to the palace the leaders of the hostile sects, that he might enjoy the agreeable spectacle of their furious encounters. The clamour of controversy sometimes provoked him to exclaim, "Hear me! the Franks have heard me, and the Allemanni;" but he soon discovered that he was now engaged with more obstinate and implacable enemies; and though he exerted the powers of oratory to persuade them to live in concord, or at least in peace, he was perfectly satisfied before he dismissed them from his presence, that he had nothing to dread from the union of the "christians" so-called.

As soon as he ascended the throne, he assumed, according to imperial custom, the character of SUPREME PONTIFF, not only as the most honorable title of imperial greatness, but as a sacred and important office, the duties of which he was resolved to execute with pious diligence. Encouraged by the example, exhortations, and liberality of their pious sovereign, the cities and families resumed the practice of their neglected ceremonies. "Every part of the world," exclaims Libanius, with devout transport, "displayed the triumph of religion; and the grateful prospect of flaming altars, bleeding victims, the smoke of incense, and a solemn train of priests and prophets, without fear and without danger. The sound of prayer and of music was heard on the tops of the highest mountains; and the same ox afforded a sacrifice for the gods and a supper for their joyous votaries."

As the army is the most forcible engine of absolute power, Julian applied himself with peculiar diligence to corrupt the religion of his troops, without whose hearty concurrence every measure must be dangerous and unsuccessful; and the natural temper of soldiers made this conquest as easy as it was important. On the days of solemn and public festivals, the emperor received the homage and rewarded the merit of the troops. His throne of state was encircled with the military ensigns of the Roman republic; the name of Christ was erased from the Labarum, and the symbols of war, of majesty, and of pagan superstition, were so dexterously blended that the faithful subject incurred the guilt of idolatry when he respectfully saluted the person or image of his sovereign. The soldiers passed successively in review, and each of them, before he received from the hand of Julian a liberal donative proportioned to his rank and services, was required to cast a few grains of incense into the flame which burned upon the altar. This restoration and encouragement of paganism revealed a multitude of pretended christians, who, from motives of temporal advantage, had acquiesced in the catholicism of the former reign, and who afterwards returned, with the same flexibility of conscience, to the superstition professed by the successors of Julian.

As I am not composing a history of the Julian earthquake, but merely evidencing illustratively by history the symbolical drama of the apocalypse, it is only necessary that I should show that the events of the first sixteen months of his reign over the whole empire, following the "lightnings," were, in the fullest sense, such a revolution as could only fairly and properly be represented by "an earthquake." I need not go into all the details of his remarkable reign. It will, therefore, be sufficient to say that, in his great work of humbling the LAODICEAN APOSTASY in the lowest depths of degradation into which he could plunge it, he proclaimed himself the gracious protector of the Jews! He had no love for these unfortunates, but they deserved the friendship of the idolator by their implacable hatred of the christian name. He proposed to rebuild their temple in Jerusalem, and relieved them of the pecuniary oppressions imposed upon them by the bishops and eunuchs of the court of Constantius. The catholics were firmly but erroneously persuaded that a sentence of everlasting destruction rested upon the whole fabric of the Mosaic law. Julian, therefore, argued that the success of his rebuilding speculation would prove the falsity of the prophets, and turn the truth of revelation into a lie. But had he succeeded, his success would only have proved the ignorance of the catholics, who understood nothing aright. His enterprise, however, was defeated by an earthquake, a whirlwind, and a fiery eruption, which scorched and blasted the workmen, overturned and scattered their works, and compelled the abandonment of the undertaking.

Foiled in this manoeuvre, he attacked the catholic church in the very seat of its soul. He transferred to the priests of his own superstition the management of the liberal allowances from the public revenue which had been granted to their church by Constantine and his sons. The proud system of clerical honors and immunities was levelled to the ground, testamentary donations were forbidden, and the catholic priests were confounded with the last and most ignominious class of the people. By this policy he aimed to deprive them of all the temporal honors and advantages which rendered them respectable in the eyes of the world, which is "the enemy of God." But, besides this, he prohibited catholics from teaching the arts of grammar and rhetoric, observing that the men who exalt the merit of implicit faith are unfit to claim or enjoy the advantages of science, and that they ought to content themselves with expounding, not Homer and Demosthenes, but Luke and Matthew in the conventicles of the Galileans. This edict deprived them wholly of the education of youth, which, in the Roman world, was intrusted to masters of grammar and rhetoric, who were elected by the magistrates, maintained at the public expense, and distinguished by many lucrative and honorable privileges. Having thus substituted pagan sophists for catholic priests, he invited a free and general resort to the public schools, in a full confidence that the tender minds of the scholars would be paganized by the impressions received. The greater part of the catholic officers were gradually removed from their employments in the state, the army, and the provinces; and the hopes of future candidates were extinguished by his maliciously, but most correctly, reminding them, that it was unlawful for a christian to use the sword either of justice or of war; and studiously guarding the camp and the tribunals with the ensigns of idolatry. The powers of government were entrusted to the pagans, who professed an ardent zeal for the superstition of their ancestors. Under their administration the catholics had much to suffer and more to apprehend. Julian was averse to cruelty, but his provincial ministers exercised a vexatious tyranny against sectaries, on whom they were not permitted to confer the honors of martyrdom. He dissembled the knowledge of the injustice exercised in his name, and expressed his real sense of their conduct by gentle reproofs and substantial rewards.

The most effectual instrument of annoyance with which they were armed was the law that obliged the catholics to make full and ample satisfaction for the temples they had destroyed under the preceding reign. The zeal of the triumphant Laodicean Apostasy had not always the sanction of the public authority; and the catholic bishops, who were secure of impunity, had often marched at the head of their congregations to attack and demolish the rival fortresses of Satan. On his consecrated lands, which had been given to the clergy, and on the ruins of paganism, the catholics had frequently erected their conventicles. The ground had to be cleared of these, and the stately temples of the idols which had been levelled, and the precious ornaments which had been converted to catholic uses, had to be restored, making a very large amount of damages and debt. But the catholics, who had robbed and destroyed the property of "heretics" as well as pagans, in this, the dark hour of retribution, were unable to pay. The Roman law, therefore, gave the claimants a right to the debtors' persons. They were, consequently, seized by Julian's ministers, and subjected to bodily pains and torments. In this the moment of their prosperity, they dragged their mangled bodies through the streets, pierced them by the spits of cooks and the distaffs of enraged women, and the entrails of catholic priests and their ecclesiastical females, after they had been tasted by these bloody fanatics, were mixed with barley and contemptuously thrown to the unclean animals of the city.

About the same time, Julian was informed from Edessa that the proud and wealthy faction of Arian catholics had insulted the weakness of a sect of “heretics” styled Valentinians, and committed such disorders as ought not to be suffered with impunity in a well regulated state. Upon hearing of this, he confiscated the whole property of the church by his mandate to the magistrates of the place. The money was distributed among the soldiers, the lands were added to the state’s domain, and, with the most pungent irony, he wrote to the offenders, saying, “I show myself the true friend of the Galileans. Their admirable law has promised the kingdom of heaven to the poor; and they will advance with more diligence in the paths of virtue and salvation when they are relieved by my assistance from the load of temporal possessions. Take care,” continued he, in a more serious tone, “take care how you provoke my patience and humanity. If these disorders continue, I will revenge on the magistrates the crimes of the people; and you will have reason to dread, not only confiscation and exile, but fire and sword.” The catholics, both Arian and Athanasian, who, before the “earthquake” that levelled their high towers in the dust, had possessed above forty years the civil and ecclesiastical government of the empire, had contracted the insolent vices of prosperity, and the habit of believing that they were the saints, and that the saints alone were entitled to reign over the earth. As soon as the justice of Julian deprived the clergy of the privileges conferred by the favor of Constantine, unmindful of their own tyranny against “heretics,” among whom were the sealed servants of the Deity, they complained bitterly of “the Apostate’s” most cruel oppression; and the free toleration of idolators and HERETICS, who were alone benefited by the Julian earthquake, was a subject of grief and scandal to catholics. Their present hardships, intolerable as they might appear, were considered as a slight prelude to impending calamities, which were suspended till their crafty oppressor’s victorious return from the Persian war, when laying aside the mask of dissimulation, he would cause the amphitheatres to stream with the blood of hermits and bishops; and that catholics who persevered in the profession of their opinions would be deprived of the common benefits of nature and society. These gloomy forebodings of deserved punishment, however, were suddenly dispelled by the death of Julian, who was mortally wounded, June 26, A.D. 363. He was pierced by a Persian javelin, in the thirty-second year of his age, after a reign of one year and eight months from the death of Constantius. He was the last of the house of Constantine, which was left without an heir, and the empire without a master, by his unexpected death. The trembling of the catholic world subsided, and the military election of Jovian restored tranquillity to the church and state.

FOREWORD TO VOLUME THREE

In the original edition of Eureka, the present volume formed the second part of Volume Two, making it all a large book of some 736 pages. Subsequently this was found to be somewhat unwieldy, and the volumes was divided into two, numbered Volume 2A and Volume 2B. But the volumes were divided in the middle of a sentence which added to their awkwardness.

As we have reset the contents in larger type, we would have added to the original problem if we had presented Volume Two as it first appeared; at the same time we certainly wanted to avoid the problem of dividing it in the middle of a sentence.

Hence we have created a new Third Volume of Eureka.

The previous volume, having introduced the opening of the Seventh Seal (v. Apocalypse 8:1–5), which opening followed the prayers of the saints (4), this present volume expounds upon the first and second sections of it.

The opening of the seal revealed seven angelic trumpeters. The sounding of the first four called forth judgments upon Catholic Europe. The Fifth Trumpet, also styled the First Woe, directed attention to the east, and predicted the uprise of the Saracenic Moslem power. The Sixth Trumpet, or the Second Woe, symbolized the uprise of the political Euphratean power, and the consequent demise of the Eastern catholic Empire with its headquarters in Constantinople. Then follows the prophecy of the Rainbowd angel destined to conquer the world (Apocalypse 10); after which, in accordance with the plan of The apocalypse, the second section of the Seventh Seal relating to the death and resurrection of the witnesses (Apocalypse 11:1–14) is expounded. This introduces the Third Woe as outlined in the rest of the chapter (Apocalypse 11:15–19), culminating with the triumph of the saints and the Nave of Deity opened in the political heavens of the future age. At that point, this section of The Apocalypse, and this Second Volume of Eureka closes.

It is with great personal satisfaction that we have been enabled to present this Volume to the Reader. We trust he will derive as much pleasure out of studying it as we are sure the Author had in writing it, and we certainly have done in re-producing it. May the Reader enjoy the blessing pronounced upon those who study The Apocalypse with understanding.

CHAPTER 8

THE CHAPTERS OF THIS VOLUME ARE NUMBERED ACCORDING TO THE NUMBERS OF THE CHAPTERS OF THE APOCALYPSE; SO THAT THE EIGHTH CHAPTER OF THIS WORK IS AN EXPOSITION OF THE EIGHTH CHAPTER OF THE APOCALYPSE, AND SO ON TO THE ELEVENTH INCLUSIVE. THE PREVIOUS VOLUME HAVING INTRODUCED THE SEVENTH SEAL, THIS VOLUME PROCEEDS TO EXPOUND THE SEAL PROPERLY.

SUBJECT

First Section of the Seventh Seal

This section comprehends the events resulting from the release of the Four Winds, held by the Four Angels standing at the Four Corners of the Earth—Apoc. 7:1. When in operation, they were to blow injuriously upon the earth, the sea, and the trees, of Daniel's Fourth Beast-Dominion. They were what Gibbon styles "the threatening tempests of barbarians which subverted the foundations of Roman greatness." They were commissioned against the catholic empire of the west, and did not cease to blow until they had sorely plagued the Apostasy, and disrobed Old Rome of its glory and dominion. The Four Wind-powers angelized against Roman Europe are identical with the first four trumpets, which were sounded or blown against "the earth," the "trees," and "sea," which were not plagued to the subversion of their sovereignty until these trumpets had produced their full effect.

Preparation For Sounding

The seven angels, which John tells us in ch. 8:2, he saw standing before the Deity, and to whom were given seven trumpets, he further informs us, in the sixth verse, "prepared themselves to sound." Though they had been commissioned in the days of Constantine, they had also been forbidden to execute judgment until the sealing of the 144,000 was duly effected. Their preparing to sound was no part of their sounding. When the trumpets were given them they were quiescent, and quiescent they remained during the "voices, and thunders, and lightnings, and earthquake" of the reigns of Constantius and Julian; but, when the earthquake was over, and the Catholic Apostasy found unexpected deliverance in the military election of JOVIAN, a trinitarian catholic, nothing improved by the well merited castigation it had experienced, it progressed from bad to worse, until the forbearance of the Deity had attained the limit which, in His wise foreknowledge of all things, He had fixed, and beyond which He had predetermined that the blasphemous superstition should not continue unscathed by the fierceness of His devouring indignation. From the death of Julian, A.D. 363, to the death of Theodosius the Great, and the revolt of the Goths under Alaric, A.D. 395, a period of thirty-two years, was the period also of the preparation for sounding, which terminated in the Gothic blast of the First Wind-Trumpet. At the end of this PREPARATION-PERIOD, the Catholic Imperiality was finally divided into TWO SOVEREIGNTIES, which answered to the TWO IRON LEGS of Nebuchadnezzar's Image—the sovereignty of Constantinople under Arcadius, and the sovereignty of Rome under Honorius, both of them the worthless sons of the catholic tyrant, "Theodosius the Great."

This preparation period of thirty-two years includes the reigns of Jovian, Valentinian and Valens, Gratian, and Theodosius—of Jovian, who reigned about seven months; of Valentinian, who ruled twelve years; of Gratian, who, after reigning four years, associated Theodosius with himself in the purple; and of Theodosius, who reigned sixteen years, or till his decease, A.D. 395. The sounding of the seven angels was, and is (for they will not have ceased to sound until the reign of the saints shall have been established over all the apocalyptic earth), the execution of judgment upon the Laodicean Catholic Apostasy in its imperio-regal constitution. During this preparation-period it made rapid and gigantic progress in developing "the mystery of iniquity," "after the working of the Satan with all power and signs and wonders of falsehood, and with all deceivableness of the iniquity in them who are being destroyed." It rapidly filled up that measure of iniquity which rendered it no longer expedient to defer judgment—to restrain the tempest of "hail and fire mingled with blood," which, as a devouring blast, should scorch and torment it unto death.

It will, doubtless, be satisfactory to the reader unacquainted with the history of this period to receive some information respecting it. I shall, therefore, as briefly as is compatible with clearness, notice the state of the Catholic Apostasy in the thirty-two years of angelpreparation for the execution of judgment.

1. THE APOSTASY IN THE PREPARATION-PERIOD

The death of Julian left the Ancient Idolatry in possession of the empire, but without a champion. He had endeavored to thoroughly paganize the army but had succeeded only in making hypocrites of those who took any interest in religion. So long as he was the dispenser of the loaves and fishes of the state, the soldiery bowed the knee to Jupiter; but when the arrow of the Persian had given victory to “the Galilean,” and the “pious Jovian” became the elect of the fickle host, whose affection had been gained by his comely person, cheerful temper, and familiar wit, the soldiers again displayed at the head of their legions the banner of the cross, the Labarum of Constantine, by which was announced to the people the superstition of their new emperor.

The first monuments of peace were devoted by Jovian to the restoration of domestic tranquillity to the church and state. The “Christians,” says Gibbon, “had forgotten the spirit of the gospel, and the pagans had imbibed the spirit of the church. In private families, the sentiments of nature were extinguished by the blind fury of zeal and revenge; the majesty of the laws was violated or abused; the cities of the east were stained with blood, and the most implacable enemies of the Romans were in the bosom of their country.” As soon as Jovian was enthroned, he secured the legal establishment of the catholic superstition. The insidious edicts of Julian were abolished, and the immunities of the catholic apostasy were restored and enlarged, which gained for him, of course, the loud and sincere applause of its devotees. The episcopal leaders of their contending sects, convinced, by experience, how much their fate would depend on the earliest impressions made on the mind of an untutored soldier, hastened to the court at Antioch. “The highways of the east were crowded with Homoousian, and Arian, and Semi-Arian, and Eunomian bishops, who struggled to outstrip each other in the holy race for the prize of the imperial favor; the apartments of the palace resounded with their clamors, and the ears of Jovian were assailed, and perhaps astonished, by the Babel-mixture of metaphysics and passionate invectives. They discovered at length his admiration for ‘the celestial virtues of the great Athanasius’, “one of the most persistent ecclesiastics of which Jezebel could boast in that or any subsequent period of her career. By this discovery, Jovian was found to be possessed of the spirit of the times, and therefore in fellowship with the zeal and numbers of the most powerful sect of the Apostasy. Under his reign, Laodiceanism obtained an easy and lasting victory; and as soon as the sunshine of imperial patronage was withdrawn, the ancient idolatry, which had been cherished by the arts of Julian, sunk irrecoverably in the dust. Thus, as justly remarked by Themistius in his address to Jovian, “in the recent changes, both religions (Julian’s and Constantine’s) had been alternately disgraced by the seeming acquisition of worthless proselytes, of those votaries of the reigning purple, who could pass without a reason, and without a blush, from the church to the temple, and from the altars of Jupiter to the sacred table of the Christians.”

After Jovian’s death, Valentinian was elected by the military to the absolute government of the Roman empire. In thirty days after his own election, he associated his brother Valens as his colleague in the emperorship. In June, A.D. 364, they divided the empire between them; Valentinian bestowing on his brother the rich praefecture of the Eastern Leg of the Babylonian Image, from the Lower Danube to the confines of Persia; whilst he reserved to himself the three praefectures of Illyricum, Italy, and Gaul, constituting the Western Leg, from the extremity of Greece to the Caledonian rampart, and from the rampart to the foot of Mount Atlas. This division being amicably arranged, preparation for the angel-trumpeters was advanced a stage. The Emperor of the West established his temporary residence at Milan; and the Emperor of the East returned to Constantinople, to assume the dominion of fifty provinces.

ROMAN EMPIRE UNDER VALENTINIAN

364–75 Valentinian I, elected by the military to absolute government, elevated his brother Valens to co-ruler in the East. Under their joint rule, the borders of the Empire were extended to the Rhine frontier and Hadrian's Wall in Britain.

Both these men were cruel, and not equally and similarly zealous for the traditions of the Apostasy. Valens was an Arian, and therefore a persecutor of the Athanasians. These hostile factions were more equally balanced in the East than in the Latin West, where the Arian party was but small. The Arian and Athanasian monks and bishops supported their arguments by invectives, and these were sometimes followed by blows. Athanasius reigned archbishop in Alexandria over the most ignorant and ferocious catholics of the empire. Constantinople and Antioch were occupied by his enemies, the Arians; and every episcopal vacancy was the occasion of a popular tumult, greatly to the disgust and contempt of philosophers and pagans. So great was the lust of power, that the leaders of both factions believed that, if they were not suffered to reign, they were most cruelly injured and oppressed.

The western emperor Valentinian reigned over the countries in which the Sealing Angel was occupied in the work of sealing the servants of the Deity in the forehead. Though a man whose savage disposition was hardened against pity and remorse, he uniformly maintained a firm and temperate impartiality in an age of singular discord and contention among ecclesiastics. He declined with respectful indifference the subtle questions of their debates; and, while he remembered that he was a disciple of the church, he never forgot that he was lord and master of the clergy. The pagans, the Jews, and all the various sects which acknowledged the divine authority of Christ, were protected by the laws from arbitrary power, or popular insult; nor did he prohibit any mode of worship, except those secret and criminal practices which abused the name of religion for the dark purposes of vice and disorder. He published an edict A.D. 370, addressed to Damasus, Bishop of Rome, restraining the avarice of the clergy. The things he forbid them to practice show in what they were especially guilty. He admonished the ecclesiastics and monks not to frequent the houses of widows and virgins; and menaced their disobedience with the animadversion of the civil authority. These were of that sort Paul predicted would “creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away by divers lusts, ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth” (2 Tim 3:6). These reprobates installed themselves with these “silly women” as their spiritual directors. But Valentinian rightly discerned the corruptness of their purposes. He therefore forbid their visiting the houses, or receiving any gift, legacy, or inheritance, from the liberality of their spiritual daughters. He had to step in as the civil guardian of domestic happiness and virtue, against the assaults of clerical wolves in sheep's clothing, calling themselves christian pastors of Christ's flock!! By their professed contempt of the world, they insensibly acquired the most desirable advantages; the lively attachment, perhaps, of a young and beautiful woman, the delicate plenty of an opulent household, and the respectful homage of the slaves, the freedmen and clients of senatorial families. Under this spiritual direction, the immense fortunes of Roman ladies were gradually consumed in lavish arms and expensive pilgrimages; and the artful ecclesiastic, who had assigned himself the first, or possibly the sole, place in the testament of his spiritual daughter, still presumed to declare, with the smooth face of hypocrisy, that he was only the instrument of charity and the steward of the poor. The lucrative, but disgraceful trade which was exercised by the clergy to defraud the expectations of the natural heirs, had provoked the indignation of a superstitious age; and two of the most respectable of Latin spiritual directors, Jerome and Ambrose, honestly confess that the ignominious edict of Valentinian was just and necessary.

What Gibbon styles “the splendid vices of the church of the Rome,” in the reign of Valentinian, and under the spiritual direction of Damasus, its bishop, have been impartially stated by Ammianus, who says, “The praefecture of Juventius was accompanied with peace and plenty; but the tranquillity of his government was soon disturbed by a bloody sedition of the distracted people. The ardour of Damasus and Ursinus to seize the episcopal seat surpassed the ordinary measure of human ambition. They contended with the rage of party; the quarrel was maintained by the wounds and death of their followers; and the praefect, unable to resist or appease the tumult, was constrained, by superior violence, to retire into the suburbs. Damasus prevailed; the well-disputed victory remained on the side of his faction; one hundred and thirty-seven dead bodies were found in the Basilica of Sicinius, where the christians (!) hold their religious assemblies; and it was long before the angry minds of the people resumed their accustomed tranquility. When I consider the splendor of the capital, I am not astonished that so valuable a prize should inflame the desires of ambitious men, and produce the fiercest and most obstinate contest. The successful candidate is secure that he will be enriched by the offerings of matrons; that as soon as his dress is composed with becoming care and elegance, he may proceed, in his chariot, through the streets of Rome; and that the sumptuousness of the imperial table will not equal the profuse and delicate entertainments provided by the taste and at the expense of the Roman Pontiffs. How much more rationally (continues the honest pagan, more christian in spirit than “the christians”) would these pontiffs consult their true happiness, if instead of alleging the greatness of the city as an excuse for their manners, they would imitate the exemplary life of some provincial bishops, whose temperance and sobriety, whose mean apparel and downcast looks, recommended their pure and modest virtue to the Deity and his true worshippers.” When the tranquillity of the city was restored by the wisdom of the prefect Praetextatus, this polite and philosophic pagan, disguising a reproach in the form of a jest, remarked to the “right reverend bishop” Damasus, that if he could obtain the bishopric of Rome, he himself would immediately embrace the christian religion. This lively picture of the wealth and luxury of the bishops of Rome in the fourth century becomes the more curious as it represents the intermediate degree between the humble poverty of the Apostles, and the royal state of an Imperial Pontiff, whose temporal dominions once extended from the confines of Naples to the Po.

On the death of Valentinian, A.D. 375, Gratian, his son, a youth of seventeen, and his brother, Valentinian II, then only four years old became emperors of the West, so that the government of the Roman world was now exercised in the united names of Valens and his two nephews. On the fall of Valens in the battle of Hadrianople, A.D. 378, Gratian appointed Theodosius his successor over the East. Gratian was a feeble and indolent character, piously credulous, and a mere tool in the hands of ecclesiastical hypocrites, who procured from him an edict to punish, as a capital offence, the violation, neglect, or even the ignorance, of what they were pleased to call the divine law. This would give them power to persecute and destroy “the servants of the Deity,” then being impressed with his seal. The murder of Gratian did not improve the situation; for Theodosius, a name dear to the Apostasy, was pious and cruel, with strength and activity of mind.

Among the benefactors of the catholic church, the fame of Constantine has been rivalled by the glory of Theodosius, who assumed the merit of subduing Arianism, and abolishing the worship of idols in the Roman world. Theodosius was the first of the emperors immersed in what the apostasy terms “the true faith of the Trinity.” As he ascended from the water, “still glowing with the warm feelings of regeneration,” he dictated a solemn edict which proclaimed his own opinions and prescribed the religion of his subjects. “It is our pleasure,” said this sacramentally regenerated prince, “that all the nations, which are governed by our clemency and moderation, should stedfastly adhere to the religion which was taught by St. Peter to the Romans, which faithful tradition hath preserved, and which is now professed by the Pontiff Damasus (!) and by Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, a man of apostolic holiness. According to the discipline of the Apostles and the doctrine of the gospel, let us believe the sole Deity of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, under an equal majesty, and a pious Trinity. We authorize the followers of this doctrine to assume the title of ‘CATHOLIC CHRISTIANS’; and as we judge that all others are extravagant madmen, we brand them with the infamous name of HERETICS, and declare that their conventicles shall no longer usurp the respectable appellations of churches. Besides the condemnation of divine justice, they must expect to suffer the severe penalties which our authority guided by heavenly wisdom, shall think proper to inflict upon them.”

This edict of Theodosius caused great joy to the catholics. He convened, A.D. 381, a council at Constantinople, of one hundred and fifty bishops, to complete the theological system which had been established in the council of Nice. They decreed the equal Deity of the Holy Ghost, which, upon their authority, has been received by all the deluded nations and all the churches of the Apostasy. But, whatever the merits of the question, the sober evidence of history will not allow much weight to the personal authority of these Theodosian fathers. In an age when the spirituals of the Apostasy were a scandalous degeneration from apostolic purity, the most worthless and corrupt were always the most eager to frequent, and disturb the episcopal assemblies. The conflict and fermentation of so many opposite interests and tempers inflamed the passions of the bishops; and their ruling passions were the love of gold and the love of dispute. Many of the same churchmen who now applauded the orthodox piety of Theodosius, had repeatedly changed, with prudent flexibility, their creeds and opinions; and in the various revolutions of the church and the state, the religion of their sovereign was the rule of their obsequious faith. The unjust and disorderly proceedings of these sycophants forced the gravest members of the council to dissent and secede; and the clamorous majority, which remained masters of the field, could be compared only to wasps or magpies, to a flight or cranes, or to a flock of geese.

The decrees of the council of Constantinople had set up the standard of catholic opinion; and the spirituals who governed the beclouded conscience of Theodosius suggested the most effectual methods of persecution. In the space of fifteen years, he promulgated at least fifteen severe edicts against the heretics; and, to deprive them of every hope of escape, he sternly enacted that if any laws or rescripts should be alleged in their favour, the judges should consider them as illegal productions either of fraud or forgery. The penal statutes were directed against the ministers, the assemblies, and the persons of “the heretics”; and the passions of the legislator were expressed in the language of declamation and invective.

Thus the theory of persecution was established by this regenerated trinitarian emperor, whose justice and piety have been applauded by the church”; but the practice of it, in the fullest extent, was reserved for his rival and colleague, Maximus, then reigning beyond the Alps, the first, among catholic princes, who shed the blood of his subjects on account of their religious opinions. These were Priscillian and six of his brethren, who were tortured, condemned, and executed at Treves. Their tenets being reported by their enemies, it is not possible to speak with certainty respecting them. Their rejection by the clergy and their adherents is a presumption in favor of their being sufferers for the truth. Their death was the subject of a long and vehement controversy, in which, though Martin, Bishop of Tours, and Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, proclaimed the eternal damnation of heretics, they both were surprised and shocked by the bloody image of their temporal death. Since the murder of Priscillian by the catholics, they have become scarlet with the blood of the saints, and drunk with the blood of the witnesses for Jesus (Apoc. 17:6); and their proceedings have been refined and methodized in the “Holy Office,” which assigns their distinct parts to the ecclesiastical and secular powers. The victim to be murdered is regularly delivered by the sanguinary priest to the magistrate, and by the magistrate to the pious executioner; and the inexorable sentence of their Mother Jezebel, which declares her charge against the victim, is hypocritically expressed in the language of pity and intercession. Who need wonder at seven angels being commissioned to inflict vengeance upon such a communion of blood? How can wrath cease against men, so long as the earth is cursed with the presence of catholicism, and its kindred abominations? The divine indignation can only be appeased by their extirpation total and complete. After the death of Valentinian II, and the overthrow of Maximus, the Roman world was in the undivided possession of Theodosius; and thus it continued till his death, A.D. 395, when the separation of the East and the West became final under his sons Arcadius and Honorius.

About sixty years after Constantine's conversion to catholicism, the ancient form of heathenism was completely superseded by catholic polytheism; and the temples of the gods were replaced by the Bazaars of Guardian Saints and Angels (Dan. 11:38–39), in which Theodosius, and his sacramentally regenerated coreligionists, convened under the spiritual direction of reprobate bishops and presbyters, for the degrading adoration of dead men's bones, and other relics they were taught to venerate as sacred. A pagan, treating of this change in the form Of Rome's polytheism, says: "The monks" (a race of filthy animals, to whom he is tempted to refuse the name of men) "are the authors of the new worship, which, in the place of those deities who are conceived by the understanding, has substituted the meanest and most contemptible Slaves, The heads, salted and pickled, of those infamous malefactors who, for the multitude of their crimes. have suffered a just and ignominious death; their bodies, still marked by the impression of the lash, and the scars of those tortures which were inflicted by the sentence of the magistrates; such are the gods which the earth produces in our days; such are the martyrs, the supreme arbitrators of our prayers and petitions to the Deity, whose tombs are now consecrated as the objects of the veneration of the people." This writer was the spectator of a revolution which raised a multitude of fabulous saints and victims to the rank of mahuzzim, of celestial and invincible protectors of the Roman empire! He might well be indignant at the worse than pagan abomination. Fifty years after the building of Constantinople, the pretended remains of Samuel, the prophet of Israel, were transported to that city. His ashes, deposited in a golden vase, and covered with a silken veil, were delivered by the episcopal mountebanks into each other's hands. These fabulous relics were received by the infatuated catholic multitude with infinitely more demonstrations of joy and reverence than they would have shown to the real prophet; the highways, from Palestine to the gates of Constantinople, were filled with an uninterrupted procession; and the emperor Arcadius, at the head of the most illustriously betitled members of the clergy and senate, advanced to meet this extraordinary and fictitious guest! The example of Rome and Constantinople confirmed the superstition, blasphemy and discipline of the catholic world. The honors of fictitious saints and martyrs, after an ineffectual protest of the sealed servants of the Deity, were universally established; and in the age of those conspicuous theological empirics, Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine, something was still deemed wanting to the sanctity of a catholic bazaar, till it had been consecrated by some portion of "holy relics," which fixed and inflamed the devotion of the deluded multitude.

The Catholic Apostasy by the end of the preparation period for angelic sounding had become a system of organized and established idolatry—of the worship of gods produced from the earth by the clerical officials of Satan's kingdom. Perceiving how profitable were the so-called relics of saints, more valuable to church-knaves than gold and precious stones, the clergy were as stimulated to multiply these treasures of 'the church.' Without regard for truth or probability they invented names for skeletons, and actions for names. The fame of the apostles and prophets, and their holy brethren, was darkened by superstitious fraud and falsehood. To the invincible band of real saints, whose blood from beneath the Altar cried for vengeance against their pagan murderers, the Theodosian craftsmen added myriads of imaginary heroes, who had never existed except in the fancy of "daemons speaking lies in hypocrisy; and having their conscience seared as with a hot iron," of whom Ambrose, bishop of Milan, his pupil "St. Augustin," and "St. Jerome," were notable examples: "and there is reason to suspect," says Gibbon, "that Tours might not be the only diocese in which the bones of a malefactor were adored instead of those of a saint. A superstitious practice, which tended to increase the temptations of fraud and credulity, insensibly extinguished the light of history and of reason in," what he incorrectly terms, "the christian world."

But the progress of catholic idolatry would have been much less rapid and victorious, if the superstition of the people had not been assisted by the seasonable aid of what Paul styles, “signs and wonders of falsehood;” that is, of pretended visions and spurious miracles, to ascertain the authenticity and virtue of the most suspicious relics. When Ambrose refused to obey the sentence of banishment decreed against him by the Arian government of Valentinian II., and while he and his party were blockaded in the cathedral of Milan, he falsely declared that he was instructed by a dream, to open the earth in a place where the relics or remains of two martyrs, Gervasius and Protasius, had been deposited above three hundred years. Immediately under the churchpavement two perfect skeletons were found, with the heads separated from their bodies, and a plentiful effusion of blood. These “holy relics” were presented, in solemn pomp, to the veneration of his credulous flock. The knavish designs of Ambrose were admirably promoted by this pretended discovery. Their bones, blood, and garments, were supposed to contain a healing power; and their praeternatural influence was said to be communicated to the most distant objects, without losing any part of its original virtue. The alleged extraordinary cure of a blind man by touching the garment, and the reluctant confessions of several daemoniacs, were adduced to justify the Athanasian opinions and sanctity of this rebel churchman! The truth of these miracles is attested by Saint Ambrose himself, and by his proselyte, the celebrated Saint Augustin, who, at that time professed the art of rhetoric in Milan. The Arian court very properly rejected the testimony of such interested parties; and derided the theatrically represented cures, exhibited by the contrivance and at the expense of the archbishop. The effect, however, upon the irrational and strongly deluded multitude was rapid and irresistible; and the feeble sovereign of Italy found himself unable to contend with such a favorite of heaven!

The same “grave and learned Augustin,” afterwards bishop of Hippo in the Roman Africa, attests the innumerable prodigies performed there by the relics of Stephen, stoned in the presence of Saul of Tarsus. These were brought to light by a dream, thrice repeated to one Lucian, a presbyter, residing twenty miles from Jerusalem. When they were unearthed, the ground trembled, and an odour, such as that of paradise, was smelt, which instantly cured the various diseases of seventy-three of the grave-openers. The relics were transported, in solemn procession, to a house of the dead, called “a church” by the ignorant multitude, constructed in their honor on Mount Zion; and the minute particles of those relics, a drop of blood, or the scrapings of a bone, were acknowledged, in almost every province of the catholic world, to possess a divine and miraculous virtue. This “wonder of falsehood” is inserted in his elaborate work, “The City of God,” which Augustin designed as a solid and immortal proof of the truth of what he called christianity. He solemnly enumerates above seventy miracles, performed by Stephen’s relics, of which three were resurrections from the dead, in the space of two years, and within the limits of his own diocese! “If we enlarge our views to all the dioceses, and all the saints, of the ‘christian’ world”, says Gibbon, truly, “it will not be easy to calculate the fables, and the errors, which issued from this inexhaustible source. But we may surely be allowed to observe, that a miracle in that age of credulity and superstition, lost its name and its merit, since it could scarcely be considered as a deviation from the ordinary, and established, laws of nature.”

The innumerable “wonders of falsehood,” of which the tombs were the perpetual theatre, impressed the infatuated crowd with a notion of the state and constitution of the invisible world, which became the basis of the system of idol-worship, which darkens the kingdom of the clergy to this day. Whatever might be the condition of the common herd between death and resurrection of body, it was fancifully supposed that the disembodied ghosts of so-called saints and martyrs did not consume that interval in silent and inglorious sleep. It was imagined (without presuming to determine the place of their habitation, or the nature of their felicity) that they employed the lively and active consciousness of their happiness, their virtue, and their powers; and that they had already secured the possession of their eternal reward. The supposed enlargement of their intellectual faculties surpassed the measure of human conception; since they imagined that they had proved by experience, that they were capable of hearing and understanding the various petitions of their numerous votaries, who, in the same moment of time, but in the most distant parts of the world, invoked the name and assistance of Stephen or of Martin. The confidence of their petitioners was founded on the heathen dogma of inherent immortality; and the supposition, that the disembodied immortal souls of saints go to Christ at death, and as unclothed and naked ghosts are reigning with him, and in this their glory cast an eye of pity upon earth; their worshippers are strongly deluded with the notion that these naked souls are warmly interested in the prosperity of the church; and that the individuals, who imitated the fabled example of their faith and piety, were the peculiar and favourite objects of their most tender regard. Sometimes, indeed, it was thought that their friendship might be influenced by considerations of a less exalted kind; that they viewed, with partial affection, the places which had been consecrated by their birth, their residence, their death, their burial, or the possession of their relics. They were regarded as not exempt from pride, avarice, and revenge; hence they were supposed to approve with gratitude the liberality of their votaries; and to hurl the keenest bolts of punishment against the impious wretches, who violated their magnificent shrines, or disbelieved their supernatural power. Severus, bishop of Minorca, says that the relics of St. Stephen in eight days, converted in that island five hundred and forty Jews; but, it must not be forgotten, that they were aided by some potent severities, such as burning the synagogue, driving the obstinate infidels to starve among the rocks, and so forth. The immediate, and almost instantaneous, effects, that were supposed to follow the prayer, or the offence, satisfied the deluded fanatics of the ample measure of favor and authority enjoyed by Immortal Ghosts in the presence of the Supreme; and it seemed superfluous to inquire, whether they were continually obliged to intercede before the throne of grace, or whether they might not be permitted to exercise, according to the dictates of their benevolence and justice, the delegated powers of a subordinate ministry. The imagination, which had been raised by a powerful effort to the contemplation and worship of Eternal Spirit, eagerly embraced such inferior objects of adoration as were more in keeping with its gross conceptions and imperfect faculties. The simplicity which is in Christ, or, as Gibbon styles it, “the sublime and simple theology of the primitive christians,” was not only corrupted, but practically and doctrinally abolished; and the Monarchy of Heaven, already clouded by metaphysical subtleties, was dethroned by the introduction of a popular mythology, which restored the reign of a multitude of gods, which became the Mahuzzim, or ghost-protectors, of the “Religious World.”

Having thus substituted for the old gods of Greece and Rome, the phantasms of their corrupt imaginations, which they decorated with the names of real and fictitious saints and angels, they next proceeded to institute the rites and ceremonies, or will-worship, with which they deemed that their new deities ought to be satisfied. These were such as seemed most powerfully to affect the senses of the vulgar herd. If, in the beginning of the fifth century, Paul or Luke, had been raised from the dead, to witness the festival of some popular saint, or martyr, they would have gazed with astonishment and indignation on the profane spectacle, which had superseded the pure and spiritual worship of a christadelphian ecclesia. As soon as the doors of the Saint-Bazaar, or “church,” were thrown open, they would have been annoyed by the smoke of incense, the perfume of flowers, and the glare of lamps and tapers, which diffused at noonday a gaudy, superfluous, and in their judgment sacrilegious light. If they approached the balustrade of the Saint-altar, they would have made their way through a prostrate crowd, consisting for the most part of strangers and pilgrims, who resorted to the city on the vigil of the feast, and who already felt the “strong delusion,” or intoxication, of fanaticism, and perhaps of wine. Their devout kisses were imprinted on the walls and pavement of the IdolBazaar; and their fervent “vain repetitions” were directed, whatever might be the expletives of their conscience keepers, the priests, to the bones, the blood, or the dust, of the tutelar of the bazaar, which were usually concealed by a linen or silken veil, from the eyes of the vulgar. The fanatics frequented the tombs of their ghost-deities, in the hope of obtaining, from their supposed powerful intercession, every sort of spiritual, but more especially of temporal, blessings. They implored the preservation of their health, or the care of their infirmities; the fruitfulness of their barren wives, or the safety and happiness of their children. Whenever they undertook any distant or dangerous journey, they requested that “the holy martyrs” would be their guides and protectors, or Mahuzzim, on the roads; and if they returned without having experienced any misfortune, they again hastened to the ghostbazaar tombs, to celebrate, with grateful thanksgivings, their obligations to the memory and relics of their invisible patrons. The walls were hung round with symbols of the favors they supposed they had received; eyes, and hands, and feet, of gold and silver; and memorial pictures, which also soon became objects of idolatry, represented the image, the attributes, and the miracles of the tutelar phantasma. All this new system of idolatry was the invention of that spirit of superstition that reigned incarnate in the presbyters and bishops of the church who imitated the polytheism and ritual they were impatient to destroy. They had persuaded themselves, that the ignorant rustics would more cheerfully renounce the superstition of paganism, if they found some resemblance, some compensation, in the bosom of their catholicism. This religion of Constantine achieved, in less than a hundred years, the final conquest of the old idolatry in all the Roman empire; but the catholic victors themselves were completely subdued by the heathen arts of their vanquished rivals.

2. PREPARATION-JUDGMENTS UPON GHOST-WORSHIPPERS

Could it have been possible for “seducing spirits,” or demons, who had departed from the faith, and speaking lies in hypocrisy, to have invented and set up such a system of abomination in the fourth century, and in the name of christianity, and the Deity not have poured out of His wrath upon the deceivers and the deceived? The whole Roman Catholic world had gone wondering after the NEW IDOLATRY, against which none opposed a scriptural testimony but the SEALING ANGEL, or those engaged in the work of sealing the servants of their Deity with His seal, in their foreheads. A presbyter or elder, among these took up his pen to oppose it. His book was directed against the institution of monkery, the celibacy of the clergy, praying for the dead, and to martyrs, celebrating their vigils, and lighting up candles to them after the manner of the heathen. Jerome, who is esteemed a saint and luminary of the catholic church, and who was a zealous advocate of all these popular superstitious rites, undertook the task of refuting him, whom he styled “a most blasphemous heretic,” and “the organ of the Devil.” An individual denounced after this fashion by a monk, or a clergyman, must have been one of the excellent of the earth; for it is only such who are obnoxious to their reproach. The following extract from Saint Jerome’s answer to his book, will satisfactorily explain the heresy of Vigilantius, for that is his name, who has still the honor of being enrolled in the list of those who are anathematized as heretics by the Mother of Harlots, whose citadel is Rome. “That the honor paid to the rotten bones of saints and martyrs,” says Jerome, “by adoring, kissing, wrapping them up in silk and vessels of gold, lodging them in their churches, and lighting up wax candles before them after the manner of the heathen were the ensigns of idolatry—that the celibacy of the clergy was a heresy, and their vows of chastity the seminary of lewdness—that to pray to the dead, was superstitious, inasmuch as the souls of departed saints and martyrs were at present in some particular place from which they could not remove themselves at pleasure, so as to be everywhere present attending to the prayers of their votaries—that the sepulchres of the martyrs ought not to be worshipped, nor their fasts and vigils to be observed—and finally, that the signs and wonders said to be wrought by their relics, and at their sepulchres, served to no good end or purpose of religion.”

These were the sacrilegious tenets, as they are termed by the fanatical and superstitious Jerome, which he could not hear with patience, or without the utmost grief, and for which he declares Vigilantius a detestable heretic, venting his foulmouthed blasphemies against the relics of the martyrs, which were working daily signs and wonders. He tells him to “go into the churches of those martyrs, and he would be cleansed from the evil spirit which possessed him, and feel himself burnt, not with those wax candles which so much offend him, but with invisible flames, which would force that demon that talked within him to confess himself to be the same who had personated a Mercury, perhaps, or a Bacchus, or some other of the heathen deities.” Such is the style in which this renowned father of the church rants and raves through several pages against the sealed servants of the Deity, who, in the days of the sealing, protested with Vigilantius against these delusions which had then become so strong.

As it may gratify the reader’s curiosity, the following specimen of Jerome’s absurd manner of refuting their testimony, is presented: “If it were such a sacrilege or impiety,” says he, “to pay these honors to the relics of saints, as Vigilantius contends, then the Emperor Constantius must needs be a sacrilegious person, who translated the holy relics of St. Andrew, Luke, and Timothy to Constantinople; then Arcadius Augustus, also, must be held sacrilegious, who translated the bones of the blessed Samuel from Judea, where they had lain so many ages, into Thrace; then all the bishops were not only sacrilegious, but stupid too, who submitted to carry a thing the most contemptible, and nothing but mere dust, in silk and vessels of gold; and lastly, the people of all the churches must needs be fools, who went out to meet those holy relics, and received them with as much joy as if they had been the prophet himself, living and present among them; for the procession was attended with swarms of people from Palestine, even into Chalcedon, singing with one voice the praises of Christ, who were yet adoring Samuel perhaps, and not Christ, whose prophet and Levite Samuel was.

What a development in this extract from Jerome, one of the greatest luminaries of the Apostasy in that age, of the darkness and superstition that overspread the Catholic World, and that in less than a hundred years after the Catholic superstition was established by law! The sentiments of Jerome were a sample of the opinions of Ambrose, Augustin, and the clergy at large; how deplorable then must have been the state of their flocks! Jerome’s defence of their stupid sacrilege against which the 144,000 lifted up their united voice, and which found a record in the writings of Vigilantius, is childish and ridiculous. The thing cannot be gainsaid, that to worship a bone, or a tooth, or the dust of a dead man, however excellent his character may have been, is idolatrous impiety of the basest, and most degrading kind. None would attempt to gainsay this but the clergy, who hold Jerome and his fraternity in admiration. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the emperors aforesaid were sacrilegious, the bishops both sacrilegious and stupid, and the people fools; and because of the intense disgust with which the Lamb contemplated their adulterous prostitution of his name to their gross and lying vanities, He caused the Seven Angels to prepare to sound; and in the preparation to execute upon them the calamities I shall now briefly recite.

“As soon as,” says Gibbon, “the death of Julian had relieved the barbarians from the terror of his name, the most sanguine hopes of rapine and conquest excited the nations of the east, of the north, and of the south.” The chiefs of the Allemanni being offended, crossed the Rhine, A.D. 365, and before Valentinian could cross the Alps, the villages of the ghost-worshippers of Gaul were in flames; and before his general could encounter them, they had secured the captives and spoil in the forests of Germany. In the beginning of the ensuing year, the military force of the whole nation, in deep and solid columns, broke through the barrier of the Rhine, during the severity of a northern winter. This irruption having been repelled, Mentz, the principal city of the Upper Germany, was unexpectedly attacked A.D. 368, while the relic-worshippers were celebrating one of their festivals. Rando, a bold and artful leader, suddenly passed the Rhine, entered the defenceless town, and retired with a multitude of captive idolators of either sex. Valentinian soon after followed them with a powerful force, and giving them a signal overthrow, recrossed the Rhine, and wintered at Treves. As his ambition was not to conquer Germany, he wisely confined his attention to the important and laborious defence of the Gallic frontier, against an enemy whose strength was renewed by a stream of daring volunteers, which incessantly flowed from the most distant tribes of the north. This influx from distant regions to the frontiers of the catholic world, was a very important and essential element of the preparation for sounding.

About the middle of the fourth century the Burgundians, a warlike and numerous people of the Vandal race, occupied the countries on either side of the Elbe, insensibly swelled into a powerful kingdom, and finally settled in the clays of the sounding on a flourishing province of the catholic empire.

Three small islands toward the mouth of the Elbe, comprehended in the duchy of Sleswig-Holstein, were occupied by the Saxons. These were a gate, as it were, through which poured forth upon the sea and maritime parts of the doomed empire, inexhaustible swarms of barbarians, who descended from the gloomy solitudes of their woods and mountains; and as a military confederation gradually moulded into a national body, under the name and laws of the Saxons, sallied forth upon the ocean in quest of plunder. In this preparatory enterprize they acquired an accurate knowledge of the maritime provinces of the West, after which they extended the scene of their depredations, so that the most sequestered places had no reason to presume on their security.

In the preparation for sounding, A.D. 371, under the reign of Valentinian, the maritime provinces of Gaul were afflicted by the Saxons. They landed from their frail coasters, and spread desolation among the relic-worshippers with fire and sword. They were at length repelled, however, as the time of their permanent settlement under the sounding of the angels had not yet arrived.

From the reign of Constantine to A.D. 366, that is to say, during an interval of thirty years, there had been peace between the Catholic Empire and the Goths. During this period these barbarians under Hermanric, the king of the Ostrogoths, extended their dominions from the Danube to the Baltic, including the greater part of Germany and Scythia. The name of Hermanric is almost buried in oblivion, his exploits are imperfectly known; and the Roman and Greek worshippers of the dead themselves appeared unconscious of the progress of an aspiring power, which threatened the liberty of the north, and the peace of their dominion.

Civil war between Procopius an usurper, and Valens, A.D. 366 became the occasion of the Goths crossing the Danube to foment, as the allies of Procopius, the civil discord of the catholics of the East. The suppression of the usurpation by Valens, left him free to carry on the war against the Goths alone. "But," says Gibbon, "the events scarcely deserve the attention of posterity, except as the preliminary steps," or preparation, "of the approaching decline and fall of the empire." The war, which had inflicted much evil on both sides, terminated A.D. 369; after which the Goths remained tranquil about six years; till they were violently impelled against the Catholic empire by an innumerable host of Scythians, who appeared to issue from the frozen regions of the north.

This period of preparation which opened the way, under the sounding of the four wind trumpets to the inroads of so many hostile and savage tribes from the Danube to the Atlantic, was also signalized by terrible and wholesale destruction of catholic idolators by earthquakes, A.D. 365. On the twenty-first of July, the greatest part of their empire was shaken by a violent and destructive convulsion of the earth. The shores of the Mediterranean were left dry by the sudden retreat of the sea, and valleys and mountains were laid bare, which had never since the Mosaic Era of the globe been exposed to the sun. But the waters soon returned with the weight of an immense and irresistible deluge, which was severely felt on the coasts of Sicily, of Dalmatia, of Greece, and of Egypt; large boats were transported, and lodged on the roofs of houses, or at the distance of two miles from the shore; the ghost-worshippers, with their habitations, were swept away by the waters; and the city of Alexandria, the orogenic birthplace, and alternate throne of Homousianism and Homoiousianism, annually commemorated the fatal day, on which fifty thousand Trinitarians and Arians lost their factious and blasphemous lives in the inundation. This calamity astonished and terrified the subjects of Rome, who rightly considered these alarming strokes as the prelude only of still more dreadful calamities, which would ultimate in the submersion of the fabric of their world.

From the reign of Valens was a most disastrous period for the Laodicean Apostasy. “The fall of the Roman empire,” says Gibbon, “may be justly dated from the reign of Valens.” In this period of disaster, the happiness and security of each individual were personally attacked; and the arts and labors of ages were rudely defaced by the barbarians of Scythia and Germany. The invasion of the Huns from the rear and remoter countries of the north, A.D. 376, precipitated on the provinces of the west the Gothic nation, which advanced in less than forty years, from the Danube to the Atlantic, and opened a way by the success of their arms, to the inroads of so many hostile tribes more savage than themselves. The original principle of motion was concealed in the remote countries of the north, whence these destructive emigrations issued.

In the year 375, Valens, then resident at Antioch, was informed by his officers who were intrusted with the defence of the Danube, that the north was agitated by a furious tempest, that the irruption of the Huns, an unknown and monstrous race of savages, had subverted the power of the Goths; and that the suppliant multitudes of that warlike nation, whose pride was now humbled in the dust, covered a space of many miles along the banks of the river. They earnestly sought permission to cross the Danube, and to settle on the waste lands of Thrace, promising perpetual obedience to the laws, and to defend the limits of the empire. The prayers of the Goths were most imprudently granted, on condition of delivering up their arms, and their children to be dispersed through the provinces of Asia, as hostages to secure the fidelity of their parents. Upon these ignominious conditions the whole body of the Gothic nation was transported across the Danube, by the most strenuous diligence of the infatuated officials, who were careful that not a single barbarian of those who were reserved to subvert the foundations of Rome, should be left upon the opposite shore. The stipulation, however, most offensive to the Goths, and the most important to the Romans, was shamefully eluded by bribery and corruption. The catholic officials allowed them to retain their arms in exchange for the prostitution of their wives and daughters, and contributions of cattle and slaves. When the transportation was finished, and their strength collected on the southern side of the Danube, an immense camp of two hundred thousand Visigothic warriors in arms, was spread over the plains and hills of the Lower Maesia, and assumed a threatening and even a hostile aspect.

The leaders of the Ostrogoths, Alatheus and Saphrax, pressed also by the Huns in their rear, sought the like favor that had been granted to the Visigoths. But this was absolutely refused by Valens, whose suspicions and fears were now thoroughly aroused. His generals, however, whose attention was solely directed to the Visigoths whose discontent and hostility they had excited by their tyranny and avarice, had imprudently disarmed the ships and fortifications which constituted the defence of the Danube. The fatal oversight was observed, and improved by Alatheus and Saphrax, who anxiously watched the favorable moment of escaping from the pursuit of the Huns. By the help of such rafts and vessels as could be hastily procured, the leaders of the Ostrogoths transported, without opposition, their king and their army; and boldly fixed a hostile and independent camp on the territories of the empire. A secret union having been formed between these Gothic powers, they were prepared for a desperate conflict with the catholics who had treated them with great inhumanity and treachery. The flames of discord and mutual hatred soon burst forth into a dreadful conflagration. At Marcianopolis, the capital of the Lower Maesia, about seventy miles from the banks of the Danube, they sought to purchase supplies in the plentiful markets of the city. They were refused, however, with insolence and derision; and as their patience was now exhausted, passionate altercations and angry reproaches ensued. A blow was imprudently given; a sword was hastily drawn; and the first blood that was spilt in this accidental quarrel, became the signal of a long and destructive war.

Valens removed from Antioch to Constantinople to be nearer the seat of war. He was received as the author of the public calamity and provoked to desperate rashness by the vain reproaches of an ignorant multitude, whose contempt he had not firmness to resist; he hastened the downfall of the Roman empire, and the termination of his own inglorious career, by the terrible defeat of Hadrianople, A.D. 378, in which two thirds of the catholic army of 82,000 horse and foot were destroyed. The pride of the Goths, who had been joined by their former enemies the Huns, Alani, and other tribes, was elated by this memorable victory. The scene of war and tumult was instantly converted into a silent solitude, and abandoned for other fields. The Gothic inundation rolled from the walls of Hadrianople to the suburbs of Constantinople. Laden with the spoils of these, and the adjacent territory, they slowly moved from the Bosphorus to the mountains which form the western boundary of Thrace; and securing the important pass of Succa, the Goths who had no longer any resistance to apprehend from the scattered and vanquished troops of the East, spread themselves over the face of a fertile and cultivated country, as far as the confines of Italy, and the Adriatic sea.

Jerome, a saint of the Apostasy, vehemently deplores the calamities inflicted by the Goths and their allies in the provinces of the catholic empire—the rapes, the massacres, the conflagrations, and, above all, the profanation of the “churches,” that were turned into stables, and the contemptuous treatment of the pretended relics of fictitious saints, rubbish regarded by him as worshipful and holy. The triumph of the Goths extended far beyond the limits of a single day. One of their chiefs was heard to declare, with insolent moderation, that, for his own part, he was fatigued with slaughter; but that he was astonished how a people who fled before him like a flock of sheep could still presume to dispute the possession of their treasures and provinces. The formidable name of the Goths spread terror among the subjects and soldiers of the catholic dominion, who, if they had been hastily collected, and led by Theodosius, the successor of Valens, would have been vanquished by their own fears. But this more fortunate emperor, through the superior vigor of his mind, effected the deliverance and peace of the provinces by prudence rather than valor, which was seconded by favorable circumstances, which he did not fail to seize upon and improve. By the death of Fritigern, their heroic leader, and the predecessor and master of the renowned ALARIC, the Gothic confederacy was broken into many disorderly bands of ferocious robbers, who destroyed every object which they wanted strength to remove or taste to enjoy, and they often consumed with improvident rage, the harvests or the granaries which soon after became necessary for their own subsistence. At length, a very considerable part, who already felt the inconvenience of anarchy, acknowledged Athanaric for their king, who, instead of leading them to battle, entered into treaty with Theodosius, A.D. 382, which resulted in the final capitulation of the Goths. By this treaty, a numerous colony of Visigoths was settled in Thrace, and the remains of the Ostrogoths in Phrygia and Lydia, as the allies of the Roman State. Prudence and necessity extorted the concessions and privileges of this treaty from Theodosius, who, nevertheless, had the address to persuade them that they were the voluntary expressions of his sincere friendship for the Gothic nation. It was apparent, however, to every discerning eye, that the Goths would long remain the enemies and might soon become the conquerors of the catholic empire. It was generally believed that they had signed the treaty of peace with a hostile and insidious spirit, and that their chiefs had previously bound themselves by a solemn and secret oath, never to keep faith with the Romans; to maintain the fairest show of loyalty and friendship, and to watch the favorable moment of rapine, of conquest, and of revenge. But the renewed outburst of the Gothic tempest was restrained by the firmness and moderation of Theodosius; so that the public safety seemed to depend on the life and abilities of a single man.

Such, then, is the historical illustration of “this unhappy period,” as Gibbon styles it, in which the Lamb was gathering his hosts and bringing them into position on the four corners of the earth, that they might be prepared to subvert the western empire of Rome when the sealing of the 144,000 should have sufficiently advanced. His hosts were in position, the battle was arrayed, and nothing remained but that the trumpet should sound “its harsh and mournful music” for the dreadful combat to begin, that was to hurl fire and blood and bitterness into the highways and fastnesses of catholic superstition and crime.

SOUNDING OF THE TRUMPETS

All things being prepared—the iniquity of the catholic apostasy being matured, the executioners of judgment upon it being ready, and the 144,000 to be taken from it duly sealed—there was no longer any reason for holding back the tempests that were appointed to blast “the earth,” “the sea,” and “the trees,” of the section of the catholic dominion doomed to judicial overthrow. We proceed, then, to consider them in the order of the release, which was successive and not contemporary; that is, the winds did not rush forth against all “the four corners of the earth” at the same instant, which would have been to make the winds blow against each other instead of against the earth and sea. In ch. 7:1, 2, we are not informed as to the order and effects of the blowing of the winds. It is not said whether the blowing was consecutive or not. They were to blow when released, and their blowing would be, in the general, injurious; this is all that can be extracted from the testimony there. It was reserved for the latter half of the eighth chapter to reveal the details omitted in the seventh. These have been sufficiently supplied in the symbolism of the first four trumpets, which are clearly identical with, and expository of, the four winds. Indeed, the reference to the winds, in ch. 7:1, is a prefatory announcement to the first four trumpets, as the angel-proclamation of “Woe,” in ch. 8:13, is prefatory to the last three of the seven. The first four are, therefore, very properly styled “Wind-Trumpets,” and the last three, “Woes” (ch. 11:14), or “Woe-Trumpets.”

But, before proceeding to expound these “winds” and “woes” in detail, it may assist the reader in the comprehension of so much of the Seventh Seal as is hitherto interpreted in this work, to present him with the following:

CHRONOLOGICAL SYNOPSIS

324.

Opening of the Seventh Seal, marked by the victory of Constantine over Licinius at Chrysopolis.

Silence in the heaven a half hour begins.

Silence, or peace, ends.

During this half-hour period the Sealing of 144,000 proceeds—ch. 7, and the prayers of these saints ascend abundantly as incense of supplication and thanksgiving—ch. 8:3, 4.

The silence ends with the ascension of the three sons of Constantine, who each reign independently over a distinct division of the catholic empire.

At their accession, “Fire is cast into the earth, and there were VOICES”—ver. 5. The two brothers and seven of the nephews of Constantine, the praefect Ablavius, and the patrician Optatus, massacred by order of the “pious” Constantius.

Constans, emperor of the “third” then comprising Italy, Africa, and the Western Illyricum, assassinated by order of a usurper.

354.

“AND THERE WERE THUNDERS”
VERSE 5.

337.

War between the Romans and Persians twenty three years.

356.

War with the Allemanni and Franks.

357.

War with the Quadi and Samaritans.

“AND THERE WERE LIGHTNINGS”

340.

CIVIL WAR BETWEEN THE SONS OF CONSTANTINE “THE GREAT,” CONSTANS AND CONSTANTINE, IN WHICH THE LATTER IS SLAIN.

350.

Usurpation of Magnentius and Vetricio, which produces a revolt throughout the praefectures of Italy and Gaul, with the Illyrian countries from the Danube to the extremity of Greece. The civil war continues three years.

355.

Revolt and assassination of Sylvanus.

“AND THERE WAS AN EARTHQUAKE”
VERSE 5

360.

The Roman legions at Paris proclaim Julian, the last of the House of Constantine, emperor. He declares war against Constantius.

361.

Constantius dies, and Julian, the pagan, is acknowledged. He reforms the court of the second “christian” “sovereign pontiff” by turning out a thousand barbers, a thousand cupbearers, a thousand cooks, and eunuchs numerous as clouds of insects on a summer's day. He appoints the Tribunal of Chalcedon for the sanguinary punishment of the sycophants of the former reign. He deprives catholics of the power of tormenting heretics; orders the pagan temples to be reopened; reestablishes paganism as the religion of the empire; assumes the pago-sacerdotal functions of the Imperial Pontificate; erases the name of Christ from the Labarum; undertakes the rebuilding of the temple in Jerusalem, with a view to a falsification of the prophecies; the enterprise is defeated by earthquake, whirlwind, and a fiery eruption from the foundations.

He orders christians to be called Galileans by way of contempt; abolishes clerical honors and immunities; prohibits "christians" from teaching schools, or practising medicine, or the liberal arts.

He degrades the clergy to the lowest class of the people; excludes catholics from all offices of trust and profit, on the plea that it is unlawful for christians to use the sword either of justice or war; condemns them to make full and ample satisfaction for the pagan temples they had destroyed in the last reign.

The result of this earthquake is recorded by the sophist, Libanus, in these words: "Every part of the world displayed the triumph of religion, and the grateful prospect of flaming altars, bleeding victims, the smoke of incense, and a solemn train of priests and prophets, without fear and without danger. The sound of prayer and music was heard on the tops of the highest mountains; and the same ox afforded a sacrifice for the gods, and a supper for their joyous votaries."

Julian is wounded in battle, and dies. Jovian, a catholic created emperor in his stead. He abolishes the edicts of Julian, and reestablishes the Catholic Apostasy as the legal and privileged religion of the state.

"The seven angels which have the seven trumpets prepare themselves to sound"—ver. 6.

Preparation-period ends with the death of Theodosius.

The Sealing and separating the 144,000 from among the catholics, previous to judgment, finished.

ROME: AN EPITOME

According to Varro, the foundation of the city, was laid by Romulus on the 20th April, in the year 3961 of the Julian period (3251 years after the creation of the world, 753 years before the birth of Christ). The Romans conquered nearly the whole of the then known world. In the time of Julius Caesar, the empire was bounded by the Euphrates, Taurus, and Armenia on the east; by Africa and Ethiopia on the south; by the Danube on the north; and by the Atlantic on the west. It included much of Europe, the Middle East, and North Africa.

On the death of Constantius at York, in Britain, in 306, the troops under his son, Constantine, saluted him as emperor. In 313 he had conquered the West and had established his power in Rome. Licinius remained in the east to oppose him, but was defeated in battle, and put to death by order of Constantine (his brother-in-law) in 324. Constantine then reigned alone. He established Constantinople as the capital of the Empire, and died on 22nd May, 337.

The Empire was divided into Eastern and Western by Diocletian in 296; but was reunited under Constans in 340. It was again divided into Eastern and Western by Valentinian and Valens, the former having made the latter, his brother, emperor of the West in 364.

The Western Empire, with Rome as its capital, came to an end in 476 when Odoacer, king of the Heruli took the city. He assumed the title of King of Italy, and completed the fall of the Western Empire. The Eastern Empire came to an end with the capture of Constantinople its capital by the Turks, and the death of Constantine XIII on 29th May, 1453. Thence afterwards, Constantinople formed part of the Ottoman Empire, and its name was changed to Istanbul. It remains the only portion in Europe of the once powerful Turkish Empire today under Turkis

Blowing of the Four Winds

After the apostle saw the things represented in the sixth chapter; that is, after he saw in vision the progressive accomplishment of the taking out of the way of that power, even of the pagan Greco-Latin or Roman power, which hindered the revelation of the New Power in the estate of Daniel's fourth beast—a power both spiritual and temporal, or ecclesiastical and civil, unknown to the Augustan Caesars who ruled anterior to Constantine; and germinated from that “Mystery of Iniquity” which, as tares, was sown and springing forth in growing vigor in the days of John and Paul; after he saw this power, whom the latter styles “the Man of Sin, the Son of Perdition,” and “the Lawless One,” exalted to supreme authority and enthroned; in other words, after the entire exhaustion of the judgments of the Sixth Seal, he saw “four angels” or powers, divinely commissioned to destroy, “standing against (epi) the four corners of the earth”—standing in arms, ready to operate against the four projections of that “third part of the fourth beast earth” or territory, which was to be the arena of the first four trumpets—namely, Gaul, Spain, Italy, and Africa. For a time, even during the time of the sealing of the symbolic 144,000, John saw the authorities, who had the control of these destroying tempests, “holding” or restraining “the four winds of the earth, that THE WIND,” the one wind of divine fury, blowing now against Italy, and then against Africa, and then in a third and fourth direction, “should not blow against the earth, nor against the sea, nor against any tree.”

That the blowing of the wind was a destruction set in motion against the earth, sea, and trees, is manifest from the proclamation made by the sealing angel commanding the four destroying messenger-powers not to injure them until the sealing work was accomplished. In other words, when the foundation was firmly and thoroughly laid for the witnessing against the rising power of the Beast of the Outer Court, whose Lion-Mouth would be opened in blasphemy, and, aided by the ten new regal powers, would overcome the witnesses (Apoc. 11:3–7; 13:6, 7); so that there would be moral force enough to carry on the witnessing against the Apostasy in its decemregal and papal organization during what might remain of sackcloth-propheying for a thousand two hundred and threescore symbolic days—when the foundation of this witnessing institution was duly organized and strengthened, then, and not till then, the destroying winds might begin to blow to the injury of the fourth-beast earth, sea, and trees.

The First Four Trumpets

Though the wind blow towards divers points, and is styled the east wind, the north wind, and so-forth, it is still but one and the same wind, air, or spirit in motion. So with “the four winds” of ch. 7:1, they were the one wind, which, when blown against Italy, Spain, Gaul, and the Roman Africa, “the four corners of the earth” to be tempest-tossed, sounded forth destroying blasts, and swept with withering desolation all green and living things. These hurricanes of destruction are figuratively styled “trumpets;” and as “the wind” was to sweep over the four sections of the western Roman third of the fourth beast territory, each blasting current became a distinct trumpet.

The sounding of trumpets was a divinely appointed Mosaic institution. It was a holy convocation, styled “a memorial of blowing of trumpets,” and was celebrated on the first day of the seventh month—Lev. 23:24. It introduced one of the most important months of the Hebrew calendar—the month on the tenth of which was the Day of Covering of Sins; on the fifteenth, the Feast of Tabernacles; and on every fiftieth tenth, the Jubilee, when sins, were not only covered, but every man returned to his possession and family—Lev. 25:8–17.

The trumpets used were of silver, two fabricated from a whole piece. They were blown by the sons of Aaron “for the calling of the assembly, and for the journeying of the camp.” If they blew with only one, then the princes, heads of the thousands of Israel gathered themselves to Moses; but when they blew an alarm with both trumpets, it was for war against the enemy that oppressed them; and with the assurance that they should be remembered by Yahweh their Elohim, and be saved from their enemies—Numbers 10:1–10.

When an alarm was blown it portended great evil. This appears from Jer. 4:5, which says: “Blow the trumpet in the land: cry, Gather together, and say, Assemble yourselves, and let us go into the defenced cities. Set up the standard toward Zion: retire, stay not, for I will bring evil from the north, and a great destruction. The lion is come up from his thicket, and the destroyer of the Gentiles is on his way; he is gone forth from his place to make thy land desolate; and thy cities shall be laid waste without an inhabitant.”

And again, in Joel 2:1. “Blow the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in my holy mountain; let all the inhabitants of the land tremble for the day of Yahweh cometh, for it is nigh at hand; a day of darkness and of gloominess, a day of clouds and of thick darkness, as the morning spread upon the mountains: a great people and strong; there hath not been ever the like, neither shall be any more after it ... A fire devoureth before them, and behind them a flame bumeth: the land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness; yea, and nothing shall escape them. The appearance of them is as the appearance of horses; and as horsemen, so shall they run. Like the noise of chariots on the tops of mountains shall they leap, like the noise of a flame of fire that devoureth the stubble, as a strong people set in battle array. Before their face the people shall be much pained; all faces shall gather blackness. They shall run like mighty men; they shall climb the wall like men of war.... the earth shall quake before them; the heavens shall tremble; the sun and the moon shall be dark, and the stars shall withdraw their shining: and Yahweh shall utter His voice before His army: for His camp is very great: for he is strong that executeth His word: for the Day of Yahweh is very terrible, and who can abide it?” Such is the illustration furnished by the Spirit of what he means by sounding trumpets of alarm against the guilty. The sounding of a plurality of trumpets was indicative of war. This is the indication of nearly all the trumpets of the apocalypse; not of every trumpet, but of all the Seven trumpets certainly. If they blew with only one, “then the princes, and heads of the thousands of Israel gathered themselves to Moses.” None of the seven trumpets indicate a gathering of the saints, or princes and chiefs of the thousands of Israel, to the prophet like unto Moses. They only portend evil to the Apostasy—the throwing down of the walls of Babylon, when the last blast of the seventh shall have sounded against her from the breath of the kings and priests of Yahweh. But before this portentous blast is sounded by them, a trumpet is blown of a different import—one that “gathers them together as the elect from the four winds, from one end of the heaven to the other”—Matt. 24:31. This is the TRUMPET OF THE JUBILEE, which will bring all the approved into the possession of the inheritance; and is symbolized, by none of the seven, but by “an angel flying in mid-heaven having aion-glad tidings to preach.” These moshkai kesheth, or sounders of the truth, of Isaiah 66:19, and messengers of Matt. 24:31, go forth “with a trumpet and a great voice,” which declares the glory of Yahweh among the nations. It has no sound of alarm in it, like the sounding of the seven. When the saints, in their graves, and we who may remain, hear this great voice, we shall all gather ourselves together to the Moses-like prophet—to Jesus “both Lord and Christ.” This gathering accomplished, and the affairs to be transacted in the presence of the Lord with regard to his household disposed of—then, what remains to be executed in connection with the sounding of the seventh and last trumpet will be proceeded with; and the Lamb, with those “who follow him whithersoever he goeth,” will “execute the judgment written” against Daniel and John’s beasts, till nothing remains of the civil and ecclesiastical powers of the world.

In the prophets, this judicial execution by Jesus and His Brethren, the Elohim of Israel, is styled “The NAME OF Yahweh coming from far, burning with his anger.... his lips full of indignation, and his tongue as a devouring fire: his breath as an overflowing stream ... to sift the nations with the sieve of vanity”—Isaiah 30:27. And Yahweh shall be seen over the sons of Zion, whom he shall raise up against the sons of Greece; “and ADONAI Yahweh shall blow the trumpet, and shall go forth with whirlwinds of the south”—Zech. 9:14. This trumpet thus divinely blown, is the winding up of the seventh apocalyptic trumpet. All the preceding events of the seven are operative to the development of this crisis in which is “filled up the wrath of Deity.”

The sounding by Adonai Yahweh of this closing blast of the seven is the great apocalyptic day of sacrifice—the slaying of the beasts, before the sins of the nations are covered over, and they become “blessed with faithful Abraham,” and “in Abraham and his seed.” He executes the Second and Third angel-missions, reaps the harvest, and treads the winepress. All this pertains to “the war of the great day of Almighty Power.” It prostrates Babylon, breaks in pieces the powers of the nations, and establishes the power of the kingdom in all the earth.

The final purpose, then, of the seven trumpets is to abolish the Laodicean Apostasy, which enthroned itself in the reign of Constantine the First, and of which he was the new-born defender of its faith. This is the grand and glorious consummation prepared for the Catholic and Protestant hierarchies of what the world styles “Christendom.” They will then have answered their purpose in the providence of heaven of a spiritual police in aid of the civil government of the nations. There will be no more any use for them; because the nations being enlightened and blessed, will no longer require deceivers and impostors to rule them by terror and imposition. “All nations shall come and worship before thee, O Lord; for thy judgments are made manifest”—Apoc. 15:4. Clerical hierarchies then will be no more; and the truth will cease to be evil spoken of because of their impiety and folly.

But these deceivers of “the whole earth that goes wondering after the beast” (ch. 13:3), were not to be permitted the enjoyment of times of bliss during the centuries of their inhabitation of the high and fat places of the world. They were image makers, relic and demon worshippers, murderers of the servants of the Deity, bewitchers of the people with their sorceries, or theological conceits, corrupters of silly women, and thieves. This is the apocalyptic indictment against them—ch. 9:20, 21; 11:7; 13:6, 7, 15; 16:6, 7; 17:3, 6; 18:20, 23, 24. Was it to be supposed that the Deity would permit these titled and wealthy blasphemers of His name, and tabernacle; these idolatrous “spirituals of wickedness in the heavenlies;” to enjoy all the sweets of life and receive none of the plagues stored up as His artillery for the day of evil? Such a winking at their iniquity was no part of His wisdom revealed to John. The trumpets were so arranged in their sounding as to give the clergy “wormwood” and “blood to drink;” and to be “tormented” to the gnawing of their tongues for pain and sores—ch. 8:11; 16:6; 9:4, 5; 16:10, 11.

This judicial operation, however, was not to affect all parts and orders of the clerical dominion at one and the same epoch. When the preparation for beginning to sound the trumpet was complete in the Gothic occupation of the Illyrian Third of their domain, the Catholic Empire was permanently divided into TWO LIMBS, as represented by the thighs and legs of Nebuchadnezzar's Image; the EASTERN CATHOLIC LIMB being Greek, with Constantinople for its imperial and ecclesiastical centre; while the WESTERN CATHOLIC LIMB was Latin, with Rome for its Mother City. This western section consisted of Gaul, Spain, Britain, Italy and the Roman Africa. This was the first Constantine's imperality when he divided the Fourth Beast dominion with his rivals Licinius, who possessed the Illyrian Praefecture; and Maximin, who possessed that composed of the Asiatic provinces and Egypt.

The judgments of the trumpets were ordered with reference to this threefold division of the Catholic World. The first four trumpets were to be blown against the WESTERN THIRD, that its inhabitants of all orders and degrees (except the sealed ones who were cherished) might be plagued until their power was broken, and their sovereignty blotted out for a season.

DIVISION OF ROMAN EMPIRE DUAL

Eastern & Western Empires

When these judicial calamities had settled down into the generation of a new and rising order of things, judgment was preparing for an ascent from "the Pit of the Abyss" against the EEASTERN THIRD of the catholic domain. It was the mission of the fifth and sixth trumpets primarily to torment, and then to kill the political life of the men, who wielded authority and power over the subjects of this imperial praefecture; and secondarily, of the sixth, to inflict "wars" upon the unrepentant spirituals of the Western Third, until the seventh should begin to sound—ch. 11:14.

The first four trumpets, then, made the Western Praefecture the seat of war—the third part of the Roman Orb, consisting, as we have said, of Gaul, Spain, Britain, Italy and the province of Africa, an area upon which, were caused to bud forth by the judgments that befel, the TEN POWERS seen by Daniel and John as "Ten Horns" upon the Eighth Head of the Fourth Beast.

It may be remarked here, that we do not learn from Daniel that the Fourth Beast had more heads than one. His was a vision of said beast in its constitutional manifestation coevally with its being slain, and its body politic given to the burning flame, at a time when judgment is also given to the saints for its especial destruction. I speak not now of what he saw concerning the Little Episcopal Horn Power; but of the head. All the horns were seen standing upon the head of the beast. The history of the past is demonstrative that the Eleven Horns did not stand on either of the first seven; though, when the uninstructed in these mysteries undertake to give sketches of the beast, they scatter the ten horns over all the seven heads. The Horns only began to bud forth in the times of the Seventh Head, and therefore cannot be placed upon any of the previously developed six. This seventh was to continue only "a short space." The beast and horns have continued many ages since the seventh head fell; unless therefore we view the horns as standing upon the Eighth Head, we have before us a symbolical monstrosity of a beast with ten horns and no head for them to stand upon. It is to John's writing we are indebted for knowledge about the heads. From him we learn that the beast of Daniel has Eight Heads; and that it is with the eighth that the ten horns are allied for "one hour" in a period of conflict with the lamb and those that are with him—ch. 17:11–14.

The trumpets were not only destructive of much that existed, but formative rudimentally of future political manifestations. The first four destroyed the Latin Catholic Imperial state unity of the western third; abolished the sovereignty of Rome; and formed the ten rudimental powers, which are destined for world-wide operations in the last hour of their existence. In the first four trumpets we have to do with things rudimental; but in the seventh and last, with the great and marvellous manifestations of the future, which could by no means have been developed without the preliminary judgments we proceed now in their apocalyptic order to expound.

ACT I—FIRST WIND-TRUMPET

The hurting of the earth by hail and fire, mingled with blood, by which a third part of the trees, and all green grass is burned up.

A.D. 395, and onwards.

“And the first angel sounded, and there was hail and fire which had been mingled with blood, and it was cast into the earth; and the third of the earth, and the third of the trees was consumed, and every green blade was burned up.”

Apoc. 8:7

1. The Symbols Explained

A prophesy couched in such terms as these indicates nothing but judgment of the severest kind. It is a tempest of the most scathing description imaginable—a beating down with hail, scorching with lightning, and causing blood to flow.

The prophets give us to understand that by such language as this is signified, “A mighty and strong one casting down to the earth with the hand.” This interpretation is indicated in Isaiah 28:2; as “Yahweh hath a mighty and strong one, as a tempest of hail, and a destroying storm, as a flood of mighty waters overflowing, he shall cast down to the earth with the hand,” or power of the sword. This was a threatened war against the drunkards of Ephraim, which was afterwards executed by the King of Assyria who cast down their sovereignty, and carried them away into a captivity from which they have not yet returned. They thought themselves secure, and made lies their refuge, and under falsehood hid themselves. But in the seventeenth verse they are informed that “the hail should sweep away the refuge of lies, and the waters overflow the hiding place.”

In Ezek. 13, we find, that the self-constituted prophets of Israel promising peace to Jerusalem, when Yahweh had determined there should be no peace for her, is styled building up a wall, and daubing it with untempered mortar. Ezekiel was commanded to announce to them, that it should fall by an overflowing shower; and then addressing the constituents of the shower, he says, “And ye, O great hailstones, shall fall; and a stormy wind shall rend it.” This prediction was afterwards fulfilled by the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar, who as great hailstones, a mighty and strong power, demonstrated the flimsiness and instability of their wall by laying Jerusalem in ashes and destroying the liars out of her.

In The Apocalypse, hailstones operate conspicuously in demolishing walls daubed with untempered mortar, sweeping away the refuges of lies, and overflowing all hiding places. Beside the place before us, they are brought into play in chs. 11:19 and 16:21. The hail in these two places signifies the same thing—a mighty and strong power, which falls out of the heaven upon men to plague them exceedingly. This power is the power of the heaven, the spirit, congealed (if I may so speak) into spiritual bodies weighing one talent a piece. These are the hailstones and coals of fire which result from the thunder voice of the Most High. They are the electrical congelations of the Spirit which beat down the Assyrian in his latter day overthrow; as it is written, “And Yahweh shall cause his glorious voice to be heard, and shall show the lighting down of his arm, with the indignation of anger, and the flame of devouring fire, scattering and tempest and hailstones; for through the voice of Yahweh shall the Assyrian be beaten down who smite with a rod,” (Isaiah 30:30). The Assyrian to be beaten down by these living, precious, and all powerful hailstones, is the Gog of Ezekiel, the Fourth Beast of Daniel, and the eighth Head in alliance with the Ten Horns of John. These are destroyed by the saints when judgment is given to them; they are mighty and strong who fall upon them as a plague of hail and a destroying storm upon the forest.

“The third of the earth,” into which the mighty and strong power is cast for judicial execution, was that third section of the Roman Orb occupied by “the third of the trees.” A third implies two other thirds. The trees of these two thirds were not to be affected by the scorching hailcommingled fire. It was to be confined to one of the thirds, which, as we shall see in our historical illustration, was the Western Third. This is “the earth,” or arena, of the first trumpet.

“Trees” are symbolical of the great men among a people. This is evident from Jotham’s parable in Judges 9:8. “The trees went forth,” said he, “to anoint a king over them, and they said unto the Olive Tree, ‘Reign thou over us’.” But, when the olive, and the fig, and the vine, severally declined to be promoted over the trees, all the trees with one voice invited the bramble to wear the crown; to which this prickly bush replied, “If in truth ye anoint me king over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow; and, if not, let fire come out of the bramble, and devour the cedars of Lebanon.” All this is perfectly intelligible, and no sane mind would think of trying to interpret it upon what is called the literal principle of hermeneutics. The trees in Jotham’s parable symbolized all the men of Shechem, and all the house of Millo, in whom the king-making and king-sustaining power resided. It is unnecessary to adduce further proof of this notable signification of “trees” in the symbolic language. An aggregation of wild, uncultivated trees constitutes “a forest.” This is prophetically obnoxious to the storm of hail, which descends upon it; while the people, or trees of Yahweh’s planting (Isaiah 61:3) are dwelling securely, as Israel did in Goshen when the rest of Egypt was desolated and scorched by literal hail mingled with fire; as it is written, “My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure (or safe) dwellings, and in quiet resting places, when it shall hail, coming down on the forest” (Isa. 32:18). This shows that when hail descends on forest trees, there is no peace, safety, or tranquillity, to the wicked represented thereby.

“Grass” is figurative of the multitude. “All flesh is grass” (Isaiah 40:6). It may be either withered or green and flourishing. Before the blast of this trumpet is blown, the grass is “green”; but when the trumpet ceases to sound, it is burned up, and consequently black. Before the hail and fire mingled with blood descends, the catholic multitude, consisting of priests and people, are “green grass.” They are so represented, because of their wickedness, and the iniquity worked by them. The proof of this is found in Psalm 92:7, as, “When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed forever.” Grass that springs is green and looks flourishing. This is sufficient to determine the meaning of the symbol. When it becomes withered or black, it is “because the Spirit of Yahweh bloweth upon it,” and the tempest licks it up as stubble (Isaiah 40:7, 24).

Hence then, the symbolism of this trumpet is representative of the Spirit of Yahweh blowing upon the great men and people of the catholic apostasy of the West. He did it by destroying agents already in a state of preparation. The hail and fire mingled with blood were these agents, ready to fall upon the pious hypocrites of the Latin West, when the time appointed should arrive.

2. Historical Exposition

The following historical summary from Elliot’s Horae Apocalypticae being strictly correct, I cannot do better than to lay it before my readers. “The first angel sounds his trumpet: and lo the same tremendous tempest as before, black with other clouds from the cold hailgenerating countries beyond the Danube, and charged with lightning and hail, appears driving westward. "The third of the land," or continental provinces of the Western division of the Roman empire, is declared the fatal scene of ravage. The Asiatic continent and maritime province of Africa are to remain unharmed by the storm: and the European provinces, too, of the Eastern Empire mostly to escape. The skirts of the storm discharge themselves, as it passes forward, on the Rhoetian hill-country. Then quickly its course is towards Italy. As it sweeps across the Italian frontier, other terrific thunder-clouds from the distant northwest quarter of the heaven succeed, and intermingle with the first. Once and again, the almost united tempests spread in devastating fury over Italy, beyond the Alps and Apennines. Then dividing, a part, impelled yet further south, bursts with terrific lightnings directly over the SevenHilled Imperial City, and passes thence to the southernmost coast of Bruttium beyond. A part, driven backward, takes a westerly course over the Rhine, into Gaul, and far and wide devastates it; then, crossing over the Pyrenaean chain, pours its fury on the Spanish provinces: nor spends itself till it has reached the far shores, west and south, of the Atlantic and Mediterranean. Thus has the entire continental division of the Western Empire been involved in its ravages. Throughout the whole, the lightning fire runs along the ground, even as in the plagues of ancient Egypt, burning in wide spreading conflagration country and town, trees and pasture. And there are signs, too, not to be mistaken, of the destruction of life, as well as of vegetation: for blood appears mixed with the fire and hail. Slowly at length the storm subsides, destroying, however, even in its subsidence. The desolation that it leaves is frightful. The land was as the garden of Eden before it. It remains a wasted wilderness." Vol. I. p. 343.

ALARIC and RHADAGAIUSUS were the leading spirits of what Claudian, a contemporary writer, styles the "hail-storm." With singular impolicy, Arcadius, the emperor of the eastern third, which fell to him on the death of Theodosius, made Alaric Master General of the Eastern Illyricum, and furnished him by so doing with arms from the imperial armories. During four years he made preparation for the invasion of the West. Installed by imperial authority in the centre of the Illyrian Third, he was seated, as Gibbon expresses it, "on the verge, as it were, of the two empires." The separate halves of the catholic body politic were before him, devoted of heaven to be ruthlessly scathed and torn in his merciless career. As preliminary to this sanguinary enterprize, the chieftains of his nation, according to ancient custom, raised him upon a shield, and proclaimed him King of the Visigoths.

At this epoch, the first trumpet sounded, A.D. 395–400. "Fame," says Claudian, "encircling with terror her gloomy wings, proclaimed the march of the barbarian army, and filled Italy with consternation." The public distress was aggravated by the fears and reproaches of superstition. The pagans had no omens and sacrifices to consult; but the infatuated catholics still derived some comfort from what they regarded as the powerful intercession of saint and martyr ghosts. The emperor Honorius was preeminent in fear. The approach of Alaric to Milan caused the Emperor to flee, and take refuge at Asta, a small fortified town, in Piedmont, in which he was hard pressed by the Goths. The timely arrival of the renowned Stilicho effected his deliverance. The Goths retreated, and were afterwards defeated at Pollentia. But Alaric soon repaired his losses, and boldly resolved to break through the unguarded passes of the Apennine, to spread desolation over the fruitful face of Tuscany, and to conquer or die before the gates of Rome. Before, however, his threat was carried into effect, another "dark cloud collected along the coast of the Baltic, and burst in thunder upon the banks of the upper Danube." Rhadagaisus, the king of the confederate Germans, passed without resistance the Alps, the Po, and the Apennine, A.D. 406. Many cities of Italy were pillaged or destroyed. Alaric was a catholic and a leader of a disciplined army; but, Rhadagaisus was a savage, and a stranger to the manners, religion and language of the South. The senate and people of Rome, "the trees and green grass" of the State, trembled while yet his presence was before Florence, 180 miles from Rome, which he vowed to reduce to a heap of stones and ashes, and to sacrifice the most illustrious Romans on the altars of those gods who were appeased by human blood. But the fierceness of this portion of the hail and fire mingled with blood, was destined to expend itself before Florence. The strategy of Stilicho again saved the capital, and caused more than a third of the vast and various multitude of Sueves, Vandals, and Burgundians, who adhered to the standard of Rhadagaisus, to perish on the fields of Tuscany. But one hundred thousand Germans still remained in arms after the death of Rhadagaisus; and the invasion of Gaul, which Alaric had designed, was executed by the remnant of the great army of the Baltic. "This memorable passage (of the Rhine) of the Suevi, the Vandals, the Alani, and the Burgundians, who never afterwards retreated, may be considered," says Gibbon, "as the fall of the Roman empire in the countries beyond the Alps; and the barriers which had so long separated the savage and the civilized nations of the earth were, from that fatal moment, levelled with the ground."

The subjects of Rome in Gaul, "the trees" and "green grass" of the earth, unconscious of their approaching calamities, enjoyed the state of quiet and prosperity, which had seldom blessed the frontiers of Gaul. The banks of the Rhine were crowned, like those of the Tiber, with elegant houses, and well-cultivated farms. This scene of peace and plenty was suddenly changed into a desert, and the prospect of the smoking ruins could alone distinguish the solitude of nature from the desolation of man. The flourishing city of Mentz was surprised and destroyed; and many thousand catholics massacred in their temples; and the consuming flames of war spread from the banks of the Rhine over the greatest part of the seventeen provinces of Gaul. That rich and extensive country, as far as the ocean, the Alps, and the Pyrenees, was delivered to "the hail and fire mingled with blood"—the barbarians, who drove before them, in a promiscuous crowd, the bishop, the senator, and the virgin, "the trees" and "green grass," laden with the spoils of their houses and altars; so that in less than two years, the divided troops of the savages of the Baltic advanced, without a combat, to the foot of Pyrenees.

The inroads of the Barbarian nations during the period of the period of the sounding of the first period of the sounding of the first trumpets. By 407 the Roman garrison in Britain had revolted and set up a soldier Emperor of its own known as Constantine (not to be confused with Constantine "the Great"). At that time therefore, Britain had independent status.

see Penguin Atlas of Medieval History.

As I am not writing a detailed history of the times, but selecting so much from history already written as will illustrate what has been fulfilled of The Apocalypse, it will be unnecessary for me to do more than to note, that the calamities that befel "the third of the earth" were aggravated by the revolt of the army in Britain, which renounced its allegiance to the Emperor of the West, and set up a new emperor, named Constantine, whom they found in the lowest ranks of the army. He established himself in Britain and Gaul, and received also the submission of Spain, whose feeble resistance was ineffectual to prevent the authority of the usurper being acknowledged from the walls of Antoninus to the columns of Hercules.

Adversity had exercised and displayed the genius of Alaric; and the fame of his valor invited to the Gothic standard the bravest of the barbarian warriors, who from the Euxine to the Rhine were agitated by the desire of rapine and conquest. After the death of Stilicho, he put his troops in motion, and A.D. 408, with bold and rapid marches, passed the Alps and the Po; pillaged several cities; proceeded on to Rimini, stretched his ravages along the sea coast of the Hadriatic, and meditated the conquest of the ancient Mistress of the World. An Italian hermit sought to turn him from his purpose; but was silenced by the solemn asseveration of Alaric, that "he felt a secret and preternatural impulse, which directed, and even compelled, his march to the gates of Rome."

During a period of six hundred and nineteen years "the Queen of the Earth" had never been violated by the presence of a foreign enemy. The hour had now arrived for this indignity. The city was blockaded by Alaric, whose vigilance inflicted upon it at length the horrid calamities of famine. Enraged by hunger, the desperate devoured the bodies of their victims; and even mothers tasted the flesh of their slaughtered infants! Many thousands of the inhabitants expired in their houses, or in the streets, for want of sustenance; and the stench arising from so many putrid and unburied carcasses, infected the air. At length Alaric was induced to retire by the payment of an enormous ransom, and to enter upon negotiations for peace. But these failed through the imbecillity and infatuation of the administration. A second siege of Rome was formed; and a third followed, A.D. 410, Aug. 24. At midnight, the Salarian gate was silently opened, and the inhabitants were awakened by the tremendous sound of the Gothic trumpet. Eleven hundred and sixtythree three years after the foundation of Rome, the imperial city, which had subdued and “civilized” so considerable a part of mankind, was delivered to the licentious fury of the tribes of Germany and Scythia.

This awful catastrophe of Rome filled the astonished empire with grief and terror. The people deplored the afflictions of “the Queen of Cities,” while the clergy, who applied justly to recent events the lofty metaphors of oriental prophecy, were foolishly tempted to confound the destruction of the capital, and the dissolution of the globe.

The victorious Goths evacuated Rome on the sixth day, and marched into the southern provinces of Italy, destroying whatever dared to oppose their passage, and plundering the unresisting country. The “hail and fire mingled with blood” continued to consume “the trees,” and to burn up “the green grass” for a still longer period than that reached by the termination of the career of the King of the Goths. While meditating further conquests beyond the limits of this trumpet, Alaric was suddenly arrested by the power of death, which fixed, after a short illness, the fatal term to his conquests. His sepulchre was built in the bed of the Consentia, a river in Bruttium, and adorned with the spoils and trophies of Rome. The secret of its location was concealed by restoring the waters to their accustomed channel, and the massacre of the prisoners employed in constructing it:—“The last Italian blood,” remarks Elliot, “that mingled with the fire and hail,” under the judgments of the first trumpet.

ACT II—SECOND WIND-TRUMPET

The hurting of the Sea by a great mountain burning with fire being cast into it, by which the third of the Sea became blood; the third of its living creatures died; and the third of its ships was destroyed.

A.D. 429 and Onwards

Apoc. 8:8, 9

“And the second angel sounded, and, as it were, a great mountain burning with fire was cast into the sea; and the third of the sea became blood. 9. And the third of the creatures in the sea, having souls, died; and the third of the ships was destroyed.”

1. Symbols Explained

We are plainly informed in this text, that its terms are not to be understood “literally”: that the great mountain in a state of intense combustion was not a real mountain, but something analogous thereto. The information is conveyed by the use of the particle hos, as it were. What John saw represented was a destroying power of great force and magnitude, judicially affecting the population of the maritime arena of the Western Third of the Catholic empire.

“The very etymology of the word mountain,” says Daubuz, “helps out the signification of the symbol. For דָּבִיר

, a mountain comes from דָּבַר

in Hiphil דְּבִיר

.This, and the Chaldee אֲדָבַר

, and the Arabic دَبَّر

, signify to command, subdue, and govern. So, in our military terms, hills and mountains are said to command the places about them. Mountains burning with fire together with a strong wind, and seen by a king in his dream, signify, according to all the interpreters among the Persians and Egyptians, the destruction of his people by a warlike enemy.”

In addressing the Babylonian power of Chaldea, the Spirit styles it “a destroying mountain”—“Behold, I am against thee, O Destroying Mountain, saith Yahweh, which destroyest all the earth” (Jer. 51:25). “A mountain burning with fire” is a destroying power; and the direct opposite to “mountains that bring peace to the people.” A mountain burning with fire would throw the sea, if cast therein, into a bubbling and hissing agitation; it would be “a mountain of prey” but, if the mountain were burnt, instead of burning, it would represent a great power deprived of all ability to injure—a power destroyed instead of destroying. Therefore, saith Yahweh to the power of Babylon which had destroyed all the earth subjugated by it, “I will stretch out Mine hand upon thee, and roll thee down from the rocks, and will make thee a burnt mountain,” a prediction that was fulfilled when He executed “the vengeance of his temple” by Cyrus and his uncle, “the kings of the Medes.”

“The sea” of this trumpet is the politico-geographical arena of its judgments. The mountain burning, or destroying, with fire was providentially “cast into the sea.” “Sea, clear and serene, denotes an orderly collection of men in a quiet and peaceable state. When troubled and tumultuous, a collection of men in motion and war. Either way, waters signifying peoples (Apoc. 17:15), and the sea being a collection of waters, the sea becomes the symbol of people, gathered into one body politic, kingdom, or jurisdiction, or united in one design.”

The four great beasts of Daniel 7 were seen by the prophet to come up out of “the sea” in consequence of the four winds striving upon the Great Sea. The many headed beasts of the apocalypse are but symbolical parts of the fourth of these in Daniel. As the whole came up out of the sea, so therefore must its parts; and that sea, says the prophet, was “the Great Sea,” or Mediterranean. In this trumpet-prophecy “the sea” has a twofold signification, the symbolic and literal. The destroying power was to descend literally upon the maritime region washed by the waters of the Mediterranean; and symbolically upon the peoples inhabiting its coasts. The Romans used the term as inclusive of the islands and maritime coasts of what they regarded as their sea, because situate in the midst of their domain.

“The third of the sea.” This, the sea-third, is the sea of the same “third of the earth,” that was subject to the emperor of the catholic west. It included the coasts of Spain, Gaul, Italy, and the Roman Africa; with the islands of Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, Majorca and Minorca. This seathird “became blood.” Its peoples were put to the sword because of the enormity of their blasphemy, hypocrisy, and crime; for it is on account of these things that the judgments of heaven are poured out with volcanic fury and destruction upon mankind.

THE ROMAN EMPIRE AT ITS GREATEST EXTENT

They “strove upon the Great Sea” (Dan. 7:2). The ancient world in relation to the Great Sea—as the Mediterranean is styled in Scripture.

“The creatures in the sea having souls” were the fish of the symbolic sea; and therefore fish in a symbolic sense. “A sea being thus considered,” says Daubuz, “as a kingdom or empire (in the text, the western empire), the living creatures in it must be typical fishes, or men. But if a sea be considered only of the waters, of which it is a collection, then the waters will signify the common people; and the fishes, or the creatures in the sea, living, as having a power to act, will denote their rulers. And in this sense are the fishes mentioned in Ezek. 29:4, 5, explained of the princes of Pharaoh.”

“The ships.” The introduction of ships into the prophecy indicates that the judgments of the second trumpet have especial regard to the naval and commercial interests of “the third.” Job’s days “passed away as swift ships.” Here ships are used as a metaphor signifying swiftness. In this, his days were analogous to ships. “They that go down to the sea in ships, do business in the great waters.” To destroy these ships, then, would be to destroy the business, whether naval and commercial: and to destroy those who worked them. In predicting this destruction, therefore, of the naval and commercial power of the western third’s dominion, all that was necessary was to say, “the third of the ships was destroyed.”

2. Historical Exposition

The following is Mr. Elliott’s sketch of the phenomena of this vision. “A pause ensues. Then presently there is heard another trumpetblast of judgment. Now, is the visitation of the Western Third of the Mediterranean sea, and the islands and transmarine province included in it; a part hitherto unscathed and safe. Behold yon giant mountain-rock, blazing with volcanic fires, that upheaved from the southernmost point of Spain near the straits of Gades, and cast into the sea, looks like Etna in its raging! Mark how the waters of the midland sea are agitated by it! The lava pours down the mountain sides! The igneous stones and ashes of the volcano are scattered for hundreds of miles all round, on sea and mainland, coasts and islands; first on the coast of Africa, then on that of the opposite continent, from the Atlantic Straits, all along up to the head of the Adriatic. Ships appear set on fire by them, at sea and in the harbors, and light the waters with their conflagrations. Blood marks the loss of life accompanying; the same as in the former vision. Over the whole maritime scene of its devastations whatever is habitable appears desolated; whatever had life, destroyed.”

To the Vandal power was providentially assigned the judicial execution of the second trumpet upon the guilty catholic population of the west. Their work began A.D. 429, by their precipitating their destroying hosts, led by GENSERIC their king, upon the rich and productive province of Africa. Gibbon styles him “the terrible Genseric; a name, which, in the destruction of the Roman empire, has deserved an equal rank with the names of Alaric and Attila.” His ambition was without bounds and without scruples; and prompted him to any enterprise that promised plunder and dominion. His power was a volcanic mountain vomiting forth desolation and death upon what he styled “the guilty.”

The discord of Aetius and Count Boniface, two generals of the Western empire, was the fatal and immediate cause of the eruption of this Vandal volcano, which resulted in the loss of Africa and the islands. Boniface, then in arms against the administration, invited Genseric to an alliance. The Vandal king readily accepted the invitation; and, by the assistance of the Spaniards, who, anxiously desiring to get rid of them, furnished him with ships, he transported his Vandals over the Straits of Gibraltar to the coast of Mauritania where he mustered about 50,000 effective men.

BARBARIAN INVASIONS

When Genseric landed in Africa, he became the deliverer of the Donatists, who were then suffering the most rigorous persecution by the catholic officials, lay and clerical. Among the latter was their zealous enemy, the so-called “Saint” Augustin, Bishop of Hippo, who died just before his city was taken, A.D. 430, and, according to Mr. Elliott, was “joined to the white-robed company before the throne!!” Genseric being an enemy to the catholic faction in power, showed himself to the Donatists as a powerful deliverer, from whom they might reasonably expect the repeal of the odious and oppressive edicts of the Roman emperors. Genseric’s vengeance descended with terrible effect upon the “wolves in sheep’s clothing,” who had been so long and cruelly oppressing all who were opposed to the reigning catholic superstition. Under the reign of the Vandals, whose success they favored, the Donatists of Africa enjoyed an obscure peace of one hundred years, at the end of which they may again be traced “by the light of the imperial persecutions.”

At the time of invasion, Africa was so fruitful as to deserve the name of the common granary of Rome and of mankind. On a sudden, the seven fruitful provinces from Tangier to Tripoli were overwhelmed. The Vandals where they found resistance seldom gave quarter, and the deaths of their comrades were expiated by the ruin of the cities before which they had fallen. Boniface having returned to his allegiance, obtained the command of a powerful armament of ships and land forces, with which he boldly attacked the Vandals before Hippo. But his defeat irretrievably decided the fate of Africa. Eight years after the fall of Hippo, Carthage was reduced to ignominious servitude. After permitting his troops to satiate their rage and avarice, he enjoined all persons, without fraud or delay, to deliver their gold, silver, jewels, and valuable furniture or apparel, to his officers; and the attempt to secrete any part of their patrimony was inexorably punished with torture and death, as an act of treason against the state. The nobility and senators of Carthage were condemned to perpetual banishment; and crowds of exiles, of fugitives, and of ingenuous captives, filled the provinces of the east and west.

With the capture and sack of Carthage, all resistance to the “mountain burning with fire” ceased in Africa. By the separation of this province, the internal prosperity of Rome was irretrievably destroyed. The rapacious Vandals confiscated the patrimonial estates of the emperors and cut off the regular subsidies. The distress of the Romans was soon aggravated by an unexpected attack, June 15, A.D. 455. There being nothing to tempt the rational ambition of the Vandal king in the direction of the desert, “he cast his eyes,” says Gibbon, “toward the sea. He resolved to create a naval power, and his bold resolution was executed with steady and active perseverance. He animated his daring Vandals to embrace a mode of warfare which would render every maritime country accessible to their arms ;” so that, “after an interval of six centuries, the fleets that issued from the port of Carthage again claimed the empire of the Mediterranean.” They vomited fire upon Sicily, which “became blood” in its conquest and the sack of Palermo. The Western empire being left without a defender and lawful prince, the avarice of Genseric increased, and, with a numerous fleet of Vandals and Moors, he cast the anchors of his burning power into the sea at the mouth of the Tiber. Having disembarked, he boldly advanced to the gates of Rome. The bishop (for there was then no Pope, no Pontiff King with temporal power, and “church-states” to be ruled with a grievous yoke)—this bishop Leo, at the head of his clergy, issued in procession to supplicate with all due orthodox humility, a restraining of the fierce and burning wrath of the heretical defender of the Donatists. The Vandal king promised to spare all non-resistants, to protect the buildings from fire, and to except the captives from torture. Nevertheless, Rome and its inhabitants were delivered to the blind passion of his soldiery. The pillage lasted fourteen days and nights. Among the spoils transported from the city by the king were the Golden Table and the Seven-Branched Golden Light-stand, brought by Titus to Rome, where they were deposited in the temple of peace. Nearly four hundred years after, these spoils of Jerusalem were shipped for Carthage, with the rich plunder of the catholic bazaars, dedicated to demons called “guardian saints,” and adorned by the excessive superstition of the coreligionists of Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and company. The gold and silver, amounting to several thousand talents, with the jewels, brass, and copper, accumulated by rapine, were all removed to the fleet, which returned laden with thousands of captives, with a prosperous navigation, to Carthage—all except one vessel bearing the relics of the capitol, which descended to the bottom of the sea.

But “the sea” had not yet sufficiently “become blood;” nor had “the third of the creatures in the sea, having souls, died;” nor had “the third of the ships” been “destroyed.” To bring this about required the revival of “the kingdom of Italy’s” power of resistance (for the Western empire had been reduced to an Italian kingdom) to Genseric upon the sea. The four years reign of the judicious and enterprising Majorian afforded scope for this. Perceiving that Rome could not be safe while Carthage existed as a hostile state, he determined to create a maritime power, and by it achieve the conquest of Africa. In three years he collected an imperial navy of three hundred large galleys, with an adequate proportion of transports and smaller vessels, in the secure and capacious harbor of Cathagena in Spain. Hearing of this, and apprehensive of Majorian’s descent at his own original landing place, Genseric reduced Mauritania into a desert. Secret intelligence guided him to the anchorage of his foe, whose unguarded fleet he surprised in the bay of Carthagena. Many of the ships were taken, or sunk, or burnt, and the preparations of three years were destroyed in a single day.

For six years after the death of Majorian, the government of Italy was in the hands of the Count Ricimer alone, one of the principal commanders of the barbarians, descended from the Visigoths and Suevi. Under his rule, the kingdom of Italy was afflicted by the incessant depredations and conflagrations of the Vandalic “mountain burning with fire.” In the spring of each year, Genseric sallied forth from the port of Carthage in command of the most important expeditions. When asked by his pilot what course he should steer, “Leave the determination to the winds,” said he, “THEY will transport us to the guilty coast whose inhabitants have provoked the divine justice.” They repeatedly visited the coasts of Spain, Liguria, Tuscany, Campania, Lucania, Bruttium, Apulia, Calabria, Venetia, Dalmatia, Epirus, Greece, and Sicily. They subdued the island of Sardinia, and spread desolation or terror from the columns of Hercules to the mouth of the Nile; and, as they always embarked a sufficient number of horses, they had no sooner landed, than they swept the dismayed country with a body of light cavalry. The fierceness of the scourge is attested by the massacre of five hundred noble citizens of Zante, whose mangled bodies he cast into the Ionian sea—“the sea became blood; and the creatures in the sea, having souls, died.”

The permission of such sanguinary severities by Providence can only be accounted for on the principle of the wicked being Yahweh’s sword for the punishment of the hypocrisy, blasphemy, superstition, and immorality of the victims. Genseric seemed to recognize that he was the executioner of “divine justice” upon the orthodox catholic fraternity that inhabited “the sea”. “The fury of the Vandals,” says Gibbon, “was confined to the limits of the Western empire”—to “the third of the sea, and of the creatures, and of the ships.” The Italians, now destitute of a naval force, through the haughty Ricimer were at length reduced to address the throne of Constantinople in the language of subjects; and Italy submitted, as the price and security of the alliance, to accept a master from the choice of Leo the First, the Emperor of the East, in the person of Anthemius, who entered Rome as Emperor of the West, April 12, A.D. 467. Immediately after this, “regardless of the majesty of the purple,” said he, “I gave my daughter to a Goth; I sacrificed my own blood to the safety of the republic.” But this did not prevent Ricimer, his daughter’s husband, from sacking Rome and putting him to death, A.D. 472.

In the meantime, however, the alliance developed immense naval and military preparations on the part of the eastern Romans, languidly aided by the west, for carrying the war into Africa. One hundred and thirty thousand pound weight of gold (about æ5,200,000), and seven hundred thousand of silver, paid into the treasury for expenses, reduced the cities to extreme poverty. The fleet it provided, and which sailed from Constantinople to Carthage, consisted of eleven hundred and thirteen ships, and the number of soldiers and mariners—“the creatures in the sea having souls”—exceeded one hundred thousand men.

This formidable navy was increased by a fleet under Marcellinus from the Adriatic. Consternation seized the Carthaginians; but Genseric beheld the danger with firmness, and eluded it with his veteran dexterity. Having obtained a truce of five days to regulate the terms of submission, in this short interval the wind became favorable to his designs. He manned his largest ships of war with his bravest Moors and Vandals, who towed after them many large barks filled with combustible materials. In the obscurity of the night, “as it were a mountain burning with fire,” these destructive vessels were impelled against the unguarded and unsuspecting fleet of the Romans. Their close and crowded order assisted the progress of the fire, which was communicated with rapid and irresistible violence; and the noise of the wind, the crackling of the flames, and the dissonant cries of “the creatures in the sea having souls”—the soldiers and mariners, who could neither command nor obey—increased the horror of the tumult. While they labored to extricate themselves from the fireships, and to save at least a part of the navy, the galleys of Genseric assaulted them with temperate and disciplined valor; and many of the Romans, who escaped the fury of the flames, were destroyed or taken by the victorious Vandals. “More than half the fleet and army was lost,” and Genseric again became “the Tyrant of the Sea.” The coasts of Italy, Greece, and Asia, were again exposed to his vengeance; and, before he died, in the fulness of years and of glory, A.D. 477, he beheld the final extinction of the Trinitarian Empire of the West. And thus “the third of the creatures in the sea, having souls, died; and the third of the ships were destroyed.”

ACT III—THIRD WIND-TRUMPET

The poisoning of the third of the rivers and fountains of waters with a deadly bitterness, by the Great Blazing Star Apsinthos falling from the heaven into them, and causing the death of many.

A.D. 450, and onwards.

“And the third angel sounded, and a great star blazing as it were a torch fell out of the heaven: and it fell upon the third of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters. And the name of the star is called the Apsinthian; and the third of the waters became undrinkable; and many of the men died out of the waters, because they were made bitter.”

Apoc. 8:10, 11

1. Symbols Explained

On account of the luminaries in the natural heaven governing the day and the night (Gen. 1:14–18), all luminaries in the symbolical language signify ruling powers; and the light itself is well employed to signify the edicts, laws, rules, or directions that proceed from them for the good of their subjects. Thus of the Great King, styled the “Day Star,” and “the Sun of Righteousness,” it is said in Psalm 119:105, “Thy word is a light unto my path;” and in Hos. 6:5, “Thy judgments are as the light.” “I am,” saith the Lord Jesus, “the bright and the Morning Star”—Apoc. 22:16; the Star which the Spirit compelled Balaam to predict would “come out of Jacob” (Num. 24:17). By this star is evidently intended a ruler, a conqueror, a great potentate; for, as the Sceptre of Israel, he is to “smite the princes of Moab, and to destroy all the children of Sheth.”

A Star, therefore, sometimes signifies a destroying power. The word is also put for that which is inconstant, or meteoric in its motions. Hence, in Jude, such stars are styled “wandering” or shooting stars. In this third trumpet prophecy, the star seen was of this species. It shot forth out of the heaven. John did not see it there, shining as a fixed star of great and sparkling, but steady light; its motion was erratic, wandering or shooting out of the starry sphere into regions below the ruling heaven. It fell from its position where it was “a Great Star” in the heaven. It fell, or descended, not because it was expelled as those stars of the heaven which the Little Horn of the Goat cast down to the ground, and stamped upon (Dan. 8:9, 10) by a superior power; but by its own precipitancy, derived from the motive power of Deity, whose agent it was for judgment upon the Laodicean Apostasy.

In symbolic style, “a great star blazing as it were a torch” signifies no good to those upon whom it is said to fall. Its effects must be conflagrating and deadly. An ordinary, or literal, blazing torch would be extinguished by falling into water; but we know that certain bodies cast into that fluid will set it on fire, and convert it into a solution that would be fatal to the drinker. There is therefore a decorum, or fitness, in the language of the vision, which is now known to be founded in the nature of things. Mr.

Cunninghame has therefore well remarked that “the language of symbols is not of arbitrary or uncertain signification, but is interpretable on fixed principles, to ascertain and define which, is the first duty of a commentator, as the judicious application of that language to the events of history is the second.”

“A shooting star was, in antiquity, the appropriate image of a powerful and successful invader from a distant country.” “The more I read this wonderful book” (the Apocalypse), says Bishop Horsley, “the more I am convinced that the precision of the phraseology is little short of mathematical accuracy. The language seems highly adorned, but the ornaments are not redundancies: they are not of that sort that the proposition would remain the same if the epithets were expunged. And in passages which may seem similar, there never is the smallest variation of style, but it points to something of diversity, either in the subject or the predicate. With this notion of the style of the Apocalypse, I think it of importance to remark that the falling stars of the third and fifth trumpets fall ‘from heaven,’ or ‘out of the sky,’ but are not said to be of ‘the stars of heaven,’ which are seen to fall in ch. 6. But, further, that which falls ‘from heaven,’ or ‘out of the sky,’ upon the sounding of the third trumpet, is a great star, burning as it were a lamp.

“Lampas, in the Greek language, is the name of a meteor of a particular sort. From Pliny’s description, it is evident that lampas was one sort of those meteors which are commonly called ‘shooting stars.’ It was of that sort, in which a large ball, appearing first in time, and foremost in the direction of the motion, draws a long train of bright sparks after it. Such exactly was the meteor in the vision of the third trumpet.

“The most remarkable circumstances in these shooting stars are these: 1. They have no appropriate place in the starry heavens, but are engendered in the lower regions of the earth’s atmosphere. 2. They shine by a native light; but third, are visible only while they fall. 4. The motion is rapid. 5. The duration brief. 6. The brightness, while it lasts, intense. 7. The extinction instantaneous. 8. And when the light is extinguished, nothing remains: the body which emitted the light is nowhere to be found.”

The falling of a great star blazing like a torch out of the heaven, then, was symbolical of a great destroying power, issuing forth from a lower region of the political aerial, progressing by its native force with rapid, but brief, yet intense motion, coming suddenly to the end of its career, and leaving nothing but a smoking desolation as the memorial of its presence.

“The heaven” out of which it blazed forth was the heaven under which were “the rivers and fountains of waters” into which the great star precipitated itself. “Wherever the scene is laid,” says Daubuz, “heaven signifies, symbolically, the ruling power or government; that is, the whole assembly of the ruling powers, which, in respect of the subjects, or earth, are a political heaven, being over and ruling the subjects as the natural heaven stands over and rules the earth: so that according to the subject is the term to be limited and, therefore, Artemidorus, writing in the times of the Roman emperors, makes the country of Italy to be heaven. As heaven says he, is the abode of gods, so is Italy of kings.”

But after the times of the pagan emperors, and concurrent with those of the scarcely less pagan Constantine and his successors, the Roman Heaven expanded itself into the comprehensiveness of the three seats, or thrones, which ruled over the three thirds, or Imperial Praefectures, into which the dominions of Daniel's Fourth Beast, civil and ecclesiastical polity, were divided. These heavenly thirds are especially recognized in the vision of the fourth trumpet; and are styled in Dan. 7:27, "the Whole Heaven." The whole is more than its parts. These thirds of the heaven have relation to the thirds of the earth, or Roman Orb; and may be styled, the Byzantine or Constantinopolitan Heavenly, the Italian Heavenly, and the Illyrian Heavenly, all of them "the abode of kings." A shooting star, generally, projects itself obliquely: so, when this "great star blazing as it were a torch" fell, it fell "out of" its own appropriate heavenly, into "the waters" under the neighboring third, whose heavenly bodies were doomed shortly to be eclipsed. It fell from the Illyrian heavenly section of "the whole heaven," into the rivers under the Italian Third.

Yahweh charges Sennacherib with saying by his messengers to Hezekiah: "With the multitude of my chariots, I have digged and drunk strange waters, and with the sole of my feet have I dried up all the rivers of fenced places." These waters and rivers were the foreign nations he had laid waste. And again: "O Jacob, when thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee": that is, waters or peoples, and rivers or nations. So they are also explained in Apoc. 16:4-7, where "rivers and fountains of waters" are declared to be those who have "shed the blood of saints and prophets"; and in ch. 17:15, "the waters" upon whom the Great Harlot sits are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues.

But we are not to suppose that because "waters" signify these populations of earth, their geography and topography are left undetermined. On the contrary, in the phrase, "upon the third of the rivers, and upon the foundations of waters," is a blending of the literal and the symbolical, which is so frequent in prophecy. There is a striking illustration of this in Apoc. 17:9, 10, where the seven heads of the beast are symbolical of seven supreme powers, or "kings"; and literally identical with the seven mountains on which they were successively located: so "the rivers" pertaining to "the third" represents symbolically the populations thereof; and their literal chorography in the mountainous and valley, or river, regions of the Catholic West. These "rivers and fountains of waters" had not, previously to the times of the third trumpet, done much in the way of shedding the blood of saints and prophets; they were beginning to approve this remedy for what they were pleased to style "heresy": nevertheless, they had proved themselves bitter persecutors of "the sealed servants of Deity," during the one hundred and twentyfive years their rulers, who were all "pious catholics," exercised dominion over Italy, Africa, Gaul, Spain and Britain. The third trumpet was an especial element of the judgment upon them. Its scorching visitations retaliated upon them bitterness and death for the bitterness they had caused "the sealed." But after the judgments of the third and fourth trumpets had extinguished the so-called orthodox catholic power of the West, another power arose out of the wreck, which was a perfect novelty in the earth. This has been known for more than a thousand years past as the Papal. It acquired sovereignty over "the rivers and fountains of waters," and energized them "to shed the blood of saints and prophets," to pour it out abundantly; so that they became worthy to receive blood to drink, by one who, under the third Vial, gloried in his resemblance to the Great Star that blazed like a torch in the judicial execution of the third trumpet retribution.

"And the name of the star is called ho Apsinthos". This I have simply transferred as being the name of the star before the English tongue was written or spoken. As the star-power did not exist in John's day, the legetai, "is called," must be understood to mean that, in the days of the third trumpet, those who spoke Greek called it ho Apsinthos. It is a proper name; and is to be taken in a like sense as the name of the conqueror, styled by men in the days of the third vial, "the Corsican." This was applied to the first Napoleon as indicative of the country from which he came; so the Great Star was called by the Greeks, "the Apsinthian," to designate the region out of whose heaven he fell blazing upon "the third of the rivers,” after he had proved a scourge to them.

I have said that “the Apsinthian” fell upon “the rivers and fountains of waters,” out of the Illyrian section of the whole heaven of the Roman orb. My reason for this is that Apsinthos is the name of a river in the Illyrian third of the Roman earth; and is therefore as significative of Illyria, as the Euphrates was of Assyria, or the Nile of Egypt.

But, for what reason, may we conclude, did the Spirit select this river of Illyricum in preference to any other? Because of the signification of the name being appropriate to the nature of the judgments to be executed by THE ILLYRIAN POWER, which had been developed in the preparation of the angels of the trumpets for sounding. The word radically signifies undrinkable from whatever cause. The trumpet mission of the Illyrian Power was to make the rivers of the third undrinkable, by putting many of the men of the waters to the sword, that they might die out from them. This was, as in the Arabic Romance, Antar, it is expressed, “Death serving them with a cup of apsinth by the sword.”

2. Historical Exposition

The following is Mr. Elliott’s summary of the phenomena of the vision. “Which,” he inquires, “is the new scene of judgment? ‘The third of the rivers,’ it is said, ‘and the fountains of waters.’ It begins where yon mighty river to the North forms the ancient limit between barbarian Germany, and the Illyrian, or Middle Praefecture of the Roman Empire. Mark the portentous meteor that glares over it; like a blazing torch trailing its red line of light behind it in the Northern sky! And see, where the Teiss pouring itself into the Danube, marks the central point of the base of the Great Illyrian Praefecture; there suddenly it descends, and blazes, and taints with its sulphurous exhalations the downward course of that ancient river.

“But it was the same western third of the empire, as before, that was in this case too to taste specially of the bitterness of the woe. And mark how, in fulfilment of its mission, the meteor tracks the course of the Upper Danube, and then reaches and moves along the Rhenish frontier river of the Western Empire; blazing over and poisoning its waters, down even to the Belgic lowlands. Thence again unquenched it rises; shoots in rapid course westward; is repelled, as if by some counter electric force, and as from a region on which it behoved not that it should permanently shed its malignant influences; then in southerly direction falls on the fountains of European waters, there where the Alpine snows are dissolving from their eternal glaciers. Wheresoever it has fallen, the rivers and their tributaries have been poisoned by it; and the dead and dying of those that drink them, appear lying on the banks. Having thus done its part, it shoots back towards the Danube; there blazes for a moment longer, and is extinct.”

“In the reign of ATTILA the huns,” says Gibbon, “became the terror of the world—a formidable barbarian, who alternately insulted and invaded the east and the west, and urged the rapid downfall of the Roman Empire.” He alone among the conquering meteors, or blazing torches, of ancient or modern times, united the two mighty kingdoms of Germany and Scythia under one sceptre. Claiming to be the rightful possessor of the Sword of Mars, he asserted his divine and indefeasible claim to the dominion of the earth. He soon acquired a sacred character; and the barbarian princes confessed, in the language of devotion or flattery, that they could not presume to gaze with a steady eye, on the Divine Majesty of the King of the Huns. As supreme and sole monarch of the barbarians, he was able, when he collected his military force, to bring into the field an army of five, or according to another account, seven hundred thousand troops. When these were set in rapid motion, they constituted a power, that may be very appropriately likened to “a Great Star blazing as a torch.”

The Attila-power, which prevailed from A.D. 433 to 453, was fitly designated “the Apsinthian,” or Illyrian. It touched the Danube on one hand, and reached with the other, as far as the Tanais, or Don. On making peace with the Constantinopolitan power, after a ravaging war of five years to which he was stirred up by his African ally, the redoubtable GENSERIC. the eastern Catholic emperor, resigned to Attila an extensive and important territory, which stretched along the southern banks of the Danube from Belgrade to Nova, in the diocese of Thrace, a breadth of fifteen day's journey, and embracing Naissus within the limits of his dominion. The exact location of his capital is uncertain; but supposed to have been seated between the Danube, the Teyss, and the Carpathian hills in the plains of Upper Hungary. All these regions were embraced in the great Illyrian Praefecture; so that the great Attila-star might well be styled by its Greek contemporaries of the Byzantine dominion adjacent, "THE ILLYRIAN;" and by the Spirit symbolically, "the Apsinthian."

Theodosius the younger, emperor of the east, having acknowledged Attila, the Illyrian, as the lord of the Lower Danube, the Huns were now its masters, commanding the navigation to the Black Sea; and prepared to blaze forth in any direction Providence might impel them to take. "What fortress," said the Apsinthian to the Byzantine ambassadors, "what city, in the wide extent of the Roman Empire, can hope to exist, secure and impregnable, if it is our pleasure that it should be erased from the earth?" They knew by experience, that these were not mere words; and as they were unequal to contend with him in war, they sought to rid themselves of this "Scourge of God," by his assassination. But "the Apsinthian" was not to be thus imperially disposed of till his mission was fulfilled; and then the Deity would lay his instrument aside in his own way. Attila was informed of the conspiracy against his life; and though he had the meaner conspirators in his hands, he disdained to punish them; but reserved his just indignation for the pious catholic prince who approved his murder. He denounced Theodosius as a wicked slave, who had clandestinely conspired against his master, "whom fortune and merit had placed above him" Nevertheless, he consented to pardon the emperor, and to maintain peace.

All the history of the Illyrian Conqueror goes to show, that his abode was in "the heaven," and that he was "a great star" therein; for he enjoyed the proud satisfaction of receiving in the same camp, the ambassadors of the eastern and western empires; and it is only to sovereign and recognized powers, that such apocalyptic "demons," are commissioned by the superior gods of their heavenlies.

The inglorious life of Theodosius was closed A.D. 450. The Apsinthian Star forthwith assumed a threatening aspect against both empires. "While mankind," says Gibbon, "awaited his decision with awful suspense, Attila sent an equal defiance to the courts of Ravenna and Constantinople, and his ministers saluted the two emperors in the same haughty terms, saying, 'Attila my lord, and thy lord, commands thee to provide a palace for his immediate reception'." But "the Apsinthian" despising the Romans of the east, whom he had so often vanquished, soon declared his resolution of suspending the easy conquest, till he had achieved the more glorious and important enterprize of "blazing like a torch upon the third of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters;" and thus unconsciously fulfilled the mission appointed for him by the finger of God.

For this great and blazing descent upon the Western Third, the kings and nations of Germany and Scythia, from the Volga to the Danube obeyed the warlike summons of "the Scourge of God." From the royal village in the plains of Hungary, he marched to the conflux of the Rhine and the Neckar, where he was joined by the Franks. These hostile myriads were poured with resistless violence, into the Belgic provinces. The consternation of Gaul was universal. Its cities were besieged and stormed by the Apsinthian Huns, who practised their customary maxims of war. They made the waters undrinkable; so that multitudes were separated from them by death; for they were made very bitter. "They involved," says Gibbon, "in the promiscuous massacre, the priests who served at the altar, and the infants, who in the hour of danger had been providentially baptized by the bishop; and the flourishing city (Metz) was delivered to the flames." From the Rhine and Moselle, Attila marched into the heart of Gaul; crossed the Seine at Auxerre; and fixed his camp under the walls of Orleans. From this city, however, he prudently retreated to the plains of Chalons. The nations from the Volga to the Atlantic were marshalled here under the Illyrian, and Aetius and Theodoric, the catholic generals of the west. The results were very bitter to the contending hosts. Many of the Gothic warriors, who served in that memorable engagement informed Cassiodorius, that it was “a conflict fierce, various, obstinate, and bloody; such as could not be paralleled, either in the present or in past ages.”

The number of the polloi ton anthropon, the “many of the men” who were apsinthianized in this battle of Chalons, amounted to 162,000, or, according to another account 300,000. Though Attila was put to the worse in this battle, he threatened his foe with redoubled fury. Prudence, however, prevailed over revenge; and the allied army of Latin and Gothic catholics separated, and withdrew from the plains of Chalons. Attila’s retreat beyond the Rhine confessed the last victory achieved in the name of the western empire. The Thuringians who served under “the Apsinthian,” made the waters very bitter. They massacred their hostages and captives; they tortured young maidens with exquisite and unrelenting rage; their bodies were torn asunder by wild horses, or their bones were crushed under the weight of rolling wagons; and their unburied limbs were abandoned on the public roads, as a prey to dogs and vultures.

The Empire divided into two parts answering to the legs of iron of the image seen by Nebuchadnezzar (Daniel 2:33).

Neither the spirit, the forces, nor the reputation of the Apsinthian Star were impaired by the failure of the Gallic expedition. It had blazed like a torch, and imbittered the river populations of the country; but it had only partially executed its mission upon the worshippers of relics and demons. In the ensuing spring he passed the Alps into Italy with an innumerable host of barbarians. He laid siege to Aquileia, the most populous and strongest of the maritime cities of the Hadriatic. The Huns mounted the breach with irresistible fury, and the succeeding generation could scarcely discover the ruins of Aquileia. After this dreadful chastisement, this blazing torch descended upon Altinum, Concordia, and Padua, which were reduced into heaps of stones and ashes. The inland towns, Vicenza, Verona, and Bergamo, were exposed to the rapacious cruelty of his Huns. Milan and Pavia submitted without resistance to the loss of their wealth; and applauded the unusual clemency, which preserved from the flames the public, as well as private buildings; and spared the lives of the captive multitude. After this, the scorching ravages of this Great Star, blazing like a torch, overspread the rich plains of modern Lombardy, which are divided by the Po, and bounded by the Alps and Apennine.

“It is a saying,” says Gibbon, “worthy of the ferocious pride of Attila, that the grass never grew on the spot where his horse had trod. Yet the savage destroyer undesignedly laid the foundation of a republic, which revived, in the feudal state of Europe, the art and spirit of commercial industry.” This was Venice. Before the Apsinthian descended like a blazing torch upon the Italian province of Venetia, extending from the confines of Pannonia to the river Addua, and from the Po to the Rhaetian and Julian Alps, this fertile region was adorned with fifty cities flourishing in peace and prosperity. They also were swept by the conflagration; “all was flight,” says Sigonius, “depopulation, slaughter, slavery, and despair;” but many families who fled from the sword of Attila, found a safe, though obscure refuge in the hundred islets at the extremity of the Hadriatic. Upon these they laid the foundations of the queen of that sea, which in after times became the Tyre of the feudal world; “and,” says Elliott, “he who has seen the fair Venice may do well to remember that he has seen in it a memorial of the terrors and ravages of that Scourge of God, the Hun Attila.”

What a terrible signification there is in the apocalyptic symbols: This great blazing star was still craving devastation and blood; and declared his resolution of carrying his victorious arms to the gates of Rome. But the Star was meteoric, and, as a meteor, must be of brief duration, and suddenly become extinct. It had been blazing and scorching among “the rivers and fountains of waters” during three years; but where was the power to extinguish it? The barbarians, who had defended Gaul, refused to march to the relief of Italy; and the succors promised by the Eastern Emperor were distant and doubtful. The only deliverance was in unqualified submission. The Western Emperor, with the Senate and people of Rome, by a solemn and suppliant embassy, embraced the salutary resolution of deprecating the wrath of “the Apsinthian.” The barbarian monarch listened with favorable, and even respectful attention; and the deliverance of Italy was purchased by an immense ransom; but before he evacuated the country, he threatened to return more dreadful, and more implacable, if the treaty were not faithfully and punctually observed. But his mission being accomplished, he was of no further use. Having returned to his royal village between the Danube and the Teiss, the next year, which was A.D. 453, he was suddenly cut off by apoplexy, and this blazing “terror of the world” lay powerless in death. The empire and power of the Huns was soon after broken; and the wind of the third trumpet ceased to blow.

ACT IV—FOURTH WIND-TRUMPET

The darkening of the third of the luminaries of the Greco-Latin Catholic firmament by smiting them; so that the Day and the Night of their system were without ruling lights, and therefore, shone not for a third of them.

A.D. 476

“And the fourth angel sounded, and the third of the sun, and the third of the moon, and the third of the stars, was smitten; so that the third of them was darkened, and the day shone not the third of it, and the night likewise.”

Apoc. 8:12

1. Symbols Explained

“For the understanding of the prophesies,” says Sir Isaac Newton truly, “we are, in the first place, to acquaint ourselves with the figurative language of the prophets; which is taken from the analogy between the world natural, and an empire or kingdom considered as a world politic.”

The sun, moon, and stars are therefore prophetic symbols taken from the natural world. “The Lord God is a Sun, and Shield” (Psalm 84:11). He is the universe’s Ruler and Lightgiver, and Protector. This is the signification of sun, as a symbol, in its largest sense. But, in Jer. 15:9, it is used restrictedly in the testimony of the Spirit against Jerusalem; as “Her sun is gone down while it is yet day.” In this instance the sun symbolized the sovereign power and glory of the commonwealth, of which Jerusalem was the capital. It went down when the state was destroyed by the Chaldeans. But it shone forth again; and again went down, when the kingdom was taken away from the Pharisees—when “the sun was darkened, the moon gave no light, and the stars fell from the Heaven;” and were thenceforth suppressed superlatively “until He come whose right it is,” even “the sun and shield.” Then, the Spirit saith to Jerusalem, “the sun shall no more be thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee; but Yahweh shall be unto thee an everlasting light,” or sun; “and thine Elohim thy glory. Thy sun shall no more go down; neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for Yahweh shall be to thee for the Light,” or sun, “of the Olahm,” and which is explained to signify, that “the days of Zion’s mourning shall be ended”—she should no more lose her sovereignty, and mourn the withdrawal of her ecclesiastical institutions and privileges.

Again, when the Spirit revealed his purpose to subvert the Egyptian monarchy by the Chaldean power, he said to the King of Egypt, whom he likened to a dragon, in the seas, in Ezek. 32:6–8, “I will water with thy blood the land wherein thou swimdest; and when I shall extinguish thee, I will cover the heaven and make the stars thereof dark: I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give her light. All the bright lights of heaven, will I make dark over thee, and set darkness upon thy land, saith Adonai Yahweh.” The Chaldean power under Nebuchadnezzar was the “cloud” that covered the sun of Egypt, and made the stars of its heaven dark, and its moon eclipsed; and the Pharaoh-Dragon thenceforth swam no more in Egypt.

After the same manner the prophets spoke when they predicted the overthrow of the kingdoms of Babylon and Idumea. In foretelling the subversion of the former power by the Medes and Persians, Isaiah says in symbolizing ch. 13:9, “For the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine”—ver. 10; which in verse 11, is interpreted to signify the punishing of the Chaldean world for evil, “and the wicked for their iniquity.”

The threatening against the Idumean sovereignty is in the highly symbolic style of the sixth seal. “All the host of heaven,” says the Spirit in Isa. 34:4, “shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll; and all their host shall fall down, as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig tree. For my sword shall be bathed in heaven;” then follows the exposition: “Behold, it shall come down upon Idumea, and upon the people of my curse to judgment.”

Thus, we see, that the moral universe, the Israelitish, the Egyptian, the Chaldean, and the Idumean, kingdoms and empires, have all their suns, moons, stars, and constellations, as well as the natural world or system of things. The supreme civil and military authority of a state is the sun which sheds forth all the light, power and glory of the polity. The moon, stars and constellations are the ecclesiastical and aristocratic orders, which reflect its beams upon the earth or subjects of the state. They rule the day and the night of their own polity, which, without their shining, has no distinction of day or night. Like the natural world luminaries, they are affected by eclipses, darkening, and so forth, which become causes intercepting or suspending their regular and peaceful influences upon the peoples.

Daniel’s fourth beast system of powers has its sun, moon, and stars, as well as the polities by which it was preceded. Under its pagan constitution, the authority and power vested in the imperial and senatorial orders were the sun of the Roman orb; its moon, the priestly orders of the state; and subject kings, nobles, and magistrates, its stars and constellations. When the pagan constitution that hindered was taken out of the way, the aerial, or political expanse, transmitted the rays of the same lights, only that they emitted influences less intensely heathen than before. The sun, moon and stars which continued to shine had become “catholic.” They radiated the malign influences of the Laodicean Apostasy, and were essentially, though not professedly and in detail, as devilish as of old.

In the earlier years of Constantine’s reign, the Roman Sun was the one solar investment of three emperors—Constantine, Licinius, and Maximin. So also, when “the silence in the heaven about half an hour” had ended, his three sons were clothed with the sun. In these instances, each emperor’s jurisdiction was representative of “the third of the sun;” and the ecclesiastical orders in each imperial jurisdiction, of “the third of the moon;” and the nobles and magistrates also in each, “the third of the stars”. If one of these emperors made war upon another of them, and defeated him, and incorporated the dominion of the vanquished in his own jurisdiction, then “the third of the sun and the third of the moon, and the third of the stars,” would be “darkened” by smiting; and there would be no political “day” nor “night” peculiar to that smitten third.

Now, in the days of the third trumpet, the sun of the Roman Heaven clothed the emperors of the eastern and western thirds, to say nothing of the Illyrian. The smiting of one of these thirds to obliteration from the political map, would be the darkening of that third in its imperial, ecclesiastical, and aristocratic relations to the subject peoples of its eclipsed jurisdiction. The unsmitten third would be

“the third of the men,” which so long as it continued a distinct and independent power, would be regarded as living, or not “killed” (Apoc. 9:18).

When there are no heavenly bodies visible to a spectator supposed to be standing upon the earth, the alternations styled day and night, do not exist. To blot out the sun, moon, and stars of the natural universe, would be to extinguish day and night, and to establish “darkness upon the face of the deep.” The effect would be analogous in the political universe. For, as in the case of Egypt, when Pharaoh’s dominion was abolished, to make all the bright lights of heaven dark, would be to set darkness upon the land. But, as in the instance of the Greco-Latin Catholic dominion, if only one third of its sun, moon, and stars be smitten into obscurity, the day and night of the whole polity would not be extinguished, but only a proportional third. The imperial catholic day and night would be restricted to the unsmitten thirds, where the bright lights of their heaven would still be observed to shine.

2. Historical Exposition

The phenomena of the fourth trumpet are thus briefly sketched by Mr. Elliott: “The vision has passed; the fourth angel sounds. Hitherto, though its land, its sea, and its frontier rivers and fountains of waters have been desolated, yet the sun has still continued shining on the Western Empire as before. But now at length this too is affected. To the extent of a third part of its orb, it suffers eclipse. The shadow falls over the Western Empire. Then the night supervenes. And see the eclipsing influences act on the luminaries of the night also. Presently the Western third of the moon becomes eclipsed; and of the stars scattered over the symbolic firmament, all that are in the third of the Roman sky, are darkened also.”

Thus, by the judgments of the first, second, and third, trumpets, the final catastrophe was preparing, by which the emperors of the west and their dominions were to be extinguished. Rome’s glory had long departed; its provinces severally and successively separated from it; the territory still remaining to it had become like a desert; and its maritime dependencies, and its fleets and commerce, been annihilated. Little remained to it but the vain titles and insignia of sovereignty; and now the time was come that, by the smiting of the fourth trumpet, these too were to be withdrawn; and that the imperial, or Sixth Head of the Roman Dragon should be “as it were slain unto death,” and give place to the SEVENTH HEAD, which had not then yet come, and which. “when he cometh, must continue a short space” (Apoc. 13:3 and 17:10).

The blast of the fourth trumpet when it began to sound, found Romulus Augustulus, A.D. 476, the last and feeblest of emperors, upon the throne of the catholic dominion of the West. He was placed there by his Father Orestes, the secretary of state to the imperious Attila: and after his death “Patrician, and Master General” of the barbarian confederates in the service of the Western empire, who formed the defence and the terror of Italy. They oppressed and insulted the last remains of Roman freedom and dignity. Their insolence and avarice at length prompted them peremptorily to demand, that a third part of the lands of Italy should be immediately divided among them. But Orestes rejected the audacious demand. The standard of revolt was raised, therefore, by the bold barbarian ODOACER. From all the camps and garrisons of Italy, the confederates flocked to the standard of this popular leader. Overwhelmed by the torrent, Orestes entrenched himself in Pavia, which was stormed and pillaged; and the tumult could be appeased only by his execution. This “smiting” left Augustulus at the mercy of Odoacer, whose clemency he was induced to implore.

The success of this revolt elevated the king of the Heruli to the Vicegerency of the Emperor of the West. But deeming the imperial office both useless and expensive, Odoacer determined to abolish it. The unfortunate Augustulus was made the instrument of his own disgrace, by sending in his resignation to the Senate. An epistle was addressed by their unanimous decree to Zeno, the contemporary incumbent of the Byzantine throne. In this document, they solemnly “disclaim the necessity, or even the wish, of continuing any longer the succession in Italy; since, in their opinion, the Majesty of a Sole Monarch is sufficient to pervade and protect, at the same time, both the east and the west. In their own name, and in the name of the people, they consent that the Throne of Universal Empire shall be transferred from Rome to Constantinople; while they renounce the right of choosing a master, the only vestige that yet remained of the authority which had given laws to the world. The republic might safely confide in the civil and military virtues of Odoacer; and they humbly request, that the Emperor would invest him with the title of PATRICIAN, and the administration of the diocese of Italy.” After some display of displeasure and indignation. Zeno’s prudence and vanity prevailed. He was gratified by the title of SOLE EMPEROR, and by the statues erected to his honor in the several quarters of Rome. He gratefully accepted the imperial ensigns, the sacred ornaments of the throne and palace, which the Patrician Odoacer was not unwilling to remove from the sight of the people.

Speaking of Romulus Augustulus, whom Odoacer sent into banishment, Gibbon says, that of all the nine emperors of the last twenty years of the empire, Augustulus “would be the least entitled to the notice of posterity, if his reign, which was marked by the extinction of the Roman empire in the west, did not leave a memorable era in the history of mankind.” The epoch was, indeed, remarkable and peculiar. The Roman Sun was still recognized as shining; but still it shed no administrative light in the west. One third of its face was pervaded by the shadow of a darkening body—the administration of the Patrician of Italy. By this also the light of the Roman Moon was diminished one third; for of what account in the state were the bishop of Rome and his clergy, while “the diocese of Italy” was the patrimony, not of St. Peter and his pretended successor, but of Odoacer and his military compatriots?

In A.D. 476, the Western Roman Empire came to end when Romulus Augustulus was deposed. The Eastern Empire gradually eroded until it was brought to its demise by the Ottoman Power in the overthrow of Constantinople in 1453. In the West, the Holy Roman Empire was established by Charlemagne, but in the east the Ottoman Power remained supreme until its decline.

Odoacer was the first barbarian who reigned in Italy. The stem Ricimer had exercised the power, without assuming the title, of a king; so that the patient Romans were insensibly prepared to acknowledge the royalty of Odoacer and his barbaric successors. The laws of the emperors were strictly enforced, and the civil administration of Italy was still exercised by the praetorian praefect and his subordinates; while the Roman Magistrates were appointed by Odoacer to the odious and oppressive task of collecting the public revenue. Being an Arian Catholic, the Trinitarian Catholics of the Italian Diocese were in eclipse. Their sect no longer constituted the State Church. The bishop of Rome was now the mere bishop of churches in Rome; and he and his clergy were nothing but sectaries and dissenters. The absence of catholic abuse of the Patrician by his contemporaries, attests the toleration which they enjoyed. His praefect, however, had to interfere in the choice of their bishop that the peace of the city might be preserved. They regarded this interference with disgust; but being under eclipse they could not help themselves. The brightness of their ecclesiasticism was darkened over them; and Trinitarian churches had to submit to the humiliation and defilement of heretical Arian interference in the election of a so-called Successor of St. Peter and St. Paul!

Notwithstanding the prudence and success of Odoacer, his patriciate exhibited the sad prospect of misery and desolation. The country was exhausted by the irretrievable losses of war, famine, and pestilence; and Gelasius, the Roman bishop, and one of Odoacer’s subjects, affirms, that in Aemilia, Tuscany, and the adjacent provinces, the human species was almost extirpated. The plebeians of Rome, who were fed by the hand of their master, perished or disappeared, as soon as his liberality was suppressed; and the senators, “the stars” of the Roman firmament, bewailed their private loss of wealth and luxury. One third of their ample estates was appropriated to the use of Odoacer's confederates. Actual sufferings were imbibed by the fear of more dreadful evils; and as new lands were allotted to new swarms of barbarians, each senator, or "star," was apprehensive lest the arbitrary surveyors should approach his favourite villa, or his most profitable farm. But the darkening power was irresistible, and absolute master of their fortunes. Desiring to live, they owed some gratitude to the tyrant who spared their lives; and as he could have taken all, they had to accept the portion he was pleased to leave as his pure and voluntary gift.

But the end was not immediately. The judgments of the fourth trumpet had not yet "slain" the Imperial Head "as it were to death." Odoacer was the Patrician Representative of the Constantinopolitan Imperiality. He had ruled as such during fourteen years in Rome, and the epoch had now arrived. A.D. 489–493, that he should succumb to the superior genius of Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, who, after a march of seven hundred miles from the region of Illyria, descended from the Julian Alps, and displayed his invincible banners on the confines of Italy. After the loss of two battles, Zeno's Patrician fled to Ravenna. Favored, however, again "by fortune," Odoacer reappeared upon the field in formidable array. The fierce conflict that ensued was finally decided by the victory of Verona, which conferred on Theodoric the independent royalty of Italy. The assassination of Odoacer, A.D. 493, left him without a rival, and the emperor of the East without a representative to administer the Diocese of Italy. From the Alps to the extremity of Campania, from Sicily to the Danube, and from Belgrade to the Atlantic Ocean, Theodoric reigned first King of the Seventh Head of the Beast. His royalty was proclaimed by the Goths, with a tardy, reluctant and ambiguous recognition by the emperor of the East. He maintained with a powerful hand, during a reign of thirty-three years, the balance of the West; and the Greeks themselves acknowledged that the heretical king of Italy reigned over the fairest portion of the darkened empire of the West.

"From a tender regard to the expiring prejudices of Rome, Theodoric declined the name, the purple and the diadem of the emperors; but he assumed," says Gibbon, "under the hereditary title of king, the whole substance and plenitude of imperial prerogative. His addresses to the Eastern Throne were respectful and ambiguous; he celebrated in pompous style the harmony of the two republics, applauded his own government as the perfect similitude of a sole and undivided empire, and claimed above the kings of the earth the same preeminence which he modestly allowed to the person or rank of Anastasius." Thus, while the jurisdiction and authority of the Sixth Head were completely darkened in Rome, after shining upon its Seven Hills for five hundred and twenty-four years, they continued in the light of imperial majesty to illumine the eastern third of the catholic firmament. In regard to Rome, "it was slain as it were to death" by the Gothic sword. It seemed to be dead beyond all possibility of being "healed" or restored to life. It was expelled from the Seven Hills, and a new form of government established there, a Seventh Head, which claimed and possessed, and was able to maintain, the preeminence of its predecessor. In the recognition of the sovereignty of the Seventh Head, and the Horn-Powers that had established themselves in the sounding of these tempestuous trumpets, in Gaul, Spain and Africa, by the Sixth Head "the Dragon" had "ceded to the Beast his power, and his throne and a great authority"; so that the worshipful allegiance of catholics "in the whole earth"—en hole te ge—was divided between the Dragon and the Beast: as it is written, "they worshipped the dragon which gave power to the beast; and they worshipped the beast saying, Who is like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with him?"—ch. 13:3, 4.

Under the first king of the Seventh Head, prosperity and peace were revived under the shadow of the Seven Hills. Theodoric cultivated the affections of the Roman Senate and people. The nobles were flattered by sonorous epithets and formal professions of respect; while the people enjoyed, without fear or danger, order, plenty, and public amusements. But the reign of Theodoric was only a temporary arrest of judgment. The Seventh Head was only to “continue a short space”—sixty years, which is “short” compared with the supremacy of the Sixth. This was to be “healed” of its “deadly wound,” a process to be enacted at a great cost of blood and treasure. The death wound to the authority of the Sixth Head could only be “healed” by the destruction of the Seventh. When this should be abolished, the obscuration of the Imperial Roman “day and night” would cease. The fourth trumpet does not symbolize the healing of the deadly wound it judicially inflicted. To this our attention will be recalled in my exposition of Apoc. 13.

A WARNING PROCLAMATION

Apoc. 8:13

“And I saw, and I heard from one, an eagle flying in midheaven, saying in a loud voice Woe, woe, woe, to the dwellers upon the earth, from the remaining voices of the trumpet-call of the three angels hereafter to sound.”

1. Symbols Explained

An angel, in a symbolic sense, represents a class of agents executing a mission to which they have been appointed. We have seen this use of the word in ch. 7:3, where an angel says: “Hurt not the earth and the sea until we have sealed the servants of our Deity.” So also in the text of the English version, the “angel flying” is representative of a class of agents having a mission to perform.

But Griesbach and other critical editors of the original text read aetos, an eagle, instead of aggelou, an angel. Upon this, Elliott remarks: “The external evidence of manuscripts is decidedly in favor of the former reading. On the other hand, the internal evidence of scriptural analogy, with which Griesbach and the rest did not concern themselves, is as decidedly—indeed, as it seems to me even more so—against it. For nowhere in the Apocalypse is the proclaiming function assigned to a bird, or, indeed to any being but an angel or the divine Spirit ... I do not therefore hesitate to retain the reading aggelou.”

Tregelles reads eagle in his translation, and gives us to understand that it is justified by manuscripts fourteen hundred years old. This would carry us back to the times of the second trumpet. In a note upon the word, the American Bible Union editor says: “I recommend that this reading be adopted and translated eagle; and that the following note appear in the margin: ‘Or, as a few copies read angel’.” I believe that eagle was the original and correct reading, and that it is supported both by the external evidence of manuscripts, and the internal evidence of apocalyptic testimony. It affords us a very important clue to the mystery of the text. Mr. Elliott is unquestionably mistaken in saying that “nowhere in the Apocalypse is the proclaiming function assigned to a bird.” We find the very reverse of this in ch. 6:7, where the fourth living creature, likened to “an eagle flying” in ch. 4:7, makes proclamation, saying, “Come and see!”

“An eagle flying” is the ensign of one of the camps of “the Israel of God”; and when we consider their relative position at the time when the Latin Catholic “day and night” were darkened by the fourth trumpet, it symbolized their community very fitly. The eagle was the ensign of the sealed servants of the Deity, who, during the tempestuous times of the first four trumpets, and for centuries after, were protected from extermination by the Serpent-power, in “the two wings of the Great Eagle”—ch. 12:14. They were an eagle “flying” in the “midheaven” of the great eagle-dominion. They had an angelic mission indicated by the action of flying. This is motion from one place to another for a purpose. The eagle encampment was therefore an angel-community; and hence eagle and angel came afterwards to be traditionally used as equivalents in the text. The angelism of the eagle flying was to warn “the dwellers upon the earth” of what was still coming upon them. That flying in midheaven is symbolical of preaching, or making proclamation, is evident from ch. 14:6, where “another angel” is said to “fly in midheaven having the glad tidings of the Aion to preach unto the dwellers upon the earth.” Midheaven, mesouranema is, according to the decorum of the symbol, the region of their flight. They are not luminaries of the political heaven; they are not constituents of the sun, moon, and stars, having no identity, officially or morally, with the secular and spiritual orders they symbolize. Neither are they “of the world,” though encamping in the world. “The dwellers upon the- earth” were the Arian and Athanasian catholics, and others, to whom they preached. Hence, the Heavenly they occupied was peculiar to themselves; it was, as it were, in the midst between the heaven of government and the peoples governed. In this midheaven they winged their flight as “one” of the four living ones, the fourth, or eagle flying saying, “Woe, Woe, Woe, to the dwellers upon the earth”—woes issuing “out of the remaining voices of the trumpetcall of the three angels hereafter to sound.”

And because these woes were to issue out of the fifth, sixth and seventh trumpets, the last three have been appropriately enough styled woe-trumpets. In the ninth chapter, we enter upon the consideration of the fifth and sixth woes; the latter not being exhausted till the epoch indicated in ch. 11:13, 14. The third woe will prove the most terrific of all winds and woes; to “the dwellers upon the earth,” catholics, protestants, “sectaries,” and “infidels”; for, to the Lion, the Ox, the Man and the FLYING EAGLE—symbols of the saints—will be given the consummating judgments of the three “Woes,” that they may slay the beast, and give his body politic to the burning flame—Dan. 7:11, 26.

2. Historical Exposition

We have seen in ch. 7, that the judgments of the first four trumpets were restrained until the work of sealing the servants of the Deity should be sufficiently advanced. The tempests that were to wreck the state, and dash it in pieces upon the rocks, were not to blow until there should be a community of faithful ones developed, who should be able to read the signs of their times aright, and be able to instruct others. This is implied in their being “sealed in their foreheads”. Being thus prepared, when the trumpets sounded they could call the attention of their contemporaries to the true situation of affairs; and in so doing deliver them from the superstition and blasphemy of such blind leaders as Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, Ambrose, Cyril, and others, of the catholic church by law established. These all assumed that the superstition they professed was the true religion; and that when Antichrist appeared, he would be “some great man raised up by the devil,” who would head “the apostasy,” which could be no other than a falling away “from the right faith, from truth, and from good works,” as presented to the dwellers upon the earth in the traditions with which they made void the word. They taught that Antichrist was to appear in a Jewish temple, and from among the Jews, and gain the empire of the world. They were all impressed with the idea that the dissolution of the Roman empire into ten kingdoms was at hand; their Antichrist would be revealed, and then destroyed by Christ, about A.D. 500, which was to be the end of the world!

The gloomy forebodings among them respecting their near future were heightened by chronological ignorance. They imagined that the world was nearly 6,000 years old. Hilarion, A.D. 402, thus wrote: “It now wants 101 years to the end of the Sixth Chiliad about the closing of which the ten kings must arise, Babylon, now reigning, fall, Antichrist arise and be destroyed by Christ’s coming, and so the saints’ sabbath millenary begin.” To read the vagaries solemnly propounded by these Laodiceans, is to remind us of the times in which we live. The confusion of ideas was truly marvellous. Their speculations were as hairbrained as those of Mormons, Millerites and clergymen at large, in the age in which we live. They had been given over to “believe a lie, that they all might be condemned who believed not the truth; but had pleasure in” their own righteousness, which was “unrighteousness.” What, then, was to be done in this extremity? They could no more deliver themselves from their own blasphemies, than the natural man from his own ignorance. The remedy was at hand, if they had been sagacious enough to discern it; but, like our contemporaries, they cruelly persecuted and denounced it as heresy, and put it from them. The remedy was the EAGLE-ANGEL preaching of the truth. These preachers being “sealed in their foreheads,” would be able to explain to them that the dissolution of the Western Empire was not the end of the world, but a judgment upon them as the real apostasy foretold by Paul. That they were deceivers and deceived. That the end of the world was not at hand, nor the reign of the saints either. That the trumpet-judgments of heaven were a call upon them to “repent of the works of their hands, that they should not worship daemons, and idols of gold, and silver, and brass, and stone, and of wood, which can neither see, nor hear, nor walk;—to repent of their murders, of their sorceries, of their fornication and of their thefts” (ch. 9:20, 21). That of all these crimes they were guilty, and had been punished by heretical and pagan firebrands, as Alaric, Genseric, Attila, and other barbarian scourges; and that the terrible calamities they endured were not complete. That, as they repented not of the works of their hands; or, in the words of Jerome, though “the Roman world rushes to destruction, we bend not our neck in humiliation;” therefore, “Woe, Woe, Woe” to them, both of the east and the west, because of the judgments yet to befall them before the end should come.

While this eagle-angel proclamation was warning the people, war, pestilence, and famine, in all the reign of Justinian, were plaguing them with unexampled miseries. A hundred millions of the human race were exterminated in his reign. But this was only introductory to the coming “woes.” The camp of safety was with “the flying eagle.” The belief and obedience of the gospel of the kingdom was then, as now, the only seal protective from the sword.

Being the largest bird of Palestine, the eagle was considered the monarch of the skies. It is also identifiable with the standard of Dan. One of the faces of the Cherubim was that of the eagle (Ezek. 1:10; 10:14), and one of the four living creatures surrounding the throne of Rev. 4, is described as “like a flying eagle” (v. 7). The speed, vision, strength, and lofty skimming of the eagle are symbolic of the attributes of the Spirit.

CHAPTER 9

SECOND SECTION OF THE SEVENTH SEAL

OR

FIRST TWO WOE-TRUMPETS

Act I—Fifth Trumpet; or, First Woe

Summary

A star falls out of the heaven into the earth, to whom is given the key of the pit of the abyss, which he opens; and from its furnace a smoke issues that darkens the sun and air. Out of the smoke locusts go forth into the earth with scorpion-power to torment “those men who have not the seal of the Deity upon their foreheads,” during five months, and to injure them other five. Their king is styled THE ANGEL OF THE ABYSS; and named in Hebrew, Abaddon; in Greek, Apollyon.

TIME OF EVENTS
FROM A.D. 632 TO A.D. 932=300 YEARS

Arena

The territory of the Dragon upon which the imperial “sun” shone before being darkened by the smoke.

Translation

Apoc. 9:1–12

1. And the fifth angel sounded, and I saw a star which had fallen out of the heaven into the earth, and there was given to him the key of the pit of the abyss.

2. And he opened the pit of the abyss: and smoke ascended out of the pit as it were smoke of a great furnace; and the sun was darkened, and the air from the smoke of the pit.

3. And out of the smoke came forth locusts into the earth, and there was given to them power as the scorpions of the earth have power.

4. And it was commanded them that they should not injure the grass of the earth, nor any green thing, nor any tree, except the men only who have not the seal of the Deity upon their foreheads. 5. And it was given to them that they should not kill them, but that they should torment them five months: and their torment was as the torment of a scorpion when it striketh a man.

6. And in those days the men shall seek the death, and shall not find it: and they shall earnestly desire to die, and the death shall flee from them.

7. And the resemblances of the locusts were like to horses which had been prepared for war; and upon their heads as it were chaplets like to gold, and their faces as faces of men. 8. And they had hair as the tresses of women; and their teeth were as of lions. 9. And they had breasts as it were breasts of iron: and the sound of their wings as the sound of many chariots of horses rushing into battle.

10. And they have tails like to scorpions, and stings were in their tails; and their power to injure the men was five months.

11. And they have over them a king, the Angel of the Abyss the name for him in Hebrew is Abaddon; and in the Greek, he hath the name Apollyon.

12. The first woe hath passed away; behold there come yet two woes after these things.

I. Symbols Explained

On the sounding of the fifth angel, John saw “a star.” I need not repeat here what has already been said about stars. The reader is referred to my explanation of the symbols of the third trumpet, the subject of which is the “great star Apsinthos.” The star of the fifth trumpet may also be styled a falling star; or rather, when John saw it in vision, a fallen star. Its place was in the heaven, or it could not have proceeded “out of the heaven.” It was not a fixed star of the heaven, transmitting through “the air” in “the night” of the Greek catholic world, the reflected light of the Byzantine “sun.” Had it been a fixed star of the eastern Roman firmament, its falling would not have been to receive power, but the deprivation of everything constituting the glory of a star. John may not have seen it in the act of falling into the earth. The falling had been completed when he first saw it. This is intimated by the perfect participle peptokota, which signifies “having fallen.” The falling out of the heaven is no part of the vision's scenery. It had fallen, or descended, into the earth, as the Apsinthian Star had fallen, or descended into the rivers and fountains of water. It did not forsake the heaven as its place, because it had fallen into the earth; but being a power, a power of the heaven peculiar to itself, it retained its position there, but fell with destructive effect upon the people represented by "the earth."

By "the earth" in this vision is meant "the dwellers upon the earth;" or the grass, green things, and trees, which symbolized the unsealed. The eagle-angel community, constituted of the servants of the Deity sealed in their foreheads, was not to be tormented by this woe. The sealed servants of the Deity—the enlightened believers who have obeyed the truth—are nowhere in the apocalypse styled "the earth". They are "a Holy Nation." But "the earth" apocalyptic is the very reverse. "The earth" is an unholy generation that "wonders after the beast;" and that "worships the Dragon, and worships the beast;" and represents the "all kindreds, and tongues, and nations" subject to the Dragon and Beast forms of government (Apoc. 13:3, 4, 7). "The earth," in the prophecy of the fifth and sixth trumpets, is symbolical of the secular and ecclesiastical orders and people of the Catholic Apostasy; which, by the fifth trumpet were to be "tormented" and "injured;" and by the sixth, to be "killed," or deprived of all power, authority and rule, over the Eastern Third of the fourth beast dominion (ch. 9:15, 18). "The earth" would therefore represent the territory upon which these catholic idolators dwelt. The sealed servants of the Deity dwelt there likewise, only in "the Two Wings" of it, where they were "nourished;" and though the locusts swarmed over "the earth," they were especially forbidden to torment and injure them, in the command to injure only the unsealed—ver. 4. Hence, then, when John saw the Fallen Star "in the earth," he saw it where it did not naturally belong. It fell "out of the heaven into the earth," and being a star of destruction, or a destroying power, it would make its way "into the earth" by an overwhelming invasive force. In other words, "the earth" was fallen upon, or invaded, by the star-power.

1. THE PIT OF THE ABYSS

But, before the star was seen by John "in the earth," it had acquired possession of "the Key of the Pit of the Abyss"—he kleis tou phreatos tes abussou. The pit of the abyss is the geographical locality of the "smoke," out of which the locusts issued to invade "the earth." When the pit was opened smoke arose out of it. The pit—to phrear—is contiguous to "the earth;" they abutt the one upon the other. It is an immense depression in the surface of the globe, confining upon Palestine, then a province of the Eastern Third, called the Greek or Byzantine empire. It is the pit or reservoir, or basin in which lies the abussos, abyss, or Dead Sea. It is introduced here symbolically to represent the region styled Arabia, whose tribes inhabited it, and poured out of it "into the earth." The Arabic region is well represented as "the pit;" and locality of "a great furnace;" for the district of the Dead Sea, and of the whole valley of the Jordan northward to the Lake of Tiberias, is quite a phenomenon in physical geography, being below the level of the ocean. No other example of similar depression, or pit, is known. The Lake of Tiberias is 328 feet below the level of the Mediterranean; and from thence the river-valley declines to the Dead Sea, the surface of which is very nearly 1,400 feet below the same level. Owing to the great depth of this "pit," or depression of the surface, together with the heights which wall in the valley, the heat powerfully accumulates, or becomes as it were "a great furnace," by the concentration and reflection of the solar rays, while the bordering highlands prevent the admission of external breezes to relieve the temperature. The climate is therefore tropical. Travellers, on descending into this low and deep country, feel as if they had entered another zone. They confirm the accuracy of Josephus, who reports that winter in the plain of Jericho resembled spring, and that the inhabitants wore linen garments at the time when the people in other parts of Judea were shivering in the midst of snow. The balsam-tree, a tropical plant, which yields the medicinal gum, now called the balsam of Mecca, and is now limited to Arabia, once flourished in groves near Jericho, and furnished the renowned balm of Gilead. Apart from the margin of the Jordan, the surface of “the pit” has the aspect of a parched desert through the months of summer.

The Dead Sea Depression

The Jordan Valley from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea is a phenomenon in physical geography, being below the level of the ocean. A small plane can fly above the Dead Sea and yet be below normal sea level! The depression extends further south via the Arabah through Arabia proper to the Gulf of Aqaba. This area saw the uprise of the Saracen power, the locusts of Revelation 9.

Such are the natural conditions of this “pit of the abyss,” or sea, which constitute it a fit and proper emblem of the political situation of affairs within its limits before its locusts issued forth upon the earth. The whole pit was in the condition of a furnace. In Deut. 4:20, Egypt is styled “an iron furnace” to Israel; and in Isa. 31:8, 9, Zion and Jerusalem are styled the place of the fire and the furnace, whence shall issue the destruction that is to fall upon the Assyrian. So this Arabian Pit was the place of a fire burning as a furnace, which, when it should be “opened,” would pour forth a woeful tormenting power upon the unsealed inhabitants of the earth. The inhabitants of this pit of the sea, while they were shut up therein, would be in a state of war and distraction; for such is the idea conveyed by a burning furnace, which melts down the crude matters cast into it. A great furnace is never a symbol of peace and prosperity; but always of the contrary. John saw the pit of the abyss in this fiery, or embattled, condition before it was opened; but he has revealed to us no details. He has simply informed us, that a power was developed that was able to open the pit of the abyss; and to let out the contents thereof, which he styles “smoke” and “locusts”. This information he conveys in the words, “and to him (the Star) was given the Key of the Pit of the Abyss; and he opened the pit of the abyss; and smoke ascended out of the pit ... and out of the smoke came forth locusts into the earth.”

2. THE KEY OF THE PIT

A key is symbolical of governmental power and authority. The laying of the key of the house of David upon the shoulder of Eliakim, was representative of the bestowal of regal power upon ONE, who should be for a glorious throne to his father’s house, and have the sole power of opening and shutting (Isa. 22:22). With the Mohammedans, it is also symbolical of administrative power. “The Koran,” says M. Peyron, “continually speaks of the Key of God, which opened to them the gates of the world and of religion. So in the Koran: “Did not God give to His legate the power of heaven which is above, and fire (the furnace-pit) which is beneath? With the Key, did he not give him the title and power of a porter, that he may open to those (the locusts) whom he may have chosen?” The parentheses in this quotation are mine. The following form of renunciation of Mohammedanism, enjoined on a convert to the catholic superstition, thus alludes to Mohammed’s key of heaven: “I anathematize the spurious teaching and promising of Mohammed among the Saracens; who says, that he is become the Key holder of Paradise.” The key was also an armorial bearing of the Mohammedans in Spain. When they crossed from Africa to Spain, it was on their standard; and was afterwards sculptured on the archway of the Alhambra, an engraving of which is given in Mr. Elliott’s work.

In the apocalypse, there are two keys spoken of in connection with “the abyss;” this in ch. 9; and another in ch. 20:1. They are, however, not the same. The former is the key of the pit of the abyss; and the latter, the key of the abyss itself. The key of the pit was given to the Star of the pit, or the Star who kindled the furnace of the pit; while the key of the abyss is brought out of the heaven by the angel thence descending. He descends with power to enlighten the earth with his glory, and to shut down the Dragon “into the abyss,” out of which, according to Daniel, he came up—salkan min yammah—ch. 7:3.

3. THE ABYSS

This leads me to remark, that in these places of the apocalypse, abussos is improperly rendered “bottomless pit.” In Isa. 44:27, what in the Septuagint is abssos, or abyss, is in the Hebrew הַאֲלִיּוֹת

“deep;” and is explained in Jer. 50:38 and 51:36, of Babylon’s power, which is also likened to a dragon therein. Hence, in Daniel’s time, the eagle-winged lion of Babylon was the dragon of the great sea, or abyss, so long as its dominion extended to the Mediterranean; but when it lost that jurisdiction, then its “sea,” or abyss, was said to be “dried up.”

Abyss is frequently used in the Greek version as synonymous with sea. The following passages show this sense of the word abussos. In Job 38:30—“the face of the abyss is frozen;” 41:31, “he maketh the abyss to boil like a pot; he maketh the sea like a pot of ointment.” In Isa. 63:13, where is he “that led them through the abyss” by the hand of Moses? It is manifest that there is nothing bottomless in the abyss as used in these texts.

In Rom. 10:7, abyss is used by Paul in asking, “Who shall descend into the abyss?” in the C.V. deep: and he tells us what sense he attaches to the word in letting us know the purpose of the descent—“that is,” says he, “to bring up Christ again from among dead ones, ek nekron.” This is an abyss which is “never full;” still bottom can be reached when “there shall be no more death, and the grave shall be destroyed. In this use of the word, abyss does not signify “the invisible receptacle of departed spirits,” but the common receptacle of dead bodies; or more strictly speaking, the aggregate of dead bodies themselves. These are a sea of death, which when living were “a troubled sea, whose waters cast up mire and dirt”—Isa. 57:20.

The apocalyptic abyss is this troubled sea of nations, inhabiting the countries circumjacent to the Great Sea; and out of which Daniel’s four beasts arose. Arabia is physically and politically “the pit” of this “abyss”—physically, because it is a sandy sea-bottom; and politically, because its tribes may be regarded as the lowest, or worst of the peoples of the east. The key of the abyss, that is brought down from heaven by the binding angel, is power to suppress the Dragon-Government, and to destroy the Beast-Polity of the abyss, or sea—Apoc. 13:1: and to maintain its suppression for a thousand years. The abolition of the Dragon-Government will be the reduction of all its officials in church and state to the common level of mankind; and the depriving them of all power to recover the position lost during that long period. Thus, they will be comingled with the waters of the great national abyss—they will have been “cast into the abyss, and shut up, and sealed” with such a mark of divine reprobation, that they will be able to deceive the nations by their hypocritical pretensions, and blasphemous projects, no more for ages.

What a different key is this to the key of the pit! This key is power given to one to open the pit to let out clouds of tormentors and destroyers. Their mission is not to deliver the nations from official and clerical deceivers; but to torment and injure these blind leaders, and those who are blindly led by them. These all “have not the seal of the Deity in their foreheads;” and were therefore obnoxious to the stinging calamities inflicted by the bold, licentious, and ferocious swarms emergent from the smoke-clouds of the flaming pit.

4. THE SMOKE OF THE PIT

Until the power of the Prophet-King, or Star, was matured in “the pit of the abyss,” the pit was shut; so that neither “smoke” nor “locusts” could issue forth upon “the earth” to torment and destroy the unsealed. The furnace was roaring with flaming blast in the pit, from which nothing could come forth until the acquisition of undisputed authority and power by the star. This he at length acquired; for it is testified, that “he opened the pit of the abyss.” He had become a powerful star, ruling over the kingdom of the pit, styled historically, the kingdom of Arabia; the armies of which no longer in a state of civil war, but united under the yellow banner of the star, were prepared to rush through the opened portals of the pit, and to invade the world at large.

And invade it they did; for when the pit was opened, smoke poured out in columns vast enough to darken the sun and the air. “Smoke” when considered as proceeding from fire, signifies punishment and war. Thus Sodom and Gomorrah, and all the cities of the plain, were situated in the pit of the abyss; and when they were destroyed, “the smoke of the country went up as the smoke of a furnace.” Here, the smoke became representative of their judgment. It is the adjunct of anger, as in Deut. 29:20, “The anger of Yahweh shall smoke against that man;” and in Psa. 74:1, “O God, why doth thine anger smoke against the sheep of thy pasture?” Smoke arising out of a pit, and darkening the sun and air, is symbolical of divine anger and wrath against the things represented by “the sun and air.” In ch. 9:18, the men obnoxious to the sixth trumpet woe, are said to be “killed by the fire, by the smoke, and by the brimstone.” In ch. 14:11, smoke is associated with torment as “the smoke of their torment ascendeth to the aions of the aions; and they have no rest day nor night;” and in ch. 15:8, “the temple was filled with smoke from the glory of the Deity and from his power;” that is the wrath contained in the seven vials, and which in its seventh vial consummation comes for the destruction of the destroyers of the earth—ch. 11:18.

5. THE SUN AND AIR DARKENED BY THE SMOKE

The sun is here the symbol of the same imperial majesty as that which was darkened in its third by the judgments of the fourth trumpet. The darkened third had recovered its light in the process of re-annexing Italy and Africa to the Byzantine, Greek, or Constantinopolitan, empire in the reign of Justinian. The “deadly wound” the Sixth Head had received, had been “healed;” and its affairs restored to order in Italy by the Pragmatic Sanction, A.D. 554. The sun now shining forth, “the third of the day and of the night,” then recovered their brightness. The sun, therefore, now shone upon Italy, Africa, Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, and the islands of the sea. “The rest of the men not killed by” the fifth and sixth trumpet plagues, were found in Spain, Gaul, Britain, Germany, &c. When the sun was darkened by the smoke of the pit, its light, or power, was quenched in the countries of “the earth” where the locusts of the smoke established themselves.

Not only was the sun darkened, but “the air” likewise. In the darkening of the Roman luminaries by the fourth trumpet “the air” remained unaffected. In symbolic language, the air denotes the civil and ecclesiastical constitution of the world. This constitution was not changed when the Seventh Head superseded the Sixth in Rome. It still continued catholic. The Gothic kingdom of Italy was a catholic monarchy administered by Arian catholic kings, who distributed civil and ecclesiastical offices both to Arian and Trinitarian members of the apostasy. But when the smoke of the pit darkened “the air” all this was changed where its locusts tormented the unsealed. The aerial constitution became Arabian. Place and power, in the conquered countries, were only for the locusts of the smoke; so that if a catholic idolator would retain office, he must become a convert to the new superstition, which so darkened the air politically, that the rays of the spirituals of wickedness in the Byzantine heaven, could not pass through it for the illumination of their coreligionists in scorpion-like torment.

In Apoc. 16:17, “the air” is also the recipient of judgment. But in this instance, on a much larger scale.

The course of the whole world will be changed; so that every political island and mountain will be abolished. The civil and ecclesiastical constitutions of all the states and kingdoms will be superseded by “the law that goes forth from Zion,” which will become “the air” in which clouds of saints will meet the Lord, and so be ever with him (1 Thess. 4:17). When the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of Yahweh and his Anointed, “the wise” will be the embodiment of “the air” or firmament; for “they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament” (Dan. 12:3). No smoke of the pit, or wrath of vials, will ever darken, or abolish them. They will always be bright and clear, and give transmission to the healing rays of the Sun of Righteousness, as his kings and priests over the subject nations of the earth.

6. “OUT OF THE SMOKE CAME FORTH LOCUSTS INTO THE EARTH”

“Locusts,” says Daubuz, “begin to appear in spring, about a month after the equinox, and are only seen at most during five months. They are wont to arise in such vast companies, that they form a kind of cloud which eclipses the sun and darkens the sky; and make so great a noise with their wings as that, according to some, the sound thereof may be heard at six miles distant. Wherever they fall they make a most terrible havoc of all the fruits of the earth; and therefore the people, when they see them flying, are in the greatest consternation. Pliny says, “That they were looked upon as a plague proceeding from the wrath of the gods.”

The head of the locust resembles that of the horse; and therefore the Italians, who are often troubled with them, call them cavalette, as it were little horses.

“The Arabians, who know them well, say that the locusts have the thigh of a camel, the legs of an ostrich, the wings of an eagle, the breast of a lion, their tails are like a viper’s, and the appearance of horns adorns their heads and countenance.” As to the teeth of the locusts, Pliny observes that “nothing can resist them.” For the reasons above given, locusts are the symbol of an army of enemies coming in great multitudes, with great speed and swiftness to make an excursion in order to plunder and destroy.

“It is further to be observed, that locusts are generated in the pits of the earth, out of which the new progeny arises in the spring.” Volney observes, that “the inhabitants of Syria have remarked that locusts come constantly from the desert of Arabia.” Indeed, etymologically, an Arab and a locust are almost the same in radicals, and in pronunciation—arbeh, signifying a locust; and arbi, an Arab. In Judg. 6:5, in the original, the locust is used to designate the number and character of invading Arab hosts—“they (the Midianite Arabs and children of the east) came as locusts for multitude.” In a work styled Mohammedanism Unveiled, the writer says: “In the Bedoween Romance of Antur, the locust is introduced as the national emblem of the Ishmaelites.” He adds: “It is a remarkable coincidence with these illustrative facts, that Mohammedan tradition speaks of locusts having dropped into the hands of Mohammed, bearing on their wings their inscription, ‘We are the army of the Great God’.”

The Locusts (Revelation 9)

The devastation caused by a plague of locusts is depicted by these illustrations. The tree above was quickly denuded of all foliage in a very short time. The photo below illustrates the extent of locust swarms during a plague.

The Saracen Locusts

A drawing illustrating the symbolism of the locusts. A bad plague will darken the sun like smoke (Rev. 9:2). The appearance of locusts is so like that of horses that Italians call them cavelette—cavalry (see Rev. 9:7)

It is evident from the entomology of the insect, that the apocalyptic locusts were not literally such. The locusts of the first woe had faces of men, and tresses as those of women, and a king over them. These and other characteristics show that they were armies of men, whose main force consisted of cavalry, invincible, licentious, and tormenting; analogous in their destructive operations to clouds of locusts. They were fitly styled locusts as coming from Arabia, the native country of the locust, whose name, with the change of a single letter as arabah for arbeh, signifies a desert—the Arab desert between the Dead and Red Seas. As of the locust so of the “scorpion,” whose native locality was considered by the Jews to be the Arabian desert. And they had good reason for this; for they were reminded by Moses on emerging from it, that it was “a great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents and scorpions.” “And who know not,” says Elliott, “if facts so notorious be worth mentioning, that it is Arabia, still Arabia, that is regarded by naturalists as the original country of the horse; and its wildernesses are the haunts also of the lion. The entomology of the hieroglyphic is all Arabian.”

7. “POWER WAS GIVEN TO THE LOCUSTS AS THE SCORPIONS OF THE EARTH HAVE POWER.”

The bite or sting of the scorpion is generally fatal. Hence, the power of the locusts was a fatal power. They had scorpion-like tails, and in these tails was some of their power for destruction. But scorpion-like tails and stings were only symbolical of something analogous thereto. In Gibbon, I find the following solution of the mystery. “A Roman knight,” says he, “who despised the swords and lances of the Saracens, relates his own fears at the sight and sound of the mischievous engines that discharged a torrent of the Saracen fire. ‘It came flying through the air,’ says Joinville, ‘like a winged, long-tailed dragon, about the thickness of a hogshead, with the report of thunder and the velocity of lightning; and the darkness of the night was dispelled by the deadly illumination. The use of the Saracen fire, or, as it was afterwards called, the Greek fire, was continued to the middle of the 14th century, when the scientific or casual compound of nitre, sulphur, and charcoal, effected a new revolution in the art of war and the history of mankind.’”

An Arab writer in the Escorial collection, about the year 1249, thus speaks of what Joinville styles “a winged, long-tailed dragon,” used by the Saracens: “The scorpions,” says he, “surrounded and ignited by nitrated powder, glide along like serpents, with a humming noise, and, when exploded, they blaze brightly and burn. Now, to behold the matter expelled was as a cloud extended through the air, which gave forth a dreadful crash like thunder vomiting fire on every side, and breaking down, burning, and reducing all things to ashes.”

8. CHAPLETS LIKE TO GOLD

The use of this tormenting Saracen fire constituted the resemblance of the Arabs to scorpion-tailed locusts. Besides this, they had other remarkable “resemblances” in their equipment for war. They had, as it were, “chaplets like to gold”—hos stephanoi. This was only an homoïoma—resemblance—not literal golden circlets. They would be yellow so as to bear a resemblance to gold. They had a yellow headgear.

Ezekiel, in ch. 23:42, describes the head-dress of the Sabean and Keturite Arabs by atereth, rendered in Greek by stephanon, as “Sabeans from the wilderness, who put beautiful stephans or wreaths upon their heads”—that is, turbans. It was a usual saying among them that Allah had bestowed four peculiar things upon the Arabs; and that one of them was, that their turbans should be to them instead of diadems. “Make, a point,” said their prophet, “of wearing turbans, because it is the way of angels.”

9. FACES AS THE FACES OF MEN

Another resemblance of the locusts was that “they had faces as faces of men.” This distinguished them from the Goths and other kindred barbarian hordes; the faces of these being noticed by Jerome, who was contemporary with their earliest invasions, as having faces shaven and smooth, like women’s faces. The beard was not always worn by the Romans. From Nero to Hadrian, the imperial custom was to have the beard shaven; from Hadrian to Constantine, unshaven; afterwards (with the exception of Julian), down to Phocas, shaven. But the locusts did not shave. They wore beards, and so vindicated their relationship to the bearded race, and their antagonism to all shaven crowns. Pliny, who was contemporary with John, speaks of the Arabs as wearing the turban, having the hair long and uncut, with the moustache on the upper lip, or the beard, that “venerable sign of manhood,” as Gibbon, in Arab phraseology, calls it. In the age immediately preceding the great Saracen irruption, in the poem, Antar, the Arabs are portrayed with moustache and beard, long hair flowing on the shoulder (“hair as the tresses of women,” which the Greeks regarded as shameful), and the turban also.

10. “THEIR TEETH WERE AS OF LIONS”

This indicated their ferocity. Nothing could successfully resist them in their ravening upon the prey. The Star styled his first vizier, Ali, the Lion of God. “Who,” says Mohammed, “will be my Vizier and Lieutenant?” “O prophet,” replied Ali, “I am the man. Whoever rises against thee, I will dash out his teeth, tear out his eyes, break his legs, rip up his belly. O prophet, I will be thy Vizier.” “These words,” says Hallam, “are, as it were, a text upon which the commentary expands into the whole Saracenic history.” The spirit of Ali was the spirit of the lion, and became the spirit of the hosts he led to battle, who were equally entitled with him to the appellation of the lions of God.

11. “AND THEY HAD BREASTS AS IT WERE BREASTS OF IRON”

In this the thing covered is put for the covering. In the poem Antar, as quoted by Elliott, the steel or iron cuirasses of the Arab warriors are frequently noticed; as, “a warrior immersed in steel armour,” “15,000 men armed with cuirasses, and well accoutred for war;” they were “clothed in iron armor and brilliant cuirasses;” “out of the dust appeared horsemen clad in iron.” In the Koran, among God’s gifts to the Arabs, their coats of mail for defence are specially mentioned; as, “God hath given you coats of mail to defend you in your wars.” The Saracen policy was the wearing of defensive armor. The breastplate of iron, as symbolized by their iron breasts, was a descriptive feature answering literally to the Arab warriors of the sixth and seventh centuries.

12. THE TWO PERIODS OF FIVE MONTHS EACH

The locusts were to torment the men of the catholic apostasy in church and state “five months”—ver. 5; they were also to “injure” them for “five months”—ver. 10. This is, of course, symbolic time. The fitness of things requires that the time allotted for symbolic action should be expressed symbolically and analogically. The entomology of the hieroglyphic required that it should be five months, and not ten; because locusts are only seen at most five months, namely, part of April, May, June, July, and August, with part of September. Yet it would seem that they could not do all the tormenting and injuring they were appointed to do against “the shaven crowns” and their deluded votaries in one season of five months, but in two seasons. The decorum of the symbols, therefore, rejected the record of ten months, and required the time to be expressed symbolically twice by “five months.” This period is 150 days, and upon the principle of a day for a year, which is the basis of the symbolic times of the apocalypse, represents 150 years. Hence, the locusts were to torment with scorpion torment “the men” of the apostasy until the end of 150 years; and they were to injure “the rest of the men” not included in the eastern or Byzantine third, which was politically “killed by the plagues” of the first and second woes, until another 150 years should have expired. So that the sounding of the fifth trumpet would continue to harass the men destitute of intelligence in the truth, for not less than 300 years. A period to be dated from the commencement of the tormentation or military operation of the locusts in the Roman earth. A.D. 632–33

13. “AND THEY HAD OVER THEM A KING”

“The locusts,” says Solomon, “have no king, yet go they forth all of them by bands.” As we must not set scripture against scripture, these opposite sayings concerning locusts must be interpreted so as to harmonize. The apocalyptic locusts who had a king are not literal locusts, as some ignorantly affirm who deny the symbolic character of the apocalypse. John records the truth of the locusts he saw in vision; and Solomon writes the truth concerning literal locusts. These have no king; but John’s had, and he was apocalyptically named “the Angel of the Abyss;” not the angel of the Pit of the Abyss, but of the abyss at large. The locust king-power is styled angel, because it was a messenger of heaven against the unsealed—a destroying angel-power; and, therefore, named Abaddon, and Apollyon, names which signify in English, DESTROYER. The locust king-power was the destroyer of “the abyss”—“the dwellers upon the earth,” against whom the woe-plague was commissioned, and in the midst of whom it scattered destruction for three hundred years. In history, the succession of men who reigned over the locusts are styled CALIPHS and Commanders of the Faithful.

14. ABADDON—APOLLYON

But why are we informed that the destroying power is called “Abaddon in Hebrew, and Apollyon in Greek,” and not told what it would be called in Latin, or any other tongue? The answer is, because it was commissioned primarily and chiefly against the countries to which the Hebrew and Greek belonged. We are not told what its name was in Latin, because it was not sent against Italy to “torment” the Italians. It was the Greek empire, which included Palestine and Syria, upon which the locusts were to fall with their most destructive energy.

There is another instance where our attention is claimed to the name of a thing “in the Hebrew,” and for the same reason. In ch. 16:16, the sixth angel-power gathers the kings of the earth and of the whole habitable, “into the place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon.” This is equivalent to saying that Armageddon is in the land where Hebrew was wont to be spoken. So “the abyss,” where the destroying angel was to torment, was the Holy Land and the Greek empire, in which he would help to “set up an abomination making desolate 1,290 years” (Dan. 12:11).

“THE death” which “THE men” of the apostasy so earnestly desired (ver. 6) was not natural death. This death did not flee from them, but pursued them on every side, and overtook them by thousands. It was “the death” which could only be arrived at by the woe-plagues of the sixth trumpet, which was for the slaying of “the third of the men” of the catholic world. It was political death they desired, the bitterness of which they had not experienced. Subject to this, they hoped to find peace and protection from the conqueror, who would cease to torment and injure them as enemies and foreigners to his rule and institutions. “The death” at length came in aftertimes; and, when it came, it reduced “the men” of the Greek catholic superstition and empire to the condition of Rayahs—mere dogs and slaves in the estimation of their Ottoman superiors. In the depth of this abyss, they have been prostrated without political life for upwards of four hundred years. This is their present condition, and will so continue to be, until “Yahweh shall have bent Judah for himself, filled the bow with Ephraim, and raised up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece, and made Zion as the sword of a mighty man.” This will change the situation, and be “life from the dead,” not to the Greeks only, but “to the world” (Zech. 9:13; Rom. 11:15).

II. Synthetic Exposition of The First Woe

In the previous section, I have analysed in detail the symbols of the first woe-trumpet. I have resolved them severally into the things they signify. In this section, I shall put their significations together, and thereby show what the apostle predicted if he had recorded what he saw in plain unsymbolical terms. This is what I mean by a synthetic exposition of the first woe.

1. “And the fifth angel sounded, and I saw one who had acquired power, and become a king, precipitate the forces of his kingdom upon the territory of the eastern Roman empire. And to this king was yielded the power of Arabia. 2. And he removed the barriers by which Arabia was shut up from the world without, and a fiery host issued forth, and, by reason of the smoking fierceness of their wrath, subverted the imperial Byzantine authority, and changed the political aerial constitution of the catholic countries they overrun.

3. “The wrathful hosts that invaded the eastern Roman empire were Arabians like locusts for multitude; and they had power fatal as the power of scorpions. 4. And it was commanded them by one, styled the Commander of the Faithful, that they should not hurt the grass of the earth, nor any green thing, nor any tree, but only those men who have not the truth of the Deity in their understandings. 5. And to the Arabians it was given that they should not extinguish the sovereignty of these men, but that they should be tormented in war during one hundred and fifty years, with a scorpion-like torment.

6. “And in those days shall these ignorant professors of christianity seek political extinction, and shall not find it; and shall earnestly desire to be a conquered people, and political death by conquest shall flee from them.

7. “And the resemblances of these Arabians when embattled exhibit them as cavalry prepared for war; and on their heads they wore yellow turbans; and their faces were bearded, and they had long flowing hair like the tresses of women; and their spirit was ferocious as lions. 9. And they had on polished steel cuirasses; and the sound of the right and left wings of their armies were of multitudes of cavalry rushing into battle. 10. And they trailed in their rear, or tails of their hosts, scorpion-artillery for destruction; and their power to hurt the rest of men westward was also one hundred and fifty years.

11. “And they had over them a king styled a CALIPH, the Messenger of Destruction among the subjects of the eastern Roman empire, or ‘the abyss.’ In the land of the Hebrew, he earned the name Abaddon, or Destroyer; and in the land of the Greek, that of Apollyon, which signifies the same.

12. “One woe, that of the fifth trumpet, is passed away after three hundred years; and, behold, there come two woes more before the consummation—the sixth and seventh trumpets, after these things.”

III. Historical Exposition

1. ORIGIN OF THE STAR

Justinian was invested with the majesty of the Sixth Head of the Dragon, or in other words, clothed with the sun, during a reign upon the Constantinopolitan throne of thirty-eight years, from A.D. 527 to A.D. 565. The triple scourge of war, pestilence, and famine afflicted his subjects, and “his reign is disgraced,” says Gibbon, “by a visible decrease of the human species, which has never been repaired in some of the fairest countries of the globe.”

After Justinian’s death the Byzantine throne was occupied by Justin II., Tiberius II., Maurice, Phocas, and Heraclius. Phocas reigned from A.D. 602 to A.D. 610; and his successor Heraclius till A.D. 642. It was in the reign of Heraclius that the fifth trumpet began to sound; and that “the abomination of desolation” established itself as the normal condition of things in the Holy Land.

The events transpiring in the Pit of the Abyss until it was opened by the Star, were contemporaneous with the first twenty-three years of the reign of Heraclius. Mohammed, who was the principal agent in the development of the Star-Power, began his career at Mecca, A.D. 609, by proclaiming the unity of God, and his own apostleship. In three years he had made fourteen proselytes; and in 613, assumed the prophetic office. On this occasion he said: “Friends and kinsmen, I offer you, and I alone can offer, the most precious of gifts, the treasures of this world, and of the world to come. God has commanded me to call you to this service. Who among you will support my burthen?” His uncle, Abu Taleb, tried to turn him from what he considered his impracticable design. “Spare your remonstrances,” rejoined Mohammed; “if they should place the sun on my right hand, and the moon on my left, they should not divert me from my course.” Like Alexander and the Napoleons, first and third, he felt within an impulse irresistible, which impelled him blindly upon a course, which had been marked out for him to run in the preparation of a power, that should torment and destroy the corruptors and enemies of the truth.

For ten years after, he labored in Mecca to turn the Arabs from idolatry to the belief and worship of a sole Deity. “Citizens and pilgrims,” said Abu Taleb, “listen not to the tempter, hearken not to his impious novelties. Stand fast in the worship of Al Lata and Al Uzzah.” Nevertheless, Abu Taleb, the prince of the republic of Mecca, protected his person from violence. The leaders of the people repeatedly reproached him for this. “Thy nephew,” said they, “reviles our religion; he accuses our wise forefathers of ignorance and folly; silence him quickly, lest he kindle tumult and disorder in the city. If he persevere, We shall draw our swords against him and his adherents, and thou shalt be responsible for the blood of thy fellowcitizens.”

On the death of Abu Taleb, and the accession of Abu Sophian, a zealous votary of the idols, protection was withdrawn from the deserter and denier of the gods of Arabia; and Mohammed found it necessary to take flight from Mecca, accompanied by Abubeker who afterwards succeeded him, and to seek refuge in Medina. The flight of Mohammed occurred A.D. 622, and has fixed the memorable aera of the Hegira, which still discriminates the lunar years of the Mohammedan nations.

On his establishment in Medina, this Unitarian Prophet assumed the exercise of the regal and sacerdotal office. He was now a Pontiff-King in the Pit of the Abyss, rising into great power and dominion, like that other Pontiff-King in Rome, who was at the same time, as the spiritual chief of the image-worshippers of “the abyss,” assuming divine supremacy over “the earth.” Of the two, Mohammed was, doubtless, less of an impostor than the prophet of the west. The pope is an idolator, and the prince of idolators; but the Prince of Medina among his companions was the champion of the Divine Unity; and the uncompromising enemy of idolatory in every form. He was now “a star in the heaven,” where he shone without a rival till A.D. 632. After a reign of six years, fifteen hundred Moslems, in arms and in the field, renewed their oath of allegiance. The deputy of Mecca witnessed the review, and was astonished at the devout fervour of his attendants. “I have seen,” said he, “the Chosroes of Persia and the Caesars of Rome, but never did I behold a king among his subjects like Mohammed among his companions.”

The Flight (Hegira) of Mohammed

In 622 A.D. Mohammed fled from Mecca to seek refuge in Medina. The Islam calendar commenced at that time, A.D. 622 being Year One according to its reckoning, and 1917 being year 1335 (the moslem, year being based on lunar times.) The time-periods of Daniel’s prophecy reveal some interesting conclusions when reckoned from that commencing date.

2. THE PIT BECOMES A BURNING FURNACE

The choice of an independent people had exalted the fugitive of Mecca to the rank of a sovereign; so that he was now invested with the prerogative of forming alliances, and of waging offensive or defensive war. In other words, being now the Star of the Pit he possessed the power of kindling within its limits a burning furnace, in which might be melted down into one homogeneous mass, all the tribes of Arabia. This was the arduous work before Mohammed in the last years of his reign—to eradicate idolatry, subdue the Jews, and to conquer the Arabs, so as to unite all under his standard. His former moderation, the effect of weakness, was superseded by a fiercer and more sanguinary tone; and he gave out that he was commanded to propagate his religion by the sword, to destroy the monuments of idolatry, and to pursue the unbelieving nations of the earth. The martial prophet fought in person at nine battles, or sieges; and fifty enterprises of war were achieved in ten years by himself or lieutenants. “The Key of the Pit of the Abyss was given to him;” nor was he ignorant of the nature of the key bestowed upon him. “The sword,” said he, “is the key of heaven and of hell.”

It was not long before the fire was kindled in the furnace of the pit. The battle of Beder, A.D. 623, was the spark that set the fuel all ablaze. This led to the battle of Ohad, six miles north of Medina. In this, Mohammed was wounded. In A.D. 625, Medina was besieged by the troops of Mecca, but without capture; and on retiring, the enemy no longer hoped to subvert the throne, or to check the conquests, of the invincible exile.

By exciting and joining in this attack upon Medina, the Jews of Arabia brought upon themselves the fierce wrath of the Star of the Pit. The fiery furnace he had kindled consumed them. Their castles were reduced, and Chaibar, the seat of the Jewish power in Arabia, submitted to the yoke. Under the reign of Omar, the Jews of Chaibar were transplanted to Syria; in justification of which he alleged the dying injunction of Mohammed, that only the one true religion should be professed in his native land Arabia.

The attack upon Medina was retaliated upon Mecca. Mohammed assembled ten thousand soldiers for its conquest. The idolators being hopeless of success, surrendered at discretion. Their prince, the haughty Abu Sophian, presented the keys of the city, observing, that the son of Abdallah had acquired a mighty kingdom, and confessing, under the scymitar of Omar, that he was the Apostle of the true God. Mohammed forgave the guilt, and united the factions of Mecca. The chiefs of the idolators were prostrate at his feet. “What mercy,” said he, “can you expect from the man whom you have wronged?”

“We confide in the generosity of our kinsman.” “And you shall not confide in vain: begone! you are safe, you are free!” The people of Mecca deserved their pardon by the profession of Islam; and after an exile of seven years, the fugitive missionary was enthroned as the prince and prophet of his native country.

The conquest of Mecca determined the faith and obedience of the Arabian tribes. Yet an obstinate remnant still adhered to the idolatry and liberty of their ancestors. Four thousand pagans descended into the valley of Honain hoping to take the prophet at disadvantage. At first, the battle prevailed against the Moslems, and their prophet greatly endangered; “O my brethren,” he repeatedly cried with sorrow and indignation, “I am the son of Abdallah, I am the apostle of truth! O man, stand fast in the faith! O God, send down thy succor!” The flying Moslems returned from all sides to the holy standard. The tide of battle had turned against the idolators, which Mohammed, standing in his stirrups to overlook the conflict, perceiving, clapped his hands with joy, and exclaimed, “at last the fire is kindled in the furnace.” His conduct and example had restored the battle, and he animated his victorious troops to inflict a merciless revenge.

From the field of Honain, he marched to the siege of Tayef, sixty miles southeast of Mecca. After a siege of twenty days; he sounded a retreat, but he retreated with a song of devout triumph, and affected to pray for the repentance and safety of the unbelieving city. He was followed by the deputies of Tayef, who dreaded the repetition of the siege. “Grant us, O apostle of God, a truce of three years, with the toleration of our ancient worship.” “Not a month, not an hour.” “Excuse us at least from the obligation of prayer.” “Without prayer religion is of no avail.” They submitted in silence; their temples were demolished, and the same sentence of destruction was executed on all the idols of Arabia. His lieutenants, on the shores of the Red Sea, the ocean, and the gulph of Persia, were saluted by the acclamations of a believing people. Thus, the fiery wars of this “great furnace” of the pit destroyed idolatry, and brought the Arab nation to submit to the God and sceptre of Mohammed. The sword of Arabia was the sword of God, forged and sharpened for judgment upon the idolators of Syria and Greece. Hitherto, the Pit of the Abyss was closed. The wars raging within were internal fires, whose smoke had not drifted toward the west. The star-power that had kindled the furnace, had first to subdue all enemies within the pit of the abyss, before it could issue forth, and precipitate its incendiary fires upon the nations of the abyss itself.

The key-sword of power was not only given to the Star of the Pit, but he was to use it in opening the pit. The fact that the reigning star power in the heaven did open the pit, the manner in which he opened it, and in what sense the smoke arose from the pit, and locusts issued out of it “into the earth,” as the falling of the star therein—is illustrated by what follows.

3. THE PIT OF THE ABYSS OPENED

When Heraclius, emperor of the Roman world, returned victorious from the Persian war, A.D. 629, Mohammed having conquered and converted the idolators of Arabia, and thereby united them into one kingdom, judged that the time had come to invite the princes and nations of the Catholic Idolatry to abandon the worship of images and demons, commonly known among the ignorant as the ghosts of dead men and women. He beheld with great disgust and contempt the condition of the catholic apostasy from the religion of Christ. He saw what Gibbon relates. “The christians” (!) says he, “of the seventh century had relapsed into a semblance of paganism; their public and private vows were addressed to the relics and images that disgraced the temples of the east: the throne of the Almighty was darkened by a cloud of martyrs, saints, and angels, the objects of popular veneration; and the Collyridion heretics who flourished in the fruitful soil of Arabia, invested the Virgin Mary with the name and honors of a goddess.” In the Koran, or Mohammedan Bible, ch. 5., the catholics of the Roman empire are distinctly charged with worshipping the Virgin Mary as God; and in ch. 9, it is said of the priests and monks specifically: “Very many of the priests and monks devour the substance of men in vanity, and obstruct the way of God.” This referred to their fraudulent gains by the sale, exhibition, and false miracles attached to relics. Mohammed was right; these shaven crowns “obstructed the way of God,” as the clergy of all orders and degree in “christendom” have been doing, and are doing, ever since, even to this day. Though originally an ignorant pagan Arab, and afterwards but imperfectly instructed in the scriptures, he had become wiser than the whole catholic world. He not only spurned the gods of his native land, but he vindicated the Divine Unity against “the infidels” who darkened the Almighty’s throne by the senseless objects of their disgraceful and demoralizing superstition. Being the providentially developed military apostle of the Divine Unity, he offered all idolators, or worshippers of demons, the alternative of conversion and peace, or idolatry and war. Hearing of the presence of the Roman emperor at Emesa, he sent an ambassador to him, and invited him to the profession of Islam. At first their intercourse was amicable, but their friendship proved of short continuance. One of his envoys had been murdered; and the rapacious spirit of the Saracens—the lion tooth characteristic of the locusts—inflamed by the new religion, or smoking in the pit, burned to be avenged. The murder afforded their star-king a decent pretext for gratifying it; and he forthwith ordered the invasion of the territory of Palestine eastward of the Jordan, A.D. 630. A small force of three thousand Saracens encountered the Roman army at Muta. After losing three generals, they effected a safe retreat under Caled, who afterwards was renowned as “the Sword of God.” This was the first military action that tried the valor of the Moslems against a foreign enemy. It was an opening of the pit; the initiation only of the enterprise in which the forces of the Star may be said to have got the worst of it.

Mohammed now solemnly proclaimed war against the Romans. The Moslems were discouraged. They alleged the intolerable heat of the summer. “Hell,” said the indignant prophet, “is much hotter.” He advanced at the head of ten thousand horse, and twenty thousand foot. After a painful march, in which they suffered much from lassitude and thirst, aggravated by the scorching and pestilential winds of the desert, they arrived at Tabuc, midway between Medina and Damascus. Beyond this he did not advance. Caled, however, spread around the terror of his name, and the prophet received the submission of the tribes and cities, from the Euphrates to Ailah, at the head of the Red Sea. The power, styled by Schlegel, “the new power of hell,” was still restricted to “the pit of the abyss.” An expedition against Syria had been set in motion, but was arrested in its march at Medina, by the death of Mohammed in that city, A.D. 632.

Mohammed was succeeded in the throne of the kingdom of Arabia by the venerable Abubeker, who was now “Successor of the prophet, Caliph, and Commander of the Faithful.” But the death of Mohammed was the signal of independence; and Abubeker found himself the chief of a power and religion which tottered to its foundations. He forthwith assembled an army of forty thousand men to subdue the rebellion, which sought the reestablishment of the old idolatry. Thus the furnace was rekindled in the pit of the abyss, and smoke ascended toward the heaven. After exhorting the Moslems to confide in the aid of God and his apostle, Abubeker attacked the idolators vigorously. Though unsuccessful at first, he at length broke the power of the rebels, who, without chief or cause, were suppressed by the power and discipline of the rising monarchy; and the whole nation again possessed, and more steadfastly held, the religion of the Koran.

4. THE SMOKE AND LOCUSTS ASCEND OUT OF THE PIT

The time had now arrived for the Star-Kingdom-Power of the Arabian Pit to “fall into the earth,” and to open it completely and permanently for the egress of the smoke with its clouds of locusts, for “the darkening of the sun and the air.” At this crisis, as we learn from the fourth verse of the chapter under consideration, “it was commanded them (the smoke issuing locusts) that they should not hurt the grass of the earth, nor any green thing, nor any tree; but those men only who have not the seal of the Deity in their foreheads.” This is explained by what follows. Abubeker, who was the first caliph, by his victory over the rebels had restored the unity of the faith and government; and he now resolved, A.D. 632, to provide immediate exercise for the restless spirit of the Saracens, in the prosecution of a holy war. He accordingly despatched a circular to the locusts of the pit, saying: “This is to acquaint you that I intend to send the true believers into Syria, to take it out of the hands of the infidels” (or to darken their sun and air); “and I would have you know that the fighting for religion is an act of obedience to God.”

The summons was responded to by numerous intrepid bands of Saracens, who flocked to the camp at Medina, where they were reviewed by the Caliph. In his instructions to the chiefs of the army, he said: “Remember that you are always in the presence of God, on the verge of death, in the assurance of judgment, and the hope of Paradise. Avoid injustice and oppression; consult with your brethren, and study to preserve the love and confidence of your troops. When you fight the battles of the Lord, acquit yourselves like men, without turning your backs; but let not your victory be stained with the blood of women or children. Destroy no palm trees, nor burn any fields of corn. Cut down no fruit trees, nor do any mischief to cattle, only such as you kill to eat. When you make any covenant or article, stand to it, and be as good as your word. As you go on, you will find some religious persons who live retired in monasteries, and propose to themselves to serve God that way: let them alone, and neither kill them nor destroy their monasteries. And you will find another sort of people that belong to the synagogue of Satan, who have shaven crowns: be sure you cleave their skulls, and give them no quarter till they either turn Mohammedans or pay tribute.” These shaven crowns of the synagogue of Satan were THE MEN WHO HAD NOT THE SEAL OF GOD IN THEIR FOREHEADS; and the alternative of death by the sword, conversion, or tribute, was the “torment” to which they were to be subjected during “five months” of years.

5. THE SUN AND THE AIR DARKENED

After these things, the earth was invaded, and Damascus, the capital of Syria, attacked. An army of seventy thousand succors—indifferently styled Syrians, from the place of their birth or warfare; Greeks, from the religion and language of their sovereign; and Romans, from the appellation still assumed by the successors of Constantine—were encountered and dispersed; and, after a siege of seventy days, Damascus was taken by storm and capitulation, A.D. 634. While being surrendered in one quarter, the city was betrayed and taken by assault in the opposite. Caled, the Sword of God, rushed in with his rapacious and sanguinary lion-toothed locusts. “No quarter,” he cried, “no quarter to the enemies of the Lord;” his trumpets sounded, and a torrent of Mariolatrous blood was poured into the streets of Damascus. A large majority of the people accepted the terms of toleration and tribute offered by Abu Obeidah, the general in chief; but Caled, “the lieutenant of the Commander of the Faithful,” was for a general massacre. The fury of “the Sword of God” was at length appeased; nevertheless he sternly declared that, after a respite of three days, all who left the city as exiles, with Thomas, their valiant, though unsuccessful defender, might be pursued and destroyed by the Moslems. On the fourth day, he issued from Damascus in pursuit. Having overtaken the promiscuous multitude of priests, monks and citizens, encamped in a pleasant valley, insufficiently provided with arms, and already vanquished by sorrow and fatigue, Caled and his cavalry rushed upon them, smoking with fury. Except a captive who was pardoned and dismissed, the Arabs enjoyed the satisfaction of believing that not a Virgin-Mary worshipper of either sex escaped the edge of their scymitars.

Thus, the Pit of the Abyss was effectually “opened” by the key-sword in the hand of the first of the Caliphs. The “smoke of the pit” was curling and drifting over “the earth” in the direction of the Great Sea. After the battle of Yermuk, the conquest of Jerusalem, and then of Aleppo and Antioch, Heraclius fled from the country, and bid an eternal farewell to Syria, which, A.D. 639, bowed under the sceptre of the Caliphs seven hundred years after Pompey had despoiled the last of the Macedonian kings. Thus, the sun and the air were darkened by the smoke of the pit; and Syria, now become Arabian, became the seat and support of the house of Ommiyah; and the revenue, the soldiers, the ships of that powerful kingdom were consecrated to enlarge on every side the empire of the caliph-kings of the locusts, “the angel of the abyss,” the ABADDON, in the land of the Hebrew tongue.

But the “torment” of the catholic worshippers of images and daemons was not to be confined to the land of Israel; it was to extend to the countries where Greek was the vernacular, and there the caliph-power was to be revealed as the most potent and absolute of the globe. It was to torment with an intensity that should acquire for it in Greek the name APOLLYON, the destroyer. In the ten years of the administration of the caliph Omar, the Saracens reduced to his obedience thirty-six thousand cities or castles, destroyed four thousand churches or temples of the unbelievers, and erected fourteen hundred mosques for the exercise of the religion of Mohammed. One hundred years after his flight from Mecca, the arms and reign of “the Angel of the Abyss” extended from India to the Atlantic Ocean, over the various and distant provinces which may be comprised under the names of Persia, Syria, Egypt, Africa, and Spain. Their armies, which consisted chiefly of cavalry and archers, advanced with the speed of horses, and fought with the courage of lions; and it excites no little perplexity in the mind of the historian to explain by what means the church and state of the Roman world were saved from destruction by so invincible a foe. But their preservation is attributable, not to the virtue, skill and power of those establishments, but to the fact that “to them it was given that they should not kill them.” The Greek Church and State were not to be broken up and to become politically extinct; and therefore, though Constantinople was twice besieged by the Saracens, the first time for seven years, and the last for thirteen months, they could not capture it, and abolish its dominion. They were not to inflict political death upon the Byzantine Empire, which they would certainly have done had they captured Constantinople. This consummation was reserved for the Four Angel-Powers of the Euphrates, under the sixth trumpet. The horse-like locusts were only to darken, torment, and injure, for a specific period; and when this was passed, according to the analogy of the insects to which they were likened, to settle down so as at length to be found no longer tormenting “the earth.”

6. THE TORMENT AND INJURY

The words used by John with respect to their mission are basanizo, and adikeo. The first is rendered torment, the last, injure. The Spirit, doubtless, intended different ideas to be represented by the different words. They were to torment, but not to kill. It is clear from this that killing was not an element of the torment. Basanidso signifies to rub upon the touchstone, or basanos; hence, to try the genuineness of a thing. The touchstone used by the Saracen Locusts was “the Koran, tribute, or the sword.” They rubbed all the unsealed upon this; and according to the result, was the genuineness, or true character, of the party in their estimation. If they accepted the Koran, they were then fellowshipped as devout Moslems, and subjected neither to tribute nor death; but if they rejected the Koran, or refused to become Mohammedans, which was the same thing, then they must either pay tribute or be put to death. Such a touchstone as this could not seriously affect those who had the seal of the Deity in their foreheads. The Saracens were particularly favorable to all who were persecuted by the constituted authorities of the Greeks. They became their protectors and allies, not their tormentors. To the Saracen touchstone they replied after this sort: “The Greeks are determined to abide the determination of the sword; but with the Greeks we desire no communion, either in this world or in the next, and we adjure forever the Byzantine tyrant, his synod of Chalcedon, and his Melchite slaves. For ourselves, we are resolved to live and die in the profession of the gospel and unity of Christ. It is impossible for us to embrace the revelations of your prophet; but we are desirous of peace, and cheerfully submit to pay tribute, and obedience to his temporal successors.”

The Arab Empire At Its Greatest

The Saracens extended their conquests throughout North Africa and Spain. In the east they occupied all of Arabia and Persia as far as India. wherever they went they offered to the conquered the choice of either the Koran or the Sword.

The word adikeo contains no idea answerable to that of using a touchstone of any kind. To injure, without defining how the injury should be inflicted, conveys all the meaning of the word in the text. They were to apply the touchstone five months of years; and they were to injure, or commit offensive operations, for an equal length of time. This we shall find was the fact. Power to torment and injure was divinely appointed to “the Angel of the Abyss” for three hundred years; and beyond this limitation he could not destroy.

7. THE ANGEL OF THE ABYSS

The locusts had a king over them, the Angel of the Abyss—not the angel of the pit of the abyss, but of “the abyss” at large. The star was especially related to “the pit”; and the Angel-king, to “the abyss”. The star-power, as we have seen, was the kingdom of Arabia before its forces were precipitated upon “the earth”; while the Destroying Angel of the abyss was the Arabian Empire of the Caliphs, which, but for the Star-power of the pit, would never have existed in the world to torment and injure the nations of the abyss.

The caliphs united in their own persons the kingly and priestly characters. The first caliph was Abubeker, who began to reign on the death of Mohammed, A.D. 632. In A.D. 718, the end of the first century of the Hegira, the caliphs were the most potent and absolute monarchs of the globe. They reigned by the right of conquest over the nations of the east. Under the last of the Omniades, the Arabian empire extended two hundred days’ journey from east to west, from the confines of Tartary and India to the shores of the Atlantic ocean. In the year 750, a revolution dethroned the caliphs of the house of Omniyah, styled the Omniades, and set up in their stead the descendants of Abbas, uncle to Mohammed, and known as the Abbasides. Hitherto, Damascus had been the throne of the Arabian empire; but it was removed by Almansor to Bagdad, “the City of Peace,” on the eastern bank of the Tigris, A.D. 762. This was a few miles beyond the old Roman Euphratean frontier. War was now no longer the passion of the Saracens; their stern enthusiasm was softened by time and prosperity, and it was no longer easy to allure them by the hopes of spoil and of paradise. The luxury of the caliphs relaxed the nerves and terminated the progress of the Arabian empire. The application of the touchstone now necessarily ceased. The power of the caliphs being established over “the abyss,” the alternative of “the Koran, tribute, or the sword,” could no longer be propounded to them. The “torment,” therefore, by this touchstone was no longer applied. It could not be in the nature of things. Power was given to them to basanize the Virgin-Mary and image worshippers five months, and beyond this period they could not “torment.” When did these five months begin? and how long a period do they represent?

In answer to the first question, I reply that they began when Abubeker, the first caliph, fulfilled the fourth verse of this ninth chapter, in commanding the generals and captains of his Syrian army to apply the touchstone according to his instructions. This was A.D. 632, which is doubtless the beginning of the five months of tormentation.

As to how long a period these five months represent, the key to this question is the nature of the torment. We now know what this is; and we know also, from history and the nature of things, that the torment did not cease at the end of five months of days, but continued for many such terms of five months each. On the contrary, it continued until there were no more within the scope of the woe to be tormented, the power of the caliphs having reached the full. In the sanguinary civil war between the Ommiades and the Abbassides, the Greeks had seized the opportunity of avenging themselves, and enlarging their limits: so that, A.D. 781–2, found the Greeks arrogant, and the frontier of the Arabian empire diminished. This was five months of years, or 150 years, from Abubeker's command to torment, or "cleave the skulls" of the shaven crowns of the synagogue of Satan, and to give them no quarter till they turned Mohammedans or paid tribute.

But, though the power to torment had passed away with the period assigned for tormentation, the Apollyon-Caliphs were still formidable, and powerful for offensive military operations, such as occur between hostile states. From A.D. 782 to A.D. 805, the caliphs Mohadi and Haroun al Rashid inflicted great calamities upon the Greeks. Haroun invaded their territories eight times; and, as often as they declined the payment of the regular tribute, they were taught to feel that a month of depredation, or adikia, injury, was more costly than a year of submission. They were exposed to these hostile inroads so long as the caliphs held the sceptre of the east. In the national and religious conflicts of the two empires, peace was without confidence, and war without mercy. Quarter was seldom given in the field; those who escaped the edge of the sword were condemned to hopeless servitude, or exquisite torture; and a catholic emperor relates with visible satisfaction the execution of the Saracens of Crete, who were flayed alive, or plunged into caldrons of boiling oil.

But, the time allotted for the Arabian and Greek empires to cease their sanguinary conflicts, in the beginning of the tenth century was drawing to a close. The destroying power of the caliph-angel of the abyss, as against the Greek empire, was limited to three hundred years, or the end of the second period of five months. It was to decline and fall. The luxury of the caliphs, the rebellion of the Carmathians, and the revolt of the provinces, at length deprived the Arabs of the sceptre of the east. The revolt of the provinces circumscribed the dominions of the caliphs within the walls of Bagdad; until the independent Persic-Moslem dynasty of the Bowides interposing on account of factions prevailing there, advanced A.D. 933, to Bagdad; stripped the caliph of his secular office and supremacy; and reduced him to his spiritual functions as Chief Pontiff of Islamism, the mere phantom thenceforward of the departed power of the Destroying Angel of the Abyss. Thus died "Apollyon" by the suicide of his own hands twice five months of years, or three complete centuries, from the issuing of the smoke out of the pit of the abyss A.D. 632.

"The first woe is passed away," A.D. 933; "behold, there come yet two woes after these things."

Act II—Sixth Trumpet or Second Woe

1. Eastern Part

Summary

Still in response to the prayers of all saints, a voice from the four horns of the golden altar of incense commands the four messenger powers, confined by the great river Euphrates, to be loosed. They are prepared for successful aggression against the Byzantine empire during “the hour and day and month and year,” that, at the end of this period, they may slay with political extinction, the power of the men who ruled the Eastern Third of the Roman orb, and worshipped demons and images, and were murderers, and sorcerers, fornicators, and thieves; and had not been smitten by the judgments of the four winds—See Tabular Analysis, Vol. 2 page 116.

TIME OF EVENTS

FROM APRIL 29, A.D. 1062, TO MAY 29, 1453—391 YEARS 30 DAYS.

Translation

Apoc. 9:13–21

13. And the sixth angel sounded, and I heard one voice out of the four horns of the altar of gold which is in the sight of the Deity, saying to the sixth angel, who had the trumpet, “Loose the four angels, which have been bound by the great river Euphrates.”

15. And the Four Angels having been prepared were loosed for the hour and day and month and year, that they might kill the third of the men.

16. And the number of the hosts of the cavalry was two myriads of myriads: and I heard the number of them.

17. And thus I saw the horses in the vision; and those who sat upon them having breasts fiery and hyacinthine and sulphurous; and the heads of the horses were as the heads of lions, and out of their mouths there burst forth fire and smoke and sulphur. 18. By these three were killed the third of the men, by the fire and by the smoke and by the sulphur, bursting forth out of their mouths. For their powers are in their mouth and in their tails; for their tails are like serpents, having heads, and with these do they injure.

20. And the rest of the men who were not killed by these plagues changed not from the works of their hands, that they might not worship the daemonials and idols of gold and of silver, and of brass, and of stone, and of wood, which can neither see nor hear, nor walk. 21. And changed not from their murders, nor from their sorceries, nor from their fornication, nor from their thefts.

Notes

In the above translation there are some variations from the English Version. Instead of “a voice,” I have rendered phonen mian, one voice; for, although it issued from the four horns of the altar, there were not four voices, but only one, as in the text.

Instead of “in the river,” I have preferred the rendering of epi to potamo, “by the river;” the preposition is rendered in this sense in Matt. 24:33, “He is near epi thurais by or at the doors.”

In verses 17 and 18, I have rendered ekporeuetai and ekporeuomeno by “burst forth” and “bursting forth,” instead of “issued or “proceeded,” as in the Bible Union version. I have so rendered it from the use of the verb in Apoc. 4:5, where it is used in connection with lightnings and thunders from the throne; when they go forth, they do it burstingly.

The phrase to triton ton anthropon, I have rendered “the third of the men,” instead of “the third part of men,”—“part” is not in the Greek, and the definite article ton, should be translated as referable to a certain class of men; those of the Byzantine Third, namely, not having the seal of the Deity in their foreheads. It was that third which was to be killed, not the third of mankind in general; but “the third of,” or belonging to, “the men who were unsealed.”

In verse 16, ho arithmos strateumatou tou hippikou, is rendered in the C.V. “the number of the army of the horsemen.” This is a version very regardless of the original. I have translated it the number of the hosts of the cavalry—the number having regard to the individual troopers in the aggregate.

In verse 19, the English Version reads “their power is in their mouth and in their tails.” Griesbach and Tregelles prefer, “the power of the horses is in their mouth and in their tails.” Greenfield’s edition of Mills, omits “and in their tails” from the text, and inserts it in the margin. I prefer the reading hai exousiai auton en to stomati auton eisi, kai en tais ourais auton, their powers are in their mouth, and in their tails; my reason for this preference will appear in the exposition.

1. THE SYMBOLS EXPLAINED

1. “One Voice of the Four Horns”

“And I heard One Voice out of the Four Horns of the Altar of Gold which is in the sight of the Deity, saying, &c.” This is the same altar as that in the scene pictured in Apoc. 8:3, which may be fitly reproduced here by way of remembrance. “And another angel came and stood by the altar, having a golden censer; and there was given to him many odors, that he might cast for the prayers of all the saints, upon the golden altar which is in sight of the throne. And the smoke of the odors for the prayers of the saints ascended out of the hand of the angel, in the sight of the Deity. And the angel took the censer, and filled it from the fire of the altar, and cast into the earth and there were voices and thunders and lightnings and an earthquake. And the Seven Angels having the seven trumpets prepared themselves that they might sound.”

This scene is, as it were, a general preface to the sounding of each of the seven trumpets. That is, each trumpet develops its judgments retributively upon the enemies of the saints, and responsively to their prayers. The prayers of the saints were not to be confined to the apostolic age; but to ascend till Christ the avenger should return. “Men,” said Jesus, “ought always to pray, and not to faint.” This saying he illustrated by the parable of the unjust judge and the widow, in Luke 18:1–8. “Avenge me,” said she, “of mine adversary;” but he would not, until wearied by her importunity, he complied to get rid of her complaints. If an unjust judge would do this, “shall not the Deity,” the just judge of all the earth, “avenge his own elect, who cry day and night unto him, though he bear long with them? I tell you,” said Jesus, “he will avenge them speedily. Nevertheless when the Son of Man cometh, shall he find the faith upon the earth?”

In all apocalyptic times, the elect of the Deity are represented as crying unto him “to judge and avenge their blood on them that dwell upon the earth” (ch. 6:10). In Apoc. 8:3–5, the sounding of all the trumpets is dramatically represented as responsive to “the prayers of all the saints;” and consequently, not to the prayers of those saints only who lived between A.D. 324 and A.D. 395; but also to the prayers of the saints living contemporarily with all the trumpets. The successive soundings of the first five trumpets have brought us down to A.D. 933; and we have seen how the safety of the saints was guaranteed by the command of the Angel of the Abyss to his destroying agents to torment only the unsealed. The saints were not to be harmed by the special plagues; for they were “nourished” while the unsealed, who were their enemies, were being scourged.

In all the days of their nourishment, which were 1260, their prayers were “ascending out of the angel’s hand in the sight of the Deity.” They ascended as sweet odors of the golden altar, for his eyes were always upon the Woman’s place in the wilderness—ch. 12:14. Her seed had been contemporary with the seals as the four living ones full of eyes; they were coeval with the first five trumpets as the golden altar; with the sixth, as “the four horns of the altar of gold;” and with the seventh trumpet as the four living ones, and in its seventh vial manifestation, as “the nave of the Deity” and “the four and twenty elders sitting upon their thrones” (ch. 11:16–17; 15:7). Hence, in all the apocalypse, under one symbol or another, the saints are discerned in position; and that position is always in opposition to “the men who have not the seal of the Deity in their foreheads;” and as constituting no part of the symbols representing their civil and ecclesiastical organizations.

Now, although, according to the pattern in the Mosaic Tabernacle, this living altar of gold has four horns, answering to the four living ones, and four comers of the square, but one spirit pervades the whole. The multitude of the true believers which compose the altar “are of one heart and of one soul” (Acts 4:32). In singleness of heart—“with one mind and one mouth they glorified the Deity, even the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ” (Acts 2:46; Rom. 15:6). With this spirit of unanimity, resulting from their being sealed in their foreheads with the seal of the living God, they cause their prayers to ascend as burning odors—as one voice out of the four horns—and not a distinct and discordant voice from each horn. In “the vision” there was only “one voice.” It was the voice of the altar of gold, for it proceeded from the four horns thereof. This voice of prayer said, “Loose the four angels;” and, in answer to the prayer addressed “to the sixth angel, that had the trumpet,” “the four angels were loosed.”

This unanimous voice of prayer, ascending from hearts whose faith was more precious than gold which perishes, was addressed, I say, to the sixth angel. This was equivalent to addressing the Father-Deity, whose apocalyptic symbol is “a Lamb as it had been slain, having Seven Horns and Seven Eyes.” This represents Omnipotence and Omniscience manifested in flesh that had been slain, and afterwards “justified in spirit.” These seven horns and seven eyes, viewed apart from the slain Lamb, represent “the Seven Spirits of the Deity sent forth into all the earth.” These seven spirits as sent forth are symbolized by the Seven Angels, who in all the earth sound the seven trumpets. It is the Omnipotent and Omniscient Spirit, in sevenfold manifestation, that sounds. HE, incarnate in the Lamb, creates powers in the earth, stirs up their ambitions, and impels them on to destinies which they can neither control nor see. “There is no power,” says Paul, “but of the Deity;” and when judgments are abroad in a country, the spirit of Yahweh is in an unquiet state (Zech. 6:8). In the previous trumpets, we have seen illustrations of the terrible nature of the inquietude of the Spirit. The Goths, Huns, Vandals, and Saracens, were embodiments of this unrest. When they acquired motion, they swept as a tornado over the guilty; fell upon them like hail and fire mingled with blood; plunged in among them as a great mountain burning with fire; scathed them as with a burning torch; smote them, darkened them, destroyed them with scorpion-torment, and killed them, as we shall see, with serpents. And all this in vindication of “the truth as it is in Jesus;” in retribution of blasphemy, daemon-worship, and idolatry; and in retaliation of war against the saints, whom they labored, but too successfully, to subdue.

Now, the Spirit created and excited these powers as he operated upon Pharaoh when he hardened his heart; and as he will hereafter operate upon the powers that be now, when he shall put in their hearts to fulfil his will, and to agree, and give their kingdom, or power and strength unto the Eighth Head of the Beast, until his words be fulfilled (ch. 17:13, 17). It was the same Spirit that inhabited the golden altar, only that it was incarnate in the altar by the truth understood, believed, and obeyed. This incarnation of spirit is holy, and, standing “in the sight of the Deity,” as his holy altar, “smokes” with the fragrant odors of enlightened zeal and indignation against “every high thing that exalts itself against the knowledge of the Deity.” With “one voice” this emanation of spirit cries day and night, through the angel of the altar, to be avenged. This cry ascends from spirit, through spirit, to the Eternal Spirit—from the truth incarnate in the saints; through “the Lord the Spirit,” who makes intercession for them; to the Father of the Lord Jesus Christ. The answer to this cry sets in motion the whole machinery of judgment exhibited in the scenery of the apocalypse, which ultimates in the consummation which completely and thoroughly avenges his elect.

In addressing the sixth angel, then, the Deity was addressed by the “one voice from the four horns of the altar of gold.” The Spirit had the trumpet, which he sounded in the loosing of the four angels, in the killing of the Third, and in the overthrow of the Tenth of the City (ch. 9:15, 18; 11:13); and all of this, a judicial development through seven centuries, in response to that one voice so influential before the throne.

The altar of gold is said to be enopion tou Theou, which I have rendered, “in the sight of the Deity.” Literally, enopion signifies in the eye, from en, in, and opi, dative of ops, the eye. The Golden Altar Community is in the eye of the Deity, in the same sense that the twelve tribes of Israel were in his eye when they dwelt in the Holy Land; but, when expelled therefrom by the Assyrians, were said to have been removed out of his sight (2 Kings 17:18). The Golden Altar Community have never been “removed out of his sight,” as Israel and Judah were. But, can any thing be removed out of the sight of him who sees all things? In a certain sense it can. Now, concerning the Holy Land, by way of illustration, Moses says, in Deut. 11:12: “It is a land which Yahweh thine Elohim careth for; the eyes of Yahweh thine Elohim are always upon it, from the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year.” When, therefore, Israel and Judah were dwelling there, they were in his sight; for his eyes were upon them, being upon the land; but, when expelled, they were not within the landscape, and, therefore, out of his sight. But they are to return from captivity; and then, the prophet says, “in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight” (Hos. 6:2); that is, in the Holy Land. In a like sense, the Golden Altar Community is in his eye, or in his presence, or before him. It is sojourning, and has been for a long series of ages, among the nations, kindreds, and tongues, which have been given over to the Dragon and the Beast, and which have been made drunk by the Mother of Harlots that sits upon them. But in the midst of all these, it is not hidden from his sight. It is before him in all the brightness of fine gold. It is the Altar of gold from which ascends sweet odors in the holy and heavenly in Christ Jesus.

2. “Loose The Four Angels”

To loose is the opposite of to bind. The nature of the loosing depends upon that of the thing bound. The things to be loosed in the text before us are “the four angels.” These are the symbols of the “two myriads of myriads of cavalry” by which “the third” is killed. The four angels, therefore, represent four powers. These were “bound”. A power bound is either a power restrained from action, or bound by its own territorial limits. An example of the former occurs in the Dragon shut up in the abyss. Here the Dragon-power is restrained from acting—from “deceiving the nations.” When it is “loosed,” its wonted action is restored, and it returns to its old work of deceiving (ch. 20:3, 7, 8). The four angel-powers of the sixth trumpet were bound territorially; for we are informed that they “*had been bound—dedemenous—*by the great river Euphrates.” This river was the boundary of their dominion, and divided it from the territory of “the Third” which they were to kill. To loose these Oriental powers was to cause them to cross the Euphrates, to invade with their myriads of cavalry the Eastern Third of the Roman inhabited earth, and to extend their own dominion at its expense.

They “had been bound by the great river Euphrates,” until the time of their loosing arrived. They were eastern powers, therefore. The countries east of the Euphrates were the area of their preparation for the work they had to do. They were prepared angel powers; therefore it is written, “The four angels having been prepared were loosed.” While they were in preparation, or being prepared, they were confined, or bounded within confines, that did not extend further west or southwest than the Euphrates. The powers or angels were not contemporary. They were not all four being prepared at one and the same time. They were successively prepared messenger-powers, to be brought into action one after the other.

Hence, the loosing of the four angels was not simultaneous. First, one angel was loosed: then followed an interval; after that, a second: then a second interval; the third angel was next unbound, and executed his mission: a third interval then ensued; and, lastly, the fourth angel was loosed, and he consummated the work of killing “the third.” Thus, these four angel-powers may very properly be styled Euphratean. The fourth angel still exists, and occupies the capital in which the throne of the extinct “third” flourished for a thousand years. It is, therefore, by origin and possession, Euphratean; for this “great river” flows through its territory. Hence, “the Great River Euphrates” is made the symbol of the fourth angel in the period coincident with the advent of Christ (ch. 16:12, 15).

3. Symbolic Period of the Loosing

These four angel-powers of the Euphratean region of the globe, were loosed for the execution of a mission to be completed in a specific period—“they were loosed that they might kill the third of the men at the end of, eis, until, THE hour, and day, and month and year,” eniauton. Here was a whole period, which began with the complete preparation of the first angel-power, and ended with the consummation of the work of the four angels, which was the putting to death of “the third” (ver. 18). Of how many years was this period composed? The answer to this question is, of three hundred and ninety-one years and thirty days. The time of the preparation of each angel-power, is not stated. The transactions, which developed the angels beyond the Euphrates, do not enter into the vision; nor the time they consumed. The period of time has exclusive reference to the operations of the “two myriads of myriads of cavalry” against the Eastern Third peoples, after their crossing the Euphrates.

But, it may be further asked, How are these 391 years and 30 days arrived at? In answer to this it may be remarked, that it is absolutely certain from the historical illustration of the fifth trumpet, that the two periods of “five months” each, were periods of 150 years; and that the whole ten months, or 300 years, was the aeon, or cycle, allotted to the tormenting and injuring ascendancy of the Caliph-Angel of the Abyss. Events having clearly demonstrated the duration of five months, we are thereby instructed as to the number of years contained in one month. A symbolical month, then, is thirty years. When a month, therefore, is associated with “hour, day and year” in symbolic time, these must be relatively proportional. The year, eniautos, that which returns into itself, or a circuit of time, must be twelve times the length of “the month;” and “the day” one thirtieth of the month; and “the hour,” one twelfth of “the day.” In the case of the five months events have proved that Apocalyptic time is based upon the principle of a day for a year. According to this, an eniautos or year, being twelve times more than a month of years, would be equal to three hundred and sixty ordinary years; a day, one year; and an hour, thirty days. These added together give the whole number of years for the period of the execution of the mission of the four loosed angel myriads of Euphratean cavalry, as stated above; and may be tabularly presented thus:

In the Greek text the definite article ten is prefixed only to horan, hour. It does not read, “for the hour, and the day, and the month, and the year;” but, one article is prefixed to the whole time—eis ten horan and so forth; “for, during or until the end of the hour,” &c. This was, doubtless, significant; and designed to indicate, that the divisions of time were to be taken as proportional parts of a whole p

4. Number of the Cavalry

“And the number of the hosts of the cavalry was two myriads of myriads”—theo muriathes muriathon. This is the symbolical number of the four angel-powers—two myriads of myriads hippikou of cavalry—equestrian myriads. The number is enormous when literally stated; but, however great, is in strict accordance with the truth of history. A myriad is ten thousand. But this must be multiplied by two, for there are “two myriads,” or twenty thousand. In the phrase “two myriads of myriads,” this twenty thousand becomes the multiplier of “myriads,” which is the multiplicand. If muriathon, genitive plural, is to be taken as one myriad of ten thousand, then the “two myriads of myriads” will represent two hundred millions, or twenty thousand ten thousands. These 200,000,000 must not be taken as the numeration of the angel-hosts at any one time; but as the aggregate of the equestrian forces of the four angel-powers in all the 391 years and 30 days of the killing period—their numbers were computed by millions.

5. The Horses and Their Riders

“And thus I saw the horses in the vision; and those sitting upon them.” The description which follows exemplifies the “thus.” He saw the equestrian millions in vision. What a host to contemplate! He beheld them embattled, and vomiting forth fire and smoke, and deadly missiles. The horses he saw were not real horses, but horses in vision, or symbolical horses and symbolical riders; which in solid array and in action presented certain characteristics illustrative of the historical reality.

I find the following concerning the horse in symbol in Daubuz. He says: “The horse was of old used only for warlike expeditions, and not barely to ride, draw, and drudge, as it is now practised with us. Hence, in that noble description of the horse, in Job. 39:18–25, there is no notice taken of any quality of his but what relates to war. So that the horse is the symbol of war and conquest.” When, therefore, the Spirit saith in Zech. 10:3, “Yahweh Tz’vaoth hath visited his flock the House of Judah, and hath made them as his goodly horse in the battle,” the meaning is, that he will ride them as their Commander-in-Chief, and make them conquerors over his enemies, glorious and successful.

Thus in Psa. 45:5 r'chav, to ride, is rendered in the Septuagint by basileuein, to reign. And in several other places to ride, signifies to have dominion. "Agreeably to this," the Oneirocritics say, "that if any one dreams that he rides upon a generous horse, it denotes that he shall obtain dignity, fame, authority, prosperity, and a good name among the people; in short, all such things which may accrue to a man by good success in martial affairs." And hence, from the horse being an instrument of conquest, and therefore the symbol of the dignity, fame, power, prosperity, and success he causes, when Carthage was founded, and a horse's head was dug up by the workmen, the soothsayers gave out that the city would be warlike and powerful."

"As a horse is warlike, so he is also a swift creature, and is therefore not only the symbol of conquest, but also of the speediness of it" (Joel 2:4; Jer. 4:13).

The following in Hab. 1:8, concerning the swift, fierce, and invincible career of the Chaldeans against Judah, is expressive also of that of the four Euphratean angel-powers, as represented by the equestrian myriads in the sixth manpet vision: "Their horses are swifter than the leopards, and are more fierce than the evening wolves: and their horsemen shall spread themselves, and their horsemen shall come from far; they shall fly as the eagle hasteth to prey. They shall come all for violence.... they shall scoff at the kings, and the princes shall be a scorn unto them: they shall deride every stronghold; for they shall heap dust, and take it".

6. Breasts Fiery and Hyacinthine

But, there were characteristics pertaining to the armed equestrian myriads seen in vision by John, that Habakkuk did not see in the Chaldean hosts. He says, the horsemen had breasts thorakas, fiery and hyacinthine and sulphurous." These were breast-works, in military phraseology; and on these were mounted "heads," in which were "mouths." They were equestrian lion-heads, very fierce and destructive; and out of these horse-lion-head mouths "burst forth fire, and smoke, and sulphur." These horses were what is now styled horse-artillery: artillery drawn by horses, without which they would be of little use in war. "The heads of the horses were as the heads of lions," because of their roaring; "and out of their mouths burst, or roared forth the fire, smoke, and sulphur." Hence, the horses in the vision besides being symbolical of the equestrian character, and of the swift and fierce invincibility, of the Euphratean angel-powers, are representative of the new and powerful artillery used by the fourth Euphratean Angel in putting to death "the third"—the third that belonged to the men who were unsealed. These lion-headed horses, roaring and vomiting fire, smoke, and sulphur out of their mouths, were cannons belching forth destruction. John saw them mounted on breastworks, which breasted the troops behind them; and from these "breasts," as well as from the "mouths," burst forth fire; for the riders had "breasts fiery, hyacinthine, and sulphurous." He saw these artillery mounted breastworks actively at work; and the nature of their activity he signifies by the sight and smell. They appeared to the eye "fiery and hyacinthine." This is the symbolism of the flash seen on the discharge of loaded cannon. If a little saltpetre and sulphur be triturated together, and then thrown into the fire, the hyacinthine color will be seen in their combustion. In other words, this combustion will be "fiery and hyacinthine." Hence, breastworks, lined with cannon in explosive operation, would be fiery and hyacinthine to the eye, being illuminated with these colors at every flash. The smell also would be highly "sulphurous," owing to the composition of matters vomited out of the roaring mouths of the great guns.

The Apocalypse predicted that the eastern Empire would be brought to its end by “fire, smoke and brimstone” (or sulphur—Rev. 9:18) This describes the use of cannon and gunpowder. In describing the fall of the Eastern Empire, Gibbon in The Decline And Fall Of The Roman Empire makes specific reference to the use of such weapons in the overthrow of Constantinople.

A Turkish Mortar, 15th Century.

7. “With the Heads They Do Injure”

But what he saw and smelt were not mere holiday salutes. He saw and smelt them in the battles which extinguished the political existence of “the third”—to triton. There were not only color and smell, but death also, in “the fire, and the smoke, and the sulphur;” for “by these three,” saith he: “were killed the third of the men by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the sulphur bursting forth out of their mouths. And the reason given for the deadliness of these three agents in combination, when bursting forth from the mouths of the lion-headed horses, or artillery, is “because their powers are in their mouths and in their tails.” A cannon, in modern style, is divided into breech, barrel, and mouth. The Spirit only indicates the mouth and the breech, which he terms the tail, which is an appendage thereto. These “tails” were “like serpents,” in the similitude of their destructive operation; for the tails were not headless. Had they been headless tails, they could have done no injury; no more than a serpent without a head. When a serpent injures, it coils, and making a fulcrum of its tail, shoots forth its head from amid the coils, which are straightened by the spring, and with its head strikes its victim with a deadly stroke. Hence, the death-dealing powers of the serpent are in its head, or mouth, and in its tail. So it is with flying artillery, and with artillery mounted on breastworks, compared herein to “serpents.” Without the tail of the piece the mouth thereof could not injure; and without the mouth, or outlet, the tail could do no harm. As in the natural, “the powers” of these artillery serpents “are in their mouths and in their tails.” The projecting power is in the tail of the piece; many pieces, therefore, in our time, being “breech-loading.” But until of late, the projecting power and the projectile were always mouth, or muzzle-loaded—they went through the mouth into the tail; and being well rammed, they spring or shoot forth with the voice of a lion, straightening themselves from tail to mouth, out of which they rush in “fire, smoke, and sulphur,” dealing death and destruction upon what things soever may be encountered by their “head,” their tail-heads, or cannon balls; “for their tails have heads, and with these do they injure.” Thus, “by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the sulphur,” as an exploding power projecting the tail-heads, were “the third of the men killed.” The scorpions of the first woe were highly incendiary; but they did not make breaches in walls, and overturn lofty towers: the serpents of the second woe did all this; and in opening breaches by their tail-heads, gave admission to the fourth Euphratean angel-power into the capital of the Eastern Third, where he has been enthroned upwards of four hundred years, the observed of all observers; some of whom long for his decease, that they may be enriched by the division of his estate.

8. Fire, Hyacinth, and Sulphur

“Fire, hyacinth, and sulphur,” and “fire, smoke, and sulphur,” are symbolical of gunpowder, which is composed of charcoal, saltpetre, and sulphur. These three substances in their normal, distinct, and quiescent state, have no resemblance to fire, hyacinth, and smoke; but while, in combustion, they are the appearances, which, with the sulphurous smell, most forcibly strike our senses. Hence, the phenomena resulting from the combustion, become symbolical of the projecting force, or power, which drives forth the power that strikes with the stroke of death. Saltpetre, or nitrate of potassa, is symbolized by hyacinth-color, because of the analogy it bears to it in color when in deflagration. Nothing could be more significant of this destructive agent, first used in the warfare of nations in the fourteenth century, than the terms employed by the Spirit in this vision. The hieroglyphic can mean nothing else than the great destroying machinery of modern warfare.

9. "Lake of Fire Burning with Sulphur"

It will be in place here to remark, that "these plagues," as they are fitly termed in verse 20, will be terribly operative in the destroying of the body of the beast, and in the binding of the dragon, and casting of him into the abyss (Dan. 7:11). They will be swamped in "a fiery stream," and "be given to the burning flame." This is apocalyptically styled, "a Lake of Fire burning with sulphur" (ch. 19:20). The territory upon which the beast and false prophet dominion exist, will be turned into a lake of fire by this sulphur-burning machinery of war. The saints will be in that lake, "executing the judgment written," in tormenting with fire and sulphur the worshippers of the beast (ch. 14:10). Fire, sulphur, and smoke, in these places, symbolize the same agent as they do in the second woe. The governments are not casting great guns, and storing up munitions of war in vain. They are preparing them blindly for their own destruction. Their arsenals will fall into the hands of the Lamb and his people, who will plunge incessant fire upon their enemies, the smoke of whose torment will ascend, until their power shall be totally and finally destroyed. From thenceforth, war will be no more for a thousand years.

10. "The Rest Of The Men"

In the twelfth verse, the Spirit refers to hoi loipoi ton anthropon "the rest of the men who were not killed by these plagues." The to triton ton anthropon, the third of the men were killed by the plagues. The former class who were not killed, though filled with consternation at the fate of "the third," still flourished in political existence. The fourth Euphratean angel-power, though it injured them greatly in its wars upon them, was unable to kill them, as he had slain their brethren of "the third." The others, hoi loipoi, in habit all those countries of the Roman orb not included in the Ottoman empire, or fourth Euphratean angel dominion. They are known as "the Latins," who in ch. 13:4, 5, are said to worship the beast, and to be subject to his Mouth, which speaks great things and blasphemies. These are said in ch. 9:20, to worship the Daemonials and idols, the works of their hands. Notwithstanding the signal overthrow and political annihilation of their daemon and imageworshipping brethren of the eastern third, they, the Latins of the west, still continued the same abomination, as at this day. Hence, the work of judgment ceased not with the death of the third; but continues still, and will continue, until all "the daemons" are cast out, and "the idols" are thrown to the moles and the bats, and Yahweh alone is exalted in the glory of his majesty and might (Isa. 2:17–21).

11. "The Daemonials"

In the English Version of Apoc. 9:20, ta daimonia, is very improperly rendered "devils." In my translation I have merely transferred it from the Greek, leaving it for explanation as a symbol.

Under the word daimonion, I find the following among other significations of the noun: "Especially an inferior race of divine beings; the name by which Socrates called his genius, or the SPIRIT he supposed to dwell within him." (Not diminutive from daimon, but neuter from daimonios). The root of the word is daimon, of which one of the senses given is "the souls of men of the golden age hovering between heaven and earth, and acting as tutelary deities; they formed the connecting link between gods and men, and so Æschylus calls the deified Darius daimon, a daemon; hence, when daimones and theoi are joined, the daimones are gods of lower rank; and here note, that theos is never used for daimon, though daimon is for theos. In later authors, as Lucianus, in general, departed souls"—Liddel and Scott's Lex.

This was the sense of the word among the heathen who worshipped images. They foolishly imagined that all men, women, and children have within them a genius, spirit or soul which they considered to be a particle of the essence of Deity, whoever or whatever he might be; and that, therefore, said genius, spirit, or soul, was absolutely and essentially immortal or deathless. This was the daemon in a living man, such as Socrates surrendered himself blindly to the guidance and protection of. But, when men, women, and children, ceased to be creatures visibly existing, they supposed, that they still continued in being, only invisible to the naked eye. Their bodies they often burned to ashes, which they deposited in urns; nevertheless, they supposed that they were still in existence, only in a new form. They conceived that the real man was the indwelling soul; and that when the body ceased to breathe, said soul ascended into the air, or aerial, where it "hovered between heaven and earth." These were deified souls—souls made deities by human decrees, or apotheosis. They styled them "Immortal Gods," though but "an inferior race of divine beings." Of these gods were Darius, Caesar, Alexander, and a host of others, who had made themselves "great," in the estimation of the blind multitude, who decreed divine honors to their souls, and erected statuesque copies of their perished forms, for the glorification of their friends, and the factions they were supposed to have adorned. The immortal soul in the aerial called Darius, and decreed to be a god, was what they called a daemon or a daemonion. Such daemons the heathen worshipped, and placed themselves, their families, their property, and countries, under the protection of. Hence, they styled them "tutelary deities," or divine guardians.

"In classical use," says Dr. Geo. Campbell, "demon signified a divine being, though not in the highest order of their divinities, and therefore supposed not equivalent to Theos, but superior to human, and consequently, by the maxims of their theology, a proper object of adoration." "All demons," says Plato, "are an intermediate order between God and mortals." "It was customary with the pagans to deify abstract qualities, making them either gods or goddesses, as suited the gender of the name." "They sometimes deified men who had been their benefactors." "The proper notion of demons is, beings in respect of power superior to human, but inferior to that which christians comprehend under the term divine."

"What are men?" says a dialogist in Lucian. The answer is, "Mortal gods. What are gods? Immortal men." In fact, immortality disembodied was almost the only distinction between them. Disembodied immortals is the idea represented by demons.

"The pagans were a kind of superstitious atheists," says another writer, "who acknowledged no being that corresponds to our idea of a deity. Besides, a great part of the heathen worship was confessedly paid to ghosts of departed heroes, of conquerors, and potentates, inventors of arts, whom popular superstition, after disguising their history with fables and absurdities, had blindly deified. Now, to all such beings they themselves, as well as the Jews, assigned the name daimonia, demons." The whole superstructure of paganism is based upon the unscriptural dogma, and invention of the carnal mind, of an immortal essence in man capable of disembodied existence after death. But for this stupid fiction there would have been no daemons, nor any of the thirty thousand gods and goddesses, nor any guardian saints, or tutelary deities, of ancient and modern Greece and Rome. A scribe well instructed for the kingdom of the heavens, knows that man has no such daemon in him; and that however high he may be "in honor," if he understand not the truth, "is as the beasts that perish" (Psa. 49:12, 20).

In the apocalypse diamonia occurs only once, and that in ch. 9:20; while daimon in the genitive plural is found twice; first, in ch. 16:14; and then in ch. 18:2. In ch. 9:20, it is really the neuter plural of the adjective daimonios, of, or pertaining to, daemons: "that they should not worship ta daimonia things related to daemons"—things supposed to exist in the aerial, "between heaven and earth." In ch. 16:14, the word is different, because it refers to different things, and pertaining to a different region. Both in this text, and, in ch. 18:2, the things signified by daimones are related to earth, though, among the inhabitants of the Roman earth, they occupy a position analogous to that of the daemons of the mythical aerial between the political heaven and the peoples beneath. The habitation of these daemons is the aerial of Babylon; “the hold of every foul spirit, and cage of every unclean and hateful bird,” such as popes, cardinals, bishops, priests, monks, and other officials of the state. In ch. 16:14, they are the gods of the political aerial, whose policies, or “spirits,” develop remarkable and notable events. The daemons of these two texts are men of high degree—real men of flesh and blood, in the official exercise of power; and not objects of superstitious worship. But this is not the case in ch. 9:20. Here the things related to daemons are associated with idols or images, in the phrase ta daimonia kai eidola, where the definite article ta serves both for daimonia and eidola; and very properly so, because the eidola are the visible representations of the daemonia.

“The passage in which,” says Mr. Tayler Lewis, in his Platonic Theology, “we find the most express and the clearest mention of daemons is in the Epinomis,” which he renders thus: “Next to these, and under these, the Daemons, an aerial race, having the third seat, must we honor by prayers.” They are spoken of as possessing wonderful intelligence, as feeling a deep sympathy in human affairs, as loving the good, hating the bad, and, in consequence of their middle position in the air, acting as interpreters and mediators between gods and men. To the same effect Socrates speaks of them in the Symposium, as: “For the whole demonial race is between Deity and mortals, acting as interpreters or messengers to both. Through this passes all divination, and the whole prophetic art; for Deity mingles not directly with the human race, but through these media is ever carried on the intercourse between Heaven and men, both when awake and when asleep.”

Such were the daimones, daemons, ta daimonia, the things pertaining daemons, of pagan antiquity. They were unsubstantial, unreal, imaginary phantasms, and fit only to make symbols of, as representative of other abominations analogous to, and as unreal as, themselves.

The Greeks and Romans have never relaxed their hold upon daemonolatry or demon-worship to this day. They have only changed the character of their daemons and idols. When they became catholics they did not really cease to be pagans; they only “baptized” their daemons, and called them by other names. Jupiter, the Latins styled St. Peter, and the idol representative of “the father of the gods and men” became the image of St. Peter, “the Prince of the Apostles.” Jupiter’s wife, Juno, the Queen of the Universe, was converted by the Collyridion “heretics,” who changed her name to “Mary, Mother of Mercy, Queen of the whole world, Mother and Spouse of God.” After this fashion, they have conferred the names of fabulous saints and angels upon the gods and daemons of ancient Greece and Rome. All that the old heathens affirmed of their deities, the modern heathens of the Greek and Latin communions affirm of their martyrs, saints, and angels. The daemonology of the ancient world is the daemonology of the Apostasy, catholic and protestant. These are in fellowship with Plato, Socrates, and other pagans, in their views about “souls” and “departed spirits”; and, with all their “ripe scholarship,” as they absurdly style proficiency in “the foolishness” of their collegiate “divinities” they are not one step in advance of the Platonists upon these subjects. That is, they know no more about souls and departed spirits, and their post mortem relations, than did they who had no revelation at all to guide them into truth.

Protestants and Catholics now believe, with all the heathen, that there is inherent in man a particle of the Divine Essence, endowed with all the attributes of deity, in like proportion as part bears to whole. This they call "soul," or "spirit," or "immortal soul;" because they imagine it is incorruptible, indestructible, deathless. They regard this fiction as the real man. The body, in their psychology, is of no account. The soul is God in man's nature—an immortal god in mortal flesh—both in combination constituting what the pagan poet styles "a mortal god." When what is mortal of this god dies, that which they style "the immortal soul" still lives, and becomes what their brother Lucian denominates "an immortal man;" that is, a daemon of inferior rank, nevertheless a god!

Now catholics and protestants hold such gods as these in high esteem. The old mythologist had thirty thousand daemons; as—

"For thrice ten thousand wait upon our earth;
Jove's everlasting guards for mortal men.
Who roam the world in robes of air conceal'd."

But their successors of the Laodicean church have millions. The immortal soul-daemons of all their favorites are "sainted in heaven," as soon as they are supposed "to shuffle off the mortal coil." The disembodied immortal soul-daemons of what are called men, women, children, babes, are decreed by their theologies, or daemonologies, to be saints and angels in the aerial or sky. The soul-daemon of a babe is transformed into "a little darling angel" with wings, and is symbolized by painters, as wild in their imaginations as the poets, by a head with wings peeping out of a cloud. The air, which these phantoms are supposed to inhabit, they term the "spirit-world," "the spirit-land," "the eternal world," "the world to come," "kingdom come," and so forth; for, in reference to them in the words of Hesiod, they say—

"close at hand, Immortal eyes behold us evermore"

Or, as Milton expresseth it—

"Millions of spiritual creatures walk the earth, Unseen, both when we sleep and when we wake."

But, though they suppose all individuals of the human race have immortal souls, catholics do not worship all soul-daemons. All these they suppose to go to "purgatory"; but it is only those of the dead they delight to honor whom they exalt to the aerial between heaven and earth. They do this by a process in their ecclesiastical court called canonization. Having tried their characters in this court, and heard all the Devil's lawyer has to say against them, they are, in spite of the Devil, decreed to be adorable saints, and are translated out of purgatory beneath, to the aerial between heaven and earth!

Apotheosis was the deification of the disembodied ghosts, or soul daemons, of pagan heroes and great men, by which they were exalted to the aerial between earth and heaven, and became, in their new position, adorable daemon gods, interpreters, mediators, angels or messengers, guardians and protectors of persons, families, nations, temples, and states. Now, what apotheosis was among the worshippers of Jupiter, canonization is among the worshippers of the fictitious ghost which they call “the Virgin Mother and Spouse of God.” It is the next process to what they style beatification. The ghost supposed to be a blessed or beatified ghost after a scrutiny of its embodied life, in the presence of the Roman bishop and his cardinals, is proclaimed a holy one, or what these “worshippers” of the daemonials and images term “a saint,” upon which the Pontiff decrees the canonization and appoints the day.

On the day upon which the beatified soul daemon is installed by sovereign authority among the saint-protectors and mediators of the Laodicean aerial, the episcopal chief of the apostasy officiates in white, and his cardinals are dressed in the same. The temple dedicated to the ghost-god whom they christen “St Peter,” is hung with rich tapestry, upon which the arms of the Romish High Priest, and of the prince or state requiring the deification, are embroidered in gold and silver. A great number of lights blaze around the temple, which is crowded with a swinish multitude, who await with the impatient devotion of ignorance and superstition till the new daemonial has made his public entry into the aerial paradise between earth and heaven, that they may offer up their petitions to his demon-godship without danger of being rejected.

The catholic aerial is full of these deified ghosts, whose demonial images and relics are stored in the church bazaars dedicated to them, for the adoration of their besotted worshippers. All the apostles, and “the noble army of martyrs,” and the popes and cardinals, and “the fathers,” and Constantine, and Theodosius, and St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, St. Jerome, and a countless host of the same sort of deities, with the Immaculate Goddess Mary, “the Queen of Heaven,” at the head of them, are all supposed to be there, interceding with Mary’s Son for the safety and prosperity of their catholic adorers “whose public and private vows,” says Gibbon, “were addressed to their relics and images which disgraced the temples of the east.” This catholic aerial is supposed to be before the throne. The reader, therefore, may easily perceive the fitness of the historian’s style, in continuing: “The throne of the Almighty was darkened by a cloud of martyrs, saints, and angels, the objects of popular veneration; while the Virgin Mary was invested with the name and honors of a goddess.” They are, indeed, a cloud darkening the Almighty’s throne, so that no worshipper of daemonial ghosts, daemonial relics, and daemonial images, can see that throne, or find transmission for a single sigh.

Such were the many new deities raised to the rank of celestial and invincible protectors of the Roman empire. The intelligent reader will know that they exist only in the intoxicated imaginations of their deluded worshippers, as do the phantoms seen by an inebriate in delirium tremens. Immortality is neither innate nor disembodied. “The Deity only hath it,” Paul says; and he only bestows it upon obedient believers of the truth as it is in the Jesus he preached; and that bestowal is upon men and women bodily existing; and by clothing their bodies with incorruptibility and deathlessness after resurrection from among the dead. This is what the scripture teaches in opposition to the mythologies of the ancient and modern worlds. If “the simplicity which is in Christ” had not been departed from, there would have been no catholic and protestant daemonialism. The dogma of inherent immortality in sin’s flesh would have remained with the old pagans; but the faith was departed from by those who ought to have been its earnest defenders. They abandoned the word, and substituted the vain imaginations of the heathen, which are all resolvable into the reasonings and speculations of the brain, unenlightened by revelation of any kind. They became polytheists in spite of revelation; and polytheists they will remain till Babylon falls; and the divine reprobation is stamped upon its idolatry in its destruction by the judgment to be executed by the saints.

The clergy, who are in all ages the blind adherents and patrons of profitable errors, came to perceive that this polytheistic daemonialism would be more valuable to them than gold or precious stones. This stimulated them to a fraudulent multiplication of daemonial relics, such as the bones, hair, teeth, toe nails, blood, and so forth, of some fictitious saint or martyr; all of which were declared to be holy and endowed with miraculous powers for the healing of the sick, and even for the resurrection of the dead. "Without much regard for truth or probability," says Gibbon, "they invented names for skeletons, and actions for names. The fame of the apostles, and of the holy men who had imitated their virtues, was darkened by religious fiction. To the invincible band of genuine and primitive martyrs, they added myriads of imaginary heroes who had never existed, except in the fancy of crafty or credulous legendaries; and there is reason to suspect that Tours might not be the only diocese in which the bones of a malefactor were adored instead of those of a saint."

But, he believes that "the progress of superstition would have been much less rapid and victorious if the faith of the people had not been assisted by the seasonable aid of visions and miracles" (termed by Paul, "all power, and signs, and wonders of falsehood") "to ascertain the authenticity and virtue of the most suspicious relics." He then gives an account of how the remains of Stephen were discovered by the appearance of Gamaliel to one Lucian, a presbyter of Jerusalem, in the reign of Theodosius II., A.D. 421–460. The ghost named Gamaliel revealed the place of Stephen's burial. When his alleged coffin came into view, the earth trembled, and an odor such as that of Paradise was smelt, which instantly cured the various diseases of seventy-three of the assistants. These fragrant daemonial relics were transported in clerical procession to a church-bazaar constructed in their honor on Mount Zion; and the minute particles of those relics, a drop of blood, or the scrapings of a bone, were acknowledged in almost every province of the Roman world to possess a divine and miraculous virtue. Augustine, bishop of Hippo, a renowned saint of the Apostasy, and the great exemplar of Mr. Elliott's "sealed ones," attests the innumerable prodigies performed in Africa by the daemonial relics of the catholic St. Stephen. In his work, the City of God, he enumerates about seventy miracles, of which three were resurrections from the dead, in the space of two years, and within the limits of his own diocese! Paul had such "saints" as this Augustine before his mind when he wrote to Timothy that in later times there would be "seducing spirits, with teachings concerning daemonials; speaking lies in hypocrisy; having their conscience seared as with a hot iron." If we enlarge our view to all the dioceses and all the saints of the catholic world, it will not be easy to calculate the fables and the errors which issued from this inexhaustible source.

"Whatever might be the condition of vulgar souls in the long interval between the dissolution and the resurrection of their bodies, it was evident," says Gibbon, satirically, "that the superior spirits (or deified ghosts) of the saints and martyrs did not consume that portion of their existence in silent and inglorious sleep. To the pious worshippers, it was evident that these daemonial spirits enjoyed the lively and active consciousness of their happiness, their virtues, and their powers, and that they had already secured the possession of their eternal reward. The enlargement of their intellectual faculties surpassed the measure of the human imagination, since it was proved by the (alleged) experience of their worshippers that they were capable of hearing and understanding the various petitions of their numerous votaries, who, in the same moment of time, but in the most distant parts of the world, invoked the name and assistance of Stephen or of Martin." The confidence of their suppliants was based on the supposition that the saints, by daemonial transformation were reigning with Christ, and were warmly interested in the prosperity of the catholic church; and that the individuals who imitated the examples of their faith and piety, were the peculiar and favorite objects of their most tender regard. They imagined that the daemonials viewed, with partial affection, the places which had been consecrated by their birth, their residence, their death, their burial, or the possession of their relics. In short, as the daemonials of the aerial were the mere fictions of disordered imaginations, the vagaries of the human mind in its passion and desires were ascribed to them. Thus, they were as proud, avaricious, and revengeful as their votaries, neither more nor less. As all they had to say to their worshippers was said or interpreted by lying and hypocritical priests and monks, they testified their grateful approbation of the liberality of their votaries; and hurled the sharpest bolts of punishment against those impious wretches who violated their magnificent shrines or disbelieved their supernatural power. “The imagination, which had been raised by a painful effort to the contemplation and worship of the Universal Cause, eagerly embraced such inferior objects of adoration as were more proportioned to its gross conceptions and imperfect faculties. The sublime and simple theology of the primitive christians was gradually corrupted; and the monarchy of heaven, already clouded by metaphysical subtleties, was degraded by the introduction of a popular mythology, which tended to restore the reign of polytheism.”—Gibbon.

Thus, contemporary with the sounding of the fifth and sixth trumpets the latter of which did not cease to sound till A.D. 1794, the daemons of pagan Rome recovered their places in the aerial under new names; and became the patrons and protectors of the catholic apostasy. These trumpets were terrible judgments inflicted upon mankind because of their daemonolatry and idolatry. Protestantism appeared on the stage of action about the time of, or a few years before, the killing of the third of the men by the fourth angel power. But, though it protested against some catholic abominations of the grosser sort, it still clung tenaciously to the beatified existence of the daemonials in the aerial. It holds to all the absurdities which flow from the dogma of hereditary immortality, and the disembodied existence of the immortal essence after death. It erects statues in honor of its departed great, and dedicates them with clerical prayers and other ceremonies; and proclaims the dead to be alive in heaven, whence they look down with pleasure and grateful satisfaction upon the demonstrations of their admirers. Protestant daemonolatry is no more agreeable to heaven than the daemon worship of the catholic world. Behold the vengeance that desolates the protestant South, and that oppresses the protestant North with death and perplexity. These sectarian sections, being composed of all kinds of polytheists, are being plagued for reasons similar to those which caused the locust-torment, and the loosing of the four trans-Euphratean angel-powers. Erecting statues, and memorial windows in churches, in honor of “immortal souls in heaven,” is worship, homage, or reverence, and they who practice such things are as much guilty of “worshipping the demonials,” as are they who bow down before the image of a “saint.”

12. “Idols”

The All Seeing Spirit, in ch. 9:20, intimates that the “plagues” of the first and second woes were designed to abolish, or punish, the worshipping of daemonial things, and idols or images. There were many other abominations concurrent with these woes not specified; but daimonia, and eidola, things related to daemons, and idols, are especially named, because the ages contemporary with the fifth, and the interval preceding the sixth trumpet, were conspicuous for the legal establishment of the worship of daemonials, and their idolatrous symbols, called images or idols.

The introduction and establishment of daemonial and idol worship as an institution of the catholic apostasy, was progressive. It began with a “voluntary humility and worshipping of angels”—and intruding into the unseen, and a vain inflation of the mind of the flesh, in the apostolic age, as appears from Col. 2:17; and was established as early as the end of the sixth century, but more firmly by Greek and Papal authority in the eighth and ninth. In the beginning of the eighth, the idol worship was in full magnitude, and became a striking characteristic of the Laodicean Apostasy; so that with Jews, Saracens, Turkmans, Moguls, and Bible Christians, apocalyptically styled “the Golden Altar,” and the “sealed,” catholics and idolators were and are but different terms for the same thing.

As I do not write for “the learned,” who are supposed to know all about the history of the past, but whose ability to apply it rightly for apocalyptic exposition is at zero; I shall give the reader a brief account, condensed from Gibbon, of the idolatry which brought the judgments of the first and second woes upon “the men” of the Greek and Latin sections of the Roman world.

At the head of certain ecclesiastical phenomena, by which the decline and fall of the Roman empire were materially affected, “We may,” says he, “justly rank the Worship of Images, so fiercely disputed in the eighth and ninth centuries;” since this question of popular superstition produced the revolt of Italy from the Greek, or Sixth Dragon-Head of the empire; developed the temporal power of the popes; and the restoration of the Roman empire of the west under its last, or Eighth Head.

Images or idols are symbols. They are symbols which represent the things related to daemons—ta daimonia. Hence, when a catholic idolator looks upon the statue or image of Jupiter, which he has been taught to regard as the image of Saint Peter, that Saint Peter upon which the catholic church is built, he immediately has before “the mind of his flesh,” ho nous tes sarkos autou, a disembodied ghost, with a bunch of keys. at the gates of Paradise, called Saint Peter. He bows before this image and kisses it, as the nearest approach he can make to bowing before the daemon-ghost in the aerial. It is to him not merely an image, but a representative image, or idol, before which certain attitudes are assumed, offerings presented, vows made, prayers repeated, which get no nearer heaven than the eyes, ears, and pockets of the hypocrites who minister before the symbol. The first introduction of this symbolic worship was in the veneration of the cross, and of relics. At first, the experiment of daemonial relic and image worship was made with caution and scruple. By a slow though inevitable progression the honors conferred on the original daemon were transferred to the copy, whether in picture, or in marble, wood, brass, silver or gold the votary prayed before the image of a deified ghost; and the pagan rites of genuflexion, luminaries, and incense, reappeared in the catholic church. The use, and even the worship of images, was ineradicably established before the end of the sixth century. They were fondly cherished by the warm imagination of the Greeks and Asiatics; and the Pantheon and Vatican were adorned with the emblems of the new superstition.

Five hundred years after the crucifixion, a certain bishop “speaking lies in hypocrisy,” pretended to have discovered a true image of Christ, which he presented to the devotion of the times. It was enthroned at Edessa in Syria, where it was adored by the catholics as the immediate creation of the divine original. The style and sentiments of a Byzantine hymn will declare how far their worship was removed from the grossest idolatry. “How can we with mortal eyes contemplate this image, whose celestial splendor the host of heaven presumes not to behold? He who dwells in heaven condescends this day to visit us by his venerable image. He who is seated on the cherubim visits us this day by a picture, which the Father has delineated with his immaculate hand, which he has formed in an ineffable manner, and which we sanctify by adoring it with fear and love.” Before the end of the sixth century, these acheiropoietal images (images made without hand, were propagated in the camps and cities of the Eastern Third; they were the objects of worship, and the instruments of miracles. The fruitful precedent was speedily transferred to the Virgin Mary, and the daemonials of the catholic air; not very godlike, doubtless, being but faintly and flatly delineated by monkish artists in the last degeneracy of taste and genius.

Blasphemy in the Vatican. Statue of Peter in the pontiff’s robes and regalia. The toe of this image has been worn away by the kisses of deluded worshippers as described by the author of Eureka.

In the beginning of the eighth century, in the full magnitude of the abuse, many of the Greeks were awakened to the conviction, that under the name of christianity they had restored the idolatry of their fathers; and they heard, with grief and impatience, from Mohammedans and Jews the incessant charge of worshipping daemonial images, which were incapable of defending themselves, much less the cities which superstition had placed under their protection. In ten years, the Saracens had subdued all the daemonially protected cities of Syria, Palestine, and Egypt, by which conquest, in their opinion, the Lord of hosts had pronounced a decisive judgment between the adoration and contempt of their mute and inanimate idols. In this season of distress and dismay, when the worshippers sought death, but found it not; and desired to die, and the death fled from them (ch. 9:6) the eloquence of the monks was exercised in the defence of images. "But," says the historian, "they were now opposed by the murmurs of many simple or rational christians, who appealed to the evidence of texts, and of the primitive times, and secretly desired the reformation of the church."

This reformation was attempted by Leo III., surnamed Iconoclast, who ascended the throne of the Eastern Third, A.D. 726. After ten years, he proscribed the existence, as well as the use of religious pictures; the church-bazaars of Constantinople were cleansed from idolatry; the images of Christ, "the Virgin, and the saints," were demolished, or a smooth surface of plaster was spread over the walls of the edifice. For these things, Leo the Isaurian, and his party, were styled Iconoclasts, or Image breakers; by whom under six emperors, the East and West were involved in a noisy conflict of one hundred and twenty years. They held a synod in Constantinople, A.D. 754, which, after a session of six months, decreed, that all visible symbols of Christ, except in the eucharist, were either blasphemous or heretical; that image-worship was a corruption of christianity and a renewal of paganism; that all such monuments of idolatry should be broken or erased; and that those who should refuse to deliver the objects of their private superstition were guilty of disobedience to the authority of the church and of the emperor.

The execution of the imperial edict was resisted by frequent tumults in Constantinople and the provinces; the person of Leo was endangered, his officers were massacred, and the popular enthusiasm was quelled by the strongest efforts of the civil and military power. Of the Archipelago, or Holy Sea, the numerous islands were filled with images and monks; and their votaries abjured the emperor, without scruple, as the enemy of Christ, his mother, and the saints. They sallied forth in armed boats and galleys against the capital, depending upon the succor of a miracle for success. But monkish miracles were inefficient against Greek fire, which wrapped their fleet in a sheet of flame, and gave victory to the image breakers; who forthwith suppressed the monks, ever the faithful slaves of the superstition to which they owed their riches and influence; dissolved their fraternities; converted their monasteries into magazines, or barracks; and confiscated their lands, movables, and cattle, to the use of the state. With the habit and profession of monks, the public and private worship of images was rigorously proscribed; and a solemn abjuration of idolatry was exacted from the clergy of the Eastern Third of the Roman orb.

The patient east abjured, with reluctance, her sacred images; while they were fondly cherished, and vigorously defended, by the Italians. Their popes were the chief advocates of "the daemonials and idols." It is agreed, that in the eighth century, their dominion was founded on rebellion, and that the rebellion was produced and justified by the heresy of the Iconoclasts. In the epistle of Pope Gregory II. to the Emperor Leo, A.D. 727, he says: "You now accuse the catholics of idolatry; and by the accusation you betray your own impiety and ignorance. To this ignorance we are compelled to adapt the grossness of our style and arguments: the first elements of holy letters are sufficient for your confusion; and were you to enter a grammar school, and avow yourself the enemy of our worship, the simple and pious children would be provoked to cast their horn books at your head." After this very episcopal salutation, he maintains a distinction between the idols of antiquity and the catholic images. The former were the fanciful representations of phantoms or daemons; while the latter are the genuine forms of Christ, his mother, and his saints, who have approved by a crowd of miracles the innocence and merit of this relative worship; and falsely asserts the perpetual use of images from the apostolic age. Then addressing Leo, he continues: "You assault us, O Tyrant! with a carnal and military hand; unarmed and naked, we can only implore the Christ, the prince of the heavenly host, that he will send unto you a devil, for the destruction of your body and the salvation of your soul. You declare with foolish arrogance, I will despatch my orders to Rome, I will break in pieces the image of St. Peter; and Gregory, like his predecessor Martin, shall be transported in chains, and in exile, to the foot of the imperial throne. Incapable as you are of defending your Roman subjects, the maritime situation of the city may perhaps expose it to your depredations; but we can remove to the distance of four and twenty stadia, to the first fortress of the Lombards, and then—you may pursue the winds. Are you ignorant that the popes are the bond of union, the mediators of peace (daimones, in the sense of ch. 18:2), between the east and west? The eyes of the nations are fixed on our humility (“pride that apes humility”); and they revere, as a God upon earth, the apostle Saint Peter, whose image you threaten to destroy. The barbarians have submitted to the yoke of the gospel, while you alone are deaf to the voice of the shepherd. These pious barbarians are kindled into rage: they thirst to avenge the persecution of the east. Abandon your rash and fatal enterprise; reflect, tremble, and repent. If you persist, we are innocent of the blood that will be spilt in the contest; may it fall on your own head.”

When Leo’s proscriptive edict arrived in Italy, the catholics trembled for their domestic deities; the images of Christ and the Virgin, of the angels, martyrs, and saints, were abolished in all the church-bazaars of the country; and a strong alternative was proposed to the pope, the imperial favor of the Dragon Chief as the price of compliance, or degradation and exile as the penalty of disobedience. Gregory refused to submit, and gave the signal of revolt. The Italians swore to live and die in the defence of the pope, and the holy images. They destroyed the statues of Leo, withheld the tribute of Italy, and put to an ignominious death the officials who undertook to enforce his decree. To punish these flagitious deeds, and to restore the dominion of the Dragon in Italy, Leo sent a fleet and army into the Adriatic gulf. In a hard fought day, the invaders were defeated, and the worship of images vindicated in a baptism of blood. Amidst the triumph of the idolators, their Chief Pontiff, with the consent of a synod hastily convened, pronounced a general excommunication against all who by word or deed should attack the traditions of the fathers and the images of the saints. They spared, however, the relics of the Byzantine dominion. They delayed and prevented the election of a new emperor, and exhorted the Italians not to separate from the body of the Roman monarchy: and till the imperial coronation of Charlemagne, A.D. 799, the government of Rome and Italy was administered in the name of the successors of Constantine.

While the popes established in Italy their freedom and dominion, the images, the first cause of their revolt, were restored in the eastern empire. The tree of superstition had been hewn down, but the stump was still enrooted in the soil. The idols were secretly cherished by the monks and women, whose fond alliance obtained a final victory over the reason and authority of man. The ambitious empress Irene, A.D. 780, undertook the ruin of the Iconoclasts. In her restoration of the monks, a thousand images were exposed to the public veneration; and a thousand lying legends invented of their sufferings and miracles. The seventh general council was convened at Nice, A.D. 787. The legates of the Roman God, and the eastern patriarch, sat in the synod of three hundred and fifty bishops, who unanimously decreed, that the worship of images is agreeable to scripture and reason, to the fathers and council of the church. The acts of this council are still extant; a curious monument of superstition and ignorance, of falsehood and folly. The comparative merit of image worship and morality in the judgment of these bishops, is illustrated by the following anecdote. A monk had concluded a truce with the daemon of fornication on condition of interrupting his daily prayers to a picture that hung in his cell. His scruples prompted him to consult the Abbot. “Rather than abstain from adoring Christ and his Mother in their holy images, it would be better for you,” said he, “to enter every brothel, and visit every prostitute in the city.” The final victory of “the daemonials and idols” was achieved by a second female, the empress Theodora, who was left guardian of the empire A.D. 842. Her measures were bold and decisive. She ordered the Iconoclast patriarch to be whipped with two hundred lashes. Upon this the bishops trembled, the monks shouted, and idolatry reigned supreme. The churches of France, Germany, England, and Spain, steered a middle course between the adoration and the destruction of the idols, which they admitted into their temples, not as objects of worship, but as lively and useful memorials of faith and history. Among the barbarians of the west the worship of idols advanced with silent and insensible progress, because among them were “nourished the Woman and the Remnant of her seed” (ch. 12:14–17); but a large atonement is made for their hesitation and delay, by the gross idolatry of the ages which precede the protestant modification of Romanism, and of the countries, both in Europe and America, which are still immersed in the gloom of daemonial superstition.

Thus, having become inveterate idolators “the inhabitants of the earth” were given over to their delusions, and nothing remained but to inflict upon them the sanguinary judgments of the three woes, or fifth, sixth, and seventh trumpets. As I have said, the second woe ended in A.D. 1794; and since then, the third woe has been doing its work upon the daemonialists and image worshippers of the European and American sections of the globe. Its judgments have not yet ceased; for “the rest of the men” have “not changed from the works of their hands, that they should not worship the daemonials and idols;” nor have they of the “religious world” abandoned murder, sorcery, fornication, and theft. Therefore the judgments of the third woe will not cease, until all the catholic, protestant, and sectarian systems of Daemonialism shall be destroyed; and Yahweh be alone exalted as Elohim and King over all the earth in a peaceful and glorious reign of one thousand years (ch. 5:10; 20:4, 6).

II. HISTORICAL EXPOSITION

As we have seen, the two periods of five symbolic months of years pertaining to the fifth trumpet, terminated with the divesting of the Caliph-Angel of the Abyss of all temporal power, which had enabled him to “torment” and “injure,” or destroy, the catholic worshippers of the daemonials and idols, for 300 years. Since that notable event, A.D. 933, their superstition and demoralization continued to intensify to the full establishment of what the moderns, in the plenitude of their own conceited wisdom, term “the dark ages.” Dark enough they were; nevertheless there were more in those ages than in this, who were scripturally enlightened in “the truth as it is in Jesus.” These were “the golden altar,” “the altar” of sacrifice, and “the holy city trodden under foot of the Gentiles” (ch. 11:1, 2); in other words less highly figurative, “the Woman in the Wilderness” and the remnant of her seed, who keep the commandments of the Deity, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ” (ch. 12:6, 17).

Parallel with the ascendancy of the Caliph-Angel of the Abyss, and far transcending the epoch of his loss of temporal power; that is, from A.D. 660 to A.D. 1200, the Woman’s Seed, under the tolerating government of the Arabs, and under the cruelly persecuting rule, both of the image-worshipping and Iconoclastic Greeks, was exceedingly active in opposing the superstition of the catholics of the Eastern Third. We shall have to speak of these more particularly in the exposition of the eleventh chapter; I need therefore only say here, that, while their labors were beneficial to individuals in regard to their eternal salvation, and as a protest against iniquity, it worked no change in the public conscience. The one hundred and thirty years that intervened between the Caliph-Angel’s loss of temporal power, and the loosing of the first of the four angel-powers from its Euphratean boundary, were a period of supine superstition. Indeed, not only for this period, but “from the beginning of the eighth century,” says Gibbon, “to the last ages of the Byzantine empire, the sound of controversy was seldom heard; curiosity was exhausted, zeal was fatigued, and in the decrees of six councils, the articles of the catholic faith had been irrevocably defined; and the prostrate Greeks were content to fast, to pray, and to believe, in blind obedience to the patriarch and his clergy. During a long dream of superstition, the Virgin and the Saints, their visions and miracles, their relics and images, were preached by the monks and worshipped by the people, including the first ranks of civil society.” The Iconoclasts somewhat rudely disturbed this dream; but the Eastern World embraced or deplored its visible deities, and the restoration of images was celebrated as the feast of orthodoxy. In this passive and unanimous state, the ecclesiastical rulers were relieved from the toil, or deprived of the pleasure of persecution. The old pagans had been superseded by the new; the Jews were silent and obscure; the disputes with the Latins were rare and remote hostilities; and the sects of Egypt and Syria enjoyed a free toleration under the shadow of the Arabian Caliphs. One enemy alone remained to disturb their spiritual slumbers; and these were the Altar-Worshippers of the apocalypse, whom they selected as the victims of diabolical tyranny: “the earth” that “helped” them (ch. 12:16) was at length exasperated to rebellion; and the exile into which they were driven, scattered over the west fresh seeds of antagonism to the Papal Power, styled “the Beast and his Image” (ch. 13).

What, then, could be done with such an incorrigible generation of daemonial and idol-worshippers, but to prepare powers, which when loosed against them, should proclaim idolatry a sin punishable with slavery or death? This was the course of the Eternal Spirit, as revealed in the vision of the second woe. The Euphratean Powers were prepared powers—powers prepared for a special mission, and therefore “angels” or messengers; and messengers are so called, because they are sent to perform, or execute missions. The mission of these Euphrateans was to make war upon idolatry with sword and gun, until the dominion of the Eastern Dragonic Third should be transferred to the Conqueror; and so, in relation to the daemonial and idol-worshipping community, to all intents and purposes, “killed.” In the order, then, of things presented to our hand, I shall proceed to relate the

1. Preparation of the First Angel

The loosing must not be confounded with the preparation of the four angels. If they had been “prepared for the hour and day and month and year,” we might have been led to look for their contemporaneous existence during all that period; which would have made any effort at exposition a hopeless failure. Each individual power was neither prepared nor loosed for a separate and independent continuance of 391 years and 30 days. This period was the time appointed of the Spirit for the work of killing the third of the men. He could have caused them to be resolved into political extinction in a much shorter period; but this would not have been a sufficient punishment for their daemonialism. The enormity of their offense in worshipping deified immortal souls. and images of the bodies of such fictions of fancy, demanded nearly four hundred years of severe national suffering. In these centuries they were baptized in blood and calamity, and no rest was granted them day or night.

The word rendered “prepared,” hoi hetoimasmenoi, is the perfect participle passive, and signifies having been prepared. Thus, it may be read, “the four having-been prepared angels were loosed for the hour and day and month and year.” Their preparation and loosing were for the work of this period. The time and circumstances of their preparation are not indicated; nor how long each angel was to continue loose, or unrepressed. These particulars must be learned from history, which gives us the following information with respect to the preparation of the first of the four Euphratean angel-powers. In tracing the preparation of the first angel-power, the reader must transport himself beyond the Caspian Sea, to the original seat of the Turkmans, against whom the first crusade was principally directed. One of the greatest of their princes, for whom the title of Sultan was first invented, was Mahmud the Gaznevide, who reigned in the eastern provinces of Persia from A.D. 997 to A.D. 1028. His name is still venerable in the east, where he was very successful against the idolators of Hindostan. Ten millions sterling were offered him for the preservation of the idol of Sumnat by the Brahmins; but he refused it, saying, "Never in the eyes of posterity shall Mahmud appear as a merchant of idols." The fame of his zeal reaching Baghdad, Mahmud was saluted by the Caliph with the title of Guardian of the Fortune and Faith of Mohammed.

The Eastern Turkmans whom he had introduced into the heart of his Persian kingdom were a cause of grief to him in the latter years of his reign. He discerned the impolicy of his course in the replies of Ismael, a chief of the race of the Seljuk, who dwelt in the territory of Bochara. The sultan had inquired what supply of men he could furnish for military service. "If you send," replied Ismael, "one of these arrows into our camp, fifty thousand of your servants will mount on horseback." "And if that number," continued Mahmud, "should not be sufficient?" "Send this second arrow to the horde of Balik, and you will find fifty thousand more." "But," said the Gaznevide, dissembling his anxiety, "if I should stand in need of the whole force of your kindred tribes?" "Despatch my bow," was the last reply of Ismael, "and as it is circulated around, the summons will be obeyed by two hundred thousand horse." The apprehension of such formidable friendship induced him to transport the most obnoxious tribes into the heart of Chorasán, where they would be separated from their brethren by the river Oxus, and enclosed on all sides by the walls of obedient cities. But on the death of Mahmud, these Turkman shepherds became robbers; the bands of robbers were collected into an army of conquerors; as far as Ispahan and the Tigris, Persia was afflicted by their predatory inroads: and the Turkmans were not ashamed or afraid to measure their courage and numbers with the proudest sovereigns of Asia.

Massoud, the son and successor of Mahmud, had neglected too long the advice of his ministers. "Your enemies," they repeatedly urged, "were in their origin a swarm of ants; they are now little snakes; and unless they be instantly crushed, they will acquire the venom and magnitude of serpents." This he essayed to do, but with ill success; for, though for a time alternating between victory and defeat, he at length lost his crown and life in battle; and in Persia, as the result of his overthrow, was founded the dynasty of the shepherd kings, A.D. 1038.

The victorious Turks immediately elected Togrul Beg, the grandson of Seljuk, for their king. His ambition was equal to his valor, and both were great. He extended his dominion eastward to the Indus. In the west, he annihilated the dynasty of the Bowides, the Persian protectors of the caliphs; and by the conquest of Media he approached the confines of the Roman earth, from whence he despatched a herald to demand the tribute and obedience of the emperor of Constantinople.

From the Oxus to the Euphrates the military colonies of the Turks were protected and propagated by their native princes, under the royalty of Togrul, who promoted the most deserving of the Persians and Arabians to the honors of the state; and the whole body of the Turkish nation embraced with fervor and sincerity the anti-idolatrous religion of Mohammed.

Saracen Empire Under Threat

The map above shows the Saracen Empire as its fullest extent (711 A.D.). Its dominance was challenged by the Seljuk Turks as they moved West. The Ottoman dynasty of Turks extended the Islamic threat to Europe itself. In 1453 Constantinople fell, and the Eastern Roman Empire came to an end.

With the belief of the Koran, Togrul imbibed a lively reverence for the caliph, the now feeble successor of Mohammed. On the fall of the Gaznevide dynasty, the caliph named the Seljukian sultan his temporal vicegerent over the Moslem world. In the palace of Bagdad, the Commander of the Faithful still slumbered, a venerable phantom. The prince of the Bowides could no longer protect him from meaner tyrants; and the presence of a conqueror was therefore implored as a blessing. Togrul obeyed the holy summons at the head of an irresistible force. As conqueror of the east, he entered Bagdad, where, seated upon a throne by the side of the caliph's, his commission was publicly read, which declared him the temporal lieutenant of the Vicar of the Prophet. Two crowns were placed on his head; and two scymitars were girded to his side, as the symbols of a double reign over the east and west. The alliance of the Caliph, the spiritual, and of Togrul, the temporal, chief of all faithful Moslems, was cemented by the marriage of Togrul's sister with the caliph, and the caliph's daughter with Togrul. The preparation of the first angel was now complete. An anti-idolatrous power had been developed upon the old Mohammedan basis, whose dominion extended to the Euphrates, by which it was "bounded," and divided from the daemonial idol-worshipping peoples, on the west. The royal nuptials of Togrul, A.D. 1062, were soon followed by his death, A.D. 1063.

Since the fall of the Caliphs, the Saracens had respected the Asiatic provinces of Rome; which, by the victories of the Greeks, had been extended to Antioch and the eastern boundaries of Armenia. Twenty-five years after the death of Basil, A.D. 1050, myriads of Togrul's horse overspread a frontier of six hundred miles from Tauris to Erzeroum, and the blood of a hundred and fifty thousand worshippers of daemonial relics, ghosts, and idols, was a grateful sacrifice by the children of the Arabian prophet. This, however, was not a loosing of the angel-power; for the arms of Togrul made no deep or lasting impression on the Greek empire. The torrent rolled away from the open country; and he retired without glory or success within his Euphratean boundary; beyond which he had found it impossible for him permanently to extend westward the territory of the Turks.

2. The Loosing of the First Angel

Togrul, the Temporal Chief of the Mohammedan World, dying childless, was succeeded by his nephew Alp Arslan, "the Valiant Lion." As soon as he was seated on the throne, he determined to continue the work of extending his dominion westward at the expense of "the third of the men," whom he very correctly denounced as idolators. "He passed the Euphrates," says Gibbon, "at the head of the Turkish cavalry," A.D. 1063, "and entered Caesarea, the metropolis of Cappadocia, to which he had been attracted by the fame and wealth of the temple of St. Basil." He carried away the doors of the shrine incrustated with gold and pearls, and profaned the relics of the guardian saint.

The final conquest of Armenia and Georgia, began by Togrul, was achieved by Alp Arslan, who by this success gave proof that the power of the Seljukian Turks was no longer "bound by the great river Euphrates," but emphatically "loosed." The loss of this important frontier was the news of a day; but as the idolators inhabiting the country were also heretics, the orthodox idolators of the capital were neither surprised nor displeased that they had been abandoned by their deities to the invader. The Turkish sultan and his son Malek were indefatigable in this "holy war;" their captives were compelled to promise both spiritual and temporal obedience; and to wear an iron horse-shoe, as a badge of ignominy, if they still adhered to the daemonial and idol worship of their fathers.

The Turks had penetrated into the heart of Phrygia; and their numerous detachments were scattered over Asia in the security of conquest. These were separately surprised and defeated by the Greeks under their emperor Romanus Diogenes; who, in three laborious campaigns, drove the Turks beyond the Euphrates; and then undertook the recovery of Armenia. The report of this bold invasion brought Alp Arslan again into the field. He flew to the scene of action at the head of forty thousand horse. His hopes of victory were in the arrows of the Turkish cavalry. After wasting the greater part of a summer's day, fatigue compelled the Greeks and their Latin allies to retire to camp. At this crisis, the Turkish squadrons poured in a cloud of arrows. The destruction of the army followed; the emperor was taken prisoner, and the Asiatic provinces of Rome irretrievably lost. "The third of the men" inhabiting the provinces "were killed." Their sovereignty was abolished, and they became the slaves of the victorious Turks, whose dominion was advanced from Antioch to the Black Sea—A.D. 1068–1071.

Alp Arslan fell by the hand of an assassin, A.D. 1072, and was succeeded by his son Malek Shah, who reigned prosperously twenty years. He was the first Turk who bore the title of “Commander of the Faithful.” By his personal merit and the extent of his empire, he was the greatest prince of his age. From the Chinese frontier, he stretched his immediate jurisdiction or feudatory sway to the west and south as far as the mountains of Georgia, the neighborhood of Constantinople, the holy city of Jerusalem, and the spicy groves of Arabia Felix. This dominion surpassed the Asiatic reign of Cyrus and the Caliphs. His hunting train consisted of forty-seven thousand horses; a stud, surpassing that doubtless, of Nimrod, the “mighty hunter before the Lord.”

But the greatness and union of the Seljukian angel-power expired in the person of Malek Shah, who died A.D. 1092. His vacant throne was disputed by his brother and his four sons. After a series of civil wars, the empire was divided into four dynasties—the Persian, and those of Kerman, of Syria, and of ROUM. The last invaded the Roman provinces of Asia Minor, A.D. 1074, under the lead of the valiant Soliman, who extended the bounds of the Seljukian kingdom of Roum to the Bosphorus and Hellespont; which, instead of “the great river Euphrates,” became the eastern boundary of the Roman world. “Since the first conquests of the caliphs,” says Gibbon, “the establishment of the Turks in Anatolia was the most deplorable loss which the church and empire had sustained.” Soliman’s new kingdom of the Romans, or Roum, is described as extending from the Euphrates to Constantinople, and from the Black Sea to the confines of Syria. Nice, the capital of Bithynia, was chosen for his fortress and palace; by which the throne of the Dynasty of Roum was planted one hundred miles from Constantinople. On the hard conditions of tribute and slavery, the Greek “worshippers of the daemonials and idols” might enjoy the exercise of their superstition; but their most holy temples were profaned; their priests and bishops were insulted; many thousands of their children were circumcised; and many thousand captives were devoted to the service, or the pleasures of their masters. A fleet of two hundred ships made Alexius, the Greek emperor, tremble behind the walls of his capital; and caused him to supplicate the compassion of the Latins in succor for the defence of the city of Constantine.

3. The Beginning of the 391 Years and 30 Days

Such is a brief sketch of the loosing of the first, or Seljukian, angel-power, that it might be no more “bound by the great river Euphrates.” The commencement of this loosing enterprise was the attempted separation of the Asiatic provinces of the Roman empire by Togrul, and perfected by Alp Arslan, A.D. 1071, by the capture of the emperor Romanus. Hence, the loosing covered a period of several years. The period of the symbolic time allotted to “the killing of the third of the men,” that is, of “the hour and day and month and year,” is no more to be calculated from the loosing of the first angel, than from that of the last three. The calculation must be made from the perfected preparation of the first angel power—“having been prepared” for the work of killing. The tense of the participle passive proves this, indicating, not partial, but complete preparation before loosing. We know the day and month and year in which the work of killing, with political death, “the third of the men” was accomplished. About this there can be no mistake. The Imperial Eastern Roman Third was “killed” with the slaying of its last emperor and the capture of the capital. This event came to pass, May 29, 1453. This was the last day of the 391 years and 30 days, which long period must consequently have commenced April 29, 1062, before the death of Togrul, and after, or at, his adoption by marriage into the domestic circle of the Caliph-Angel of the Abyss.

4. The First Interval

The second Euphratean angel power did not immediately follow the first. At the close of the eleventh century, and not more than forty years from the inauguration of Togrul, Constantinople and its empire were on the verge of ruin by the power of the Seljukian kingdom of Roum; and nothing less than a superhuman intervention seemed capable of averting it. To have permitted “the killing of the third of the men” “worshipping the daemonials and idols” at that epoch, would have falsified the vision. They were to be killed, not by bows and arrows, but “by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the sulphur bursting forth out of the mouths of the horses.” This was a power of destruction, not in operation in the days of Soliman, the Seljukian king of Roum. An intervention, therefore, was a divine necessity, that the word of the Deity might be established. Nor was the necessity unprovided for. The daemonial superstition of the pope’s barbarians of western Europe finding vent in the “crusades,” though ultimately ineffective in Syria, was made the instrument of so crippling the Seljukian power, as for two hundred years to aid in upholding against it the Greek empire, which tottered on the verge of destruction. In the age of the crusades, the catholic idolators of the east and west, insisted upon their peculiar title to the Holy Land, then as now in the possession of the Turks; and that this title, which was inalienable, had been sealed by the blood of their divine saviour. On this assumption, they affirmed that it was their right and duty to rescue their inheritance from the Mohammedans, its unjust possessors, who profaned his sepulchre, and oppressed the pilgrimage of his disciples.

But in this argument, which overwhelmed Asia and depopulated Europe, there were fatal errors; first, in the assumption that they, these worshippers of daemonial ghosts, relics, and images, were christians; and secondly, that it is the right and duty of christians to possess themselves of the Holy Land. It is indeed true, that the true believers have an inalienable title to the land; and that that title was sealed by the blood of Christ, when by his death he brought the Abrahamic covenant into force; so that the land becomes their inheritance; but it is not true, that it is the right and duty of these heirs to become crusaders to wrest their inheritance from the enemy. They are heirs, indeed; but they are also “joint-heirs with Christ,” and have therefore no right, and consequently it is not their duty, to take possession of it in his absence, even if they were able. He must first return from the far country in which he has resided so long; and return, too, with power and authority from the Father-Deity to take possession jointly with his fellow-heirs of their inalienable inheritance.

But what a monster evil the idolators of “Christendom” brought upon themselves by the false assumptions of the argument, by which they sought to justify their mad enterprises for the deliverance of the land and sepulchre of Christ. Their ignorance and fanaticism were made the means of the destruction of myriads. In the council of Clermont, Urban II. proclaimed a plenary indulgence to those who should enlist under the banner of the cross; the absolution of all their sins, and a full receipt for all that might be due of canonical penance. At the voice of the pope, the robber, the incendiary, the homicide, arose by thousands to redeem their souls, by repeating on the Moslems the same deeds they had practised against their papal brethren; and the terms of atonement were eagerly embraced by offenders of every rank and denomination. They set out for Asia, A.D. 1096, early in the spring, under Peter the Hermit and Walter the Pennyless, a herd of nearly three hundred thousand of the most stupid and savage refuse of the people, who mingled with their devotion to the cross a brutal licence of rapine, prostitution, and drunkenness; while their genuine leaders were a goose and a goat, who were carried in the front, and “to whom,” says Gibbon, “these worthy christians ascribed an infusion of the divine spirit.” In their march along the Rhine, they pillaged and massacred many thousands of the Jews, numbers of whom, with their families and wealth, perished in the rivers or the flames. As they advanced their numbers increased; but in Hungary and Asia Minor, unrelenting vengeance retaliated upon them the punishment of their crimes. In the plain of Nice, they were overwhelmed by the Turkish arrows. Of these first crusaders 300,000 had already perished before a single city was taken from the kingdom of Roum; and a pyramid of bones became the memorial of their defeat.

This herd of savages was followed by the chivalry of the nations. Their principal force consisted in cavalry; and when mustered in the plains of Bithynia, the knights and their martial attendants on horseback amounted to one hundred thousand fighting men, completely armed with the helmet and coat of mail. Besides these, the promiscuous crowd was lost in its own disorder. The Greeks were astonished at the overwhelming inundation; and the Princess Anne, the daughter of the Emperor Alexius, exclaims, "That Europe was loosened from its foundations, and hurled against Asia." Provoked by the loss of his capital, Soliman collected the Turkman hordes against them to the number of three hundred and sixty thousand horse. But the battle went against him, and he found it necessary to evacuate the kingdom of Roum. The crusaders at length obtained possession of Antioch, but with the annihilation of their splendid cavalry; and the loss of many thousands of every rank by famine, sickness, and desertion. In the month of May, A.D. 1099, the relics of their mighty host laid siege to Jerusalem, which they entered July 15. The capture of the city was followed by the foundation of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem. The Latins now reigned beyond the Euphrates; and the four cities of Hems, Hamah, Damascus, and Aleppo, were the only relics of the Mohammedan conquests.

The Latin Kingdom was conquered by Saladin, A.D. 1187; but the expulsion of the Latins from Syria was delayed till A.D. 1295; when the Sultan of Egypt, at the head of sixty thousand horse, and a hundred and forty thousand foot, closed the age of the crusades with the capture of Acre, the expulsion of these forces from the Holy Land, and the death or slavery of sixty thousand worshippers of the daemonials and idols of the catholic aerial.

5. Preparation of the Second Angel

The rise and progress of the Ottomans are founded on a previous knowledge of the great eruption of the Moguls and Tartars; whose rapid conquests may be compared with the primitive convulsions of nature which have agitated and altered the surface of the globe.

The spacious highlands between China, Siberia, and the Caspian sea, the ancient seats of the Huns and Turks, were occupied in the twelfth century by many pastoral tribes, of the same descent and similar manners, which were united and led to conquest by the formidable Zingis Khan. His private name was Temugin, but from a naked prophet, who claimed to be able to ascend to heaven on a white horse, he condescended to accept the title of ZINGIS, the Most Great; and a divine right to the conquest and dominion of the earth. In a general diet, he was solemnly proclaimed Great Khan, or Emperor of the Moguls and Tartars. War was his delight, and his maxim was that peace should never be granted unless to a vanquished or suppliant enemy.

His religious system was that of pure theism and perfect toleration. He was in direct opposition to the impious fools of Europe, who believed nonsense and defended it by cruelty. His first and only article of faith was the existence of one God, the author of all good, who fills by his presence the heavens and earth, which he has created by his power. Such a potentate was an appropriate scourge for the idolators of the Roman world.

In the west, his empire touched the dominions of the Sultan of Carizme, who reigned from the Persian Gulph to the borders of India and Turkestan. It was his wish to establish a friendly and commerical intercourse with the most powerful of the Moslem princes. But he was not met in the same spirit. In the vast plains north of the Jaxartes, 700,000 Moguls and Tartars under Zingis and his four sons, encountered the Sultan with 400,000. In the first battle, 160,000 Carizmians were slain. The Sultan retired into his fortified cities. But, aided by his Chinese engineers, and informed of the secret of gunpowder, they were unable to withstand the attacks of Zingis. From the Caspian to the Indus, his Moguls ruined a tract of many hundred miles, which was adorned with the habitations and labors of mankind; so that five centuries have not been sufficient to repair the ravages of four years. Zingis died in the fulness of years, A.D. 1227, leaving his empire to successors of his own race and family. In the sixty-eight years of the first four of these, the Moguls subdued almost all Asia, and a large portion of Europe. Thus, a power was prepared eastward of the Euphrates, which, A.D. 1258, under Holagou, the grandson of Zingis, by the storm and capture of Bagdad, and the territory of its jurisdiction, extended to the Euphrates; the east of which the stream of Mogul hostility was driven back from the south by the Mamelucs of Egypt. Hence, it was a prepared power “bounded by the great river Euphrates.”

6. Loosing of the Second Angel

When the Mogul-power suppressed the Caliphate, which had been held by the race of Abbas above five hundred years, it spread beyond the Tigris and Euphrates, pillaged Aleppo and Damascus, and threatened to join the Franks in the deliverance of Jerusalem. Egypt would have been lost had it been only defended by natives. But the Mamelucs were now established there; and they were equal in valor and superior in discipline to the Moguls. These were heading in the wrong direction. Their mission was towards Constantinople and the west. It was necessary, therefore, that they should be turned thitherward. Hence, the Mamelucs were stirred up to withstand them by their invasion of the south. They met them in many a well fought field, and at length drove them to the east of the Euphrates.

But they could not be “bound” there, for the time had come for the second angel to be loosed. The Mogul inundation overflowed with resistless violence the Kingdom of Armenia, which was possessed by the daemonial worshippers of idols; and then crossing westward into the upper region watered by “the great river Euphrates,” they flooded the Kingdom of Anatolia, which was possessed by the Turkish sultans of Iconium. These opposed some resistance to the Mogul arms, till Azzadin sought refuge in Constantinople, and his feeble successors, the last of the Seljukian dynasty, were finally extirpated by the Mogul Khans of Persia, A.D. 1272.

No sooner had Octai, one of the four sons of Zingis subverted the northern empire of China, than he resolved to visit with his arms the most remote countries of the west. Fifteen hundred thousand Moguls and Tartars were inscribed on the military roll. A third of these were intrusted to his nephew, Batou, the son of Tuli, who reigned over his father’s conquests to the north of the Caspian; and such was the ardor of his innumerable cavalry, that in less than six years they had measured a line of ninety degrees of longitude, a fourth of the circumference of the globe. They ravaged with equal fury the countries they hoped to possess, and those they were hastening to leave. They reduced the Russians to a servitude of two hundred years; made a deadly, though transient, inroad into the heart of catholic Poland; and penetrated as far as the borders of Germany. They approached the shores of the Baltic; and in the battle of Lignitz, filled nine sacks with the right ears of the slain. From this extreme point of their march westward, they invaded Hungary with five hundred thousand horse. The whole country north of the Danube was lost in a day, and depopulated in a summer. Of all the cities and fortresses of daemonial and idol worshipping Hungary, three alone survived this Mogul-Tartar invasion.

The Latin world was darkened by this cloud of second-angel hostility to the idolators of the west; and the remote nations of the Baltic and the ocean trembled at the noise of their approach. Since the invasion of the Arabs in the eighth century, Europe had never been exposed to a similar calamity. The Roman high priest of the daemonials attempted to appease and convert to his idolatry these invincible pagans by a mission of Franciscan and Dominican friars; but “His Holiness” was astonished by the reply of the Khan, that the sons of God and of Zingis were invested with a divine power to subdue and extirpate the nations; and that the pope would be involved in the universal destruction unless he visited in person, and as a suppliant, the royal horde. This was apocalyptically true; they were indeed so invested. Their mission was divine. They were one of the four Euphratean angel-powers, “invested with divine power” against the catholic world. Vengeance upon this “Sodom and Egypt, spiritually so called” (ch. 11:8)—was heaven’s decree; and the invincible sons of Zingis were the ministers of its wrath.

In this shipwreck of nations, Constantinople and the Greek empire, then divided between the Greeks and Latins, escaped surprisingly. Had the sons of Zingis undertaken the siege of the capital, it must have yielded to the common fate. In a second expedition, death arrested the Khan in full march to attack Constantinople. His brother Borga, however, was diverted from the Byzantine war which he had carried into Bulgaria and Thrace by an alliance with the Mamelukes against the Moguls of Persia. In the reign of Michael Palaeologus, the Seljukian sultan, who had fled to Constantinople, was released from his exile among the Greeks. The first terror of the arms of the Monguls secured, rather than disturbed, the peace of the Roman Asia. The Seljukian sultans of Iconium, were a barrier, which, when overthrown exposed the defencelessness of the Greeks. Holagou, the grandson of Zingis, threatened to march to Constantinople at the head of 400,000 men. The news of this spread terror among the idolators of Nice, where the doleful chant of a procession in honor of some of their saints, “from the fury of the Tartars, good Lord, deliver us!” scattered the belief of an actual assault and massacre; and it was some hours before the city could be delivered from this imaginary foe. But the ambition of Holagou and his successors was diverted by war with the Moslems of Bagdad and Syria, which disposed them to unite with the Greeks and Franks. They offered the Seljukian kingdom of Anatolia to an Armenian vassal, whose emirs all confessed the supremacy of the Mogul Khans of Persia. The death of Cazan, one of the greatest and most accomplished princes of the house of Zingis, terminated their salutary control A.D. 1304; and the decline of the Moguls gave free scope to the rise and progress of the OTTOMAN EMPIRE, or Fourth Euphratean Angel-power.

7. The Second Interval

On the dissolution of the Carizmian power by the Moguls, some of the Turkman chiefs engaged in the service of Aladdin, the sultan of Iconium; and among these were the obscure fathers of the Ottoman line. They had formerly pitched their tents near the southern banks of the Oxus. At the head of a Carizmian force, Soliman Shah was drowned in the passage of the Euphrates. His son Orthogrul became a soldier of Aladdin. He was the father of Othman. The Seljukian dynasty was no more; and the decline of the Mogul Khans soon freed him from the control of a superior.

He was situate on the verge of the Greek empire, which he first invaded, A.D. 1299. The conquest of Prusa by his son Orchan, A.D. 1326, may be dated as the true aera of the Ottoman power. The Seljukian coin was changed for the name and impression of the new dynasty. Orchan subdued all Bithynia to the shores of the Bosphorus and Hellespont; and A.D. 1341, crossed for the first time into Europe, where they established themselves in the province of Thrace, A.D. 1353. They soon subdued the whole province from the Hellespont to Mount Haemus, and the verge of Constantinople. Adrianople was now their capital; and at this fatal hour, the Greeks were surrounded, both in Asia and Europe, by the arms of the same hostile monarchy. But Amurath I. postponed for a while this easy conquest; and turned his arms against the Slavonians between the Danube and the Adriatic.

His son Bajazet I, subdued his brother emirs from the Euphrates to the Danube, and after the conquest of Iconium, the ancient kingdom of the Seljukians was revived in the Ottoman dynasty. He now accepted the patent of sultan from the caliphs who served in Egypt under the yoke of the Mamelukes: a last and frivolous homage yielded by force to opinion, by the Turkish conquerors to the Abbassides, and the successors of the Arabian prophet. Bajazet's ambition was inflamed by the obligation of deserving the august title; and he turned his arms against Hungary, the perpetual theatre of Turkish victories and defeats. In the battle of Nicopolis, he defeated a confederate army of 100,000 catholic idol worshippers, who had proudly boasted that if the sky should fall, they could uphold it on their lances. In the pride of victory, Bajazet threatened to subdue Germany and Italy; and that he would feed his horse with the bushel of oats on the altar of St. Peter at Rome.

The Roman world was now contracted to a corner of Thrace, between the Propontis and the Black Sea, about fifty miles in length and thirty in breadth. At length the ambition of the victorious sultan pointed to the conquest of Constantinople, which he claimed as his own. A refusal to surrender caused it to be more closely pressed by war and famine; and the savage would have devoured his prey, if, in the fatal moment, he had not been overthrown by another savage stronger than himself, A.D. 1402; an event that delayed the fall of Constantinople about fifty years.

8. Preparation of the Third Angel

The conquest and monarchy of the world was the first object of the ambition of Timour or TAMERLANE. He was born forty miles to the south of Samarcand in the fruitful territory of Cash, of which his fathers were the hereditary chiefs, as well as of a myriad or toman of ten thousand horse.

In the twenty-fifth year of his age he stood forth as the deliverer of his country: but not being duly supported, he retreated from the hills of Samarcand to the desert with only sixty horsemen. They were overtaken by a thousand foes, whom he repulsed with incredible slaughter, and they were forced to exclaim, "Timour is a wonderful man; fortune and the divine favour are with him."

At the age of thirty-four, after various adventures, he was invested in a general diet with imperial command over Zagatai and the East, a dominion five hundred miles in length and breadth. But this did not satisfy him; for Timour aspired to the dominion of the world; and before his death, Zagatai was only one of the twenty-seven crowns which he had placed upon his head.

In the year 1380, he invaded the kingdoms of Persia; and the whole course of the Tigris and Euphrates, from the mouth to the sources of these rivers, was reduced to his obedience. He extended his conquests eastward into Hindostan, and made his triumphal entry into Delhi, the capital. While on the banks of the Ganges he was informed of the revolt of the catholics in Georgia and Anatolia, and of the ambitious designs of Bajazet, the Ottoman sultan. He was now sixty-three years of age, and unimpaired by his innumerable fatigues, which had subjected the greatest part of Asia to his laws. The Mogul and Ottoman conquests now touched each other in the neighbourhood of Erzeroum and the Euphrates, by which Timour's dominion was "bound." Of these ambitious monarchs, Timour was impatient of an equal, and Bajazet was ignorant of a superior. A quarrel was soon excited between them that could only be composed by blood. "Dost thou not know," said Timour to the sultan, "that the greatest part of Asia is subject to our arms and laws? That our invincible forces extend from one sea to the other? That the potentates of the earth form a line before our gate? And that we have compelled fortune herself to watch over the prosperity of our empire? What is the foundation of thine insolence and folly? Thou hast fought some battles in the woods of Anatolia; contemptible trophies! Thou hast obtained some victories over the christians of Europe; thy sword was blessed by the apostle of God; and thy obedience to the precept of the Koran, in waging war against the infidels, is the sole consideration that prevents us from destroying thy country, the frontier and bulwark of the Moslem world. Be wise in time; reflect; repent, and avert the thunder of our vengeance, which is yet suspended over thy head. Thou art no more than a pismire; why wilt thou seek to provoke the elephants? Alas! they will trample thee under their feet."

Bajazet was deeply stung, and in his replies poured forth the indignation of his soul. His rage was ungovernable. He reproached TIMOUR as the thief and rebel of the desert, and declared that he had never triumphed unless by his own perfidy and the vices of his foe. "Thine armies are innumerable;" said he, "be they so: but what are the arrows of the flying Tartar against the scymitar and battle-axes of my firm and invincible janizaries? I will guard the princes that have implored my protection: seek them in my tents. The cities of Arzingan and Erzeroum are mine; and unless the tribute be duly paid, I will demand the arrears under the walls of Tauris and Sultania."

After enjoying some tranquil months of Samarcand, Timour proclaimed a new expedition of seven years into the western countries of Asia. Complaints and menaces fermented two years before the final explosion; and though the political quarrel was embittered by private and personal resentment, yet in his first expedition, Timour was satisfied with the destruction of Sebaste, a strong city on the borders of Anatolia; and revenged the indiscretion of Bajazet on the garrison of four thousand Armenians, who were buried alive for their fidelity. As a mussulman, he seemed to respect the pious occupation of the Ottoman, who was still engaged in the blockade of Constantinople; and after this salutary lesson, the Mogul conqueror checked his pursuit, and turned aside to the invasion of Syria and Egypt, A.D. 1400. Thus was prepared the third Euphratean angel-power. The time was fast approaching for it to be loosed, that it might superadd its vengeance upon "the worshippers of the daemonials and idols" of the catholic church, and prevent the fall of their eastern empire by the arms of the Ottoman sultan, until the full expiration of the 391 years and 30 days.

9. The Loosing of the Third Angel

The sack of Aleppo and Damascus signalized the loosing of the Timour-Mogul power from its Euphratean boundary. In a peaceful conference with a doctor of Mohammedan law, he said: "You see me here a poor, lame, decrepit mortal. Yet by my arm has the Almighty been pleased to subdue the kingdoms of Iran, Touran, and the Indies. I am not a man of blood; and God is my witness, that in all my wars I have never been the aggressor, and that my enemies have always been the authors of their own calamities." During this peaceful utterance, the streets of Aleppo streamed with blood, and re-echoed with the cries of mothers and children, and the shrieks of violated females; and the cruelty of his Moguls was enforced by the peremptory command of producing an adequate number of heads, which, according to his custom, were curiously piled in columns and pyramids. After a period of seven centuries, Damascus was reduced to ashes; and in his return to the Euphrates, he delivered Aleppo to the flames. Bagdad shared the same fate, and upon its ruins he erected a pyramid of ninety thousand heads. He again visited Georgia; and proclaimed his resolution of marching against the Ottoman emperor, whom he styled, the Kaissar of Roum the Caesar of the Romans. Conscious of the importance of the war he collected his forces from every province—"myriads of myriads"—variously estimated at from 800,000 to 1,600,000 men.

During the diversion of the Mogul arms into Syria, Bajazet had two years to collect his "myriads" for the encounter. John, doubtless, in vision, saw the myriads of myriads, which the Moguls counted by tomans of ten thousand each, collected by these rival destroyers of mankind for the slaughter upon the field of Angora; but without "the fire hyacinth and sulphur," which had not been introduced into Asiatic field warfare. Timour himself fixes the Ottoman army at 400,000 men, horse and foot. He invested Angora, A.D. 1402, in the heart of the Ottoman kingdom, which became the scene of a memorable battle, which has immortalized the glory of Timour and the shame of Bajazet. For this signal victory, the Mogul was indebted to the rapid evolutions of his numerous "cavalry," skillfully worked by a master hand. The genius of Bajazet sank under a stronger ascendant, and the unfaithfulness of his troops. The fleetest of his horses could not place him in safety. He was pursued, and taken; and after his capture, and the defeat of the Ottoman powers, the kingdom of Anatolia submitted to Timour. The Mogul squadrons were only stopped by the waves of the Propontis. Smyrna was taken by storm; and the trunkless heads of the daemional worshippers were launched from the engines of assault.

From the Irtish and Volga to the Persian gulph, and from the Ganges to Damascus and the Archipelago, Asia was in the hands of Timour; his armies were invincible, and his ambition boundless. He touched the utmost verge of the land; but an insuperable, though narrow, sea rolled between the two continents of Europe and Asia; “and the lord of so many tomans, or ‘myriads,’ of horse, was not master of a single galley.” He invested Soliman, the son of Bajazet, with the kingdom of Thrace. The Greek emperor paid the same tribute to him as he had to Bajazet, and took an oath of allegiance to “the king of the world.” The Ottoman sultan died in captivity beyond the Euphrates. The Ottoman power seemed ruined, or fatally and finally merged in the third angel-power. It was in abeyance beyond “the great river Euphrates,” where it was “bound” with but little prospect of being revived. Before it could reappear, the power of the Great Mogul must be broken, or rolled back within its natural limits. When released from this restraint, it would be no longer “bound by the great river Euphrates” but loosed for the work that still remained to be done in “the hour, day, month, and year.”

Timour returned in triumph to Samarcand, where for two months he ceased to exercise his power. He considered these the only happy period of his life. But he was soon awakened to the career of government and war. But the angel of death met him on his march to China and terminated his career in the seventieth year of his age, A.D. 1405 and thirty-five years after ascending the throne of Zagatai. The race of Timour was perpetuated in the Great Moguls of Delhi, whose empire has been dissolved, and their kingdoms possessed by the “Empress of India” and “Queen” of the remote islands of the northern sea—VICTORIA GUELPH.

10. Third Interval, in which the Preparation of the Fourth Angel is Completed

It would be well for the fame of fortunate destroyers of their species, if they would remember and be admonished by the remark of Ahab to Benhadad, king of Syria: “Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off.” The sultan Bajazet belonged to the numerous class of military vain boasters, which is not, while we write, even now extinct. We have seen, that A.D. 1402, Constantinople and the Greek empire, were on the verge of destruction at his hand. The really formidable chivalry of the west had intervened to save them, but had been broken in the battle of Nicopolis. The Ottoman sultan saw no power to make him afraid; and supposing himself master of the situation, he thus addressed the Dragon-emperor: “Our invincible scymitar has reduced almost all Asia (Minor) and many and large countries in Europe (“the Rest of the Men”) excepting only the city of Constantinople; resign that city, or tremble for thyself and thine unhappy people.” The killing of “the third of the men” thus seemed imminent full half a century before the prophetic period of 391 years and 30 days had elapsed that fixed it. But the eyes of the Eternal Spirit are always upon the truth. He never slumbers nor sleeps; so that all the boastful Bajazets in creation can neither expedite nor delay what he has decreed. As we have seen, he prepared the TIMOUR-MONGUL angel power to make vain the boasts of the Ottoman sultan, and to delay the catastrophe of the vision until the expiration of the period of the time appointed. Thus, “the savage,” as Gibbon says, “was forced to relinquish his prey by a stronger savage than himself; and by the victory of Tamerlane the fall of Constantinople was delayed about fifty years.”

Bajazet died in captivity, A.D. 1403; but the Ottoman Dynasty did not expire with him. “The massy trunk was bent to the ground, but no sooner did the hurricane pass away, than it again rose with fresh vigor and more lively vegetation.” When Timour, in every sense, had evacuated Anatolia, he left the cities without a palace, a treasure, or a king. The open country was overspread with hordes of shepherds and robbers of Tartar and Turkman origin; the recent conquests of Bajazet were restored to the emirs; and his five sons seemed eager, by their civil discord, to consume the remnant of their patrimony. There was as yet no fourth angel-power to be loosed. Its preparation, so far as it had progressed during the second interval, was interrupted, with little prospect of renewal and completion.

But the events of the ensuing eighteen years changed the face of affairs. This was a period of preparation, in which was completed the development of the fourth Euphratean angel-power. It was a period of war between the sons of Bajazet, which resulted in the destruction of them all, except Mohammed I. This prince, before his father’s captivity, had been intrusted with the government of Amasia, and the Turkish frontier. In his rapid career, Timour overlooked this obscure angle of Anatolia, “bounded by” Georgia on the east, the Greek kingdom of Trebisonde on the west, and the “great river Euphrates” on the southwest; where Mohammed, without provoking the conqueror, maintained his silent independence. He obtained Anatolia by treaty, and Thrace by arms. The last eight years of his reign were employed in banishing the vices of civil discord, and restoring on a firmer basis the fabric of the Ottoman monarchy.

He was succeeded by his son Amurath II., who, by the aid of the Genoese, captured Adrianople, and so reunited the Ottoman empire, A.D. 1421.

11. Loosing of the Fourth Angel

The conquest of Adrianople was followed in the ensuing spring, A.D. 1422, by the siege of Constantinople. The religious merit of subduing the City of the Caesars, attracted from Asia a crowd of volunteers, who aspired to the crown of martyrdom. It was besieged over two months by 200,000 Turks; and “old resources of defence,” says Gibbon, “were opposed to the new engines of attack”—“the horses in the vision.” The credulity of “the worshippers of the daemonials and idols” beheld the Virgin Mary, in a violet garment walking on the rampart, and animating their courage. But their time for political death (“when Ephraim offended in Baal, he died,” i.e. a political death) had not quite arrived. It was not to their Daemorial Mother of God, nor to their own courage, that they owed their deliverance, at this time; but to the recall of Amurath by a domestic revolt, which demanded the presence of his arms for its suppression. When this was extinguished, he led his janizaries to new conquests in Europe and Asia; a diversion which obtained for the Byzantine empire a servile and precarious respite of thirty years.

Mohammed II (1430–1481) overthrew the eastern Roman Empire when he successfully captured Constantinople. The strongly defended city resisted attack for some time, but on May 29 a general assault was made, and the city was carried by storm. Turkish artillery (as required by The Apocalypse as expounded by J. Thomas) played an important part in the overthrow. The illustration on p. 159 is an artist’s impression of the attack. He has correctly given prominence to the artillery used by the Turks, referred to in Scripture and also by Gibbon in Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire.

12. “The Fire, the Smoke, and the Sulphur”

“By these three,” says John, “was the third of the men killed, by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the sulphur, which burst forth out of the mouths of” the horses. The time had now arrived, which John saw illustrated in the vision by what Gibbon styles, “the new engines of attack.” When John was in Patmos, there was no name in any of the languages of mankind by which to designate these “new engines.” They were represented to John by appearances and effects; as Mexicans might have done to Montezuma when they first saw a horse with a rider and a gun trailing after him, suddenly wheeling into position with their tails towards him, and fire, smoke, and sulphur bursting forth from the gun’s mouth, with a roaring noise, and hurling a ball into their midst. John was taught to call these new engines “horses,” a name analogous to what would be afterwards bestowed upon them when they should come into use—horse-artillery. I would here add to what I have already said on the breasts of the riders. These had “fiery hyacinthine, and sulphurous breasts.” Not only do the “breasts” represent the breast-works upon which exploding horses would be mounted, but also the breasts of the riders themselves, before which would be planted carbines, which when fired by cavalry in line, would give a fiery hyacinthine, and sulphurous smell and appearance to their breasts.

An artist’s impression of the taking of Constantinople, 1453. Gibbon’s history gives prominence to the artillery used by the Turks, and The Apocalypse states: “By these was the third part (eastern division of the Roman Empire) killed (politically), by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the brimstone, which issued out of their mouths” (Rev. 9:18).

Having narrated the failure of Amurath’s attack upon Constantinople, Mr. Gibbon calls the attention of the reader to the invention of gunpowder and balls as “the powers” by which “the new engines” became effective. He remarks, that the only hope of salvation for the Greek empire, and the adjacent kingdoms, would have been some more powerful weapon, some discovery in the art of war, that would give them a decisive superiority over their Turkish foes. Such a weapon was in their hands, and such a discovery had been made at this critical period of their fate. The chemists of China or Europe, had found that a mixture of saltpetre, sulphur, and charcoal, produces, with a spark of fire, a tremendous explosion or bursting forth—ekporeusis. It was soon observed that if the expansive force were compressed in a strong tube, a ball of stone or iron “heads,” might be expelled with irresistible and destructive velocity. The precise aera of the invention and application of gunpowder is involved in doubtful traditions and equivocal language; yet we may clearly discern, that it was known before the middle of the fourteenth century; and that before the end of the same, the use of artillery in battles and sieges, by sea and land, was familiar to several states. But it was found impossible to circumscribe the secret within the pale of catholic idolatry; it was disclosed to the Turks by the treachery of apostates to Moslemism and the selfish policy of rivals; and the sultans of the fourth angel-power had the sense to adopt, and wealth to reward, the talents of a catholic engineer. It was probably by the hands of the Genoese that Amurath’s cannon was cast and directed at the siege of Constantinople. The first attempt was indeed unsuccessful; it could not be otherwise, the time appointed for “killing the third” being yet distant upwards of thirty years.

13. The Killing of the Third

Amurath II was succeeded, A.D. 1451, by his son Mohammed II., styled by Gibbon, “the Great Destroyer.” His passions were at once furious and inexorable. In the palace, as in the field, a torrent of blood was spilt on the slightest provocation. Constantinople has sealed his glory, and placed him among “the basest of men” whom the Eternal Spirit “sets up” to fulfil his will. Under his command the Ottoman “myriads” were always more numerous than their enemies; “yet,” says the historian, “their progress was bounded by the Euphrates and the Adriatic.”

Mohammed II., though the proudest of men, could stoop from ambition to the basest arts of dissimulation and deceit. Peace was on his lips, while war was in his heart; and he incessantly sighed for the possession of Constantinople. The indiscretion of the Greeks afforded the first pretence of a fatal rupture. Instead of laboring to be forgotten, they continually annoyed him with their demands, until patience being exhausted, his vizir addressed them in the following strain: “Ye foolish and miserable Romans, we know your devices; and ye are ignorant of your own danger. The scrupulous Amurath is no more; his throne is occupied by a young conqueror, whom no laws can bind and no obstacles can resist; and, if you escape from his hands, give praise to the divine clemency which yet delays the chastisement of your sins. Why do you seek to affright us by vain and indirect menaces? Release the fugitive, Orchan; crown him sultan of Romania; call the Hungarians from beyond the Danube; arm against us the nations of the west; and be assured that you will only provoke and precipitate your ruin.”

Hostile in mind, Mohammed proceeded to build a fortress on the Bosphorus, about five miles from the city, to command the strait and close the Black Sea. This was, in effect, commencing the siege. He began this work A.D. 1452, which he pressed and directed with indefatigable ardor, and quickening the diligence of the workmen with the eye of a despot, whose smile was the hope of fortune, and his frown the messenger of death. In vain did Constantine, the last of the Greek emperors of the Dragon power, try to divert him from the work. The sultan was implacable, and listened with joy to all complaints, which only afforded him occasions for treachery and violence. At length the gates of the city were closed, and a last message forwarded to the sultan: “Since neither oaths, nor treaty, nor submission, can secure peace, pursue,” said the emperor, “your impious warfare. My trust is in God alone: if it should please him to mollify your heart, I shall rejoice in the happy change; if he delivers the city into your hands, I submit without a murmur to his holy will. But, until the Judge of the earth shall pronounce between us, it is my duty to live and die in the defence of my people.” Constantine did not know, and there was no one able to show him, that the Judge of the earth had recorded the decree against him over thirteen hundred and fifty years, and that that decree was death to “the third” of which he was the imperial head. The sultan’s answer was hostile and decisive; and, having finished his fortress, he prepared to besiege the city in the ensuing spring of A.D. 1453.

The conquest of the City of Caesar seemed to haunt him day and night. About the second watch, he started from his bed, and commanded the instant attendance of his prime vizir. This secret friend of the idolators, surnamed Gabour Ortachi, or foster-brother of the infidels, alarmed at the summons, hastened with a guilty conscience to the palace with a slight tribute of gold. “It is not my wish,” said the sultan, “to resume my gifts, but rather to heap and multiply them upon thy head. In my turn, I ask a present far more valuable and important—CONSTANTINOPLE.” As soon as the vizir had recovered from his surprise, “The same God,” said he, “who has already given thee so large a portion of the Roman empire, will not deny the remnant and the capital. His providence and thy power assure thy success; and myself, with the rest of thy faithful slaves, will sacrifice our lives and fortunes.” “Lala,” continued the Sultan, “do you see this pillow? All the night, in my agitation, I have pulled it on one side and on the other; I have risen from my bed; again have I lain down, yet sleep has not visited these weary eyes. Beware of the gold and silver of the Romans. In arms we are superior; and, with the aid of God, and the prayers of the prophet, we shall speedily become masters of Constantinople.”

Mohammed's Fortress over the Bosphorus. Built in July 1452, it played a decisive part in the conquest of Constantinople. This brought political "death" to the Eastern Third.

His artillery surpassed whatever had yet appeared in the world. "Am I," said the sultan to a founder of cannon, who had deserted from the Greeks, "able to cast a cannon capable of throwing a ball or stone of sufficient size to batter the walls of Constantinople?" "I am not ignorant of their strength," replied the artist; "but were they more solid than those of Babylon, I could oppose an engine of superior power: the position and management of that engine must be left to your engineers." At the end of three months, Urban produced a piece of brass ordnance of stupendous and almost incredible magnitude, capable of projecting a stone bullet weighing six hundred pounds. The explosion was felt or heard in a circuit of a hundred furlongs; the ball, by the force of gunpowder—"the fire, the smoke, and the sulphur"—was driven above a mile; and, on the spot where it fell, it buried itself a fathom deep in the ground. For the conveyance of this destructive engine, a carriage-frame of thirty waggons, linked together, was drawn by a team of sixty oxen; two hundred men on both sides were stationed to poise or support the rolling weight; two hundred and fifty pioneers marched before to smooth the way and repair the bridges; and near two months were employed in transporting it one hundred and fifty miles.

In the beginning of the spring, the Turkish vanguard swept the towns and villages as far as the gates of the capital: all who submitted were spared and protected; whatever presumed to resist was exterminated with fire and sword. The whole mass of the Turkish "myriads" are estimated at two hundred and fifty-eight thousand. Constantinople was still peopled with more than a hundred thousand inhabitants; but, of all these, only four thousand nine hundred and seventy were found able and willing to defend the city. These were increased by two thousand foreigners, under John Justiniani, a Genoese. These seven or eight thousand soldiers were all that could be mustered to defend Constantinople, a city of thirteen or sixteen miles circuit, against the fourth angel-power, to which Europe and Asia were open, but closed against the Greeks.

The siege began April 6, A.D. 1453, and lasted fifty-three days. The Propontis and the Harbor protected it on two sides, while the land side was defended by a double wall, and a ditch one hundred feet deep and four English miles in length. Against this the fourth angel-power directed its chief attack. "The incessant volleys of lances and arrows were accompanied," says Gibbon, "with the smoke, and the sound, and the fire, of musketry and cannon. Their small arms discharged at the same time either five or even ten, balls of lead, of the size of a walnut; and, according to the closeness of the ranks and the force of the powder, several breastplates and bodies were transpierced by the same shot." This is quite apocalyptic. John, in vision, saw this described by Gibbon. John also speaks of "the smoke," and "the fire," and "the sound," or "bursting forth" roaringly; for "the horses had heads of lions, and out of their mouths burst forth fire, and smoke, and sulphur." Gibbon likewise calls our attention to the breasts of them who handled "the horses of the vision," or "sat upon them," in speaking of the musketry as well as the cannon. He connects the smoke, and the fire, and the sound, with their breasts, in speaking of their musketry; for it need not be proved that, in a line of musketry discharging its pieces, a breastline or work of small arms is presented to the observer, which, in activity, are, as John says, "fiery, and hyacinthine, and sulphurous breasts." Gibbon also calls our attention to the apocalyptic "heads." "They had heads" says John, "and with them they do hurt." A dull, stupid, round-headed fellow is often styled a bullet-head. The Spirit termed balls and bullets in the vision "heads," hissing like serpents from the lion-mouths of the pieces; and as Gibbon says, illustratively of the "hurt," that "they transpierced breastplates and bodies" of the Daemonial Virgin's troops, the idolatrous Greeks. Lastly, Gibbon is particular to explain to us what John terms "their powers." Projectiles were not new things at this siege; but the powers by which they were made to hurt were new. He says it was by "the force of the powder" that the bulletheads, or shot, transpierced the bodies. Here were two powers or forces—the force of the powder, and the force of the shot; the one the propelling power, and the other the striking power; and both these powers, Gibbon says, were in the musketry and the cannon; and John says the same thing in other words:—“their powers,” says he, “are in their mouths and in their tails; FOR their tails are like to serpents, having heads, and with them (the heads) they do hurt.” The serpent hiss of these heads is distinctly heard while they are whizzing through the air in their course from the mouth of the piece to their destination.

Now, if Gibbon was so particular to narrate these details to his contemporaries, who were as familiar with them in every day practice as himself, need we wonder that the Spirit should give them great prominence in the vision? Gibbon could no more dispense with his dissertation on gunpowder, musketry, and cannon, in treating of the fall of the Roman empire, than could the Spirit in representing the same event. And for this reason: what Gibbon styles “the new engines of attack” were the instrumental cause of that fall; and it was the indispensable duty of an accurate and faithful historian to dwell upon the remarkable fact, that Constantinople was the chief city taken, and the Roman the first empire subverted by the smoke, and the sound, and the fire, and the balls, of musketry and cannon. This testimony of history is in harmony with the testimony of the Omniscient Spirit, who, “by his servant John,” says: “By these three was the third of the men killed, by the fire, and by the smoke, and by the sulphur, which burst forth of out their mouths.” If it had not been for this “force of powder,” “the third of the men” would not have been killed at the time appointed—the end of “the hour and day and month and year.” By the aid of “the powers” of powder and shot, it took the Ottoman angel-power fifty-three days to take the city and overthrow the empire, so as to execute the work in the appointed limit; but without these it would have taken a much longer time, or have resulted in failure as before. The third of the men, then, was emphatically “killed” by gunpowder—“by the fire, by the smoke, and by the sulphur bursting forth out of” the cannons’ “mouths;” for, without this “force of powder,” shot, cannon, and musketry, would have been perfectly harmless. Such is the strict accord between prophecy and history. Hence, “the vision is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure.”

“The great cannon of Mohammed,” says Gibbon, “has been separately noticed—an important and visible object in the history of the times; but that enormous engine was flanked by two fellows almost of equal magnitude. The long order of the Turkish artillery was pointed against the walls; fourteen batteries thundered at once on the most accessible places; and of one of these it is ambiguously expressed, that it was mounted with one hundred and fifty guns, or that it discharged one hundred and fifty bullets, or “heads.” The great cannon could only be loaded and fired seven times in one day and at length burst, destroying several engaged in working it.

The resistance of the idolators was so obstinate and surprising that the perserverance of Mohammed was fatigued, and he began to meditate a retreat. The reduction of the city appeared to be hopeless, unless a double attack could be made from the harbor as well as from the land. This he at length effected. He constructed a floating battery, upon which he planted one of his largest cannon. The fire of the Greeks was controlled and silenced by the superior fire of the Turks; and, after a siege of forty days, the fate of Constantinople could no longer be averted. The fortifications, which had stood for ages against hostile violence, were dismantled on all sides by the Ottoman cannon; many breaches were opened, and four towers had been levelled with the ground. The crisis for the assault had arrived; but, wishing to spare the blood of his soldiers, he invited the worshippers of canonized immortal souls and idols to submission with circumcision or tribute; but if they preferred still to resist, death was to be their fate. It was heaven’s decree that they should be killed. The emperor of the Greeks determined to abide the last extremities of war. Several days were employed in preparations for the assault; but singularly enough, Mohammed did not trust himself to appoint the day when it should be made. He had recourse to his favorite science of astrology, that it might fix for him the day. He thus surrendered himself to “fate;” and that fate had already decreed that the Roman Empire of the East should fall at the end of 391 years and 30 days. However he might arrive at the conclusion by the principles of his science, I am not astrologer enough to tell. I doubt not but that, as in the case of Saul and the witch of Endor, the Spirit made use of his infatuation to determine him to do at the right moment what he had, over thirteen centuries before, marked out for the fourth Euphratean angelpower to accomplish. Be this as it may, Mohammed's astrology ordered him to make the assault on the twenty-ninth of May, as the fortunate and fatal day.

All was depression and abject superstition within the city. The "celestial image of the Virgin" was paraded in solemn procession; but their "divine patroness" was deaf to their entreaties. This, their daemonialism and idolatry, had brought upon them the calamities they endured. The shouts of the myriads without their walls proclaimed the truth by which they were condemned—"God is God! there is but one God!" and this one God it was, who, by all the four Euphratean angelpowers, was vindicating his Unity against the more than pagan multitude of the gods and goddesses of the catholic aerial. The morning of May 29, 1453, at length dawned. The myriads pressed forward to the breach, while the Ottoman artillery thundered from all sides; and the camp and city, the Greeks and the Turks, were involved in a cloud of smoke, which could only be dispelled by the deliverance or destruction of the Roman empire. The Turks were a hundred times more numerous than the idolators. The double walls were reduced by cannon to a heap of ruins; and their valiant emperor had fallen in the fight, and lay buried under a mountain of the slain. After his death, resistance and order vanished; the Greeks fled towards the city; and, in the heat of the pursuit, two thousand worshippers of the Virgin fell beneath the scymitars of the victorious Turks; and, thenceforth Constantinople became the capital of the Fourth Euphratean angel power. Thus was killed the Eastern Roman Third of the men, at the full end of "the hour, and day, and month and year," or 391 years and 30 days from the perfected preparation of the first angel-power.

The Ottoman Turks extended their conquests into Europe bringing political "death" to the Eastern Roman Empire.

CHAPTER 10

III—THE LITTLE OPEN SCROLL

Fourth Section of the Seventh Seal

"The Great Day of Ail-Shaddai"

Summary

The son of Man similitude, seen by John originally, in the midst of the seven lightstands, reappears in this chapter. As the Lamb that had been slain, he saw him take the seven-sealed scroll then unrolled, and which no man could open or "see" (ch. v. 6, 7); but in this chapter, as the Lion of the Tribe of Judah, who had prevailed to unroll the scroll, he sees him with a little scroll in his hand unrolled, or opened. He stands with his right foot upon the sea of the ten-horned dominion; and his left on the earth of the two-horned dragon power; burning with devouring fire: and roaring with the voice of a lion in the utterances of seven thunders; and in the annunciation, that there should be, chronically, no more time: but that in the days of the sounding of the seventh angel, or third woe, the mystery of the Deity as he had declared the good news to his servants the prophets, should be finished.

John, as a representative of his constituents, digests the little open scroll of seventh vial judgments. He is embittered in the execution of them, but sweetened by the results; for he executes on peoples, nations, tongues, and kings, the judgments written; and afterwards rejoices in “victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name.” See “Tabular Analysis,” Vol. 2 pp. 120–124

Apoc. 10

1. And I saw another powerful angel descending out of the heaven, having been clothed with a cloud, and the rainbow upon the head, and his face as the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire.

2. And he had in his hand a little scroll which had been opened, and he placed his right foot upon the sea, and the left upon the earth, and he cried with a loud voice like as a lion roars: and when he cried, the seven thunders uttered their voices. 4. And when the seven thunders uttered their voices, I was about to write: and I heard a voice out of the heaven, saying, to me, Seal, the things which the seven thunders uttered, and write them not.

5. And the angel whom I saw standing upon the sea, and upon the earth, lifted up his hand to the heaven, and swore by him who lives for the aions of the aions, who created the heaven and the things in it, and the earth and the things in it, and the sea and the things in it, That the time shall not be longer: but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel when he shall sound, the mystery of the Deity shall also be finished, as he hath announced the glad tidings to his servants the prophets.

8. And the voice which I heard out of the heaven was again speaking with me, and saying, Go, take the little scroll which has been opened in the hand of the angel who stands upon the sea, and upon the earth. 9. And I went to the angel, saying to him, Give to me the little scroll. And he saith to me, take and eat it up; and it shall imbitter thy belly, but in thy mouth it shall be sweet as honey.

10. And I took the little scroll out of the hand of the angel, and I ate it up; and it was in my mouth as honey, sweet: and when I had eaten it, my belly was imbittered.

11. And he saith to me, Thou must again prophesy against many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings.

Exposition

The political death of the eastern Roman empire, and the transfer of its capital to the Ottoman Dynasty, interrupts the continuity of apocalyptic prophecy, as it did that of history. Having brought us down to the death of “the third,” the historian informs us of the grief and terror of “the rest of the men who were not killed by the plagues of the second woe; and who changed not from the worship of the daemonials and idols;” and then bidding an everlasting farewell to the Greeks, carries the reader back over four hundred years to the consideration of the state of Rome, A.D. 1000.

Not so, however, with the apocalyptic prophecy. It does not carry us back in this tenth chapter. It leaves the Euphratean Ottoman angelpower in possession of the Dragon throne; and takes no further notice of it for upwards of three hundred and sixty years. At the end of this period, it again invites our attention to “the great river Euphrates”—to the power so named, because it was the fourth angel “bound by the great river Euphrates,” as it is bounded eastwardly at this day. Our attention is called to it in ch. 16:12, as to a sign in the heavens of the coming of the Son of Man; in other words, as to the sign of the approaching descent of the powerful angel out of the heaven, having the rainbow upon the head. The water of this Euphrates is said to be dried up in preparation of the way of the Kings of a Sun's risings—he hodos ton basileon ton apo anatolon heliou. The drying up of the water of a river is the destroying of the river; and consequently, of the power represented by the river. The fourth Euphratean angel-power, “the great destroyer,” is itself doomed to destruction; and its decadence is a great sign in the political aerial of the approaching descent of the RAINBOWED ANGEL, out of the heaven; in other words, of the manifestation of the sons of the Deity, the future kings who shall rule the earth and sea.

This tenth chapter carries us forward in vision to this great crisis of the world; even to “that great day of the Deity who is All-powerful.” “Behold,” saith the Spirit, “I COME AS A THIEF” (ch. 16:15). The rainbowed angel is the Spirit’s symbol in that coming. It represents him in “that great day”—“the great and terrible day of Yahweh,” when he shall “roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and the heavens and the earth shall shake; and he shall be the hope of his people, and the strength of the children of Israel” (Joel 2:31; 3:16).

The time of this vision is the concluding period of that division of the seventh trumpet termed the “sixth vial.” The rainbowed angel is developing “in his chambers, with his doors shut about him; and hidden as it were for a little moment” (Isa. 26:20) under that vial; and before the gathering of the kings of the earth, and of the whole habitable into the place called in the Hebrew tongue “ARMAGEDDON.” From this obscurity he emerges, and descends with burning and destructive effect upon the nations of “the earth” and “the sea.” His advent being before the conclusion of the sixth vial, he has all the work of the seventh vial as “his work before him” (Isa. 40:10; 62:11). We are now living under the sixth vial, contemporarily with the drying up of the fourth Euphratean angelpower, and the diplomatic operation of the unclean spirits of daemons like frogs. The next event is the development of the powerful angel of this tenth chapter. It is therefore not in the past, as nearly all the commentators of the world imagine; among whom stands out conspicuously the author of the Horae Apocalypticae. But we need not waste time and space in the consideration of their theories. The things represented by the scene are yet future. We have, therefore, no historical illustration to offer. Hence, my business will be to analyze the symbols, and reduce them by the process to their literal signification, that we may know “what the Spirit saith,” by the vision, “to the ecclesias.”

But before proceeding to this analysis, I remark, that the position of this sceno-dramatic vision in the apocalypse is admirable. Having disposed of the Greek division of the apostasy by the death of its sovereignty; and having likewise by the first four trumpets previously eclipsed the luminaries of the Latin West—the Spirit now sets strikingly before us, that all-powerful organization which will result from the Nave of the Deity opened in the heaven, with the ark of his covenant in the midst, as revealed in ch. 11:19. In the eighteenth verse of this chapter, the resurrection of the saints, their judgment, and consequent recompense, are set forth. These, in their spiritual relations, constitute “the Nave,” or the Most Holy Heavenly, within the veil; no longer flesh and blood, but spirit, as Jesus now is; for they are to be “like Him” (1 John 3:2). Being thus identified with him, and “glorified together,” and in the free reception of all things with him (Rom. 8:17, 32) only not equal to him in rank (Eph. 1:22; Col. 1:18) the saints are also “the ark of the covenant in the nave.” This being all developed in the hidden chambers (Isa. 26:20) into which the outer world has no admission, the doors being shut against it, they are apocalyptically “in the heaven,” though standing upon the globe. In this secret place of the Highest, they are in preparation, or being prepared for manifestation—for the epiphaneia and apokalupsis, epiphany and apocalypse, of Rom. 8:19, and 2 Thess. 2:8.

When thus prepared in the chamber under all the circumstances indicated in the phrase, “Behold I come as a thief” (ch. 16:15), they stand forth in manifestation as the “powerful angel descended out of the heaven, clothed with a cloud; a rainbow upon the head; his face as the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire.”

This is the Strong Man of Psa. 19:5; in other words, “the Spirit and the Bride” of Apoc. 22:17, who in this glorious manifestation are “one,” as the head, and the body, and the life, are one. As a bridegroom, he will have come out of his chamber; and as a strong man he will rejoice for the race he has to run.

This all-powerful angel is not only strong, but he is a Man of War. Yahweh ish Milkhamah, says Moses; Yahweh shemo; “HE WHO SHALL BE is a man of War; Yahweh is his Name (Exod. 15:3). This angel of the tenth chapter is this same Yahweh-Warrior, styled in a multitude of places, Yahweh Tz’vaoth, HE WHO SHALL BEHOSTS. The “HE” is the Eternal Spirit “who created the heaven, and the things that therein are, and the earth, and the things that therein are, and the sea, and the things that are therein” (ch. 10:6); and the “hosts,” Jesus and his Brethren. The phrase is very incorrectly rendered in the English version, “the Lord of hosts;” but Yahweh does not signify Lord; nor is it in the construct case. It is absolute, and signifies simply, with Tz’vaoth, hosts, not of hosts. Yahweh Tz’vaoth, is a title chosen by the Spirit to intimate that at a certain time appointed he would be apocalypsed in hosts. He has been manifested in One, styled “His Holy One” and “the Holy and the Just One” (Acts 3:14); but he is also to be manifested in “hosts” of holy and just ones, after the same manner. This multitudinous manifestation of the Spirit by spirit is the basis of the symbols of the Apocalypse, as I have already shown in the first volume of this work. The Son of Man similitude is identified with multitude by “his voice,” which is “as the sound of many waters” (ch. 1:15); “many waters” in this book signifying “peoples and multitudes, nations, and tongues”—ch. 17:15; hence Ezekiel, who saw the same hosts in symbol, speaks of the voice, or noise, as “the noise of great waters, as the voice of strong ones, shaddai, the voice of speech, as the noise of a host” (ch. 1:24); and Daniel who saw the same multitude says, “the voice of his words like the voice of a multitude” (ch. 10:6).

In the tenth chapter of the Apocalypse are set forth these seen of Ezekiel, Daniel, and John, as the rainbowed angel. He is herein ready for action—the strong and mighty warrior prepared for combat with the Man-Image seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream. Here, then, are two men, representing two belligerent powers—the one, that of the Kingdom of Men; the other, that of the Kingdom of the Deity. Nebuchadnezzar’s Image was the aggregation into one symbolic man, of a multitude of powers contemporary with many generations; so this one powerful angel is an aggregation into One Body, named Yahweh Tz’vaoth, of all saints accounted worthy of cooperation with the Lord Jesus in the execution of “the judgment written.” “Judgment,” says Daniel, “was given to the saints;” and this rainbowed angel is their symbol, representing their aspect in the possession of judicial power, and ready to “destroy them who corrupt the earth” (ch. 11:18).

This, then is the “ALL-POWERFUL LORD GOD, who is, and was, and is to come” (ch. 11:17); in “the Omega” and terminal manifestation of the Eternal Spirit. This manifestation is yet in the future—is “to come;” and therefore, it is spoken of in ch. 16:5, as one that “shall be;” for “Shall be is his name”—Yahweh shemo.

The symbol of these “hosts” is styled “an angel,” because the Spirit incorporate in them has a mission; which is to “take the kingdom, and to possess the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven” (Dan. 7:18, 27); or, as it is expressed in Apoc. 11:15, “the kingdoms of this world,” that they may be the kingdoms of this powerful angel, styled there, “our Lord and his Christ” or Yahweh Elohim.

1. THE CLOTHING WITH CLOUD

The angelic symbol is peribeblemenon nephelen, one who hath been clothed with a cloud. Hence, there was a time when this clothing had not been developed. Understanding that the nucleus of the symbol is “the Lord the Spirit,” who is “the resurrection and the life,” we may perceive, that there is an epoch, or point of time, when the Spirit had not as yet clothed himself with the cloud. In symbolic language, cloud is representative of a mighty host. Thus, in addressing Gog, the Spirit saith: “thou shalt be like a cloud to cover the land, thou, and all thy bands, and many peoples with thee” (Ezek. 38:9). This is a very ample cloud, widespread as the Holy Land; and composed of “a great company, and a mighty host” (verse 15). So also, in Jer. 4:7, 13, speaking of the lion of Babylon, the destroyer of the Gentiles, he says, he should come against Judah “as clouds, and his chariots as a whirlwind.” Cloud signifies the same sort of thing in the scene before us; that is, a host or multitude. The point of time when the Spirit is not clothed with this multitudinous cloud, is from his first touching ground at his coming to the completion of the judgment of his household. How many months may be occupied in this judicial cleansing of the house, I am not prepared to say. In ch. 11:18, it is styled, “the time of the dead that they should be judged;” but how long the time of their judgment may be, is not revealed. It will not be the work of an instant; for the dead in Christ have first to be brought out of their graves; and then gathered by angelic agency from one end of heaven to the other (Matt. 24:31). After this “gathering together unto the Lord Jesus Christ” (2 Thess. 2:1); the risen dead, and the contemporary living, of the household, have all to give account of themselves to the Deity (Rom. 14:12). This is “the dead, small and great, standing before the Deity; and being judged out of those things written in the books, according to their works” (ch. 19:11). Whosoever of them cannot give a scripturally good account of themselves, are rejected, and expelled into the darkness of the outer world of “the earth” and “the sea,” where they will in body receive things evil (2 Cor. 5:10); and “of the flesh reap corruption” (Gal. 6:8); but, on the other hand, those whose account of themselves is deemed good, they will receive in body things which are good, and “of the Spirit reap life everlasting.” This is their quickening, transformation, or change, “in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump;” that is, the seventh, to which the rainbowed angel belongs (1 Cor. 15:52). This is their being “clothed upon with their house which is from heaven,” not from the grave; a clothing in which, in relation to each one so clothed, “mortality is swallowed up of life” (2 Cor. 5:2–4).

Here, then, is work for an epoch, but of how long a duration, I cannot tell. This, however, we may know, that the accepted will be a host—“a great multitude which no man can number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues, who stand before the throne, and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands” (ch. 7:9). This is the host symbolized by the cloud. The Spirit clothes himself with them all, when, by their quickening, they become spirit, on the principle, that they who have been born of the spirit are spirit (John 3:6). And how could we better symbolize this Spirit-Host than by “a powerful angel clothed with a cloud”—a great cloud of witnesses, of whom, in the days of their flesh, “the world was not worthy?”

2. THE RAINBOW

Now, over or upon the head of this angel, John saw “the rainbow.” Before iris, all the recent editors of the text insert he, “the” which is no doubt correct, as having special reference to the rainbow in ch. 4:3. This is the symbol of the covenant, and inseparably connected with the throne. Upon this sat one like a jasper and sardine stone; and, as the rainbow was round about the throne, it was also over Him who sat thereon. The occupant of the throne is the Spirit, and those to whom he says, “he that overcomes will I grant to sit with me in my throne;” so that the rainbow arches over all such. The Spirit-Host is the pillar of cloud between the Cherubim, which reflects the light of the divine countenance, and develops the bow. This token of the Abrahamic covenant is well and appropriately placed over “the Head” of the Angelic Spirit-Host, seeing that in Him all the fulness dwells; and that, in the days of his flesh, his blood was the blood of that covenant brought into force by His death; and by which all the individuals of the cloud were sanctified (Heb. 9:15; 10:10). Arching over this symbol, it signifies that the angel is a company of kings and priests, related to the rainbowed throne—the throne covenanted to David and his seed.

The rainbow occurs only twice among the symbols of the Apocalypse; once in the fourth chapter, and again in the tenth. When seen by the scribe instructed for the kingdom of the heavens, it reminds him of “the covenants of promise,” in which he has become interested by adoption into “the Commonwealth of Israel,” when he put on Christ by immersion, as “the obedience of faith” (Eph. 2:12; Gal. 3:27, 29; Rom. 16:26). The rainbow token in a scene reminds him, that the symbol with which it is associated, has to do with the Holy Land, and the Kingdom, of which the land is the territory. It suggests, that the things signified by the symbol are connected with the avenging of the holy (Dan. 8:14), when the covenant with Jacob, and the covenant with Isaac, and the covenant with Abraham, has been remembered; and the land also (Lev. 26:42).

3. THE FACE AS THE SUN

The face of the angel is identical with the countenance of the symbolic Son of Man in ch. 1:16—“his face as it were the Sun;” or, “his countenance as the sun shineth in his strength.” In the vision which Daniel saw of the same, “his face was as the appearance of lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire” (ch. 10:6). Ezekiel saw the same brightness in his vision of the Elohim; “whose appearance was like burning coals of fire, like the appearance of lamps;... the fire was bright, and out of the fire went forth lightning” (ch. 1:13). Fire and glowing brightness are symbols of the Spirit in intense and destroying activity “Our Deity,” says Paul, “is a consuming fire.” The bright and fiery aspect of this apocalyptic symbol, identifies it with spirit-manifestation. It is a symbol of which the Sun of Righteousness is a constituent; and hence the sunshine of his face. This symbolic fire and brightness John saw in vision, find their significance in part, in 2 Thess. 1:8; and 2:8; where Paul speaks of the apocalypse of the Lord Jesus with a fire of flame, and consuming with spirit of his mouth, and destroying with the brightness of his presence. Hence, the fire and brightness of the symbol are indicative of the consuming and destroying characteristics of the hosts, which are glorified together with him, and invest omnipotence as a cloud.

4. FEET AS PILLARS OF FIRE

The feet of the angel as pillars of fire. The import of this has been expounded in the first volume in treating of the feet of the symbolic Son of Man, which John says, were “like to fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace.” The feet are symbols of progress, of advance into the arena of conflict; and when in intense ignition, of terrible destruction in their career. Feet, without the adjunct of “pillars of fire,” are “beautiful,” and indicative of good; as, “How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace; that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation; that saith unto Zion, Thine Elohim reigneth!” (Isa. 52:7). But the feet of the rainbowed angel are not beautiful; they are moving pillars of fire, dreadful and terrible in their desolating tramp; for wherever they tread, they kindle a fire that cannot be quenched. The rainbowed angel proclaims no good tidings, nor does he publish peace and salvation. His voice is not addressed to Zion. He is altogether a symbol of war, and destruction by the burning flame (Dan. 7:9–11). He is a fiery stream issuing and coming forth from before the Ancient of Days; and his tread is the tramp of myriads, whose mission it is to slay the beast, destroy his body, and give it to the burning flame.

In the execution of this mission, he develops the judgments of the second and third angels of ch. 14:8–11; and of the scenes described from verse 14 to 20 inclusive. He is the Lord of lords and King of kings, having been clothed with the called, and faithful, and chosen; and prepared for combat with the Powers that be, whom he overcomes (ch. 17:14). He is the angel that enlightens the earth with his glory, and announces the fall of Babylon with a mighty voice (ch. 18:1–2); and is the powerful Lord God, who judgeth her, and burns her utterly with fire—ver. 8. As constituents of the cloud with which he has been clothed, are the people of the Deity, who have separated themselves from the Apostasy; the heaven, and holy apostles and prophets; for these are exhorted to reward her as she rewarded them, to give her torment and sorrow, and to rejoice over her fall; all of which implies their previous resurrection, judgment, and acceptance (ch. 18:4–8; 20, 24). Embodied as the rainbowed angel, they are seen again in ch. 19:11–21, as the King of kings and Lord of lords, followed by the hosts of the heaven, prepared to smite the nations, and to tread the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of the All-powerful Deity. He is the angel standing in the sun, verse 17; and lastly; he is seen as the Binder of the Dragon, and the deliverer of the nations from the civil and ecclesiastical power of them by whom they are now deceived and oppressed. Such is the career of the powerful angel with “his feet as pillars of fire.”

5. THE LITTLE OPENED SCROLL

In the second verse of the tenth chapter, John says: “He had in his hand a little scroll which had been opened,”—biblaridion aneogmenon. This was not like the scroll John speaks of in ch. 5., which was closed with a sevenfold sealing; “so that no man in the heaven, nor in earth, neither under the earth, was able to open the scroll, neither to look thereon.” This “little scroll” in the angel’s hand had been opened before John saw him. The opening had been completed before he took up his position upon the earth and sea. The opening of the little scroll is not represented in this chapter any more than the clothing of the angelic symbol with the cloud. These are processes accomplished in the secret place of the Most High; and before the angel presents himself before the nations as Judah’s lion. The opening of the little scroll, and the clothing with the cloud, belong to “the time of the dead when they are judged and rewarded”—when they stand before the Deity in the scene exhibited in ch. 20:12–15. In this scene the three books, or scrolls, are opened. These are the scroll of the Seven Seals, the little scroll, and the scroll of life. Down to “the time of the dead,” the first is being unsealed and unrolled, as I have been expounding the operation in this volume. But when the apocalyptic developments reach this extraordinary and notable crisis of the resurrection, judgment, and quickening of the approved, whose names are written in the scroll of life, the mode of apocalyptic development is no longer as during the centuries past. The manner of apocalyptic fulfilment is changed. This change of method will be so demonstrable, that all the Deity’s servants will see it; for they will be a part of it. The Spirit will have prevailed to open the seven-sealed scroll in creating the crisis which crowns the centuries; and in clothing himself with the cloud, or hosts, in, with, and by whom he destroys the Fourth Beast, and takes away the dominion of the other three. The supernatural element is now introduced, which wonderfully quickens and consummates the end. But the infusion of this into the situation does not supersede the free action of the enemy, and the counteraction of him by the symbolic angel upon seemingly ordinary principles. The scroll is opened, not to him, but to the saints, to whom the judgment is given. The Fourth Beast, or Nebuchadnezzar’s Image, which covers the whole area, will contend against them, as if they were a Zinghis or Tamerlane, until defeat and destruction on every side give mankind a practical understanding of the opening of the seven-sealed scroll.

The opening of the seven-sealed scroll in the giving a reward to the servants of the Deity is, to them, also, the opening of the “little scroll of the angel’s hand.” It is a little scroll of judgment: the scroll is little, not the judgment. The scroll unrolled is not long. The seven-sealed scroll, extending from John’s day to “the time of the dead,” is long. Upon its roll are inscribed judicial events extending over nearly eighteen centuries. This is not a little scroll, but a very long one. A scroll extended gives us the idea of length; and this is representative of time. A little scroll is a short time in which things written therein are to be accomplished—a period, say of forty years, according to the testimony of Micah 7:14–17, in which “the nations shall see, and be confounded at all (this angel’s) might: they shall lay their hand upon their mouth, their ears shall be deaf. They shall lick the dust like a serpent; they shall move out of their holes like worms of the earth; they shall be afraid of Yahweh OUR Elohim, and shall fear because of thee.”

This is a shorttime hand to hand conflict between the Seed of the Woman and the Seed of the Serpent, in which he gets bruised on the head (Gen. 3:15). The rainbowed angel having come to the throne of judgment, and been crowned, received the testimony in receiving this little scroll, in which is written his mission. Being the king’s son, he succeeds to the throne, and is crowned; and the custom established in Israel was, to deliver to the crowned ruler the testimony, according to which he was to execute justice and judgment (2 Kings 11:12). The little scroll is the finishing of the mystery of the Deity, as he hath declared, announced, or testified, the glad tidings to his servants the prophets (ch. 10:7); and it is the rainbowed angel that hath to finish it. This short-scroll finishing of the mystery is the completion of the judgments written on the outer side of the seven-sealed scroll. It is, therefore, the concluding part of this scroll—that part, namely, which pertains exclusively to the saints, in the execution of the judgment given to them, by which they possess themselves of the kingdoms of the world.

This “little scroll” is the most important fragment of the apocalypse. It contains the catastrophe of the plot, without which all the rest would be of little interest to the believer. By the angel holding the little scroll “in his hand,” his power is identified with the execution of its contents, and the character of these is indicated by his voice. They are “the lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and earthquake, and great hail,” of ch. 11:19—the judgments of the seventh vial; which exhaust the wrath of Deity, and give victory to the saints, and rest for a thousand years (ch. 15:2; 14:13; 20:4).

6. THE POSITION OF THE ANGEL, AND HOW IT IS ACQUIRED

“And he set his right foot upon the sea, and his left upon the earth.” He set or placed his feet in this position. John does not reveal to us where he was before he set his pedal pillars of fire upon the sea and upon the earth. This has to be learned from other testimonies. The things represented by this colossal angel were in existence somewhere before he made a forward move in order to set his fiery feet upon the sea and upon the earth—upon the sea first; and afterwards upon the earth. The nucleus of the RAINBOWED UNITY is in present existence at “the right hand of power.” It is there in the form or “fashion of a Man,” “justified by spirit,” and therefore spirit; and “made strong” as the Man of Yahweh’s right hand, “whom he has made strong for himself” (Phil. 2:7; 1 Tim. 3:16; John 3:6; Psa. 80:17). This Spirit-Nucleus is the Lord Jesus Anointed, and by the anointing made what he is. He is the Eternal, by spirit manifested in Flesh, justified and glorified. As the nucleus of the Rainbowed Unity, he is not now standing upon the sea and upon the earth; but is in a far country, whither he went many centuries ago to receive the kingdom, and afterwards to return (Luke 19:12). This return has been long expected and earnestly desired by his servants; but, as yet, their expectation has not been fulfilled. Nevertheless, at the time appointed, styled by Paul, kairois idiois, “his own times,” the manifestation of the Lord Jesus Christ will be shown by “the Blessed and Only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords, who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen, nor can see” (1 Tim. 6:14–16). This is the individual, personal, and simple nucleus of the Rainbowed Angelic Unity—omnipotence incorporate in one man—“the Man Christ Jesus”—the SpiritMan, who says: “Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame” (Apoc. 16:15).

But, where is he to come to? Where will he first stand with his feet when he returns, having received power and authority to “revive his work in the midst of the years?” In what part of the globe, or spot of earth, will he take up his position, as the place where his saints shall be gathered to him, who have made a covenant with him by sacrifice (Psa. 50:5)? Before replying to this inquiry, I remark, that different prophets in vision have seen him approaching Jerusalem at different stages of his course. One sees something in point that another did not see; but, by noting what they all saw, we are enabled to trace out his career till his “pillars of fire” stand upon the sea and upon the earth.

The blessing of Israel by Moses before his death, is, unquestionably, a prophecy of their happy condition in the latter day, when dwelling in safety alone, and treading upon the high places of the earth (Deut. 33:28, 29). The blessing upon Levi, Benjamin, and Joseph, is clearly indicative of this. Thus, of Levi, he said: “Let thy Thummim and thy Urim be with the MAN thine HOLY ONE l’ish chasidecha, whom thou didst prove at Massah.” This, in relation to Levi, has never been yet. “And of Benjamin he said, The Beloved of Yahweh shall dwell in safety by him.” This is yet future; for, when the Beloved of the Father dwelt in the canton of Benjamin, his habitation was unsafe, and his life in danger every day. “And of Joseph he said, The ten thousands of Ephraim, and the thousands of Manasseh, shall push the peoples together to the ends of the earth.” This yet remains to be fulfilled.

Now, in the preface to this prophetic blessing, it is written that Moses said: “Yahweh came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir unto them; he shined forth from Mount Paran, and he came with ten thousands of saints”—ver. 2. It was historically true that Yahweh came to Sinai; but is there nothing more in this than an historical allusion? Without other light than this affords, we could hardly answer the question with full satisfaction. We know that Israel’s history is typical, and that the text is in connection with prophecy still, came is so decidedly past time, that it causes one to pause before we affirm that it here predicts the future.

But the Spirit enlarges our conception somewhat on this point, in Psa. 68:17, 18. Here it seems to indicate a future manifestation in the wilderness of Sinai and Paran. “The chariots of Elohim are twenty thousands, thousands repeated: the Lord (Adonai) among them, Sinai in the holy.” Then follows, in the 18th verse, the prophecy of Christ’s ascension, as Paul interprets it; after which in verse 22, “the Lord saith, I will bring again from the depths of the sea.” The English Version interjects “is among them as in Sinai in the holy place.” But Sinai bakkodesh, is equivalent to in Sinai the holy. This conclusion is strengthened by verse 22 for how can “the Lord bring AGAIN from the depths of the sea,” unless he gather his people in the vicinity of the Red Sea?

But Habakkuk has made certain what, without his testimony might be thought open to dispute. In the third chapter of his book, he prays that Yahweh would “revive his work in the midst of the years; in the midst of the years make known, or manifest; and in wrath remember mercy.” In response to this, he is favored with a vision, in describing which, he saith: “ELOAH (singular, not Elohim) came from Teman, and the Holy One from mount Paran. Selah. His glory covered the heavens, and the earth is full of his praise.” If this testimony had been faithfully translated, there would have been no obscurity in it. The prophet did not write, “Eloah came from Teman.” The word rendered came is not bah, as in Deut. 33:2, where it is correctly translated, but yahvo, the future of the same verb, and, therefore, to be rendered shall come in. The text should be rendered thus: “Eloah shall come in from the South, and the Holy One from mount Paran. Selah. Eloah is the word used for the setter up of the kingdom, in Dan. 2:44. It signifies the Adorable One, or the Strong One. It is the Deity made flesh, and justified by spirit, and equivalent to “the Holy One”—Messiah.

I conclude, then, from this positive declaration of Habakkuk, that Moses spake not historically but prophetically. The coming of Yahweh to Sinai in the days of Moses was representative, as to power, place, and purpose, of his coming in the latter day. Since Habakkuk wrote the words, “Eloah shall come in from the South and the Holy One from mount Paran,” the prediction has not been fulfilled in any sense. If it had, “His glory would now cover the heavens, and the earth be filled with his praise,” which is very far from being the fact.

This, then, I believe is the place or country to which the personal Son of Man, “the Man Christ Jesus,” will come first at his approaching advent. The region is admirably adapted for the manifestation of omnipotence, in the judicial manifestation of the mystical Son of Man, or Rainbowed Angel. The Peninsula of Sinai is the southern region which is reserved in solitude for a future display of great signs and wonders far transcending anything witnessed by Israel in the olden time. This peninsula is formed by two arms running into the land from the north end of the Red Sea, and is bounded by the one styled “the tongue of the Egyptian sea” (Isa. 11:15) on the southwest, at the end of which is Suez; and by the other, or Elanitic Gulf, called also the Gulf of Akaba, on the east. These waters form two divergent sides of a triangle, within the area of which are mounts Sinai and Paran, and a “waste howling wilderness,” containing nothing to be desired. Moses styles it, “a great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents, and scorpions, and drought, where there was no water” (Deut. 8:15). It is a dry, hot, sandy, mountainous region, that no government seeks to annex, and which no emigrants undertake to people. The few that are found within it are the descendants of Hagar—wild men, whose hand is against every man, and every man’s hand against them (Gen. 16:11). From Suez to Akaba, at the northern extremity of the Gulf of Akaba, a road was constructed by the Romans, measuring 125 miles in a straight line. The peninsula included within these limits is filled up with mountains, and narrow valleys, and desolate plains. Of these mountains, the chain or elevated circle of Sinai is the chief.

To the northward of the central region of Sinai, and divided from it by a broad valley, called El Sheikh, is a mountain range extending eastward, called Zebeir. North of this are sandy plains and valleys, the most barren and destitute of water of the whole country. This section borders still further north on another mountain chain, termed El Tyh, which stretches nearly across the peninsula from gulf to gulf. Still north of this range is the desert of El Tyh, through which ran the old Roman road, and, at present, the great pilgrim road from Egypt, by Suez to Akaba, on the way to Mecca. North and northwest, and, indeed, inclusive of the desert El Tyh, is the wilderness of Paran, a tract so called after mount Paran, a chain of mountains bordering the desert of Paran on the east. The wilderness lies between the southern border of Palestine and the Mediterranean on the north; Egypt on the west; Idumea, or Edom on the east; and the El Tyh range of the peninsula on the south. “The Holy One,” says Habakkuk, writing in Jerusalem, “will come in from mount Paran.” By the help of Moses, we understand that he arrives at Paran “from Sinai,” which Habakkuk styles, taiman, “the south”. Habakkuk had a vision of what was to be transacted in the country of the south, which will be left in the rear by an advance from mount Paran, after bringing affliction there on the tents of Cushan, and causing the curtains of the land of Midian to tremble (ch. 3:7).

The reader is requested to note, that when Moses delivered his prophetic blessing upon the tribes of Israel, he was in the plains of Moab, and soon about to leave them. This was about a hundred miles north of mount Paran. When Israel heard the blessing, would they not desire to know, in view of Moses’ speedy death, where help was to come from to establish the blessing? In reply to this, the answer is found in the oracle: “There is none like the AIL of Yeshurun riding heavens in thy help, and clouds in his potence: the Elohim of olden time a refuge; and underneath the arms of olahm: and He shall thrust out the enemy from before thee; and shall command to destroy. Israel shall then dwell in safety alone.... a people saved by Yahweh, the shield of thy help, and the sword of thy excellency! And thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee; and thou shalt tread upon their high places.” But, though satisfied that Ail, or the omnipotence that had helped them through the Elohim hitherto, was their only help; yet, they were accustomed to the manifestation of divine power in specially appointed places; where, then, were they to look for him in his coming to help? Where would he “rise up unto them,” when he should appear to destroy their enemies, and cause them to dwell in safety alone? The answer to this in Deut. 33:2, presupposes the accomplishment of the enterprise; because, although it is yet in the future, it is as certain to come to pass, as if it had already been fulfilled. For this reason, the future event is foretold in terms of the past; and we read, “Yahweh came in from Sinai, and rose up from Seir unto them; he caused to shine forth from Mount Paran, and he came with ten thousands of the holy; from his right hand a fiery mandate for them. Yea, he loved the peoples; all his saints are in thy hand.” Moses speaks in this of an entrance from Sinai—a coming into the land from Sinai by way of Seir and Paran; not of a coming to Sinai. The word I have rendered “came in,” or entered bah, “from Sinai,” is different from “came with ten thousands,” which is ahthah. The word zahrach, “rose up,” signifies to rise up as the sun hence the sun-rising in Seir, and the shining forth from Mount Paran. This Mosaic vision is unquestionably identical with John’s. The Ail of Yeshurun riding heavens and clouds, with a mandate of destruction in his right hand, is no other than the Rainbow Angel with the little scroll of fiery judgments in his hand; which, when executed, result in the deliverance of Israel, and the overthrow of all their enemies.

The south end of the Dead Sea is about a hundred and ten miles east of north from Akaba, at the north end of the gulf. Between these two points runs a valley, called towards the north El Ghor, and towards the south, El Araba, and forming a prolongation of the valley of the Jordan, through which in all probability, in very ancient times, before the overthrow of the cities of the plain, that river poured its waters into the Red Sea. There is a chain of mountains on the east of this great valley, forming the continuation of those which surround the eastern side of the Dead Sea. The portion of this chain eastward of El Araba is Mount Seir. “Yahweh rose up from Seir unto them.” Near this are situated the ruins of Petra the ancient capital of Edom; and the due north of these, and still in Idumea, and southeast of the Dead Sea, so noted in the prophecy of Isa. 63:1. Rising up from Seir with “his face as it were the sun,” he advances “in the greatness of his strength” to Bozrah, and thence still northward through the plains of Moab, to the vicinity of Mount Nebo, where Moses died.

But let us return to Sinai, distant from Jerusalem, in a straight line, about two hundred and eighty miles; but by Paran, Seir, Bozrah, and the Plains of Moab, about three hundred and ten miles. The upper region of Sinai forms an irregular circle of thirty or forty miles in diameter, possessing numerous sources of water, a temperate climate, and a soil capable of supporting animal and vegetable nature. It is upon this highest region of the peninsula, that the fertile valleys are found; and Burckhardt says: “I think it probable, that this upper country, or wilderness, is, exclusively, the Desert of Sinai, so often mentioned in the account of the wanderings of Israel.” He describes the central summits of Mount Sinai, as abrupt cliffs of granite from six to eight hundred feet high, whose surface is blackened by the sun, and surrounding the avenues of approach. They enclose the holy mountain on three sides, leaving the east and north east sides only, towards the gulf of Akaba, more open to the view. These cliffs are entered by a narrow defile about forty feet wide, with perpendicular granite rocks on each side. A gentle, but constant, ascent leads up this valley, whose aspect is terrific but ever varying. It does not attain more than two hundred feet in width; and the mountains rise to an immense height on either side. The scenery is stern. “But what,” says a visitor, “had the beauty and softness of nature to do here? Mount Sinai required an approach like this, where all seemed to proclaim the land of miracles, and to have been visited by the terrors of Jehovah. The scenes are suited to the sound of the fearful trumpet that was once heard there;” and will be heard again, when “the Lord himself shall descend from the heaven with a shout, with the voice of the Archangel, and with the trump of Deity” (1 Thess. 4:16). Sinai has four summits, and that of Moses stands almost in the middle of the others. The view from this summit is very grand. From one of these peaks a view is commanded of some parts of the two gulfs of Akaba and Suez; also innumerable ranges of rocky mountains; but around the mount the open places are but few.

Such is the elevated platform upon which is to be inaugurated the Most High and Holy Heavenly—the ever-living Nave of Deity, containing the testimony, the bread of heaven, and the life; “the glorious and fearful name Yahweh Elohaikha,” of Moses (Deut. 28:58); the “Yah that rideth in the deserts,” of David (Psa. 68:4); the “King Yahweh Tz’vaoth,” of Isaiah ch. 6:5; the “Four Living Creatures with the likeness of a Man,” of Ezekiel ch. 1:5, 12; the “Man with the voice of a multitude,” of Daniel ch. 10:5, 6; the Yahweh Elohim of hosts, Yahweh his memorial” of Hos. 12:5; the “Yahweh Givborim—the Yahweh-mighty ones” of Joel 3:11; the “Saviours who come up on Mount Zion to judge the mount of Esau,” of Obadiah, ver. 21; the “Man of Bethlehem Ephratah” with his companions, who delivers Israel from the Assyrian, and wastes Assyria with the sword, of Micah 5:2–6; the “Eloah upon his horses and chariots of salvation,” of Hab. 3:3, 8; the “four chariot-spirits of the heavens,” and the “one Yahweh and one Name,” of Zechariah 6:1, 5; 14:9; the “Son of Man, the Lamb with seven horns and seven eyes, the rainbowed angel, and the hundred and forty four thousand, who follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes,” of John’s Apocalypse:—all the things signified by these divers forms of speech are essentially one and the same theophany, or God-Manifestation, simply expressed by the words the Eternal Spirit by spirit incorporate in Jesus and his Brethren.

The Lord Jesus, then, comes first to Sinai; for before he can enter the holy land “from Sinai,” “from Seir,” and “from Mount Paran,” he must come to the places named. He comes to Sinai with ten thousands, who are style by Paul in 2 Thess. 1:7, aggeloi dunameos autou, angels of his power; that is, all power is given to him—all authority and ability to do whatever is appointed to be done, in heaven and upon earth (Matt. 28:18). He is therefore omnipotent; “for to this end he both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of dead and living ones” (Rom. 14:9). Hence, everything that is done in “the time of the end,” is done by the power, or “energy, whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself” (Phil. 3:21). But, it is not to be supposed, that so august and powerful a prince would come to Sinai alone, or unattended, by ministering officials. All the Elohim of olden time elohai kedem, have been commanded to worship, or do service to him as their Lord; for they are all public officials sent forth to do service on account of those hereafter to inherit salvation (Psa. 97:9; Heb. 1:6, 14). They are then his messengers, excelling in strength who do his commandments, hearkening to the voice of his word; his ministers that do his pleasure (Psa. 103:20, 21). Hence, they are angels, or messengers, who execute his decrees, and therefore angels of his power.

He comes to Sinai with ten thousand of these. But what brings, him there with these angels of his power? This is answered in the words, “Thou, Eloah, wentest forth for the salvation of thy people, for salvation with thine Anointed” (Hab. 3:13). Thy people; that is, first, “those who have made a covenant with him by sacrifice”—the saints; secondly, for the salvation of that people who shall be made willing in the day of his power—the twelve tribes of Israel (Psa. 50:5; 110:3). The saints are those of the circumcision justified by belief of the things promised, or covenanted, to the fathers, said covenant being confirmed and brought into force by the death of the Seed; and those of the circumcision and uncircumcision who, since the crucifixion, are justified by belief of “the things of the Kingdom of the Deity, and of the name of Jesus Christ;” and have been immersed into him, and thereby become Abraham’s Seed, and heirs according to the promise (Rom. 3:30; Acts 8:12; Gal. 3:29). These are the saints developed upon the principle of belief of the “exceedingly great and precious promises” of Deity, both during and since the times of the law. Multitudes of these are “sleeping in the dust of the earth;” and a few living ones are to be found in the British empire, and in these States of America. The dead saints, who are now lying in the dust of divers and remote countries, are to be raised into renewed existence; and, with the few that are alive, and have not tasted death, are to be “gathered together unto our Lord Jesus Christ” (2 Thess. 2:1). “Gather my saints unto me” is the command; and doubtless, the first to be fulfilled after his descent to Sinai. This command of the Judge can only be delivered to the angels of his power. This is their work in all the earth; for it is written, “He shall send his angels with a trumpet of great sound, and they shall gather together his chosen ones from the four winds, from one end of the heavens to the other” (Matt. 24:31). They will gather them to Sinai; for the prophet, who saw Adonai Yahweh go forth with whirlwinds of the south, says, “YAHWEH my Elohim, all the saints, shall come in with thee” (ch. 9:14; 14:5). But, how can they enter the land of Palestine with Adonai Yahweh, He who shall be lord, who comes from Sinai, and the south, unless they were first gathered there unto him by the angels of his power? The angels had to do with his own resurrection, when he was delivered from death by the glory of the Father; we conclude therefore, that, while the saints are raised by the same power, the application of that power in all individual cases, will be made by the angels of his power under his supremacy. The “trumpet of great sound” is not necessarily a sound making a stunning impression upon ears of flesh. It is the power of the seventh trumpet, which has been sounding for seventy years without arresting public attention. It is the power of this period for the resurrection of the saints, which will be loud enough for them to hear; for they respond to it and come forth (John 5:28, 29). An angel’s whisper can wake the dead, when breathed by the command of Him, who is the resurrection and the life. This would be a “great sound,” though inaudible to ears of flesh.

When the angels of the Lord’s power shall have finished the gathering of the saints from one end of the heavens to the other, they will have collected together “a cloud of witnesses,” by whom will be concentrated in one general assembly the living history of all ages and generations. There will be Abel, Enoch, Noah, Shem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Elijah, David, Daniel, John, and all the prophets and apostles, with a multitude beside, that no man can number; all in their day, intelligent in the word, and zealous for the truth, in the service of which many were accounted fools, and many lost their lives. In the later ages of their separation from the nations, the governments of the Gentiles, symbolized by the beast and his image, made war upon them, and overcame them, or prevailed against them (Apoc. 13:7; 11:2, 7; Dan. 7:21). But, now that the Ancient of Days has come to Sinai, and they are gathered unto him, and approved on the ground of having continued in the faith, rooted and settled, and not moved away from the hope of the gospel (Col. 1:22, 23); they are transformed, and become like Christ Jesus in all things, except that he is preeminent in rank and authority. They are “equal to angels,” who excel in strength (Luke 20:36).

Now, reader, ascend with me into the Mount of the Elohim, and from the top of the rocks look into the open spaces of this elevated region of the peninsula; what seest thou outspread before thee? What but the goodly tents and tabernacles of the “Holy Nation,” the “chosen generation,” the “royal priesthood,” the “purchased people,” the Israel of God” (1 Pet. 2:9; Gal. 6:16); “as the valleys are they spread forth as gardens by the river’s side, as the trees of lign aloes which Yahweh hath planted, as cedar trees beside the waters ... whose King shall be higher than Agag (Gog), and his Kingdom shall be exalted. Behold them “abiding according to their tribes”—those tribes apocalyptically “sealed in their foreheads with the seal of the Deity” (ch. 7:4–9). How beautiful are they in their encampment, who as the four living ones, lie foursquare, and as broad as their length, being 144 cubits, which is “the measure of a Man, that is, of the Angel”—even of the RAINBOWED ANGEL (Apoc. 21:16, 17); whose altitude is equal to his breadth; an altitude by which his relationship to “the light which no man can approach unto,” is established and revealed.

But, why do they lie there in their encampment? What is their angelism? Why are they thus marshalled, “looking forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?” Why have they been hastily transported hither in clouds? Why are they here in convention with the Lord in the aerial? Are they to remain here permanently encamped in the elevated region of the peninsula? No, the wilderness of Sinai is only the place of gathering where the saints are organized, and developed into this mighty angel. They are the SWIFT CLOUD upon which the Spirit rides.

In their camp, they are but waiting for “judgment to be given to them,” that they may go forth and “take possession of the kingdom under the whole heaven.” “He stood and measured the earth.” The wings of their flight upon the prey are not yet expanded. Though they had been gathered by the angels of his power into the presence of Israel’s King, preparation for action upon the outer world was not complete. Israel after the flesh has to be “made willing” to move in obedience to the commands of Jesus, as the Leader and Commander of the people” (Psa. 110:3; Isa. 55:4). This may be also the mission of the angels. But this work of the Spirit, however, executed by the angels or by the saints, it would seem to be a necessary preliminary to a general movement for their deliverance. This is after the order of the type. The Spirit’s Messenger in the bush sent Moses and Aaron to the elders of Israel to make the people willing to remove from Egypt under their leadership, before any communication was opened with the court of Pharaoh, or any judgment had been inflicted upon their enemies and oppressors.

But all things being prepared, the quietude of the camp of Sinai is changed for “the noise of great waters.” The scene becomes tempestuous. When they stood inactive, they let down their wings. But judgment having been given to them, they extend their wings; and the noise thereof is the noise of a host marching against the foe. Habakkuk saw this angelic multitudinous unity in full career. They would, of course, attack the peoples first who were nearest to their encampment. These are “the tents of Cushan” and “the curtains of Midian,” which are afflicted and made to tremble. This Cushan is east of the Tigris and north of the Persian gulf; the Midianites are the Arabs of the desert, who are to “bow down before him” (Psa. 72:9).

Plan of Attack

From Sinai Christ’s forces will subdue the Arabs, occupy Egypt, and then move north against Russia’s confederated forces to pour out the judgment of Armageddon.

But, it is written, “Yahweh rideth upon a swift cloud, and shall come into Egypt: and the vanities of Egypt shall be moved at his presence, and the heart of Egypt shall melt in the midst of it” (Isa. 19:1). In this invasion of Egypt then in the hands of Gog, the king of the north, who hath power over its gold, and silver, and precious things (Dan. 11:43) the troops of Sinai would have to march round the head of the gulf of Suez, or to pass over the sea, or through it. The last alternative seems to be the course to be adopted at some epoch of the enterprise; which will probably be on return from the conquest of Egypt, in the march to Zion. “I will bring again from the depths of the sea,” saith the Spirit in Psa. 68:22. And these words were written in Jerusalem, implying that they were coming Zionwards. In Psa. 66, after announcing the universal subjection of the nations, the reader is invited to the contemplation of the means by which the conquest is effected: “Come and see the doings of Elohim, terrible of deed towards the sons of men. He turned the sea to dry land; they passed through the river on foot: there did we rejoice in him.” And Isaiah says: “Yahweh shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian sea; and with his mighty wind shall he shake his hand over the river (Euphrates) and shall smite it into seven streams, and cause to go over in shoes ... like as it was to Israel in the day that he came up out of the land of Egypt” (ch. 11:15, 16). And yet again in ch. 50:9, Isaiah, by the inspiration of the Spirit saith in relation to Israel’s future redemption, “Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of Yahweh; awake as in the ancient days, in the generations of old. Art thou not the same that cut in pieces Rahab (Egypt) and wounded the dragon? Art thou not the same that dried the sea, the waters of the great deep; that made the depths of the sea a way for the ransomed to pass over?” These were the awakenings of ancient days; and by the prophet’s petition, which was the word of the Spirit, the dividing of the sea and the river in a future exodus is indirectly foretold. “Therefore the redeemed of Yahweh shall return, and come with singing unto Zion (not from Egypt to Sinai, as of old); and everlasting joy (simchath olahm, joy of the future age) shall be upon their head.”

The Rainbowed Angel being constituted of individuals who are all “like Jesus,” who descended to Sinai, and in the days of his flesh even, walked upon the sea; showing thereby that He, and therefore they, are untrammelled by the natural laws: it will be unnecessary and superfluous to divide the sea on their account. It is Israel according to the flesh, who are subject to the natural laws, that are to be “brought again from the depths of the sea;” beside showing his power, and gaining praise and fame in the earth in drying up, or destroying the Egyptian gulf; the passage of the sea by Israel in Egypt under the leadership of “the Prophet-like Moses,” is designed to serve for a national baptism into Christ by which “all their sins will be cast into the depths of the sea,” according to the testimony of Mic. 7:19. When they passed through the sea under Moses, “they were all baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea” (1 Cor. 10:2); so when saved from their long captivity by Christ, they will be nationally baptized into him by a like marine investment; and thus be able, as “a people saved by Yahweh,” nationally to sing “the song of Moses the servant of the Deity, and the song of the Lamb, saying, Great and marvellous thy works Yahweh Elohim almighty; just and true thy ways, O king of the nations. Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy Name? For thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest” (Apoc. 15:3, 4). The testimony seems to indicate, that at the time of Yahweh’s riding upon the swift cloud into Egypt, there will have collected there a considerable Jewish population, which will be grievously oppressed by the king of the north, or Russo-Assyrian Gog. This appears from Isa. 19:20, which says, “they shall cry unto Yahweh because of the oppressors, and He shall send them a Saviour, even a great one, and he shall deliver them.” This saviour is YAHWEH Elohim Tz’vaoth, He who shall be the mighty ones of hosts, the Rainbowed Angel, “and he shall deliver them.” This almighty organization having planted itself in Egypt, all the vanities or idols of Egypt, Greek, and Latin images of saints, and those who worship them, “shall be moved at His presence.” And what then? “The heart of Egypt shall melt in the midst of it.” But why? Because “Yahweh shall smite Egypt,” to “recover the remnant of his people from Egypt” (Isa. 11:11). In this process, “Yahweh will beat off from the channel of the river (Euphrates) unto the stream of Egypt” (the Nile); and thereby subdue the whole south of the grant to Abraham “from sea to sea,” from the Mediterranean to the gulf of Persia.

When the south is thus freed from the domination of “the House of Esau” (Obad. 18–21), the healing of Egypt will commence. “Yahweh shall smite Egypt and heal it; and they shall return to Yahweh, and he shall be entreated of them, and shall heal them. This healing will be curative of all the population, Gentile and Jewish, that survives the heart-melting judgments of the crisis. Egypt will no longer be proverbial for its darkness that may be felt: for in the day of the Rainbowed Angel, “shall five cities in the land of Egypt speak the language of Canaan, and swear (allegiance) to YAHWEH Tz’vaoth, (to ‘him who shall be hosts’): one shall be called, The City of Destruction. In that day there shall be an altar to Yahweh in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to Yahweh. And it shall be for a sign and for a witness unto YAHWEH Tz’vaoth in the land of Egypt.” And this is the reason of the destruction which gives name to one of the five cities; “for they shall cry unto Yahweh because of the oppressors,” as they did in the days of Moses; “and he shall send them a Saviour, even a great one (the Rainbowed Angel) and he shall deliver them. And Yahweh shall be known to Egypt, and the Egyptians shall know Yahweh in that day, and shall do sacrifice and oblation: yea, they shall vow a vow to Yahweh, and perform it ... and they shall return even to Yahweh; and he shall be entreated of them, and shall heal them (Isa. 19:18–22).

Egypt appears to occupy a very important position in the restoration of Israel by the Rainbowed Angel. Egypt, Cush and Seba are appointed for their ransom (Isa. 43:3)—the wilderness and deserts of the south into which they are to be brought for discipline, to fit them for settlement in the land of Israel (Ezek.

20:33–44). In reference to this crisis, the Spirit saith, “Remember ye not the former things, neither consider the things of old. Behold, I will do a new thing; now it shall spring forth; shall ye not know it? I will even make a way in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert. The beasts of the field shall honor me, the dragons and the owls; because I give waters in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert, to give drink to my people, my chosen. This people have I formed for myself; they shall show forth my praise” (Isa. 43:18–21).

This is all part of the work of the Rainbowed Angel, in which “Adon (the Lord) adds his hand to redeem a second time the remnant of his people which shall be left from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea” (Isa. 11:11). This is an area of wide extent, stretching from the Nile to the east of the Tigris; and thence north to the Caspian; and then westward to the Mediterranean, in and beyond which are the islands. It is not to be supposed, that such a revolution in the south of Asia and north of Africa, developing a new power of extraordinary might, could progress without making a powerful impression upon France, Turkey, and Russia, which are so sensitive in regard to their supposed interests in Egypt, the Red Sea, and the east. It will throw them all into a state of terrible belligerency. So great a danger will confederate them for a great effort to scatter it. All Europe will be moved; and “rush forth as a whirlwind to scatter me;” saith the Spirit: “their rejoicing was as to devour the poor in ambush” (Hab. 3:14): “they will ascend and come like a storm, and like a cloud to cover the land, that is (or that portion of it which is) brought back from the sword, and is gathered out of many people, who are dwelling safely in the midst of it (Ezek. 38:9, 8, 10, 12): under the protection of the Rainbowed Angel. The conquest of Egypt will, doubtless, operate powerfully upon England: for nothing can affect Egypt without greatly disturbing the policy of Britain, and deeply wounding her commercial interests. The Russo-Assyrian King of the north will have inflicted this injury upon England, previous to Yahweh riding into Egypt upon the swift rainbowed cloud. Hence, the invasion of Egypt, and the destruction of the power of the king of the north in Egypt, will, doubtless be rejoiced in by the British government; and may lead to an alliance between England, the modern Tyre, and the New Power, the common enemies of Gog and the Papacy, after the type of Hiram and Solomon, or of the Queen of Sheba, and the King of Israel. In this event, “her merchandise and her hire will be holiness to Yahweh: it shall not be treasured, nor laid up; for her merchandise shall be for them that dwell before Yahweh, to eat sufficiently, and for durable clothing” (Isa. 23:18). And in Psa. 45, which Paul endorses as a testimony for Jesus and his followers, the Spirit testifies, that in the day when, “his right hand shall teach him terrible things,” “the daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift; even the rich among the people shall intreat his favor” (verse 12); and again, “the kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents: and the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts” (Psa. 72:10); and “surely the isles shall wait for me, and the ships of Tarshish first, to bring thy sons from far, their silver and their gold with them unto the Name of Yahweh thine Elohim, and to the Holy One of Israel, because he hath glorified thee, O Zion” (Isa. 60:9).

These testimonies indicate a different relationship between the regenerators of Egypt, and the maritime power of the world, from that with the continental powers. These are fiercely hostile; while maritime Tyre, Tarshish, Sheba and Seba, are subservient to the angelic mission for the protection and regeneration of Israel. The riches of these countries, by some powerful influence in exercise at the time, are placed at the disposal of the saints, who become thereby complete masters of the sea. The present tendency of Britain to insulation is then perfected; and her destiny is identified with the New Power of the East. In this cooperation, she becomes “the land shadowing wide with wings, extending from beyond to rivers of Cush”—the Tigris and Euphrates; whose shadow shall be as the night in the midst of the noonday, for the hiding of the outcasts in the land of Moab (Isa. 18:1; 16:3–5). At this epoch, the land becomes prosperous—“a land of unwallled villages, whose inhabitants are at rest, and dwelling safely, all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates. The desolate places of central Palestine are then inhabited, by a gathering out of the nations, which has become wealthy in cattle and goods” (Ezek. 38:8, 11, 12).

But this prosperity becomes an irresistible temptation to the king of the north to invade the land, and if possible to annex it to his dominion bordering upon it, by Hamath, Armenia, and Assyria. “He will ascend like a storm, like a cloud to cover the land;” for “tidings out of the east, and out of the north shall trouble him: therefore he shall go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away many. And he shall pitch the tents of his entrenched camp between the seas,” the Mediterranean and sea of Tiberias, which will extend “to the mountain of the glory of the holy” (Dan. 11:44, 45). Thus all the nations of this northern confederacy are gathered by Yawheh against Jerusalem, after his descent to Sinai and before his own entrance into the city. He permits it to be taken, and rifled by the spoiler, and its inhabitants to be partly expelled and sent into exile (Zech. 14:2). Their hope would now seem to be lost, and themselves finally cut off from their parts (Ezek. 37:11). They had, doubtless, thought that the long expected rest had been established beyond the possibility of disturbance. They were at rest in the midst of the land; but the whole house of Israel was not there; and the nations were not yet acquainted with the omnipotence of “the Kings of the Sun’s risings.”

The land being covered with the northern hosts as with a cloud, the Russo-Assyrian Gog is the lord ascendant of the country, with none to dispute his authority, but “Edom, Moab, and the chief of the children of Ammon,” south and east of the Dead Sea, and the river Arnon. In this region, his power is contested. “Sheba and Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof,” protest against the invasion of the land, but without effect. Doubtless, he will feel too strong to be deterred from a grand solution of the Eastern Question in his own behalf. But “he shall be broken without hand:” the stone-power is near ready to fall upon him, and grind him to powder—the power of the kingdom embodied in the rainbow organization (Matt. 21:44; Dan. 2:45; 8:25). The northern Gog pays no respect to the young lions and merchants of Tarshish; but invades the country, and dominates it with an iron rule, as exemplified in the history of daemorial and idol worshipping Poland. The fate of this province of the papal empire was a punishment due to them as worshippers of the beast and his image; but the people “dwelling in the midst of the land,” in central Palestine, in peace and prosperity, belong to the Rainbowed Angel; and to invade and oppress them will not be tolerated: “for thus saith YAHWEH Tz’vaoth, after the glory,” manifested in the land, “hath he sent me unto the nations who spoiled you; for he that toucheth you toucheth the apple of his eye” (Zech. 2:8).

At this crisis, then, of extreme peril to the Jewish population of Palestine—of that “tenth” indicated in Isa. 6:13—“the fury of Adonai YAHWEH comes up into his face”—his eyes become as a flame of fire, and his countenance as the sun shining in his strength (Apoc. 1:14, 16; 10:1). He comes out of Egypt, as it is written, “Out of Egypt I called my son” (Hos. 11:1). This was true of “Israel my son, my first born” (Exod. 4:22), in the days of Moses; of the child Jesus, prophetically named Israel in Isa. 49:3, the Beloved Son of the Eternal Father, in the days of his infancy (Matt. 2:15); and it is also true of Israel in Egypt, and of the Rainbowed Angelic Son of Man, the Yahweh Name, their King, in the day when Gog, in the latter-years manifestation of the Little Horn of the Goat, the King of fierce countenance, “shall stand up against the Prince of princes” (Dan. 8:25). The Son of the Eternal Father in these several manifestations of Sonship, is called out of Egypt.

But affliction attends the Son more or less in Egypt. Sojourn in Egypt is because of distress in Canaan; and how can Israel sing for joy of heart in a strange land, while the land of their inheritance is trampled under foot of the spoiler! Hence the testimony, “I will bring them again also out of the land of Egypt, and gather them out of Assyria; and I will bring them into the land of Gilead and Lebanon, and place shall not be found for them. And he shall pass through the sea with affliction, and shall smite the waves of the sea, and all the deeps of the river (the Euphrates) shall dry up; and the pride of Assyria (of Gog) shall be brought down, and the sceptre of Egypt shall depart away” (Zech. 10:10).

In leaving Egypt, then, the Rainbowed Angel leads Israel out as a trembling bird (Hos. 11:11). He does not lead them by the Isthmus of Suez, but after the example of Moses and the angel, his prototype, he leads them to the seashore. “Was thy wrath against the sea,” saith the Spirit, “that thou didst ride upon thine horses (Apoc. 19:11, 14) thy chariots of salvation? Thou didst walk through the sea with thine horses, through the heap of great waters. When I heard,” says the prophet as representative of his people in the flesh, “my belly trembled; my lips quivered at the voice: rottenness entered into my bones, and I trembled in myself, that I might rest in the day of trouble”—that day so great that none is like it; even the time of Jacob’s trouble, out of which he shall be saved” (Jer. 30:7).

Having destroyed the tongue of the Egyptian sea, and brought Israel up again from its depths, the Rainbowed Angel leads them into the wilderness of Paran. Habakkuk sees him here in great power and indignation; for “before him goes the pestilence, and burning coals from his feet,” apocalyptically styled, “pillars of fire.”

“He beheld,” when he came from mount Paran, and “rose up from mount Seir unto them.” “Adonai YAHWEH (He who shall be lord) shall blow the trumpet, and shall go forth with whirlwinds of the south” (Zech. 9:14). “He shall march through the land in indignation, and thresh the nations in anger” (Hab. 3:12). In this march, he arrives at Bozrah in Edom, where his presence confronts the forces of the Russo-Assyrian king; “and all the men that are upon the face of the land shake at his presence.” He causes them to turn their swords against one another. He smites every horse with terror and blindness, and his rider with madness (Zech. 12:4). He pleads against them with pestilence and with blood; and rains upon him and upon his bands, and upon the many people that are with him, an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire, and brimstone (Ezek. 38:22).

This is the crisis which fairly inaugurates “the war of that great day of the all-powerful Deity” in the field of Armageddon (Apoc. 16:14, 16); “the great winepress of the wrath of Deity” (ch. 14:19). Israel under the leadership of the Rainbowed Angel on the one side; and the Powers that be, upon the other, are the belligerents in this war. In the overthrow of the enemy at Bozrah, however, Israel after the flesh had no part. The breaking in pieces of the oppressor in Idumea, in this day of “Yahweh’s vengeance, and year of recompences for the controversy of Zion” (Isa. 34:8); is the glory of the Rainbowed Angel alone. “I have trodden the winepress alone,” saith the Spirit; “and of the people there was none with me: for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment. For the day of vengeance is in my heart, and the year of my redeemed is come” (Isa. 63:3). By this treading of the winepress, the Rainbowed Angel magnifies and sanctifies himself; and is known in the eyes of those many nations confederate with the king of the north, who come to know that he is YAHWEH (Ezek. 38:23).

“YAHWEH is known by the judgment he executeth” (Psa. 9:16). This New Power of Southern Asia is known to be theocratic, as was that of Joshua and his hosts by the Canaanites, when the walls of Jericho fell at the sounding of Israel’s trumpets the seventh and last time. The treading of the winepress in its initiation at Bozrah is accompanied with a great shaking in the land of Israel, by which mountains are overturned, and towers fall, and all walls are prostrated (Ezek. 38:20); for it is “the day of the great slaughter when the towers fall;” when “Yahweh causes his glorious voice to be heard, and shows the lighting down of his arm, with the indignation of his anger, and with the flame of a devoting fire, with scattering and tempest, and hailstones; for through the voice of Yahweh shall the Assyrian be beaten down, who smote with a rod” (Isa. 30:25, 30).

But the Rainbowed Angel’s pedal pillars of fire may not halt long at Bozrah. Isaiah in vision saw him “coming from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah;” and describes him as “glorious in his apparel, and travelling in the greatness of his strength” (ch. 63:1). John’s rainbowed angel is symbolical of this traveller, who proclaims himself “mighty to save;” and powerful to tread down the peoples in his anger, and to make them drunk in his fury, and to bring down their strength to the earth—verse 6. The mutual slaughter of the enemy, the sword called for against him throughout all the mountains of Israel, and the pestilence, make his overthrow coextensive with the land. It reduces the invading hosts to only one sixth of their original force; as it is written, “I will turn thee back, and leave but the sixth part of thee” (Ezek. 39:2, 4). This wreck of the invading force falls back upon Assyria, to which the war is transferred from the Holy Land. A great and marvellous change comes over this country politically, socially, and physically. The peace so long and earnestly prayed for (Psa. 122, 125, 128), and promised (Psa. 72:3, 7; 85:8, 10; Isa. 9:6, 7; 26:12; 32:17; 54:13; 66:12; Ezek. 34:25), is at length established; so that “from this day forward” (Ezek. 39:22) there will be no more war in the land of Israel for a thousand years; and the house of Israel will come to know that the ETERNAL SPIRIT is Yahweh their Elohim, manifested in the Lord Jesus Christ and his Brethren, symbolized by the Rainbowed Angel of the Rainbowed Throne.

There is reason to believe, that from the Idumaeen Bozrah the Rainbowed Angel advances to the plains of Moab; and compassing the north end of the Dead sea, crosses the Jordan into the plains of Jericho, according to the signification of the things represented in the passage of that river in the days of Joshua. According to Hosea, Israel is allured and brought into the wilderness (of Paran). From thence, Solomon sees them coming up from the wilderness leaning for support upon the beloved (Cant. 8:5); “coming out of the wilderness like pillars of smoke”—3:6. “I will bring her into the wilderness,” saith the Spirit, “and I will give her vineyards from thence, and the Valley of Achor for a door of hope: and she (Hephzibah and Beulah, with their inhabitants, the Messiah’s national bride—Isa. 62:4, 5, 12) shall sing there, as in the days of her youth (the days of Joshua), and as in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt” (Hos. 2:14, 15). The Valley of Achor near Jericho, is “a door of hope;” when the Rainbowed Angel has led Israel to this encampment, it is only the earnest of the restoration of “the whole house of Israel.” He has overthrown the king of the north throughout the land. The country has been evacuated; but the national graves of Israel have not yet been opened. They had been gathered “one by one” into the wilderness of Egypt; yet multitudes continued in the Assyrian empire, ready to perish, especially, too, since the overthrow of the Assyrian upon the mountains of Israel (Isa. 27:12, 13; 14:25). The van only of Israel’s hosts had entered the door under the rainbow-banner; but from the plains of Jericho they looked in hope, sure and certain, of “the restitution of all things which the Deity hath spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets, ap aionos,” from the beginning of the Mosaic dispensation (Acts 3:21).

From the Valley of Achor, the Rainbowed Angel advances westward. The redemption of Zion is unaccomplished until the Angel of the Covenant establishes Yahweh’s throne in Jerusalem; that as the Spirit has testified, “they may call Jerusalem the throne of Yahweh” (Jer. 3:17). His face is, therefore, Zion-ward, and he takes up his line of march in that direction, until he stands with “his pillars of fire” upon the Mount of Olives, which is before Jerusalem upon the east. In the great shaking which threw down mountains, towers, and walls, the mount trembled at the presence of Deity in the land; and divided asunder in the midst, leaving a very great valley between the halves of the mountain removed to the north and south. The people will be panic-stricken, and flee as they fled before the earthquake in the days of Uzziah king of Judah. After this, the Pillars of Fire appear upon the mount, and in view of “the City of the Great King.”

But the remnant in the city know not that YAHWEH Elohim Tz’vaoth has returned to the mountain, whence, in the time of Ezekiel (ch. 11:23) and in the days of the apostles (Acts 1:11) he had taken his departure. The prediction of Ezek. 43:2, is now fulfilled, that “the glory of the Elohim of Israel came from the way of the east; and his voice was like the noise of many waters; and the earth shined with his glory.” This was the Rainbowed Angel from the Valley of Achor, “the way of the east.” The common idea is, that the Lord Jesus is to make a perpendicular descent, and to touch the earth for the first time upon Mount Olivet. The text in Acts 1:11, is cited to prove it. But this says nothing about the place he should first descend to; but only that he should come again; and that he should come again “in like manner” as he departed. This was verified in his descent to Sinai; and, as we have seen, he arrived at the place of his departure, “travelling in his strength” “from the way of the east.”

But the gates of the city before him are closed. He had said to them in the days of his flesh, “Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, ‘Blessed is he who cometh in the name of Yahweh’” (Matt. 23:39). That crisis has now arrived; and he sends his heralds of the rainbow to demand admission into the city for the king of glory. Approaching the gates, they exclaim, “Lift up, O gates, your heads; and be ye lifted up, ye doors of the future age (olahm), and the King of glory shall come in!” But not knowing who he is, they inquire from within the city. “Who is this King of glory?” to which his heralds reply, “YAHWEH strong and mighty; Yahweh mighty from war: lift up, O gates, your heads, and lift up, O doors of the future age, and the King of the glory will come in!” But, the porters and sentinels still hesitate; and, as if to gain time for deliberation, or in expectation of further information, they repeat the inquiry, “Who is He this King of the glory?” They are then further informed, that “YAHWEH Tz’vaoth He is the King of the glory,” so amply revealed in the prophets (Psa. 24:7–10).

This conference at the gates of Jerusalem will, doubtless, result in the opening wide the entrances to its interior. Then the strong and mighty one attended by his multitude will descend from Olivet, and enter the gates of Zion amidst the rejoicings of his retinue, crying, “Hosanna to the Son of David; Blessed is he that cometh in the Name of Yahweh; Hosanna in the highest!” Of course, all the city will be moved, and say, “Who is this?” This question will be answered in a solemn assembly of the notables of the city. One will then put the inquiry in the form, “What are these wounds in thy hands?” the reply to which will reveal the crucified Nazarene to his astounded inquisitors—“The wounds with which I was wounded in the house of my friends” (Zech. 13:6). Thus, after an absence of over eighteen hundred years, the King of the Jews proves his identity to his subjects, as he had before proved it to the apostle Thomas; and, after the representation in the case of Joseph (the type of the Shepherd and Stone of Israel—Gen. 49:24), he makes himself known to his brethren according to the flesh in his appearance before them the second time. Upon this a like result ensues: “They look upon him whom they pierced, and mourn because of him as one mourns for an only son.... In that day there shall be a great mourning in Jerusalem as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon (Armageddon)” (Zech. 12:10). This national repentance results in the salvation of the tents of Judah, whose sin and uncleanness is covered and cleansed (verse 7; 13:1); and henceforth they rejoice in the Son of David as their king. Such is the development in relation to Judah of Apoc. 1:7: “Behold he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, even they who pierced him; and all the kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Even so, Amen.”

The seven months ensuing “the great slaughter” will be occupied in burying the dead that the land may be cleansed (Ezek. 39:11–16). This, however, does not interrupt the prosecution of the war. The Bethlehem-born Judge of Israel being duly installed upon the throne of his father David as king over the little mustard seed like kingdom of Judah (Matt. 13:31, 32), invades the land of Assyria, and the land of Nimrod, and wastes them with the sword. Thus, he will not only deliver Judah from the Assyrian when he cometh into their land, and treadeth within her borders; but the Rainbowed Angel will also take away the dominion of the first three beasts of Daniel—ch. 7:12. But, though deprived of dominion, they will still exist as national organizations; for “their lives shall be prolonged for a season and a time,” or a thousand years. Their kingdoms will become the Rainbowed Angel’s, and they will be blessed in the new administration of their affairs. While Yahweh inherits Judah his portion in the Holy Land, and dwells in the midst of Zion, these nations are joined to him, and become his people (Zech. 2:10, 12). The regeneration of Egypt, Israel, and Assyria becomes complete. His right hand is established in the rivers, and his left in the sea; and he is already higher than the kings of the earth (Psa. 89:25–27): and by his prowess he has changed the face of the east, having wrested those fair and luxuriant countries from the destroyer; and made the land that was desolate, the enchanting Paradise of God (Ezek. 36:35; Isa. 51:3). “In that day there shall be a highway out of Egypt to Assyria, and the Assyrian shall come into Egypt, and the Egyptian into Assyria, and the Egyptians shall serve with the Assyrians. In that day shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, a blessing in the midst of the land, whom Yahweh T'zvaoth shall bless, saying, Blessed be Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance” (Isa. 19:23–25).

But the vindication, or avengement, of the Holy Land (Dan. 8:14—we-nitzdaik kodesh) and the conquest and regeneration of Egypt and Assyria, do not consummate the work of the Rainbowed Angel; they only serve to “place his right foot upon the sea;” and to prepare him for setting “his left upon the earth.” He has conquered the lion, the bear, and leopard: he has taken away their dominion, and placed them under his own: but there still remains that “dreadful, and terrible, and exceedingly strong fourth beast,” which came up out of the same sea as the others. This is not simply to lose his dominion, and yet continue as a body politic to exist like the others “for a season and a time.” The contrary of this, would be the continuance of the European commonwealth as now constituted in church and state, but without human government, for a thousand years. This however, can never be. The decree of heaven has long been on record for its utter and total destruction. The decree is this: “Because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake; I beheld till the beast was slain and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame” (Dan. 7:11). This is the grand catastrophe of the apocalypse—the slaying of the Latin Catholic Beast, and the destroying of its body politic by the Rainbowed Angel—by the Spirit manifested in the saints. His “pillars of fire” march through the countries of Europe with the destruction of a “burning flame;” the result of which is “judging among the nations, filling their countries with dead bodies, and the bruising of the Head over an extensive region” (Psa. 110:6).

This exposition, then, of “the mystery of the Deity as he hath declared the glad tidings to his servants the prophets,” defines the position of the Rainbowed Angel; and brings him up before us as a colossus prepared to stride the world. By his right foot being placed upon the sea, it plants his left foot, of course, upon daemonial and idol worshipping Spain, brings before him all the countries of the Latin and Greek churches, as Spain, France, Belgium, Holland, Britain and Ireland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Russia, Prussia, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Italy, the Pope’s temporality, Turkey, and Greece. In this enumeration there are protestant countries; but they all belong to the Fourth Beast dominion, being ‘the Harlots and Abominations of the earth’ which all acknowledge the Church of Rome as their common “mother”—“the Mother of all the Churches.”

Such is the commonwealth or body politic to be destroyed root and branch, by the saints when judgment is given to them, and they proceed to “prophesy before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings” (ch. 10:11). Then will the high praises of AIL (the Eternal Power—THE FATHER) be in their mouths; and “a two-edged sword in their hand; to execute vengeance upon the nations, and punishments upon the peoples; to bind their kings with chains, and their honorable ones with fetters of iron: to execute upon them the judgment written: this honor have all his saints. Praise ye YAH” (Psa. 149:6–9).

7. THE ROARING OF THE ANGEL

These are “the labors” to be performed by the Rainbowed Angel before he can “rest” (Apoc. 14:13). But, before he advances against the daemonial and idol worshippers of “Christendom” so called, “he cries with a loud voice as when a lion roars.” Being “the lion of the tribe of Judah,” his proclamations are the roarings of that lion; and the carrying of them into effect, is the noise of the roaring (Ezek. 19:1–9). Before the noise of his roaring lays waste their cities, and desolates their land and the fulness thereof, he is still awaiting the result of his manifesto to the nations of the west. Enthroned in Jerusalem his dwelling-place, he is fearless of attack. “I will be still,” says the Spirit: “yet in my dwelling-place I will be without fear—as dry heat impending lightning, as a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest” (Isa. 18:4). Such will be the condition of the political aerial, styled in Apoc. 16:17, “the air,” at the crisis when “the lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and earthquakes, and great hail” (ch. 11:19; 4:5) shall be about to rend the heavens, shake the earth, and beat down the corrupters of the world. During this ominous sultriness, and portentous calm, the strong lion of Judah “sends of those who have escaped” “the whirlwinds of the south,” of the saved remnant of Judah, “to the nations Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, sounders of the truth, to Tubal, and Javan, and the isles afar off, that have not heard his fame, nor seen his glory; and they shall declare the glory” of which he is the king, “among the nations” (Isa. 66:19). But, they will not only declare his glory throughout the west; they will also make known the aion-evangile, the good news concerning the millennial cycle, soon to commence in all its blessedness; and with a loud voice throughout the aerial, styled “mid-heaven,” invite mankind to “fear the Deity, and give glory to him, because the hour of his judgment,” which is to destroy the catholic and protestant constitution of things, “has come” (Apoc. 14:6, 7).

But this proclamation will not be complied with by the governments of the catholic world at least. They will “prepare war, and wake up their mighty men.” The ten horn-royalties of the European Commonwealth will make war with the Lamb, and contend with him in battle (Apoc. 17:14; 19:15). Foreseeing this issue the Rainbow Angel will roar out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem; and go forth as a MIGHTY MAN, and stir up jealousy as a man of war. He will cry, yea, roar; he shall prevail against his enemies. “I have,” saith he, “holden my peace maiolahm, from the (conclusion of the Mosaic) cycle; I have been still, and refrained myself: now I will cry like a travailing woman; I will destroy and devour at once. I will make waste mountains and hills, and dry up all their herbs, and I will make rivers dry deserts, and I will dry up the pools” (Isa. 42:13–15). This testimony shows the import of the action expressed in the phrase “as a lion roareth.” In the fearful conflict that ensues “he causes the nations to tremble, and the mountains of antiquity to be scattered, and the hills of the cycle to be bowed down: the goings of the cycle are his. He threshes the nations in his anger” (Hab. 3:6, 12). That great day is the great and terrible day of Yahweh. It is the day of the seven thunders when they utter their voices, in the midst of whose echoes, Babylon falls; and those who worship the beast and his image, and have the mark on their forehead, or on their hand, are tormented with fire and sulphur “in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb;” that is, in the presence of the Rainbow Angel.

When these aerial reverberations shall have died away, and calm shall be restored to the trembling heavens, and the quaking earth, “the labors of the saints” will be finished, and they will enter into the rest, or sabbatism, that remains for the people of the Deity. There will then be found nothing answering to the image of Nebuchadnezzar; nor to the Fourth Beast of Daniel. They will have become “like the chaff of the summer threshing floors, carried away by the tempest; so that no place is found for them.” The judgments of the seventh vial are exhausted; “for the Lamb has conquered;” and executed all the bitternesses of the little scroll. There is now no longer any Papacy to stultify humanity; all names and denominations are abolished, and all the political hills and mountains, or Gentile, imperial, regal, and republican states, that upheld them, are overthrown. A glorious consummation is this! The Laodicean Apostasy is destroyed; and all Europe delivered from the immense mass of ignorance and superstition that bewilders and demoralizes its catholic and protestant populations. No longer will it be possible for spiritual pretenders, and political knaves to mislead them for their own glorification and aggrandizement. This will be among the occupations gone. Clergy and ministerial craft will be ruined; and men will practise it, as sorcerers spiritualism under the Mosaic law, at the hazard of their lives. For “it shall come to pass when any shall yet prophesy (for, in modern phraseology preach) then his father and his mother that begat him shall say unto him, Thou shalt not live; for thou speakest lies in the name of Yahweh: and his father and his mother that begat him shall thrust him through when he prophesieth. And it shall come to pass in that day, that the prophet (clergy and parsons of all grades and classes) shall be ashamed every one of his vision when he hath prophesied: neither shall they wear a rough garment (or professional garb) to deceive,” or impose upon the ignorant (Zech. 13:3, 4). For the nations conquered by the Lamb and those cooperating with him, who are called, and chosen, and faithful (Apoc. 17:14) are also enlightened by them; for “the earth is lightened by the glory of the Rainbow Angel” (ch. 18:1). And under the influence of this light, “many peoples will go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of Yahweh, to the house of the Elohim of Jacob; and HE will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths; for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of Yahweh from Jerusalem” (Isa. 2:3). Thus of a free and willing mind “the Gentiles will come from the ends of the earth, and shall say, Surely our fathers have inherited lies, vanities, and things in which there is no profit” (Jer. 16:19). Such will be the judgment of posterity upon the spiritual wisdom of their ancestors. The creeds, articles, and confessions of faith which are now cherished with so much zeal, will be pronounced by a succeeding generation mere lies and unprofitable vanities. And so they are. They can teach no man the way of salvation; and therefore they are mere “vanities;” and they teach what is either not true, or they nullify the truth; so that they are neither more nor less than “lies.” These lies and unprofitable vanities, which constitute the poisonous elements of that “strong delusion,” which Paul predicted the Deity would send upon the professors of christianity “that they should believe the lie,” as a punishment for their “not receiving the love of the truth to the end that they might be saved” (2 Thess. 2:10, 11) these false teachings will all have been suppressed by the victorious heroes of the covenant, who will have “turned to the people a pure language;” and have taught them all to “call upon the name of Yahweh, and to serve him with one consent” (Zeph. 3:9). What an extraordinary and unparalleled revolution will this be among the nations of the earth! Catholic, Protestant, Sectarian, Mohammedan, and Pagan, all without exception freed from their special ignorances and blasphemies, and meeting together unanimously in peace and concord; indignant at the old fooleries imposed upon them by their pious predecessors; enlightened in the truth; delivered from the crippling tyranny of thieves and robbers in church and state; and blessed in Abraham and his seed; whom all nations, though conquered by them, joyfully proclaim to be the blessed (Psa. 72:17–19). The sea upon which the Rainbow Angel stands in ch. 15:2, will no longer be mingled with fire. It will cease to be troubled with unrest, casting up only mire and dirt (Isa. 57:20); but will have subsided into a calm which no storms nor tempests will disturb for a thousand years. It will be a glassy sea like to crystal before the throne (ch. 4:6); the beast with seven heads and ten horns will have been exterminated from its waters (ch. 13:1); and it will have become transparent, and affording in every part transmission to the glorious, illuminating, and healing beams of the Sun of Righteousness, whose enlightening influence will pervade the earth to the dispersion of all darkness in its utmost comers, and profound depths. The present dead sea of nations will be filled with the choicest fish; fished by those incomparable “fishers of men,” the companions of Deity in flesh (Matt. 13:47, 48; 4:19). Upon this bright blue sea, purified by commingled fire from the colossal feet of the Rainbow Angel, the victorious saints will stand with the harps of the Deity. Each one will himself be a living harp, a living embodiment of melody and song. And such music will ascend as no concert of earth-borns has executed, and no inventor has composed before. This rainbowed multitude, in throng which no man can number, will sing what none besides themselves can sing—the great song of their redemption and triumph (ch. 5:9, 10; 14:3; 15:3, 4). Victory crowns their labours, and they rest in a strong and peaceful reign of a thousand years (ch. 20:6).

8. THE NEW WORLD AND THE ANGEL OF THE BOW

The destruction of the fourth beast of Daniel by the Rainbowed Angel's pillars of fire will be the dissolution of the European commonwealth. When the old world hath fallen thus, what will be the destiny of the new? Will it escape "the burning flame?" and, when "the kingdoms of the old world become the kingdoms of Yahweh and of his Anointed," will the colonial and republican institutions of the American continent remain intact? Why should they so remain? American society is but an extension of European. Their civil and spiritual institutions are identical; their superstitions and blasphemies as God-dishonoring, word-nullifying, and perverse of "his way." The earth is as corrupt as in the days of Noah; "for all flesh," in both hemispheres, "have corrupted his way upon the earth" (Gen. 6:11, 12). It is only necessary to understand the way of salvation as taught by the apostles to see this. Seeing, then, that the Deity swept into the abyss the whole human family except Noah and his house for this crime, why should not the American world be punished, being guilty of the same iniquity? There is every reason to conclude that judgment will fall upon it with great severity. Its idolatry of self is God-defiant; and it needs to be taught that there is One almightier than the dollar, and stronger than the human will.

There is no symbolical revelation of events to be developed upon the American arena; there are, however, general declarations, which show what must of necessity be developed in the course of the Rainbowed Angel's mission upon this continent from one end of it to the other. Thus, the principle is oracular, that "ALL nations shall come and worship before the all-powerful Yahweh Elohim;" and that "they will learn righteousness." This necessitates instructors, and a system of instruction, such as does not exist on earth at this time—an enlightening power no less than divine. It also requires a disposition, a child-like disposition, which exists not in the public mind, neither in the ignorant people, nor in their blind and conceited guides. To correct this fatal evil, and to break the power of ignorance, which is "the power of Satan," the angelic "pillars of fire" must march through the land; for it is written, "When the judgments of Yahweh are in the earth the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness" (Isa. 26:9; Apoc. 15:4).

And when they have learned this lesson, so difficult for individuals and nations, their lofty looks will be humbled, and their haughtiness will be bowed down, and Yahweh alone will be exalted (Isa. 2:10, 11). British and American pride will be prostrate in the dust; and "the people the source of all power," an exploded fiction of the past. "In that day, Yahweh alone shall be exalted." Popular sovereignty will be a dead putrescent carcase; and all who derive their power and authority from it will be abased. Such a consummation as this, and so devoutly to be wished, can only be developed by Omnipotence—by the powerful angel of the covenant. The fate of the old world must necessarily be the fate of this whole American continent; for it is written of the Spirit, saying to the Son of David, "I will give thee the nations for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession" (Psa. 2:8). This is certainly comprehensive of the western hemisphere. The Eternal Spirit gives this to the Rainbowed Angel in fee. All power and authority here must, therefore, be derived from him, not from the people; and in these there will be no democracy or republicanism, but divine and imperial despotism, pure and simple; for "he shall rule the nations with a rod of iron" (Psa. 2:9; Apoc. 19:15; 2:26–27); "and Yahweh shall be king over all the earth; in that day there shall be one Yahweh, and his name one" (Zech. 14:9). This is conclusive. No one believing the scripture can respect the traditions of Americanism. The Monroe doctrine and the millennial perpetuity of the Union, will be a derision to the cloud-invested angel, as they are now to all who have "the patience of the saints," "the commandments of the Deity, and the faith of Jesus” (Apoc. 14:12). All the States of the new world will be taken possession of by them; for “the kingdom, and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole of the heavens is given to the people of the saints of the Most High Ones.... and all dominions shall serve and obey him” (Dan. 7:27). It is manifest, therefore, that the destiny of all colonies, and republics, and empires, upon the American arena, has long since been decreed; and that destiny is unquestionably glorious and blessed—that of being delivered by judicial power from the debasing tyranny under which they now groan; and of becoming the flourishing and happy provinces of an imperial dominion, coextensive with the globe, under which life, liberty, and property, will be secure; “mercy and truth meet together, and righteousness and peace embrace each other;” and “glory will be to the Deity in the highest heavens, over the earth peace, and goodwill among men” (Psa. 85:10; Luke 2:14). “Hitherto is the end of the matter” (Dan. 7:28). The wars of the Angel of the Bow culminate in the conquest of a peace, which extinguishes all belligerent conflagration in the earth for a thousand years.

9. THE ANGEL RESTS FROM HIS LABORS

Synchronical with this “end of the matter” is the blessedness of the dead in “rest from their labors.” The end of the Exodus from Egypt, and the destruction of the fourth beast in all its relations, domestic and foreign, being now attained by their almighty prowess, the end of Micah’s 40 years is duly arrived at. It is, therefore, written by command of a voice from the heaven, newly planted and firmly established (Isa. 51:16): “Blessed at this time are the dead who die in the Lord. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors: and their works HE goes with them” (Apoc. 14:13). This is the time for the righteous dead, who have been caused to spring out of the earth, and afterwards been quickened by Christ who is their life, to be blessed in the Millennial Sabbatism. The millennial rest cannot be enjoyed by the called, and chosen, and faithful saints so long as the fourth beast ecclesiasticism is undestroyed. The Lion-Mouth of this system of ignorance and imposition “speaks great things and blasphemies,” by which the Deity is blasphemed in “blaspheming his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in the heaven” (Apoc. 13:5, 6). The saints, though resurrected and immortalized, can have no rest while this, their old enemy, who, in the days of their flesh, made war upon them and overcame them (ver. 7; 11:7; Dan. 7:21), remains unconquered and undestroyed. When this is compassed their rest is attained. At this time, aparti, or, from now; the now beginning at this consummation of their works. They had “died in the Lord,” which they only do when they die who believed the glad tidings of the kingdom of the Deity and name of Jesus Christ, and are subsequently immersed; they had been caused to spring forth from the earth; they had been judged; and, by quickening, had been organized into the cloud-invested angel of the covenant, or bow; and following the Lamb whithersoever he went, in all his wars, had conquered three of Daniel’s beasts, and destroyed the fourth; and, in so doing, had delivered and regenerated the twelve tribes of Israel, restored all things, and abolished the superstition of the world. These are their works, the works of Jesus and his Brethren, and the consummation of them, which brings to them rest for “a season and a time.”

But, in the text before us, we are given to understand that Jesus and his Brethren did not do all these wonderful and mighty works by their own independent and inherent power. In the days of his flesh, Jesus said to the Jews, “I can of my own self do nothing;” and again, “Verily, verily, I say unto you, The Son can do nothing of himself ... but what things soever the Father doeth, these also doeth the Son likewise” (John 5:19, 30); and “the Father who dwelleth in me he doeth the works” (John 14:10). This doctrine is incorporated in the apocalyptic symbolography. It is true in regard to all the works of that remarkable prophecy. It is the Father, the Eternal Power, the Spirit, who doeth the works: as he said to Zechariah, “Not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith YAHWEH Tz’vaoth” (ch. 4:6). Of their own selves Jesus and his Brethren can do nothing. Their almightiness is of the Father-Spirit, “Whithersoever the Spirit was to go they went” (Ezek. 1:12, 20); and where they went, there the Spirit of their Father worked. Hence the peculiarity of the sentence, ta de erga auton akolouthēi met’ auton—“and their works He goes with them.” He attends upon them as akolouthos, a camp-follower. He is present in all their encampments; and all the defeats they give their enemies is by his power. How could it be otherwise? For, having been begotten and born of the Spirit, they are as much Spirit as that which has been begotten and born of the flesh is flesh (John 3:6). Therefore, what they do must of necessity be done by the Spirit—“he goes with them;” and “their works,” the works of the Angel of the Covenant, signified in his roaring, in the little scroll, and in the seven thunders, He does with almighty and invincible power.

10. THE SEVEN THUNDERS

Apocalyptic thunder is significant of War. Seven thunders are either so many distinct wars; or, they are war of complete and intense severity; or the wars are styled seven thunders, because they are the thunderings of the Seven Spirits of the Deity sent forth from before the throne into all the earth (Apoc. 4:5; 5:6). This, I believe is the correct definition. If the spirits of the Deity had been eight instead of seven, it would have changed the arrangement of the whole prophecy. There would then have been eight apocalyptic epistles to eight ecclesias, eight seals, eight trumpets, eight vials, and eight thunders. But seven is the Divine Number of the Spirit; and, therefore, all these are numbered sevenfold; and the Spirit is symbolized by “seven horns and seven eyes,” as significative of omnipotence and omniscience. The Rainbowd Angel is the Seven Spirits incorporate in Jesus and his Brethren going forth in their wars into all the earth. Hence the connection between the lion-roar of his voice and the voices of the seven thunders—“And he cried with a loud voice as when a lion roareth; and when he cried, the Seven Thunders uttered their voices.” If the angel had not crashed forth his voice, there would have been no thunderings reverberating their echoes through the aerial of the Sin-Powers of the world. The thunders are, therefore, the echoes of the voice of the Allpowerful and Omniscient Seven. They are the wars of the Saints in the execution of “the judgment written,” and “given to them;” and waged against Babylon and the apocalyptic beasts in what remains of the sixth vial after the return of Christ, and in all the seventh, until the wrath of Deity is filled up, and the smoke from his glory and power no longer prevents an entrance into the nave (Apoc. 15:8).

“And when,” says John, “the seven thunders had uttered their voices, I was about to write.” The voices of these thunders imported the things to be transacted in the wars. When John heard the revelation of them, he was about to make a record of them for the information of the servants of the Deity; but this he was forbidden to do by a voice from the heaven, saying, “Seal up those things which the seven thunders uttered, and write them not.” This shows that the voices of the thunders were their utterances; and that these were things expressed in words that could be intelligibly recorded. To seal up is to conceal; and to conceal what he had heard them say, was to obey the command, “Write them not.” When the time of the thunderings from the rainbowd throne arrives, the things they uttered will be unsealed. The unsealing of them will be the practical development of them in the execution of the judgments by the saints in the time of the end. This also will be the unclosing and unsealing of the words and the book which Daniel was commanded to shut up and seal till the time of the end (ch. 12:4, 9); and this unclosing and unsealing in that time is symbolized by the little open scroll in the angel’s hand. As the apocalypse is a revelation for the sealed servants of the Deity alone, it was deemed inexpedient to write in detail the things in which they would be practically engaged. The apocalypse is not for their enemies; hence the universal failure of all their attempts to expound it. To these, the prophesyings of the thunders were to be impenetrable. They were not to be permitted even to read them; therefore, the Spirit said, "Write them not." Thus, they can only be read in the history of "the terrible doings of the Elohim toward the children of men," in bringing them to submit themselves to the glorious majesty of the kingdom (Psa. 66:3–7). The utterances of the thunders will be written upon the historic page by the valiant and mighty deeds of all the saints. This is the only record of them the world will be permitted to inspect.

11. THE ANGEL'S OATH

The oath is the protestation of the saints-spirit swearing by Spirit—by the all-creating Spirit—concerning the termination of the times attested in the oath of the Spirit in the hearing of Daniel 12:7. This prophet saw in vision a man clothed in linen, standing upon the waters; and John saw a man clothed with a multitudinous cloud, standing upon the sea. They both have their feet upon the waters; which imports that the peoples shall be subject to them whom they represent. Daniel heard the question put to the linen-invested man, "How long to the end of these wonders?" This elicited an oath from him with uplifted hands to heaven, in which he declared by THE LIVING ONE OF THE FUTURE AGE, b'khai ha-olahm (ho zon eis tous aionas ton aionon), that it should be "for a time, times, and a half:" that is, that the ending of the wonders should be synchronical with the end of that cycle of time. In this oath he declared the duration of the wonders, but not the beginning of the period. The duration expressed in figures is 1260 years. Daniel did not hear when they began; but he was informed of a certain event that would characterize their terminal epoch—the concentration of the power of the holy people. So long as the twelve tribes of Israel remain scattered among the nations, their power is scattered. It will occupy forty years after the Rainbowed Multitude commence their labors before they will have established the twelve tribes in the Holy Land, an independent, glorious, and powerful kingdom, under David II., their King and Prince for the future age (Ezek. 37:21–28). When this is accomplished, the multitudinous angel of the covenant will have "accomplished, to scatter the power of the holy people;" which is the same as to cease to scatter it, or equivalent to restitution in the era of Israel's regeneration (Matt. 19:28). The development of this work will be terminal with 1260, which ought to be a jubilee year, in which every Israelite of that generation shall return to his possessions (Lev. 25:10). Be this as it may, this 1260 will not end so long as "the whole house of Israel" is helplessly trodden under foot of the Gentile governments. It must be restored "as in the days of old" (Amos 9:11–15; Acts 15:16); and then the wonders revealed to Daniel will have been fully developed. Thus he heard, "but," says he, "I understood not;" he then inquired about the end of these times, saying, "O my lord, what the end of these?"—of "the time, times, and a half?" But, the only additional premises supplied was the coeval termination of 1335 years; when his lot or inheritance, should be developed, as the result of wonders elaborated during 40 subsequent years; and he should stand in it.

Such was the scanty information vouchsafed to Daniel 2400 years ago. The times, however, still remained incomprehensible to him. He was like other prophets "who inquired and searched diligently searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of the Christ that was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of the Christ, and the glory that should follow. Unto whom it was revealed, that not for themselves, but for us they did minister the things which are now reported unto you by them (the apostles) who have preached the gospel unto you with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven; which things the angels desire to look into" (1 Pet. 1:11, 12). He might have been told, that the times, or 1260 years, when the glory should follow, would end in a certain year of the world's age. This would have been very gratifying to his curiosity and to ours; but such information was not granted to any "until the time of the end." He was therefore commanded to go his way, which is the way of all the earth. He was to die in ignorance of the year of the world's age when the 1260 should terminate; but he is to rise again in the time of the end, and to become one of the cloud with which the Spirit will then be invested. Then the words will be no longer closed and sealed. He will himself be engaged in the work of unclosing and unsealing in the time of the end, when "the mystery of the Deity will be finished," and fully "opened" to his view.

But, six hundred and thirty-eight years after Daniel went his way (he died in the first year of Cyrus' sole reign, B.C. 540; which was the third from the capture of Babylon, and the death of Lucifer—Dan. 1:21; 10:1; Isa. 14:12; Dan. 5:30), John was favored with a vision of the same man seen by Daniel, only instead of seeing him clothed with linen at the time, he saw him "clothed with a cloud." He had to communicate with John upon the same subject he had been treating of with Daniel—upon the "How long to the end of the wonders?" In effect, he swore by Him who lives for the Millennial Future, that when he should stand upon the sea and upon the earth, chronos ouk estai eti—Time should be no longer; that is, "the time, times, and a half" should expire; therefore, he adds, "But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall sound, otan melle salpiseion, the Mystery of the Deity should also be finished, as he hath declared the good news, hos enaggelise, to his servants the prophets" (ch. 10:6, 7). The time, concerning which Daniel inquired, saying: "What the end of these times?" is to continue "no longer" than the sounding of the seventh and last trumpet. When this shall sound, the 1260 time of Dan. 12:7 will all be in the past—this time will be longer; but will be superseded by another "manner of time," commonly styled, "The Millennium;" by Daniel hah-olahm; and by John, as in verse 6, hoi aiones ton aionon, the cycles of the cycles, which constitute YAHWEH'S TIMES, or the future age (Isa. 33:5, 6).

Such is the angel's oath. It is to be remarked, that he did not swear, that the 1260 time should be no longer than when the seventh angel should begin to sound, as rendered in the English Version; but "when he shall sound," which sounding will occupy "days;" for he said, "in the days of the voice." This indicates an indefinite continuance of the voice; indefinite as far as the words of the oath are concerned. In the days of sounding, neither at the beginning, nor in the middle, of the sounding; but when the sounding shall be progressing, the mystery shall be finished. The sixth trumpet ended with "the remnant giving glory to the Deity of the heaven" (Apoc. 11:13); which was nationally proclaimed MAY 7, A.D. 1794. Since that event the seventh angel has been sounding. He is sounding his trumpet at the present time. It is "the third woe," in the development of which, direful calamities befall the catholic and protestant "worshippers of the daemonials and idols," not expressly detailed. This American woe, which afflicts the old and new worlds, is, doubtless, an unwritten calamity of the seventh trumpet. It is a just punishment upon "the spirituals of the wickedness in the heavenlies"—in Church and State, and upon the blind multitude which is led by them into the ditch, "the last ditch," which will engulf them all. This seventh trumpet is "the last trumpet;" and will not cease to sound until "the mystery of the Deity is finished as he hath declared the glad tidings to his servants the prophets;" that is, until the end of the seventh vial, in the consummation of which John heard the announcement from the throne "IT IS DONE!" (ch. 16:17). What is done, or finished? The only answer possible is, "the Mystery of the Deity is finished."

Now, on the ground of the commencement of the seventh trumpet "quickly" after the ending of the sixth; that is, in the same year; the seventh trumpet has been sounding seventy years in the current A.D. 1865. But it will probably continue to sound forty years longer, or till A.D. 1905–8; making in all a period of one hundred and ten years. Hence, this century and a fraction answers to the "days of the voice of the seventh angel." In these days the mystery is to be finished; and the "time" of the mystery "will be no longer—the 1260 will be all expired, and the thousand years begin. Looking at the events of the past seventy years, and at the present woeful condition of this "evil world," no one can be so blind as to say that the mystery is finished. Its finishing then, is unquestionably in the future; which will be an epoch of the world's history—"a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation to that same time" (Dan. 12:1): "Blessed is he that watcheth, and keeps his garments;" and is able to discern the time (Apoc. 16:15).

12. THE MYSTERY

In my translation, I have rendered the words euaggelise, as he hath declared the glad tidings. The English Version reads as he hath declared. But this is not the full import of the verb euaggeliso. This is compounded of the adverb eu, good, and the verb aggello, to announce by one sent; by a messenger, or angel. The context of the English Version shows that the thing declared to the prophets was "the mystery," or secret purpose "of the Deity;" but its rendering does not indicate whether the import of that mystery was good or bad. The original gives us to understand that the subject-matter of the mystery was good—or glad tidings of great joy. Good, of course, to the servants of the Deity, the Father's sealed ones; not to those who are obnoxious to the "pillars of fire," which march in indignation through the countries of "the earth and sea." This mystery of the Deity to be finished is styled by Paul "the mystery of Christ," "the mystery of the gospel," "the mystery of the Deity's will," "the mystery of Godliness," "the mystery of the Deity, even of the Father and the Christ." These are not many mysteries, but one and the same mystery, which he says, was "hid from the aiones," or Mosaic and prophetic cycles of time; "and from the genea," or thrice fourteen, that is from the forty-two generations between Abraham and Christ; and in another place he says that it was "hid from the aions in the Deity," or "kept secret chronois aioniois in the times of the aions."

It was the special function of the apostles to make known this mystery in their preaching. Paul was a prisoner in bonds because of his Zealous labors in this enterprise. As we have seen before, it was revealed or declared to the prophets; but the revelation was not in the same form as was the revelation of it to and by the apostles. This appears from Paul's teachings, who says concerning "the mystery of the gospel, for which he was an ambassador in bonds," "in other generations it was not made known to the sons of men as it is now apokalyphte, apocalypsied or revealed to his holy apostles and prophets by spirit;" among whom he includes himself in saying, "kata apokalupsin, by revelation be made known to me the mystery." They were commanded to go and make manifest this important and long concealed secret to every creature under the Roman heaven. This was the apostolic work in which John and his companions were engaged. The whole ground of their prophesying was covered by the euaggelion, by the kerugma, and by the apokalupsin musteriou; that is, by the good-announcement they made as the messengers of heaven; by the proclamation of Jesus as the Christ; and by the revelation of the secret, which none of the chief men of their time knew anything about. These are the three grand divisions of the great subject they handled, and in the fight understanding of which they sought to establish all true believers. In addressing such, Paul says, the only wise Deity establish you "by my evangile," good-announcement, or gospel, "and proclamation of Jesus Christ; by the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret in aionian times, but now is made manifest through the prophetic writings by command of the aionian Deity (the Deity of the times of the law) made known for obedience of faith to all the nations." They set forth in their teaching the gospel preached to Abraham; and afterwards preached by Moses to the enslaved Israelites in Egypt; and next propeggeilato, previously announced through His prophets in the holy writings; and then by John the Baptist, Jesus and his disciples, before the crucifixion; after this, they proved that Jesus was the promised and expected Christ, or Son of David and Son of the Deity, raised from among the dead to be King of Israel; and they showed how remission of sins and eternal life might be obtained through his name. "The sufferings of the Christ and the glory that should follow,” are the more general and twofold division of the mystery; or in other words, “the things concerning the Kingdom of the Deity, and the Name of Jesus Christ;” which every one taught by them who desired to share in the great salvation, practically elaborated by the Spirit-Angel of the Bow, believed, and obtained a right to by being aqueously immersed into Christ. From this exposition, then, the reader will perceive, that, the mystery previously announced through the prophets, and preached by the apostles, is not yet finished. Multitudes have received the remission of sins and a right to eternal life, on the basis of the sufferings of the Christ, belief of the truth, and immersion into his name; but the realization of their right in the kingdom of which they are “heirs;” and the blessedness of all nations in Abraham and his Seed, are parts of the mystery previously announced to the prophets, “the Hope of the Gospel” and “the Hope of Israel,” which yet remain to be developed by the almighty power of the Spirit-Angel of the Bow, in “the days of the seventh angel,” when he shall synchronically consummate “the wonders” and “the times” (Rom. 1:2; 16:25, 26; 1 Cor. 2:7, 8; Eph. 1:9, 10; 3:3–9; 6:19, 20; Col. 1:26; 4:3; Matt. 1:17).

13. THE DRAMATIC CONSUMMATION OF THE VISION

prophecy of this tenth chapter is descriptive of a piece to be performed upon the arena of the fourth-beast dominion. The dramatis personae are the Voice in the heaven, the Angel, and John. “I am the Voice,” said John the Baptist, “of one crying in the wilderness.” It is correct, therefore, to say that “the Voice in the heaven” is a person. The Voice personates the Father and the Son, who “are one;” and the Angel personates a multitude, who are “made perfect in one, as the Father is in Jesus, and Christ in him” (John 17:23); and shall we say that John only personates his individual self in the midst of this multitudinous unity? I believe not; but that, in this dramatic scene, he is the representative of a class of agents; and that the part which he performs in it is symbolical of their agency in connexion with the angel in carrying into effect the judgments written in the little opened scroll. It was said to John, as recorded in verse 11, “Thou must prophesy again before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings.” He did not do this in any sense between his release from Patmos and his decease. His prophesying, therefore, as herein specified, must be in the future: and can only be then subsequently to his resurrection from among the dead. As a resurrected, approved, and immortal man, he will again stand before kings and nations, and “prophesy.” But not he alone. He will only be one among “thy servants the prophets, and the saints, and them that fear thy name, both small and great” (ch. 11:18). These all will “prophesy again before many peoples,” &c., after they are raised and immortalized. Hence, John in the scene before us, is their representative; and what he does by command of the Voice in the heaven, they will all likewise have to do.

Illustrative of this, John was commanded to “go and take the little scroll which had been opened in the angel’s hand.” Here was an action to be performed. When commanded, John had not the book, or scroll; nor was he where the angel stood: but when he obeyed, he stands with the angel, the scroll disappears in John’s substance, and he confronts the peoples, nations, tongues, and kings. This dramatic consummation demonstrates that the Angel and the class of agents John represents are identical. The Angel, therefore, symbolizes John and his associates as the scroll incorporate; that is, after they eat the scroll they occupy the position of the angel upon the sea and upon the earth; and in their prophesying again, their voice crashes with the roaring of the seven thunders. They become, like James and John, “the sons of thunder” (Mark 3:17); and shake the heavens with their voice. “Go and take the little scroll that has been opened.” They “go” when “gathered” by the angels of his power to the Lord Jesus Christ in the Peninsula of Sinai: and they “take” the scroll when transformed into the likeness of the body of his glory by the energy whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself (Phil. 3:21). Having taken the scroll they are commanded to “eat it up.” “Thy words were found,” says Jeremiah, “and I did eat them; and try word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of mine heart: for thy name is called upon me, O Yahweh Elohim of hosts” (ch. 15:16). Jeremiah is one of those who will eat the little scroll; and in consequence become a constituent of the same; that is, of the angel. We may see from this, that words may be eaten as well as more material substances. To eat words is first to know them, then to understand their meaning; thirdly, to believe this heartily, and to assimilate it to our mental habitude, that it may become the rule of our thought and action. When this result is attained, the words are not only eaten, but eaten up, or thoroughly digested; and they become part and parcel of the eater inseparably.

Ezekiel was put through this dramatic exercise as well as John and Jeremiah; and from the account he gives we may derive assistance in the exposition of the matter before us. A scroll held in a hand was sent to him. It was a scroll of judgment to be executed; for therein were written lamentations, and mourning, and woe (ch. 2:8–10). This he was commanded to eat, and then to go and speak to Israel. What he ate was suggestive of what he afterwards spoke and wrote in his book. It was said to him, “Son of man, cause thy belly to eat, and fill thy bowels with this scroll that I give thee. “Then,” says Ezekiel, “did I eat.” Now, the effects produced upon him by the eating to fulness being identical with those affecting John, we are enabled, upon the principle of like causes producing like effects, to determine what the contents were of the little scroll eaten by John. Ezekiel and John were similarly affected. “It was in my mouth,” says Ezekiel, “as honey for sweetness;” and then, in ch. 3:14, he tells us “the Spirit lifted me up, and took me away, and I went in bitterness, in the hot anger of my spirit: and the hand of Yahweh was strong upon me.” And when John applied for the opened scroll, and it was given to him, he was told by the angel it should make his “belly bitter, but in his mouth be sweet as honey.” Ezekiel’s scroll when eaten, though prophetic of judgments causing lamentations, and mourning, and woe, was as honey for sweetness, because, “the judgments of Yahweh are true and righteous altogether; more to be desired than gold, yea than much fine gold: sweeter also than honey, and droppings of honeycombs. Moreover by them is thy servant warned; and in keeping them there is great reward” (Psa. 19:10, 11). This explains the sweetness in the mouths of Ezekiel and John. The contents of the scrolls were the joy and rejoicing of their hearts; for in the complete execution of “the judgments written,” they saw the development of the promised recompense of reward.

But this sweetness of mouth was followed with bitterness of belly. This condition of body imports “hot anger,” as is manifest from Ezekiel 3:14. Moses connects bitter with destruction in his threatening of punishment upon Israel: “They shall be burnt,” says he, “with hunger, and devoured with burning heat, and with bitter destruction” (Deut. 32:24). Fellows inflamed with anger, and ready to execute vengeance upon the objects of their wrath, are said to be “bitter of soul:” this appears from the original of Judg. 18:25, where the Danites say to Micah, “Let not thy voice be heard among us, lest fellows bitter of soul run upon thee, and thou lose thy life, with the lives of thy household.” Here, loss of life to Micah and his dependants is predicated upon the bitterness of soul or body, of his enemies. Also in 2 Sam. 17:8, David and his mighty men are said to be mahrai nephesh, “bitter of soul as a bear robbed of her whelps in the field:” the robbed bear is a striking illustration of the nature of the bitterness—that it is a very fierce condition of mind. But, I need add no more examples illustrative of the import of the phrase, “my belly was bitter.” John ate the scroll. The effects produced upon him by the eating proved it to be the scroll of “judgment given to the saints,” when they are prepared “to execute the judgments written.” It is sweet to their taste, because of its truth and righteousness; and the great reward its consummation will secure them: and their body corporate becomes bitter when they set forth to destroy Babylon, and the powers which sustain her. Their blood had been shed copiously by the civil and ecclesiastical authorities of “Antichristendom;” and now the time arrives to repay them “double.” They become a flaming and consuming fire; and pour out from their bitterness of soul, “the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God.” In Babylon, at “the Hour of Judgment,” “is found the blood of prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth;” and, as it is written, “precious in the eyes of Yahweh is the death of his saints;” therefore they are exhorted in their bitterness of soul, to “reward her even as she rewarded them, and to double unto her double according to her works; in the cup which she hath filled to fill to her double. How much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and” sorrow are they to “give her: for she saith in her heart, I sit queen and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow. Therefore shall her plagues (the seven thunders) come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine (judgments written in the little open scroll); and she shall be utterly burned with fire (with the “Feet like pillars of fire”): for strong is the Lord God (the cloud-invested angel of the bow) who judgeth her” (Apoc. 18:24; 6–8). After this manner, they will “prophesy again” against their old enemy, in bitterness of belly. But before they can do this, they must be like Ezekiel, only in a higher degree, “lifted up by the Spirit, with the hand, or power, of Yahweh strong upon them.” They must be exalted from flesh to spirit. Their bitterness will then be “bitterness in the heat of their spirit;” and in that bitterness they will go forth to “destroy them that corrupt the earth” (ch. 11:18; 19:2). This accomplished, they will rejoice in concert with the holy apostles and prophets, over the desolated and fallen prostitute; for the Deity will then have avenged them upon her (ch. 18:20; 19:1–3).

14. “PROPHESY AGAIN”

After John, as the representative of all the saints, had eaten up the little scroll of the judgments to be executed when the Angel of the Bow shall have been developed, he was told by the angel in vision, that he “must prophesy again against many peoples and nations and tongues and kings.” In the Acts of the Apostles we have several instances of their prophesying and of its effects. They all stood before the Sanhedrin and prophesied; and their prophesying resulted in an antagonism between them and the rulers; who, being then the more powerful party, ordered them to be scourged and imprisoned. Much of their prophesying was a proclamation of “the mystery of the Deity’s will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself;” which purpose is, “that in the economy of the fulness of the times (of the “time, times, and half a time” of Dan. 12:7) he would gather under One Head the all things in the Christ; both the things in the heavens and the things upon the earth, in him”—the things in the heavens, “things visible and invisible, whether thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers;” and things upon the earth, “peoples, nations, and tongues” (Eph. 1:9; Col. 1:16; Dan. 7:14). The proclamation of this purpose—of ruling mankind in righteousness by the crucified King of the Jews, whom he had raised from among the dead—was exceedingly offensive to the Roman emperor and his adherents. An imperial edict was, therefore, published, forbidding any one to say, that there is another king than Caesar; a proclamation that troubled both the people and their rulers (Acts 17:6–8, 31). The apostles and their colaborers, however, were not daunted by decrees and threatenings; they continued their prophesying both before and against the world, to the loss of liberty and life, which in the nature of things was almost inseparable from their “prophesy.”

But, the time will come to them when the nature of things will be changed. They will “prophesy again” when power will preponderate on their side. Their function then will be, like Ezekiel’s, “to prophesy and smite” (ch. 21:14); to “turn waters into blood, and to smite the earth with all plagues, as often as they will” (Apoc. 11:6). This is the sort of prophecy resulting from eating up the little scroll. They proclaim the purpose of Deity, and that the time to carry it into effect hath arrived. In this they prophesy what is about to be; and they require all “peoples, nations, languages, and kings” to submit to the New Monarch of the earth. If these believe and obey the prophecy, it will be well with them; but if they resist it, the prophets will proceed to establish their prophecy with fire and sword. Their body will be like Samuel's of old, who, in bitterness of soul, "hewed Agag in pieces."

SECOND SECTION OF THE SEVENTH SEAL

Act II.—the Sixth Trumpet or Second Woe Western Part

Apoc. 11:1–13

Summary

The woman in the wilderness and the remnant of her seed (ch. 12:6, 14, 17) as the nave of the Deity, the altar, and the worshippers therein, measured by John. These (as the Holy City, and posterior to their measurement), are trodden under foot forty and two months by the Lion-Mouth Gentiles of the unmeasured outer court; that is, until the Ancient of days come (Dan. 7:21, 22).

But, "the Earth helps the Woman" from the time of her flight into the wilderness of the Two Wings of the Great Eagle, where she is protected for a time, times, and a half a time. To "the Earth," as the two witnesses against the woman's persecutors, power is given to maintain their testimony in sackcloth 1260 days. In the exercise of their mission, they smite the earth with all plagues as often as they will. At length the Lion-Mouthed Beast of the sea (ch. 13:7) effects their subjugation and political extinction. But after three days and a half they stand upon their feet again, and ascend to the heaven in sight of their enemies. At this crisis, an earthquake overthrows a tenth of the city Babylon the Great: titular distinctions within the sphere of the convulsion are abolished, and many of those who rejoice in them slain: the rest are terror-stricken; and give glory to the Deity of the heaven (Apoc. 11:1–14).

During the testifying, or prophesying of the witnesses the Ten Horns, the Two-horned Beast of the earth and the Image of the wounded sixth head of the best, appear upon the arena.

Act III.—the Seventh Trumpet or Third Woe: Judicially Affecting Both East and West

Apoc. 11:15–19

Summary

The events aforesaid being accomplished, the Seventh Trumpet begins to sound; and ends in the casting down by the angel of the Bow of the thrones, and the setting up of the kingdom of the Deity; who, as the measured nave, altar, and worshippers therein, commences His reign. The casting down is preceded by the revelation of divine wrath in a time of international belligerency; and by the resurrection of the saints; who, as the nave and containing Ark of the Covenant, are manifested in the heaven; and with lightnings, voices, thunderings, earthquake, and hail, destroy the corrupters of the nations—Verse 15–19.

Translation

Apoc. 11

1. And there was given to me a reed like a rod: and the angel stood saying, Rise up, and measure the nave of the Deity, find the altar, and those worshipping in it. 2. And the court which is outside of the nave cast away out, and measure it not, for it has been given to the nations; and the Holy City they shall trample forty two months.

3. And I will give to my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and sixty days, having been clothed with sackcloths.

4. These are the two olive trees, and two lightstands, which have stood before the god of the earth. 5. And if any will to injure them, fire bursts forth out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies: and if any will to injure them, in this way must he be put to death.

6. These have power to shut the heaven, that rain may not fall in their days of the prophecy: and they have power over the waters to turn them into blood, and to smite the earth with every plague, as often as they may have willed.

7. And when they may have finished their testimony, the beast ascending out of the abyss will make war with them, and overcome them, and put them to death.

8. And their corpses shall lie upon the breadth of the Great City styled spiritually Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified. 9. And they shall see their corpses among the peoples, and tribes, and tongues, and nations three days and a half, and they shall not suffer their corpses to be put into tombs.

10. And they who dwell upon the earth shall rejoice over them, and be exultant: and they shall send gifts to one another; because these two prophets tormented them who dwell upon the earth.

11. And after the three days and a half, spirit of life from the Deity broke in upon them, and they stood upon their feet; and great fear fell upon those who beheld them.

12. And they heard a great voice from the heaven, saying to them, “Ascend hither!” And they ascended into the heaven in the cloud, and their enemies beheld them.

13. And in that hour there was a great earthquake, and the tenth of the city fell, and there were destroyed in the earthquake seven thousand names of men: and the rest were terrified, and gave glory to the Deity of the heaven.

14. The second woe has passed; behold the third woe comes immediately.

The Third Woe

15. And the seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in the heaven, saying, the kingdoms of the world have become our Lord's and his Christ's, and he shall reign for the aions of the aions.

16. And the twenty and four elders sitting upon their thrones in the presence of the Deity, fell upon their faces, and did homage to the Deity, saying, We give thanks to thee, O Lord, the almighty Deity, who is and who was and who art THE COMING ONE, because thou hast assumed thy great power, and reignest.

18. And the nations were made angry, and thy wrath came; and the time of the dead to be judged, and to give the reward to thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, even to those who fear thy name, to the small and to the great; and to destroy those who corrupt the earth.

19. And the nave of the Deity was opened in the heaven, and the ark of his covenant was seen in his nave: and there were lightnings, and voices, and thunders, and earthquake, and great hail.

EXPOSITION

1. Zechariah's Symbolism

In the fourth chapter of Zechariah there is a very remarkable symbolic prophecy concerning Zerubbabel and the "great mountain." In this there is contained a hidden mystery—wisdom concealed, which the prophet confessed he did not understand. The exposition of the eleventh chapter of the apocalypse cannot be satisfactorily unfolded irrespective of Zechariah's prophecy; for this portion of John's is a symbolical revelation of the mystery therein contained. We shall therefore briefly look into what the spirit said to Zechariah about Zerubbabel.

First, then, the prophet was symbolically awakened by an angel out of a symbolic sleep, to show that what was about to be revealed would in its consummation, be manifested after he should rise up from among the dead.

Being thus figuratively introduced, into the resurrection state, he saw therein a group of symbols representative of post resurrectional Spirit-manifestation. The one group consisted of a golden lightstand with a hollow ball, or bowl, upon the top, from which projected seven tubes and burners. On each side of this was an olive tree, one on the right, and the other on the left; and from a branch on each tree a golden pipe connected with the bowl. When the prophet beheld the lightstand and the two trees, he inquired of the angel what it meant; or what was the solution of the mystery? But, instead of a definition of the symbols with an analytic exposition of the truth, he was told in very general terms, that the group represented the Spirit in manifestation, prepared to level the Great Mountain, and to establish the Head Stone triumphantly—verses 2–7.

This "great mountain" is the mountain out of which the Head Stone is cut without hand (Dan. 2:45); and symbolizes "the kingdom of men" as existing at the epoch of its final overthrow, when "the kingdoms of this world become the Lord's and his Christ's." "Before Zerubbabel" it becomes "a plain." The HEAD STONE is the Spirit in olive-tree and lightstand manifestation, and surnamed Zerubbabel—scattered in Babylon. "They shall see the plummet in the hand of Zerubbabel those seven, which are the Eyes of Yahweh" (v. 10). This is the "one stone of seven eyes" surnamed Zerubbabel. It is the Spirit head Stone so named, constituted, not of one individual only, but of a number of individuals, "which no man can number," with one individual at the head of them, named Jesus the Anointed.

But, Zechariah in looking more narrowly at the symbolic group discerned two remarkable olive branches, one upon each of the olive trees; and he saw besides two golden pipes, one proceeding from each olive branch to the golden globe of the lightstand. He perceived, that the pipes were for the conveyance of the golden colored oil from the olive branches into the globe of the lightstands, that it might be combusted in the seven burners at the end of the seven tubes projected from the top of the golden globe. But he did not see into the truth or meaning of the mystery of the two olive branches, and the two golden pipes; he therefore asked the angel what they represented? He gave him, however, very scanty information. He simply replied, “these are the two Sons of Oil standing before the Lord of all the earth” (ver. 14).

2. The “One Body” the Golden Lightbearer of the Spirit

Such was the symbolic scene beheld by Zechariah after his symbolic resurrection—two antagonistic powers; the one the Spirit, the other, the mountain-dominion of the world. But, had we no more light thrown upon the subject than granted to the prophet, the truth symbolized would be as inscrutable to us as it was to him. But, happily for them who are “the servants of the Deity sealed in their foreheads” with his seal, the hidden mystery hath been apostolically and apocalyptically revealed. The apostles, whose teaching consisted largely of “the revelation of the mystery hid from the aions and generations,” have supplied that which the angel carefully concealed from Zechariah. They have taught us, that the Golden Lightbearer of the Spirit is the “One Body,” of which the Lord Jesus is the head, or globular reservoir of the oil, anointed with the holy oil of truth; for “the spirit is the truth,” says John. This is the stem, and the bowl, and the seven tubes branching from the top, and the seven burners, and the two pipes; through which flows the spirit-oil of the truth, that it may “shine before men.” This one body, or lightbearer, is “the light of the world” (Matt. 5:14–16). It has been set up in the world to “give light unto all that are in the house,” that they may see the good works of them who are burners of the spirit-oil, and “glorify the Father who is in heaven.” It is through them that the Spirit operates in enlightening mankind, in “opening their eyes, and turning them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan (which is ignorance) to the Deity;” and in “pulling down of strongholds, and casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the Deity’s knowledge, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of the Christ” (Acts 26:18; 2 Cor. 10:5). In doing this, the seven Eyes of the Deity shine like lamps of fire from the burners of the lightstand. In apostolic times, they stood before the principalities and powers in the heavenlies making known to these rulers of the earth the manifold wisdom of the Deity, according to an exposition of the aions which he made concerning Jesus their anointed Lord (Eph. 3:10, 11). Without this lightbearing body, the world in all the ages and generations from apostolic times until now, would have been in lightless outer darkness. The One Body has been the golden seven branched lightbearer in all the gloomy period of the times of the Gentiles. “Their testimony,” which is their light, is not only enlightening to the understanding of the ignorant, but it is tormenting to the adherents and advocates of the traditions and sophistries of the catholic and protestant apostasy (Apoc. 11:7, 10). It vexes and annoys them; and especially when the eyes of the common people are sufficiently opened, if not to see the truth so as to be saved by it, at least to discern the imposition practised by those who would be their spiritual guides; but whose guidance they reject as mere quackery, and certain to precipitate all who trust it into the ditch. This effect of the light-burning stirs the gods of the earth up to inextinguishable wrath and causes them to make war upon the lightburners and to try to put out their light by breaking their lightbearing body to pieces—11:7; 13:7. But “the earth helps the Woman,” who is indirectly nourished and cherished by the democratic and revolutionary adversaries of arbitrary power in church and state. These are her helpers, though not members of her body; and owe their political existence to the leavening influence of the divine principles she irradiates. They are her fire and sword by which her enemies are killed and devoured (Psa. 17:13; Apoc. 11:5, 6): and, but for whose chivalrous devotion to what they style “the rights of man,” she could in no wise have withstood for ages the exterminating efforts of the enemies whom her testimony hath tormented and provoked.

The apostles have also taught us that the Spirit-Lightstand, or one light-bearing body, is constituted of two classes of mankind, which are fitly represented by Two Olive Trees; the one, “a wild olive tree,” and the other, “a good olive tree” (Rom. 11:17, 24). The former, we are taught in this chapter, represents the non-Israelitish portion of mankind; while the latter is representative of the twelve tribes of Israel. In the Zechariah-group of symbols, these two olive trees are united to the light-bearing body by the two golden pipes extending from a branch of either tree. This intermediate union of the two trees is allegorical of the union of Israelites and Gentiles in one body through Jesus Christ. In the apostolic allegory, the union of the two classes is represented by grafting branches taken from the wild olive tree among the branches of the good olive tree, whose root and fatness supply wholesome nourishment to the gratis. In other words, the engrafting is done by “the word of truth,” which is therefore styled “the engrafted word received with meekness, which is able to save the soul” (James 1:21). This word received with meekness by wild-olive men, makes them intelligent believers of “the things concerning the kingdom of the Deity, and of the name of Jesus Christ;” and, by causing them to be immersed into the Christ-Name, they become members of the one body. By adoption, or engraftment, through Christ Jesus, they become good olive-men; and being “cut out” of the wild olive in all “the times of the Gentiles,” during which blindness afflicts Israel, they supply the place of the Jewish branches broken off because of unbelief.

This transfer of branches from the wild to the cultivated olive is the reason of there being two olive trees in the symbolic group. In the first few years of the apostolic era, there had been no breaking off of branches from the good olive tree; and no grafting in of wild olive branches in their place. The engrafted word was preached and received by Israelites alone; for, until Peter was taught to “call no man common or unclean” (Acts 10:28), the gospel was not preached to the Gentiles; so that the one body consisted only of believing and immersed Jews. But, when it was found experimentally that Israelites were fast becoming deaf and blind to the word, it was propounded to the Gentiles, from among whom a rich fulness has been separated. As faith decayed in Israel it grew vigorously among the Gentiles. The natural branches of the good olive became sapless; and were broken off with violence, when the Little Horn of the Goat received a host against the daily because of transgression, and cast down the truth, in its Mosaic representation, to the ground (Dan. 8:9–12). A.D. 70.

But the One Body is destined to flourish in two states. The Zechariah-symbolic group represents it in the state inaugurated by the resurrection. John saw it in this state, as “a Son of Man in the midst of Seven Lightstands,” invested with all the attributes of omnipotence (Apoc. 1:12–16). Being in the midst of the seven, he occupies the same relation to the light-irradiating ecclesias that the seven tubes of Zechariah’s group do to the golden bowl, and the seven horns do to the Lamb (ch. 5:6). The whole group of John and Zechariah is symbolical of the Omniscient and Omnipotent Spirit in post resurrectional corporeal manifestation—the “One Body” perfected and glorified in all its members.

But, before the One Body thus symbolized can stand in the presence of the nations to “enlighten the earth with his glory” (ch. 18:1), it must pre-exist in all “the times of the Gentiles;” that is, in the interval between the breaking off of the natural branches of the good olive tree, say from A.D. 70, to “the time of the dead when they should be judged, and a reward given to the prophets and saints” (ch. 11:18). This state of being, Paul styles, “the present evil world;” we term it commonly, “this world,” and “the present state,” in contrast with “the future state,” or “the other world,” or “the world to come.” Seeing, then, that the One Body, a great multitudinous unity, Jesus and his Brethren, is related to these two states, it is interesting to know—

I. What position it occupies in respect to the nations of the earth?

- II. What its mission while so placed? and,
- III. How long is that position to be held?

A correct answer to these questions will furnish us with the solution of the mystery contained in the eleventh chapter of the Apocalypse.

I. Position of the One Body in the Present State

Zechariah does not aid us here. He was briefly informed, that the two olive branches emptying the golden oil through the two golden pipes into the bowl, were “the two Sons of Oil standing before the Lord of all the earth.” They represented Sons generated by the Golden Oil, or “word of truth”—the “unction from the Holy One, which teacheth of all things, and is the truth” (1 John 2:20, 27). They stand before the Lord, al-adon, or before the Ruler of all the earth. True; but who is the ruler here referred to? Is it the Spirit-King, Yahweh Tz’vaoth, Isaiah saw? (ch. 6:1, 5). Is it he exclusively, or is there a truth concealed, indicating some other ruler as well? The answer to this question must be deferred until we come to the exposition of Apoc. 11:4. We shall proceed now to the consideration of the first verse of this chapter.

1. “RISE UP!”

In this we find John in a like situation with Zechariah. They are both in the presence of an angel, and both asleep. That John was lying down asleep appears from a voice saying to him, egeirai, awake, or rise up! When John had the vision of the One Body, as related in the first chapter, he “fell at his feet as dead,” and from this symbolic death was restored again by the Spirit who spoke to him; so, in this eleventh chapter, being in the same presence, namely, of the Rainbow Angel, of whom he says, “the Angel stood,” he was prostrate in symbolic death, from which he was commanded, not by the angel, but by the voice of the power that developes the angel, to “Awake,” or “Rise up.” The angel is placed there, very much to the perplexity of the grammarians and commentators, who have proposed to abolish him from the text altogether, as an inconvenient superfluity—as the representative of the One Body in the post resurrectional period; as indicated by the symbolical resurrection of John, who, when awake or risen up, sees him standing—“the Angel stood.”

But why was John made the subject of a symbolic resurrection when he was about to transact business having regard to the position and mission of the One Body in the times antecedent to “the time of the dead?” The answer is, because the business he had to transact would ultimate in the resurrection of the One Body, of which, in its awaking or rising up, he was the dramatic representative. The literal resurrection of the dead saints developes the angel he saw standing when he opened his eyes to see. The things revealed in this eleventh chapter ultimate, as any one may see, in the resurrection of the saints, and the establishment of their kingdom. They are the Spirit’s dead men, and they arise as his dead body. This is a grand consummation in regard to them. They now “dwell in dust,” where they are fast asleep; but they shall “awake and sing,” as the climax of their position and mission in this present evil world (Isa. 26:19; Dan. 12:2).

This is a notable feature in all prophetic oracles, namely, the primary statement of the end to be established as the result of, or consequent upon, the details immediately to follow. There is another striking illustration of this in the fifteenth verse of this chapter. Here, the end resulting from the finished judgments of the seventh trumpet is summarily stated before the details of the trumpet are specified. A neglect of this peculiarity would lead the reader to suppose that “the kingdoms of this world became the Lord’s” at the first blast of the seventh trumpet. This, however, would be a great mistake; for subsequent specifications show that such a notable and world-astounding result is not to be expected until the sounding is about to cease. But, of this apocalyptic characteristic I need adduce no further examples, for it must be obvious enough to all.

2. "A REED LIKE TO A ROD"

This being so, I proceed further to notice, that the power commanding John to rise up, gave to him "a reed like to a rod." The use he was ordered to make of it shows that it was a measuring reed. "Rise up," said the voice of the Spirit, "and measure the nave of the Deity, and the altar, and them that worship therein." When we consider the things to be measured, it is clear that the reed must be a rule of faith, a rule of practice, a rule of time, or all of these; not a material rule, such as a builder would use. It was "a reed like unto a rhabdos." In writing to the saints in Corinth. Paul says to them: "What will ye? Shall I come unto you with a rhabdos or with love, and a spirit of meekness?" (1 Cor. 4:21). This shows that a rhabdos is something different from love and meekness in expression. The use of it in this chapter of the apocalypse is evidently representative of the same idea as in Paul's inquiry. The scope of the prophecy shows this; for the two olive trees are to "prophesy 1260 days, having been clothed in sackcloths" (ver. 4, 3); and to be overcome and denied a burial (ver. 7, 9). This unhappy fate was a rhabdos—a severe infliction. Hence, the measuring reed was like to severe infliction. But, how long? The answer to this question is the reed—1260 days. The reed then was a rule of time, indicating a period of severe trial; and therefore "like to a rod;" and upon the principle of loving chastisement—"whom the Lord loves he chastens, and scourgeth every son whom he receives" (Heb. 12:6).

It is to be noted here, that John, and not the angel, is the measurer. The measuring, therefore, is different from the measuring of chapter 21:15. In this place, it is one of the seven angels of the vials, the seventh, that is the measurer. John has a reed, and this angel has a reed; but the reeds differ in this, that John's is "like a rod," and the angel's is "a golden reed." Being different reeds or rules, they are used for different kinds of measurements. The reed like a rod measures the nave still in connection with altar-worship; while the angelic golden reed measures "the great city, the holy Jerusalem," in which there is neither nave nor altar.

There was great symbolic decorum in appointing John to be the measurer, in giving the reed like a rod to him. "Rise up and measure!" was the voice of the Spirit. The measuring is here connected with the rising up; in other words, John's symbolical resurrection was the limit of the measuring; at all events, of his measuring; for, where his correctional mensuration ends, there the angelic measuring by the golden rule begins.

3. THE ALTAR

The altar in the text is the altar of sacrifice. Had it been the altar of incense it would have been specified, as in ch. 8:3, "the golden altar before the throne." The altar John measured was the altar under which the saints lie, who are slain for the word of the Deity, as in ch. 6:9. In this place, the symbolic souls are represented as "crying with a loud voice, saying, How long?" But the measurement of this was not revealed. They were told that it was "for a little season;" but the number of days contained in this short period was not measured off for their information. Not so, however, in John's measuring. He gives in symbolic days the period of altar-worshipping; that is, the period during which the saints would be liable to death at the hand of their enemies because of their testimony. In all "their days of the prophecy they were an afflicted people. As the Spirit had foretold in Dan. 7:21, the Little Horn with Eyes and a Mouth of blasphemy was to make war upon the saints, and to prevail against them till the Ancient of Days came. The saints being in Christ Jesus, the altar, they "worship therein," and are "partakers with the altar” in altar-sufferings; in other words, “they are partakers of Christ’s sufferings; that when his glory shall be revealed, they may be also partakers of that, and be glad with exceeding joy” (1 Pet. 4:13; 5:1).

But, was this altar to be deluged with the blood of victims in all the period elapsing from A.D. 70 to the coming of the Ancient of Days? John’s measuring answers this question in the negative. The worshippers in the altar were to be slain, and to rise again, and to ascend to power, and to strike terror into their enemies; and, though not free from tribulation because of the word, their sufferings are not represented as unto death as aforetime. They are prevailed against till the Ancient of Days comes, but not under the same Sanguinary conditions.

4. ALL NOT OF THE “ONE BODY” EXCOMMUNICATE

John’s measuring was restricted to the One Body, the mystical body of Christ, the saints. He was expressly commanded to excommunicate all the Gentiles not of the One Body. “The Court,” said the Spirit-Voice, “that is outside of the nave, ekbale exo, cast away out, and measure it not;” and the reason given for this excommunication is, “because it hath been given to the nations.” Hence, the apocalyptic court is the Court of the Gentiles; and the antitype of the Court of the Gentiles under the Mosaic constitution. It may be remarked here, that in Solomon’s building there were three courts; first, the outmost court of all, into which the Gentiles might enter; next, the Court of Israel, for native Israelites, if clean according to the law, otherwise admission was denied even to them. Between these two courts, there was a “middle wall of partition,” upon which were notices forbidding Gentiles to pass beyond it on pain of death; and, third, the Court of the Priests, where the brazen altar of burnt-offerings, and the brazen laver for washings, stood, and where the priests and Levites exercised their ministry. Israelites, who offered sacrifices, might bring their victims to the inner part of this court, but could not pass a certain separation which divided it; they withdrew as soon as they had delivered their sacrifices and offerings to the priest, or had made their confession, with laying their hand upon the head of the victim, if it were a sin-offering. Beyond the Court of the Priests was the temple proper, subdivided within into the Holy Place, and the Most Holy Place, or Nave. These two Holies were divided from each other by the Veil or curtain. In the Holy Place were the golden altar of incense, the show-bread table, and the seven-branched lightstand, in whose seven burners was consumed the light-giving golden oil of olives. Into this place, the priests, if purified by blood and water, and invested with the holy garments, might enter at all times; but were forbidden to enter into the Most Holy beyond the Veil. Into this, the Aaronic High Priest alone could enter, but not at all times, nor without blood, on pain of death. When within the nave, he stood, as “the angel stood” (ch. 11:1), before the throne of Yahweh, whose power dwelt in a cloud between the Cherubim, made of the Olive Tree, and overlaid with pure gold; and above the propitiatory, or mercy-seat, or coverlid of the ark, styled the Ark of the Covenant, because it was a chest containing the stone tables of the law, cut and engraved in heaven, and delivered thence by angels to Moses on the mount. Within were also contained the pot of manna, the bread that came down from heaven, and Aaron’s dead rod that budded into life and bore fruit. Such was “the House made with hands”—an interesting fabric of the Mosaic parable foreshadowing certain “things of the kingdom of the Deity, and of the name of Jesus Christ.”

As we have seen elsewhere, these temple arrangements have been incorporated into the structure of the Apocalypse. The text before us appropriates the apocalyptic outside court to the Gentiles. “The middle wall of partition” having been broken down, by nailing the threatening handwriting of ordinances to the cross (Eph. 2:14; Col. 2:14); no Court of Israel is introduced into the apocalypse. Israelites and Gentiles not of the One Body, are constituents simply of the unmeasured court. Their position in relation to the Nave and the Golden Altar, and the Altar of Sacrifice, is that of excommunicate outsiders. In the aggregate, they are “the court outside of the nave cast away out, and not measured.” They are therefore, without remission of sins, and consequent right to the tree of life; they cannot offer acceptable prayer and praise to the Deity; nor have they any intercessor within the veil. Their court is wholly occupied by Daniel’s Fourth Beast. There is not a foot of its area which is not so occupied; so that there is room within its limits for no other beast; for this beast is resolved, apocalyptically, into the dragon, the beast of the sea, the beast of the earth, the image of the beast, and the scarlet colored beast and its rider. In other words, the Unmeasured Court is Christendom, so called, in its civil and ecclesiastical constitution—“Babylon the Great.”

The altar, which in the first verse includes the Court of the Priests, and the Holy place, because the constituents of the altar are constituents also of the court and the holy, is surrounded by the Court of the Gentiles; that is to say, the One Body in the present evil world, is a pilgrim and a sojourner in the midst of its enemies. It is surrounded on every side by the children of “the Great Harlot;” whose ecclesiastical institutions are apocalyptically labelled, “the Mother of Harlots, and of all the Abominations of the Earth.” This ecclesiastical family of adulteresses belong especially to “the beast that ascendeth out of the abyss, and makes war upon the saints, and overcomes, and kills them” (ver. 7; 13:7). They are the defiling women of ch. 14:4; with whom “the Virgins,” or Altar-worshippers, have nothing to do, except to prophesy against them, and to torment them with their testimony.

In this Court of the Gentiles, “the spirituals of the wickedness in their high places” are rampant revellers in tradition and blasphemy. Their court is illustrated by one great “Name of Blasphemy” (ch. 13:1); which towers in pride and arrogance (“its look more stout than his fellows” (Dan. 7:20) above all the other blasphemous “Names and Denominations,” of which it is so “full” as scarcely to afford space for novelty in this department of iniquity, transgression, and sin (ch. 17:3). These Names and Denominations of Blasphemy fill up the Court; a fact expressed in the text quoted, by the words, “a scarlet-colored beast, full of the Names of Blasphemy.” Those of them in alliance with the civil powers of the court, are styled “Harlots;” these can be counted upon the fingers; as, the Church of England and Ireland, the Church of Scotland, the Lutheran Church, the Calvinian Church of Switzerland, and the Gallican Church. These are the Harlots, who have sold themselves for gain to work the will of them who keep them. They are ecclesiastical incorporations of “all that is in the world, the” sanctimonious “lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life;” and therefore “not of the Father” (1 John 2:16). Their diversities are but the diversities of mere human speculation and views of expediency. The same substratum of blasphemy and scripture-nullifying tradition, pervades them all. They teach nothing aright; for their divinities and theologies, are the mere fleshly thinkings of the natural man. Though their spirituals claim to be “ministers of the gospel,” and “ambassadors of Jesus Christ,” and “successors of the apostles;” their claims are stamped spurious and their high pretensions ignored, by the command given to John not to measure their court, but to “cast it away out.” They are a denounced apostasy, as far removed from the One Body as the east from the west. Ministers of the gospel indeed! How can men minister that of which they are profoundly ignorant in letter and spirit. If ministers of anything, it is of “the wisdom from beneath; which is earthly, soulish, and demoniac.” By their fruits they are known to the One Body which alone has spiritual intelligence to discern their true character. This measured community knows, that they are a base counterfeit that can only be made to pass current among those who are ignorant; and who mistake brass for the fine gold of the temple. The spiritual institutions of their unmeasured and excluded court, have no vitality in them; and can therefore save no one. Their way is the way of death—the wide gate and the broad way leading to destruction.

These Harlot-Churches of the Court are the leading novelties of modern times. They had no place in the Court four hundred years ago. Then the court was wholly occupied by Greek and Latin catholic idolatry; the Latin section of which they ignorantly acknowledge as the true church; and the common “Mother of All Churches.” This is true. The state churches are all her bastard progeny, begotten of her adulteries with the kings of the earth (ch. 18:3). Hence, her apocalyptic name, “MOTHER OF HARLOTS.” But, besides these harlot daughters, whose presence in the court she is too drunk and feeble to prevent—“drunk,” not so much with wine as with folly, and “with the blood of the saints and witnesses of Jesus” (ch. 17:6) she has a multitudinous brood of young serpents, styled “All the Abominations of the Earth.” These are the Anti-State churches of the Court—churches, not allied to the state, but holding dogmas, which are a mere dilution of the traditions of the Harlot Mother of Christendom. They pervade all the British isles and possessions, under the general denomination of “Protestant Dissenters;” and all the original United States, north and south. In the American section of the Court of the Gentiles, as there is no Harlot “by law established” with privileges from which her sister-prostitutes are excluded, “the Abominations” are not styled “Dissenters” and “Nonconformists.” In this section of the court they are all equal before the world’s law; but not equally respectable and orthodox in the world’s esteem. Wealth, classical (or pagan) scholarship, and numbers are the criteria of their relative respectability and orthodoxy. The rulers and politicians of the “Model Republic,” players all upon the world’s boards, are the honored members or patrons of “all the Abominations of the Earth;” so that from the stage to the pulpit, and from the pulpit to “the floor of the House,” there is no wider step than from the sublime to the ridiculous and profane. The legislators and executives of the protestant sections of the Court are the incarnations of the profanities and blasphemies inculcated by the spiritual craftsmen who live by “the Abominations,” or “Denominations” of the earth. Hence, their legislation and rule are devilish and oppressive; and calculated to bring down upon them catastrophe and judgment, as at this day, but more intensely and generally hereafter.

An enlightened spectator, contemplating the festering abominations of the European and American papal and sectarian sections of the Court of the Gentiles, might wonder at the long suffering and forbearance of the Deity, whose Name and Tabernacle they so grievously blaspheme. He might exclaim, “How long, O Yahweh, wilt thou not avenge thine own cause!” But, to him it might be replied, that the Deity remains silent, not because he is not indignant at the blasphemies, corruptions, and cruelties perpetrated against his dignity, and the well-being of his two witnesses or prophets; but because the Antichristian Court is “cast away out, and not measured.” For this reason, the Gentiles have liberty to set up any, and all kinds of abominations in their court, or area of operation, without being subjected to immediate judgment for their crimes. Hence, polygamous Mormonism, and adulterous Romanism, courtesan state-churchism, and hypocritical sectarianism, all flourish in their several spheres of abomination. They are permitted to do as they please, until the measure or limit of the One Body’s sackcloth probation is attained—a measure indicated by John’s symbolic resurrection from the death-sleep. John’s rising up measured the altar worshipping of the nave, or saints of Deity. When these rise from the dust, and he with them, “the Angel stands” prepared to “finish the mystery of the Deity as he hath announced the good news to his servants the prophets”—to break up the court, and to level the Great Mountain of human dominion and corruption, with which it is filled. There will then be no more Court of the Gentiles, and no more apocalyptic altar-worshipping for the One Body. All “the Abominations of the Earth,” mere lies, vanities, and “things which are of no profit,” will then be swept away with the besom of destruction; and nothing will survive, but the victorious and glorified community, symbolized by Zechariah as the Seven Branched Lightstand, and Olive trees. These will then burn the golden oil in the kingdom of their Father; and enlighten the subject nations with their glory.

Such is the position of the One Body in the present altar-worshipping state. It is down-trodden—trampled upon by the “miserable sinners” of the Court of the Gentiles—“the Holy City,” said the SpiritVoice, “shall they tread under foot.” This is their present fate, in common with Israel after the flesh, who, for an evening morning of 2400 years past, according to the LXX, have also been trodden under foot by the Gentiles of the Court (Dan. 8:13, 14). The One Body, or “Holy City” is essentially antagonistic to the Sin-Powers of the Court, by what symbol or names soever they may be represented; for it is the Woman and her Seed in opposition to the Serpent and his Seed; two parties between whom there is irreconcilable hostility, which can only cease with the utter destruction of the Serpent-Powers of the Court (Gen. 3:15).

In the apocalypse, the Holy City occupies a conspicuous and interesting position. The Holy City measured by John, and the Holy City measured by the Angel, are the same Holy City in two different states—in the preresurrectional; and in the postresurrectional, states. Every immersed believer of the gospel of the kingdom and name, is an adopted citizen of the Holy City. Paul writing to such believers says: “Ye are come to Mount Zion, and unto the City of the Living Deity, the Heavenly Jerusalem,” “the Mother of us all” (Heb. 12:22; Gal. 4:26). “Ye are come;” that is, not personally; but by faith; because “we walk by faith, not by sight.” All that is promised concerning the future glory of the “barren Jerusalem that beareth not,” and is now trampled upon by the Fourth Euphratean, or Ottoman, Angel-power, they heartily and affectionately believe: and believing these “exceeding great and precious promises,” together with the things concerning Jesus, and the apostolic revelation of the mystery, they are reckoned by adoption through immersion into Christ, as if they had been royally born in the Asiatic city; and consequently entitled to share officially in all its good fortune when it shall break forth into singing, because her light is come, and the glory of Yahweh is risen upon her (Psa. 87:5, 6; Gal. 4:27; Isa. 54:1; 60:1). The true believers in the present altar-worshipping state are collectively the Holy City, the Municipality elect, and divinely appointed to rule in the restored Jerusalem, when it shall have been delivered by the Angel of the Bow from the Serpent-Power of the unmeasured court by which it is now “trodden under foot.”

5. THE HOLY POLITY TRAMPLED FORTY-TWO MONTHS

The Holy Body Politic is measured—the period of its down-treading by Gentile barbarism is measured. The Court of the Gentiles will continue to exist a longer time than their trampling of the Holy City. Not being measured, it does not appear how much longer it will continue; but as the Holy Polity is to destroy the Court and its sin-powers, it follows necessarily, that the altar-worshipping and sackcloth prophesying of the Body, must come to an end before judgment is given to it. This limit of tribulation had been revealed to Daniel in the words of the oracle: “The Horn shall make war upon the saints, and prevail against them until the Ancient of Days come, and judgment be given to the saints” (ch. 7:21, 22; and in verse 25, “they shall be given into his power until a time and times and the dividing of time.” In other words, at the end of this period the Ancient of Days will come; and then the saints will no longer be prevailed against, or “the Holy City be trodden under foot.” This coming of the Ancient of Days is the limiting event of the down-treading measured off by John with “the reed like to a rod” given to him by the Spirit. In the record of his measurement, he turns Daniel’s “time and times and the dividing of time,” into “Forty and Two months.” He says: “The nations shall trample the Holy City forty and two months” (ch. 11:2). Hence, at the termination of these months the trampling is to cease in the advent of Christ and the resurrection of his brethren—“the time of the dead” (ch. 11:18). Now he comes “as a thief” under the sixth vial, while the Franco-Frog power is in active operation (ch. 16:12–15); hence, the “forty and two months” must terminate then; an end that must be exceedingly near.

But, are these forty and two months simply months of days; or are they symbolic months of days, each day signifying a year? To affirm that they are months of days and nothing more, would be a violation of all decorum. To have evolved a scriptural exposition of the reed, the rod, the angel, the nave, the altar, the court, and the city; and to have shown that John and his actions were representative; and then to affirm, that the time related to these things is to be expounded upon an entirely opposite principle—that the time is literal months and no more, is irrational, contrary to the analogy of scripture, incongruous to the subject treated of, and contrary to historic fact. Nearly eighteen hundred years have elapsed since John saw the vision of the eleventh chapter. When he saw it, the One Body was in the altar-worshipping and sackcloth situation. It was then warred upon by the pagan Roman power, the Little Horn with the Eyes of a Man, and a blaspheming Mouth, having then no existence in the Court of the Gentiles. But, instead of being “prevailed against,” “overcome and killed,” the One Body “overcame the great red Roman dragon by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony” (Apoc. 12:3, 9–11). It was not “trodden under foot” of pagan Rome; but Rome pagan is placed under its feet, under the symbol of “a Woman with the Moon under her feet” (ch. 12:1). Hence, there is no sense in which it could be then said of the one Body, “the Holy City shall the Gentiles trample forty and two months” of days, and days only: for history shows that the trampling was the reverse of this; and that the conflict between the pagan dragon and the Holy City neither forty and two months nor 1260 days, nor 1260 years; but the much shorter period of 226 years from the time John measured the Holy City until “the dragon was cast out into the earth.”

Now, the historic fact is, that over two hundred years after the pagan dragon was overcome by the saints, the Eyes and Mouth of the Little Horn were constitutionally established as “the God of the Earth” (ch. 11:4). The Little-Horn power that had destroyed the Asiatic Jerusalem, disregarded the god of his fathers, called Jupiter; and this new god, whom his pagan predecessors knew not, he honoured, and legally established in his estate, or empire (Dan. 11:37, 38). This was the Little Horn ecclesiastical element, into whose hand, or power, Daniel was told that the saints should be given, until the elapse of “a time and times and the dividing of a time” (ch. 7:25). Many periods of forty-two literal months elapsed in these two hundred years; in all of which the saints were untrampled by the nations. But when this New God came up in the midst of their court, the situation of the Holy City was entirely changed. Forty and Two months of years have nearly elapsed since then; and in all this time the Holy City has been in the altar-worshipping and sackcloth prophesying measurement of time. Shall we ignore this remarkable fact and say, “Oh, that is nothing at all!” and, for the sake of reducing all students of the prophecy to one common low level of ignorance, affirm “that the fulfilment of what is written in the book of The Revelations, from chap. 4 inclusive, is still future?” For men to affirm this, is proof of their entire and gross ignorance of the whole subject. But many people, who are lost in the night of Egypt, desire to be thought as wise by others as they are in their own conceits. In regard to the apocalypse, they feel poignantly and painfully their deep and ineradicable ignorance; they can make nothing of it, and being too selfconceited to be taught, or envious and hateful of those who are able to teach them, they aim to allay their vexation by the comforting delusion, that its events and times are all in the future, and “in close connection with the appearing of Christ;” so that, of course, the most intelligent and the most ignorant in the word and history, are equally in the dark concerning it. This is very consoling to the envious, who love darkness rather than light, if the light proceed from any but themselves. The Apocalypse all in the future except the first three chapters!! If the reader has followed our exposition from the beginning of the fourth to the present writing, we believe he will find it impossible to endorse such “a foolish notion.” He will be able to say boldly, that the dogma of the futurists is a mere old wife’s fable; and utterly unworthy of the grave consideration of a true believer—a servant of the Deity sealed in the forehead with the seal of the living God (ch. 7:2, 3).

In my exposition of the ninth chapter, I have shown that “months” there can only signify periods of thirty years—verses 5, 10, 15. The word signifies the same period of time in the text before us. “Forty and Two months” of symbolic time are as many years as they contain days. Forty and two months are 1260 days; so that, on the principle of a day for a year, as in chap. 9, the Holy City is trampled to the end of 1260 years. This One Body has been altar-worshipping, and “clothed with sackcloth,” in nearly all this time; during which “the great harlot that” still “sits upon many waters,” whose polity is symbolized by “a scarlet-colored beast full of names of blasphemy,” has become drunk with their blood (ch. 17:1–3).

There are no data in the first and second verses of this eleventh chapter to show at what epoch these “forty and two months,” or 1260 years of trampling begin. We are informed that they shall end at John’s rising up, which is the terminal measure of their continuance. This, as I have shown, is the import of the command to him, “Rise up and measure.” But, the same Spirit told Daniel, that the time was the period of the saints being in the hand of the Little Horn with Eyes and Mouth; if, therefore, it can be ascertained when they were turned over by authority to the ecclesiastical horn-power, the commencement of the “forty and two months” will be determined.

The words of the oracle, are, “they shall be given into his hand. This implies a giver—one having power, by which he would be able to place the saints under the jurisdiction of him who should “wear them out, and think to change times and laws” (Dan. 7:25). This powerful giver was unquestionably the Sixth Head of the Dragon; or “the king that shall do according to his will, and shall honor a god whom his fathers knew not.” The throne of this dragon-king is Constantinople. It was removed here from Rome by Constantine “the Great;” a removal, that prepared the way for the manifestation in Rome of this new god, who would speak great things against the Most High. The principal bishop of the catholic idolatry in Rome was developed into “the God of all the earth” by the legislative favor of the imperial Constantinopolitan power. This development was legislative and circumstantial, and therefore progressive. He was no meteoric upstart in the Seven-hilled city; but a bastard deity, who had been begotten in the Roman Mother by the adulterous embrace of the imperial power. Rome was pregnant with this blasphemous deity during a gestative “set time” of two hundred and eighty years—nine months and ten days being the physiological period of human incubation. From A.D. 324 to A.D. 604–8, was this “god of guardian saints” in the embryo, or foetal state. He was quickened into political life as a future imperial element of the fourth beast dominion of the Court, by Justinian’s Code, A.D. 529, and his Decretal Epistle, A.D. 533; which affirmed the Roman Bishop’s universal supremacy in spiritual affairs. Seventy-five years after this quickening, he was born God of the Roman earth by Phocas, the Dragon emperor, acknowledging the supremacy of his See, A.D. 604; in grateful commemoration of which, and other benefits, the New Deity caused to be erected by the exarch of Italy a Corinthian fluted column of Greek marble, standing on a pyramid of eleven steps, on the top of which was a gilt statue of Phocas. The date of the pillar was A.D. 608; and the occasion of the honor is stated in the inscription to be, “Pro innumerabilibus Pietatis ejus Beneficiis, et pro Quiete procurata Italioe, ac conservata Libertate.” Surely, the birth of “the God the earth” was an event to be celebrated in grateful honor upon the imperial creator! Perhaps a baser wretch than Phocas never wore the dragon-crown; but the baser the more worthy in the estimation of the new god. By the murder of the imperial family, the usurper had given absolute liberty and supremacy to the Roman bishop; besides bestowing liberal donations upon the Roman churches. He was therefore entitled “His Piety;” and the pillar was erected “For the innumerable benefits of His Piety, and for the quiet procured to Italy, and the preservation of liberty.”

Thus, by this development of the Roman bishop into the responsible “god of the earth,” all spiritual things were “given into his hand” by imperial authority and power. He was constituted the Lord

Spiritual of all christians, who were denounced as heretics fit only for fire and sword, if they dared to question his divinity. Under his supremacy they were adjudged to the flames, had their tongues cut out, denied “christian burial,” as he styled it, and deprived, not only of the benefits of society, but of the common birthright of men. Such was the iron yoke forged by the decrees of the Greco-Dragon emperors, who gave all their subjects into the hand of the God they set up in the pre-Constantinian seat of their dominion; thus, “giving him his power, his seat, and great authority” (ch. 13:2): that “he might as God sit in the temple of the god, showing himself that he is a god” (2 Thess. 2:4).

All That Time Has Spared From The Glorious Yesterday Of the Forum Romanum

Once a hub of the world, men began to excavate the rubbish-heap of the Forum in the significant year 1870!—the same years as the temporal power of the Papacy was withdrawn. In the foreground are the three columns of the Temple of Vespasian and the Temple of Saturn, and in the centre the Column of Phocas referred to by the Author of Eureka. Phocas was a brutal centurian elevated to power, but with no real ability to rule. He initiated a reign of terror, and died himself on the scaffold in 610. The Column was set up in A.D. 608—Publishers.

This epoch, then, of the four years between A.D. 604–8, in which the Roman Bishop was set up for the supreme deity of the Court of the Gentiles—above all civil rulers; or, as Paul expresses it, “above all that is called a god, or that is worshipped;” is the only one that I can discover in history in harmony with the word, as the epoch of commencement for the “forty and two months” of years, or 1260 years, for the trampling of the Holy City by the nations. The terminal epoch, of course, upon this basis will be between the end of the years A.D. 1864 and 1868. In these terminal four years ending in the spring of ’69, it may therefore be expected, that “the time of the dead” to rise up, as prefigured by John, will have arrived; when the forty and two months being ended, the trampling of the Holy City will be no more.

II. The Mission of the One Body in the Altar-Worshipping and Sackcloth-Prophesying Situation of its Affairs

The third verse of this chapter testifies as follows: “And I will give to my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and sixty days, having been clothed with sackcloths.” Here is a proposition plainly stated. There can be no mistake, one would think, as to the personage who makes the statement. The “I” is, doubtless, the Spirit who speaks to the ecclesias, and who said to John. “Rise up and measure the nave of the Deity.” He gave John power to do this in giving him the “reed like to a rod,” the symbol of the measurement. John, on awaking, no doubt, obeyed the order; having accomplished the work, the Spirit added, “And I will give to my two witnesses” a certain mission to perform. The measuring was John’s work; the prophesying, theirs; and with this John was to have nothing to do, in person, until he shall “rise up” in “the time of the dead,” and rejoin his classmates, as a constituent of the Angel of the Bow; and with one foot upon the sea, and the other upon the earth, prophesy with the voice of Boanerges in the utterances of Seven Thunders, “before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings” (ch. 10).

The Spirit styles them “my two witnesses.” They are therefore the Witnesses of the Spirit, styled in ch. 17:6, hoi martures Iesou, the witnesses of Jesus—of Yah the Saviour. A witness is one who gives testimony to the truth at the hazard of liberty, estate, and life. The Spirit’s witnesses are witnesses of this kind. They testified to “the truth as it is in Jesus,” in opposition to “every high thing that exalteth itself against the Deity’s knowledge;” consequently, they were conspicuous in testifying against the catholic worshipping of the daemonials and idols; and all the other abominations they encountered in the Court of the Gentiles. Many of them incurred the loss of all things—“they love not their lives unto the death”

(ch. 12:11); therefore they are described in “the time of the dead,” as “the souls of them who were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of the Deity, and who had not worshipped the Beast, neither his Image, neither had received the mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands;” and to show that these witnesses are the Saints, it is added, “and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years” (ch. 20:4).

To these witnesses something was given—“And I will give to my two witnesses,” saith the Spirit. What was this that was given? It could be nothing else than the gift of prophecy; for it is immediately added, as the result of the gift received, “and they shall prophesy.” Now, the nature of the gift is determined by what, as prophets, they were to accomplish. They were to devour their enemies by fire bursting forth out of their mouth; to shut the heaven that it rain not; to turn the waters into blood; and to smite the earth with every plague (verses 5, 6). These effects were to result from their testimony delivered “in their days of the prophecy;” for when those days were expired, “their testimony was finished,” and they could neither prophesy, nor do any of these terrible things. Their tormenting power was gone, and the agency by which it was executed was silenced in death (verses 7–10):

The nature of the prophetic gift bestowed upon these formidable witnesses was divine. It was a divine power imparted to them, which none of their adversaries of the unmeasured Court could gainsay or successfully resist. It had given to them when the angel, who had ascended from the east, sealed them in their foreheads with the seal of the Living Deity (ch. 7:2, 3): A.D. 325, and onwards. As the result of this sealing, the word of the Deity dwelt in them richly in all wisdom and spiritual understanding; and as “the word of the truth of the gospel” is a great unfulfilled, as well as partially fulfilled, prophecy, the sealed, in vocalizing its testimony before the ignorant, are “prophets,” whose inspiration is the word understood and believed. For this reason it is, that the saints are said to “prophesy,” when they state, illustrate, and prove the truth. “He that prophesieth,” saith Paul, “speaketh unto men to edification, and exhortation, and comfort” (1 Cor. 14:3); and “he that prophesieth edifieth the ecclesia” (ver. 4); therefore he saith in another place, “despise not prophesyings.”

The essential difference between the prophets of antiquity, and “the two prophets” of this eleventh chapter, is not as to the matter given, but the manner in which that matter was imparted. The ancient prophets and apostles received the subject matter they proclaimed by revelation direct from Deity; while the apocalyptic prophets receive it by hearing expounded, and reading the writings in which the direct revelation is contained. A merely natural man is an empty earthen vessel. He contains none of “the golden oil.” What he knows, he knows only as a natural brute beast; and like other animals, obeys only the impulses of his “inner consciousness.” Such a human creature is utterly destitute of inspiration; and the efforts to enlighten him prove fruitless, he is fit only for capture and destruction. The unmeasured Court of the Gentiles is the aggregate of such; and in the midst of so dark and dangerous a community, the Spirit’s Witnesses were appointed to operate for a testimony against them.

These witnessing prophets were inspired by the truth; and the truth is declared to be “the power of the Deity for the salvation of every one that believes it” (Rom. 1:16). “Power belongeth unto him;” and “he giveth strength and power to his people;” and the truth is his power by which his witnesses are able to do, what mere naturals are utterly impotent to effect. But the truth in His witnesses is the power of the Deity to work intellectual and moral results; and is “the savor of life ending in life” to those who believe; and of “death ending in death” to those who do not. Hence, it divides the peoples in the Court into two general divisions, believers and unbelievers, between whom the truth generates implacable hostility; for as in the days of Isaac, “he that was born after the flesh persecuted him born after the Spirit, even so it is now,” “in all their days of the prophecy” (Gal. 4:29). This state of feeling is the “enmity” put between the two seeds by Divine Power (Gen. 3:15); so that a man’s foes are often those of his own house.

But the truth in the Spirit's witnessing prophets is not uniform in its effects. The character of these depends materially upon the nature of the soil into which the incorruptible seed is sown (Matt. 13:19–26). In this parable, there are no less than six varieties of product from the same sowing—the way side, the stony, the thorny and the good; and three varieties even of the good. These all received the word sown into theft hearts, even with joy; but it was only those who, with honest and good hearts, understood it, brought forth fruit unto endless life. The good soil believers are the Spirit's witnessing prophets; while the other soil believers, not sufficiently evangelized for their own personal salvation, are too much enlightened to accept the dogmas of the Great Harlot, of her Harlot-Daughters, and of the Denominations, alias, the Abominations, of the earth; or to conform to their ordinances and institutions. Hence, the Court of the Gentiles, besides containing the Harlots and Abominations, has a numerous class of nondescripts, who are not professors of any of the superstitions of the Court. These are variously styled by the spirituals of the world, “infidels,” “liberals,” “revolutionists,” “disorganizers,” “democrats,” and so forth; but apocalyptically they are termed, “THE EARTH” (ch. 12:16).

In the way previously explained, this apocalyptic earth is a creation of the truth ministered by the Spirit's witnessing prophets, “who keep the commandments of the Deity, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ.” It is not a homogeneous rabble such as may be found in all ages and generations of the world. It is, on the contrary, a heterogeneous company of divers sorts and conditions of men, as appears from Gen. 6:12, where the phrase is applied to “all flesh,” as, “the Earth was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted Yahweh's way upon the earth;” and again, “Hear, O Earth, the words of my mouth!” (Deut. 32:1). But relatively to the Spirit's witnessing prophets, “the earth” is used in a more restricted sense. “The Earth that helps the Woman” is all those upon whom her testimony or principles, or both, have made a favorable impression. Though they may not at all be influenced by her moral and doctrinal precepts for salvation, they incorporate her principles of “civil and religious liberty,” and what they call “the rights of man,” which were abolished by the edicts of the Imperial Dragon, when he subjected the nations of his dominion to the absolute sovereignty of the Episcopal God of the earth, A.D. 529. No one imbued with the principles of civil and religious liberty could forbear to testify against arbitrary power in Church and State; and when natural men become impregnated with such principles, they become impetuous and impatient of oppression, which is said to drive even a wise man mad; and in their fury organize resistance, and seek the overthrow and destruction of the oppressor. Such an “earth” as this did not exist in the ages and generations of Rome pagan. The Woman then had no Earth devoted to religious liberty to interpose itself between her and the arbitrary ferocity of “the great red dragon;” the whole brunt of this sanguinary despotism fell directly upon her unprotected self. It was not till after the establishment of that worse than pagan superstition—that “dreadful and terrible” blasphemy, surnamed the Holy Catholic Church, that “the Earth” in its witnessing relations appeared upon the arena. When aroused to action in the unmeasured Court, it was a terror of the oppressors of the saints. It tormented them with all the plagues of war; and devoured them with fire and sword, as its own peculiar testimony against “the God of the earth,” and the Sin-powers that sustained him.

An arrangement of this sort was absolutely necessary for the preservation and protection of the One Body, witnessing for the truth against “the worshipping of the daemonials and idols,” in the midst of the nations, and “before the God of the earth;” the weapons of whose warfare were civil disabilities, and the infernal tortures of anti-heretical crusades and inquisitions. The One Body, of which Christ is the Head is commanded by him, not to avenge itself; not to take any other sword than “the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of the Deity;” not to resist evil; if smitten upon one cheek to turn the other; and many other precepts, of which his own individual conduct when in the hands of his enemies, was an unmistakable illustration. In view of these commands, how was such a Polity to devour its enemies with fire, to turn waters into blood, and to smite the earth with plagues? Manifestly such a work of death and destruction was incompatible with obedience to such precepts of non-resistance. War and desolation are no part of christian duty. "The servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all." This principle faithfully and duly observed by all the Lord's servants in his absence, will prevent them from avenging their own wrongs; or lending themselves as instruments in the quarrels of others, be they individuals or nations. No degradation more ignominious can befall a servant of the Lord than that of being a bloodshedder in the service of any of the Sin-powers of the unmeasured Court. To be employed in such a service, is to be servant of the Lord's enemies. "No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of life; that he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier." This is the duty of all soldiers—they must labor to please their owners. Hence, the world's soldiers must please the world, who is their lord and master; and "if I please men," says Paul, "I should not be the servant of Christ;" for Christ himself says, "that which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of the Deity" (Luke 16:15; Gal. 1:10). The saints cannot serve two masters, Christ and Sin. If they "endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ;" and "fight the good fight of faith" scripturally, they cannot at the same time "serve Sin" in the armies of "the God of the earth"—the armies of the nations of the Court. Their mission is to "contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints;" which protests against all the wars and fightings of the Gentiles as emanating from their unhallowed and unbridled lusts. What has the Holy City, trampled by the Gentiles, to do with what they deem great, sacred and good? What is the judgment of these worth in the premises? Doth not the word testify that they are all fools and drunk? And shall saints, the salt of the earth and the light of the world, lose their savour in the service of such, and be darkened by the fog of their delusions?

Thus were organized in the unmeasured Court of the Gentiles two powerful antagonisms—civil and religious despotism, on the one hand; and civil and religious liberty, on the other. The adherents of the despotisms, in their civil and ecclesiastical organization, were the Dragon, the Ten Horns, the God of the earth, the Great Harlot, her Daughters, and the Abominations of the earth—a blind, corrupt, and cruel host; while opposed to these, were the One Body and its unconscious instrument, "the Earth"—unconscious that it was the divinely appointed and divinely energized agent for the aid, nourishment, and vindication of the Spirit's witnessing prophets against their enemies.

Here, then, were two cooperative organizations against the Catholic Apostasy of the Court. Without any treaty of alliance offensive and defensive, and without any direct mutual understanding, the ages and generations of the past found them standing side by side in witnessing and prophesying with tormenting effect against the blasphemies and abominations of "them who dwell upon the earth." Each witness had its own speciality. Christ's brethren testified the gospel, and laid before the Court the way of salvation. They showed men what they must believe and do for the remission of all their past sins; and for the obtaining a right to the tree of life in the Holy City, when it shall be measured by the angel of the golden reed—ch. 21:15; 22:14. In doing this, they did their utmost to neutralize the teaching of the Jeromes, Augustines, Ambroses, and Martins, of the apostasy; and to turn the hearts of the peoples from their profane fables to "the engrafted word which is alone able to save their souls." In this work they were eminently successful. They filled the Court with their doctrine, which inflicted great torment of mind upon the clerical and ministerial craftsmen, whose pride, arrogance, and flesh, fattened upon its superstitions and delusions.

Such torment, of course, could not fail to arouse all the bitterness and animosity of sin's flesh. The firm of the Jeromes, Augustines, and company, perceived that their episcopal craft was in danger; and that if they left this witness alone, the evil might become so great, that they might not be able to hold their own. Something, they concluded, must be done for the preservation of their fables and traditions. It had not yet become the custom for catholic to burn heretic; although the tendency to that orthodox solution of inconvenient questions was becoming rife. In A.D. 385, the blood of Priscillianists had been shed by catholic ministers; but this was not the rule. When the Christadelphians, or Brethren of Christ, undertook to protest against practices which they regarded as superstitious and unscriptural, they were then, as now, assailed with every expression of contumely and rancor. But the wordy passion and invectives of their enemies broke no bones, and destroyed no lives. These witnessing prophets of the Spirit were not to be deterred by hard words. They continued to contend earnestly for the “one body, one Spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, and one Deity;” and to admit of no truce or compromise with anything that rendered one or all of these of none effect. Their course was onward by the light of the word, and by that only; so that by the time the Roman Bishop was primarily developed into “the God of the earth” by Justinian’s Decretal Epistle, A.D. 529, they had become a numerous and influential community in all the nations of the West.

But, when this “Name of Blasphemy, speaking great things,” had received political life; and had been set up as a living Image of Imperial Power, styled “the Image of the Beast” in ch. 13:14; a change for the worse came over the situation of affairs. “All, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond,” were commanded to worship this image upon pain of death; and “to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their forehead; and that no man might buy and sell, save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name.” This pressed with great hardship upon the One Body; and upon those who were pledged to the antipapal principles of civil and religious liberty. Multitudes preferred death to submission to this decree; and determined to draw the sword in defence of “conscience and the rights of man,” thus violently assailed by the new “god of all the earth.” This Moloch of the Seven Hills was not backward in affording them scope for the development of their prowess in all the nations of the court. He proclaimed crusades against them; and called upon his worshippers to gather their hosts, and to take the field against them, and to slay them with utter and exterminating slaughter. “The Earth,” the Spirit’s other witness, embraced the conflict, undismayed by the power and ferocity of the foe. With fire and sword, which was their testimony practically administered, they tormented the minions of the oppressor. The prophesying of “the Earth” that “helped the Woman,” was not to be despised by the priests and rulers of the nations. They devoured their enemies in war; and shut the heaven of the Court, that there should be no peace “in their days of the prophecy.”

1. “THE LIGHT SHINING IN DARKNESS”

Thus, the history of the ages and the generations of the unmeasured Court is in strict harmony with this prophecy of the witnesses. For a period considerably over a thousand years after Rome renounced its old gods for the ghosts, dry bones, and fables of the catholic superstition, the Spirit had provided himself with Two Witnessing Classes, to whose custody he providentially committed the truth, and its judicial vindication by fire and sword. This was their combined mission in all that long series of centuries. The one witness was the military arm of the other; and both in combination were the two arms of the Spirit, holding the Olive Branch in one hand, and the Flaming Sword, in the other. “These,” said the Spirit-Voice to John, “are the Two Olive Trees and two Lightstands, which have stood before the god of the earth.” That is, the Two Olive Trees, or Branches, and Two Golden Pipes, about which Zechariah made special inquiry, represent these two classes of anti-catholic and antipapal, but not “protestant,” though protesting, witnesses. They are represented by two olive trees, because, though generically one, they are distinct species of witnesses. They are both olive trees, in whom light-giving oil was generated, as already explained; but the one class of witnessing prophets is of the wild olive species; while the other is of the good, or cultivated olive.

In the eleventh chapter of Romans, Paul compares all mankind to two olive trees of the wild and cultivated species. The twelve tribes of Israel to whose country the olive is indigenous he likens to “a good olive tree,” with a “holy root,” representing “the fathers” Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, on whose account the whole nation is beloved. The rest of mankind he compares to “a wild olive tree,” which is smaller and inferior in all its parts. Eliphaz in Job 15:33, compares a wicked man to an olive tree whose flowers fall before their season, and consequently brings no fruit.

Such is the primary import of these two trees, symbols of Israel and the Gentiles. But, the Israelitish Olive Tree, and the Gentile Olive Tree, signified something more than this in the symbols before us. There was a specialty to be represented which had been apostolically elicited. This was the adoption of believing Gentiles into the Israelitish Family, that they might be Israelites in every particular, except the accident of birth according to nature. This adoption, Paul styles “grafting in;” and figuratively represents the process, as a breaking of branches off from the wild Gentile olive, and inserting them into the place of certain sapless branches of the good Israelitish olive, which had also been broken off, and cast away. This teaches allegorically that while the good olive tree represents the Israelitish peoples generally; there is nevertheless a Gentile element in the nation, equally interested in the promises made to their fathers, which are “the fatness of the tree.” Thus, the good olive tree represents “the Israel of the Deity,” constituted of Israelites and Gentiles, who believe “the promises covenanted to the fathers;” and who, since Pentecost, A.D. 34, have believed “the truth as it is in Jesus,” and by immersion into him, have been adopted, or grafted into the Commonwealth of Israel, as it will be in the times of restitution.

This union of Israelites and Gentiles into One Body, or Holy City, was represented to Zechariah, by connecting the two trees by means of two golden pipes with the one golden bowl of the lightstand; the idea of branch-union being set forth in the connection of the pipes with certain branches of the trees. In the eleventh chapter of the Apocalypse, the two olive trees are not united by pipes into one lightstand, as in Zechariah. This is an important item in the premises. In the first chapter, there is only one Lightstand with seven burners; but in the text before us, we have “two lightstands” with a tree to each. Had there been but one class of witnesses, composed of faithful and obedient Israelites and Gentiles, there would, doubtless, have been only one Lightstand, indicative of their union into One Body. We should then have found it impossible to interpret “the prophecy” in harmony with the anti-war principles delivered to it. But we are relieved of this difficulty by the introduction into the vision of two separate and distinct lightstands. A wild olive branch and a lightstand are symbolical of “the Earth”—the anticatholic and antipapal champion of civil and religious liberty, and the rights of man, standing defiantly “before the god of the earth,” and the other branches of the wild olive tree. Fed by the revolutionary principles of wild olive liberalism, the earthy lightstand shone with light amid the deep and universal gloom of “the dark ages.”

But, if this “lux lucens in tenebris,” or light shining in darkness, had been the only light, it would have been a feeble one indeed. It would have been like the light of “peace democracy” shining in the abolition darkness of the past four years. There was another lightstand and a good olive branch. These symbolized the One Body, witnessing the truth. This lightstand shone with the light of the word, “Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light to my path” (Psa. 119:105). This was “the golden oil” of the good olive, by which the lightstand burners were fed. It was “the unction from the Holy One by which they knew all the things” they witnessed; and by which they were taught, “and is the truth” (1 John 2:20, 27). By the shining of the light from this lightstand, the gross darkness of catholic superstition and idolatry were made tormentingly manifest. The god of the earth, his cardinals, bishops, priests, deacons, monks, and such like, were exhibited to the peoples of the Court, as profane mountebanks, and blasphemous impostors. The light showed them to be, what they are to this day, unrepentant hypocrites, and a generation of poisonous serpents. Multitudes were enlightened to discern this; and caused thereby to desert the temples of the god. They recruited the ranks of the witnesses, and greatly increased their power; until the issue was formed, that either these lightstands must be extinguished; or the spirituals of the wickedness of the Court would find their occupation gone.

2. "THE GOD OF THE EARTH"

Now, it is expressly said, that these "two witnesses," "two olive trees," "two lightstands," and "two prophets," "have stood before the god of the earth." This was to be their position. This god is not to be mistaken for the Eternal Creator. Though he made the earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein; and claims them all as his, He is not styled in this prophecy "the God of the earth." His title in this chapter is "the God of heaven," to whom glory is ascribed at the concluding act of the second woe (ch. 11:13). It is true, these witnesses in a certain sense stand before the Creator; but in the sense of giving testimony against, they do not; and that enopion, before, is to be understood in the sense of against, is evident from the effect of their testimony which "torments," and stirs up the powers to destroy them (verses 7, 10). These two witnessing classes of antipapists confront the representatives of the papal deity in all the nations of the abyss; and in so doing, they stand in a hostile attitude before the God of the earth.

I have already shown, that this was a deity newly come up from the abyss, which was entirely unknown to the nations of the fourth beast dominion, commonly styled the pagan Roman empire; and that he was two hundred and eighty years, after the similitude of a foetus in embryo being two hundred and eighty days in developing into "THE MAN OF SIN, the Son of Perdition, who opposeth and exalteth himself over every one called god, or an object of fear"—sebasma—into the Lawless One, ho Anomos, who, Daniel was informed, would "think to change times and laws;" and "whom the Lord will consume with the Spirit of his mouth, and destroy in the manifestation of his presence—te epiphaneia tes parousias autou (2 Thess. 2:3, 4, 8). This lawless deity of the court, who sets himself above all law even in his decrepitude, while he has to be supported upon his tottering throne against "the Earth" by French bayonets, claims to be the successor of the apostle Peter, and Vicegerent of Jesus Christ—in other words, THE ANTICHRIST—anti, instead of, christos, Christ.

That the term deity, or god, is rightly applied to this imperially apotheosized Roman bishop, is apparent from the following testimonies:

"The venerable name of Pope (or Father)" says Gibbon, speaking of A.D. 500, "was now appropriated to the Roman Pontiff." Addressed by nations, it was an imperial, and originally a divine title. So Ovid says to Augustus, "Thou hast that name through earth, which in high heaven is Jupiter's; thou, the Father of men, He of the gods." And Horace, "Here thou mayest love to be called Father and Prince." The title as given to the Roman Bishop, was sometimes in the form Pater Patrum, Father of fathers; as in a letter from the bishop of Larissa to Boniface II., A.D. 531, in which occurs the sentence, "to my holy lord, and over all most blessed, and truly venerable Father of Fathers, the universal Patriarch (Chief Father) Boniface." The imperial and royal sense attached to the title pope, is illustrated in the legend of the medal of Julius III.; "Dominus Julius Rep. Christianae Rex. ac Pater—"Lord Julius, King and Father of the Christian Commonwealth."

In the time of Charlemagne, A.D. 799, a Roman Council declared, that the Pope who was the judge of all men was above being judged by any other than himself. So in the year 1090, "that the right of judging concerning every church is to the Pope alone; but he himself, indeed, is subject to the judgment of none." Afterwards in the Canon Law, collected and published by Gratian in the 12th century, it was said, "It is certain that the Pontiff was called a God by the pious prince Constantine; and it is manifest that God cannot be judged by men." This claim continued unchanged in the 15th century. So A.D. 1463, on Paul II. dismissing Platina after his election, and Platina's threatening to bring the case before the judges of the Rota, Paul fiercely replied, "Thou bring us before the judges? Would'st thou not know, that all laws are placed in the repository of our breast?... I am Pontiff: and upon the pleasure of my mind it depends both to rescind, and approve the acts of others.” Assuredly, no future antichrist can be more entitled to the name, “Lawless,” than the popes.

They exalted themselves above all called god, or an object of homage, worship, or fear. This papal exaltation and superiority above all royal majesty, Innocent III. declared to be that of the sun above the moon; and Gregory VII. affirmed that it was fit that all Princes should kiss his feet. He claimed to make and unmake kings; to assign kingdoms and to take them away. Pius II. proposed even to the sultan of Turkey to give him a legal title to the Greek empire, if he would assist him. And to come nearer to our own times, we find Pius VII., while suffering under the deep humiliation inflicted upon him by Napoleon, asserting the same authority. “Let them learn,” said he, in his excommunication of Napoleon, June 10, 1809, “that they are subjected by the laws of Jesus Christ to our throne, and to our commandment.” Concerning Celestin III., on occasion of the coronation of Henry VI. of Germany, A.D. 1191, Roger of Hoveden, gives the following illustration of the pope’s exaltation of himself “above all called god.” “The Lord Pope,” says he: “sat in the pontifical chair, holding the golden imperial crown between his feet; and the Emperor bending his head received the crown, and the Empress in the same manner, from the feet of the Lord Pope. But the Lord Pope instantly struck with his foot the Emperor’s crown, and cast it upon the ground; signifying that he had the power of deposing him from the Empire, if he were undeserving of it. The Cardinals however lifted up the crown, and placed it on the Emperor’s head.”

The pope was frequently addressed as Christ, and received the title as distinctively and only his due. Illustrative of this S. Bernard in the 12th century writes to Pope Eugenius, “Consider that thou art the Vicar of Christ, the Christ of the Lord.” Another and later illustration occurs in an official report about Pope Martin’s embassy to the Greek Emperor containing the following description of the Pope by his own accredited orator: “The most Holy and most Blessed One, who hath divine judgment, who is Lord on earth; successor of Peter, the Lord’s Christ, Lord of the universe, Father of kings, Light of the world, the Chief Pontiff Pope Martin.” It was the command of Gregory VII., that “the name of the pope alone should be recited in the churches;” and Southey observes, that men were required to bow at the Pope’s name (so recited) as at Christ’s.

In setting up for Vicar, he claimed to be the substitute, not of a pure man, but of the true God—“Summus Pontifex non hominis purised “VERI DEI, vere Vicarius appellatur:”—ruling in place of the true God on earth—“VERI DEI, VICEM gerit in terris,” as said Innocent III. “Sir Culling Eardly,” says Mr. Elliott, from whose Latin notes I have translated these gleanings, “in a late pamphlet, notices the following title of a book, published with the sanction of the Neapolitan censorship in 1724, and which illustrates the common application of this title Vice-God to the popes, even in the 18th century: “Istoria dell’ antica Repubblica di amalfi; Consecrata al VICE DEO Benedetto decimo-terzo, Pontefice Ottimo Massimo. Con licenza dei Superiori”—History of the ancient Republic of Amalphi; Consecrated to the Vice-God Benedict XIII., a perfectly good supreme pontiff. With license of the Superiors.

The Papal Casuists say, “that honor which is due to Christ, according to what God is, is due to the Pope; because honor is due to power. But the power of Christ, according to what God is, and of the Pope, is one.” The same had been set forth by Innocent in his Decretals, “the Pope is God because the Vicar of God: also in the Canon Laws’ statement, before referred to, that Constantine called the pope a God; with the gloss, “Our Lord God the Pope.”

The Pope carried in Godlike State like the ancient Babylonian Pontifex Maximus (From a Roman Painting depicted in Horae Apocalypticae, vol. 3) illustrating the comment in Eureka. The Pope is depicted holding aloft “the Host”, a bit of dough transformed, he asserts, into the real flesh and blood of Christ. This fable was derived from pagan Babylonian mythology. See Hislop's Two Babylons.

The following is a striking statement to the same effect from the "Speculum Vitae Humanae" of Rodericus Sancius, Romish Bishop and Refendary of Paul II.; a book published at Rome by Papal authority, in 1468, and many times afterwards. "The majesty of his most sacred state impairs every human intellect. If nothing in this world is more excellent than the state of simple priests, what must be thought of the Chief Pontiff who rules on earth instead of the true God? who is exalted, not only to a human sovereignty, but to a divine one; not to ruling mortals alone, but angels; not to judging the living, but also the dead; not on earth alone, but in heaven, by the great God, and in his place."

The saying of a certain French writer concerning a particular pope would be well and truly applied to the whole fraternity of papal gods. "The bulls of John XXIII.," says he, "commenced with a lie—Servant of the servants of God. He ought rather to have entitled himself Lord of lords. Seeing that he boasts himself of having as much power as Jesus Christ possesses, as God and man."

Some lines were addressed to an elephant presented to Leo X., two of which were as follows:

*Si servire Deo vere est regnare, Leoni
Dum servis regnas: nam Leo in orbe DEUS.*

If to serve God truly is to reign, while thou servest Leo thou reignest; for Leo is God on earth—App. to Roscoe's Leo, X.

This exaltation of the Roman Bishop from a Patriarch, or Chief Father, into the God of the earth, was not altogether approved by his brethren. Arnulph of Orleans in the Synod at Rheims, A.D. 991, exclaimed in reference to John XV.: "What is this, Reverend Fathers, sitting upon a lofty throne, radiant with a golden and purple vesture; what, I say, think ye that this is? Doubtless, if he is destitute of love, and puffed up and exalted with knowledge only, he is Antichrist sitting in the temple of Deity and exhibiting himself as if he were God." Arnulph's suspicion was well founded, only he erred in supposing that Antichrist was to be found sitting in the temple of the true God. This is an universal error. The temple of the Deity who created all things, is a living temple; a house not made with hands. In such a temple as the Roman, he does not dwell. His habitation is that Spiritual House, built up by his formative word, of lively precious stones, called saints, because they are "sanctified in Christ Jesus." In this temple of the Deity, Antichrist has never yet sat enthroned, nor ever will. He sits in his own temple—in the temple of the God of the earth; and there, as represented in an engraving published at Rome with license of the authorities, and republished in Elliott's Hor. Apoc. he sits upon the high altar of the Cathedral dedicated to Peter; and receives the adoration of his scarlet-robed cardinals, who worship him by bowing down before him, and kissing his toe! Thus, he sits in the temple of the deity as a deity, publicly exhibiting himself that he is a deity." This is what Paul said, and most strikingly and literally it has come to pass.

In the year 727, Gregory II, boasted to the Dragon-Emperor, that "all the kings of the west held the pope to be a God upon earth." In this he told the truth; for when Stephen visited France to obtain aid from the Franks against the Lombards, Pepin received him, according to Sismondi, as a Divinity.

In Elliott's repository of papal curiosities, I have before me copies of medals, which illustrate very forcibly the "great things and blasphemies" of the Man Eyes and Mouth of the Little Horn, which were developed into the deity of the earth; before whom the witnesses stood, and by whose command they were at length killed.

The first is a medal struck by order of Martin V., A.D. 1417. The Roman Bishop is sitting upon a throne, with the Holy Spirit symbolized by a dove, hovering amidst rays over its canopy. Two cardinals, one on each side of him, are crowning him with the tiara, or conical cap with three diadems one above another, and surmounted at the peak by a ball and a cross. On the right of the throne is an altar with a cross upon it, and a light burning on each side of it. Before the altar and throne is a figure upon his knees, his hands lifted up in prayer, and his head thrown back in devout contemplation of the pope. Opposite to this representative of the multitude, are three cardinal princes and electors, who represent the spiritual and sovereign influences by which they were inspired in the election. On the margin, is the inscription "Quem creant adorant Romae." Whom they create they worship at Rome.

Another medal was struck by Calixtus III., A.D. 1456. Upon a knoll stands a cross with a tiara above it, and rays of spirit shed upon it. Behind the mound, intended to represent Calvary, is the open sea, studded with sailing craft, and a mountain peering up above the horizon, symbolical of the governments of the world. In this symbolism, the Pope appears as Christ's substitute, or vicar. Jesus had all the sufferings; the Pope claims all the glory. The legend of this medal shows this—"Omnes Reges servient ei"—All Kings shall serve him; that is, the Pope!

A third is a medal struck by Clement VII., A.D. 1525, commemorative of his opening of heaven at the jubilee. On the right is a doorway that had been walled up for the occasion. Standing before the wall is the Roman God with a pickaxe hard at work demolishing the walls, which is represented as about a third open, and the rubbish piled up at his feet. Above him in the air, and sitting upon a cloud with a key in his hand about the size of the pick, is Peter before the gate of heaven, which is unobscured by cloud in proportion to the opening in the gate below. The relation between the two gates is shown by a parallelogram of rays from Peter's opening to the Pope's. Behind the divine pickman are five waiting figures upon their knees, representative of the multitude, who have friends in purgatory. They are watching for the entire demolition of the wall, as the sign that Peter will have then finished his job above; and his door in heaven being wide open (and if the God below had not picked out his door, Peter's would have never been opened at all) their suffering friends will pass through it, out of the scorching flames into the refreshing coolness of paradise! The legend of this medal is "Et Portae Coeli apertae sunt"—And the gates of heaven are opened.

A fourth medal struck by Alexander VII., A.D. 1655, represents the Roman God creating God out of bread for the people to worship, and then to eat. Upon a sedia gestatoria, or chair of state borne on clerical shoulders, the Pope is represented as kneeling before his breaden god, which he holds up to public gaze in a pyx, or small box, mounted on a stand. Above him is a canopy decorated with crosses, keys, and tiaras; and on either side of the sedia are priests bearing wide-expanded flabelli, or fans of peacocks' feathers, mounted on staves, so as to flank the pope from his shoulders upwards, and considerably above his head. The eyes of the fans signify the innumerable eyes of the Cherubim; so that the Roman God, while kneeling upon his sedia, is "dwelling between the Cherubim!" Surely blasphemy like this cannot be surpassed. The rest of the medal shows a crowd of worshippers, whose superstition is expressed in the legend, "Procidamus et adoremus in Spiritu et veritate"—We fall prostrate and adore in spirit and in truth!

A fifth medal also by Alexander VII., A.D. 1655, illustrates the asserted power of the Vice-Christ over the so-called "spirit-world." He is represented sitting upon a judgment seat with his cardinals on his right and left sitting in double rows, with an open space before them; across which is a bar in the foreground. Over the canopy of his throne is the symbol of the Spirit, the dove with expanded wings, and surrounded with rays and angel-heads. The legend informs us, that the matter before this divine consistory is an inquiry for reckoning Bishop Francis among the saints—"Blato Francisco Episcopo inter sanctos relato."

A sixth medal by Gregory XV., A.D. 1622, commemorates his award of heaven to five of the dead, and their apotheosis. The tiaraed god is sitting upon his throne, with a book of judgment supported upon the head of a figure kneeling before him, in which he is about to sign the decree of canonization. On the left, and above the group of attendants, are opened clouds between which is the dove, from which rays of light descend towards the book, indicating divine approval. Around the whole is the legend, "Quinque Beatis Caelestes Honores decernit”—He decrees celestial honors to five Blessed Ones.

In a seventh medal, struck by order of Clement X., A.D. 1670, is a group of five figures, four men and one woman, kneeling, standing, and sitting upon a cloud, with the dove shedding his rays upon them from above. Each has a halo of glory round the head. The figures are symbolical the daemonials, or ghosts, of a king, a cardinal, a pope, a priest, and a matron, as indicated by a crown, a hat, a tiara, a crucifix, and a babe. The central figure, the cardinal, has a book in one hand, and a pen in the other, symbolical of their admission among the gods of the catholic aerial, being consequent upon the decree of the God upon the earth below! This is expressed in the legend, “Decor ejus Gloria Sanctorum”—His grace the glory of the saints!

3. “THE GOD OF THE EARTH” AND “THE ANTICHRIST” IDENTICAL

Thus, in this eleventh chapter, two Deities are presented to view; the one living and true Deity, styled in the C.V., “the God of Heaven,” and his counterfeit and rival, called “the God of the Earth.” This is the Antichrist—ho antichristos. The preposition anti in composition has the force of instead, equal to, like, corresponding to, counter, against, &c. In the word antichrist, which is not a classical word, but one especially coined by inspiration, it signifies AN Anointed One substituted for THE Anointed One; and therefore an usurper of the rights of the true. This is certainly a hostile position for one to hold, and puts him in antagonism to Christ. But an enemy to Christ is not the force of the word. It signifies, as Mr. Elliott contends in his note upon antipope, one occupying the true Christ’s place, receiving his honors, and exercising his functions.

The germ which in after ages was fully developed into the Antichrist was the denying the Father and the Son (1 John 2:22). This denial was in the sense of not confessing that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh (2 John 7). All who held this damnable tradition (which in our time is an article of “orthodoxy” so called) forsook the fellowship of the apostles, and were thus manifested as antichrists.

“Ye have heard,” says John, “that The Antichrist comes; even now are there many antichrists. They went out from us, but they were not of us.” These were “false prophets,” spirits, or teachers, whose doctrine was “that of the Antichrist that should come; and even now already,” says John, “is in the world” (1 John 4:3). They confessed not, that he whom they called Jesus Christ was a man in the flesh common to all mankind, which is sarx amartias, Sin’s flesh (Rom. 8:3). They maintained that he had another kind of flesh, which was pure, holy, and immaculate. They confounded his immaculate, or spotless, character, with his maculate flesh. This was a fatal heresy; for if Jesus was not crucified in the flesh common to us all, then “sin was” not “condemned in the flesh,” as all the apostles taught; and there has been as yet no sacrifice for sin, and consequently there are no means of remission of sins extant. This immaculate nature of Jesus was the germ of the Catholic Apostasy headed up in the Antichrist, or Deity of the Earth. All who taught the dogma were the founders of a New Religion, and became its “Fathers;” and all who received their traditions became, with them, the Mystical Body of Antichrist, whose Head is the Deity of the Earth. The immaculate nature of Jesus, however, involved “the Fathers,” and their “Father of the Fathers”—pater pateron—in the necessity of transforming the mother of Jesus into an immaculate virgin-goddess—immaculate in her conception, and therefore not of the common flesh of Jewish nature. The Deity of the Apostasy was bound to decree this to avoid the inconvenient questions, “Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?” (Job 14:4); and, “How can he be clean that is born of woman?” (Job 25:4). Job says, “Not one” can do this. But this paragon of patience knew nothing of the Pope! He undertook to accomplish Job’s impossibility; for nothing is impossible with the Great Blasphemer of the Deity of the Heaven!! He decreed that the woman Mary was of clean and holy flesh; and therefore the thing born of her was “a thing”—spotless flesh untainted of Adam’s sin, though eph, ho pantes emarton, in him all sinned, which an unsophisticated mind would suppose included all liable to death; Eli, Mary, her mother, and Jesus all died, and must necessarily have been included federally in Adam. But these considerations are no difficulty with the Chief Sorcerer of “Christendom.” His magic wand, “thus I decree,” transforms all lies into divine truths, and the grossest absurdities into the sublimest and most adorable mysteries!

Thus, then, “the Antichrist” is the imperial and pontifical incarnation of immaculate-conceptionism; ideally conceived in apostolic times; personally enthroned A.D. 604–8; and culminating in the pontificate of Leo X., A.D. 1513–21. The blasphemies of the Antichrist, the Eyes and Mouth of the Beast of the Abyss (ch. 13:1) attained the most audacious phase of their profanity in his reign; and from the intense disgust they created even in the monkish mind, became the occasion of the renowned ANTIPAPAL REBELLION led off by the Augustinian monk of Erfurt. At this crisis, there was no impiety this Lion-Mouth forebore to utter. His pretensions were as high as heaven; his moral degradation, deep as “the lowest hell.” His assumption of divine honors, as the Christ-Impersonation, is symbolized in a pontifical medal, on the reverse of which is a lion with his right foot resting on the globe, representing the pope, who assumed the name of Lion X., being crowned by an angel; with the legend, or utterance of the angel, “Vicit Leo de Tribu Iudae”—The Lion of the Tribe of Judah has conquered.

POPE LEO X. AS THE LION OF THE TRIBE OF JUDAH.

The medal struck in Rome by Leo X (1513–21) just before the Reformation. It depicts him as being crowned by an angel, whilst the words Vicit Leo de Tribu Iudae provide the caption: “The Lion of the Tribe of Judah has conquered.” During his pontificate papal revenue increased dramatically mainly through the sale of indulgences and offices. This called forth the criticism of Protestants as illustrated in the drawings below. That on the left depicts Christ expelling the moneychangers from the temple, on the right, under the title Antichrist, the pope is seen on his throne, disposing of bishoprics and archbishoprics and selling dispensations and indulgences.—Publishers.

Such is the Antichrist, once a formidable power in all Antichristendom by which he was worshipped; but now, as the phrase is “standing upon his last legs,” a bye-word and a scorn to millions. But, although the lines of his temporality are contracted almost to the limits of “the Seven Mountains,” his divine attributes are acknowledged by many nations, and peoples, crazed and intoxicated by the wine administered to them by the spiritual knaves who are devoted to his will. Respect for this deified impropiator of the attributes of “the Father and the Son,” is, however, not wholly confined to papists. The governments of Protestant peoples send their representatives to his court; and subsidize his emissaries in their states. Their schools are patronized by pious sinners of “orthodox” antipapal “abominations;” who, being profoundly ignorant of the history of “the God,” or not believing its testimony, entrust the formation of their children’s minds to his spirituals, whose intoxicating superstition and blasphemy inscribe “his mark in their foreheads,” and prepare them for drinking the wrath of God in the outpouring of his indignation (Apoc. 14:9, 10). Many calling themselves protestants recognize the popes, cardinals, bishops, priests, and such like, as christians; and the church over which they preside as a true one, and the Mother of all others. In such a recognition is abundant proof, that they do not know what constitutes a christian; and that, consequently, they have no scriptural claim to the name themselves. The church of the Antichrist is undoubtedly the mother of all protestant churches. This I would in no wise dispute; for their dogmas are all stained with the “great things and blasphemies” of his mouth. The fathers of protestantism, in a qualified sense benefactors, were but the rebellious servants of the Antichrist, who revolted from his authority, but held on to many of his traditions. While they rejected Antichrist they did not submit to Christ; but allied themselves with sinful princes and governors of the court. The papal scheme of salvation was through penances and works of merit; the Lutheran and its fellows, “justification by faith ALONE.” These two schemes divide the Court of the Gentiles. They are both equally false; and therefore, neither of them “the power of god for the salvation of them that believe.” The principle of the Spirit’s witnessing prophets, is “justification through the One Faith.” This “One Faith” is proposed for faith, which, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone” (James 2:17). To the one faith belongs “the law of faith,” which excludes all boasting; and where law is, obedience is required (Rom. 3:27). The one faith was intrusted to the apostles that they might go forth, and publish it “for obedience to the faith for his name among all nations” (Rom. 1:5; 16:26). All who received the one faith, and yielded the obedience it demands, “believed the things concerning the kingdom of the Deity, and of the name of Jesus Christ; and were immersed into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, for repentance and the remission of sins (Acts 8:12; 2:38; Matt. 28:19). The firm of Luther, Calvin, Knox, Cranmer and Company, knew nothing of this; yet they were highly useful in their day. They were Satan casting out Satan, whereby his kingdom was greatly weakened. They fought their master with his own weapons, and prevailed and became the founders of Harlot-Superstitions, which flourished in power and worldly glory, while the Spirit’s Witnesses were lying dead and unburied in the breadth of the Great City, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified” (ch. 11:6, 9). In this breadth, plateia, they still flourish in all pomps and vanities of sin and folly. They are useful antagonists to the power of the Antichrist, while they are themselves but antichristian fellowships inimical to the truth. But, the Deity of the heaven, in his providence, educes good out of evil to his saints, “for whose sake are all things.” The antagonisms of Satan so neutralize his power, that his Deity in Chief can no longer torment them unto death. So shorn is he of his glory, that though still upon his throne, and wearing the pontifical mitre and the imperial tiara, his divine bombast is a bursted bubble, and he stands before the world “the False Prophet of the Beast” (ch. 16:13; 19:20); and unconsciously waiting with the beast, until the expiration of the “forty and two months ;” when the Lord Jesus Christ, whom he has burlesqued and blasphemed; and the saints whom he has murdered, shall pay him in his own coin; and utterly destroy him in the brightness of their manifestation.

4. HOW THE TWO PROPHETS DESTROYED THEIR ENEMIES

Before this Deity of the earth, while in the plenitude of his power, the Spirit’s witnessing prophets had to stand in all the breadth of his dominion. The One Body and the Earth that helped it were the Mordecai in the gate, who, in all the west, refused to salute him and to do him honor. But the time was at length approaching when their mission for a while would be fulfilled; and a substitute would be found for them in their testimony against the Antichrist, though not in their exhibition of the engrafted word for salvation, in the antipapal rebellion soon to blaze forth.

As I have shown, their mission was warlike as well as doctrinal. In the prophecy, what “the earth” executed as the minister of divine wrath, both were said to do; unless we understand the plural to refer to the multitude of which “the Earth” was composed. “If any will to injure them”—if any power undertake to fall upon them with the sword—“fire burst forth out of their mouth and devours their enemies; and if any wills to injure them, thus must he be put to death.” This is prophetic of the wars that would be waged against the forces raised by the antichrist for their extermination. The Deity of the heaven did not require the members of the One Body to stand and be murdered by their enemies without help. If persecuted in one city they were to fly to another; but “the Earth,” not believing in non-resistance and passive obedience to ecclesiastical tyranny, stood their ground, and devoured their enemies, after the introduction of gunpowder in war, at the cannon’s mouth. In this way “the Earth” performed their part. This was their mode of prophesying against the Antichrist; which, “in all their days of the prophecy,” was very effective in the preservation of civil and religious liberty, and the rights of man; and in perpetuating them to succeeding generations. Moreover, being not without political organization under their Counts, they were enabled to exercise a will in these matters. They could will to make war upon their enemies at pleasure; and, in so doing, they had “power to shut the” antichristian “heaven, that rain might not fall in their days of the prophecy.” I say, the antichristian heaven—the heaven of Antichrist’s inhabitation; the heaven in which “the God of the earth” dwells, under the whole of which “the Earth” and the “Holy City” stood while testifying or prophesying against him. To shut up any sort of heaven that rain might not descend upon those who lived under it, is figurative of divine wrath upon the sufferers. This appears from Deut. 11:17—“And Yahweh’s wrath be kindled against you, and he shut up the heaven that there be no rain.” This shutting up was the effect of divine displeasure. The shutting up of a heaven is never significative of blessing upon any people, but always of calamity of some sort. The genial, refreshing and fertilizing character of the administration of human affairs by the Mystical Christ—Jesus and his Brethren—is compared to an opened heaven from which rain descends in gentle showers upon the grass newly mown: as, “There shall be a ruler over mankind, a Just One, ruling in the righteous precepts of Elohim. And as the brightness of morning, He shall rise the Sun of an unclouded dawn shining forth after rain upon tender grass out of the earth” (2 Sam. 23:4); and, “He shall descend like rain upon the mown grass; as showers that water the earth.” The meaning of which is, that “In his days shall the righteous flourish; and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth” (Psa. 72:6, 7). But, when the heaven is shut, the reverse of this obtains—the righteous do not flourish, but are “in sackcloth;” and there is no peace. Thus, by way of illustration, while I now write, the atheistic abolition faction is prophesying against their brethren in Antichrist dwelling in the South. Until the day of their own judgment comes, “they have power to shut the heaven that rain fall not in their days of prophesying,” neither upon themselves nor upon their enemies. In other words, while they have the ability to carry death and desolation to the hearths and altars of their coreligionists, they prevent the righteous flourishing, and peace descending with its blessings upon the people. Hence, this infidel faction is the Deity’s scourge upon communities of religionists, who corrupt his way, and make void his word by their traditions. The faction is Itself a compound of “abominations of the earth”—an aggregation of pious and profane infidels, being choris christou and atheoi en to kosmo, without Christ and atheists in the world (Eph. 2:12). Hence, they are fit only for a providential work of blood; in which, while they are blindly executing vengeance for him, they are preparing disaster and ruin by which they will be themselves submerged into “the lowest hell”—sheol tachtiyah (Psa. 86:13; 9:17). As delighting in carnage and desolation, they must be scattered, and all their knavish devilry confused; for so the Spirit taught the Psalmist to pray—“Scatter thou the people that delight in war” (Psa. 68:30).

But, his witnessing prophets of the Holy City do not delight in war. The Earth that helps them only draws the sword to “turn the waters into blood, and to smite the earth with the plagues” of war, when the rulers of those waters, or “peoples and multitudes and nations and tongues,” will to deprive them of civil and religious liberty and the rights of men. Hence, these rulers in the anti-christian heaven bring the evils of war upon themselves. But, it must be noted, that civil and religious liberty and rights are only sacred in the sight of heaven when it is the liberty and rights of his people that are in question. He has granted a dispensation to no set of men to worship him “according to the dictates of their own conscience”. This is a liberty and right that he has granted to none. All that he has granted is liberty to enter his august presence, and to do him worship according to the dictates of his word. All else is mere “will-worship and voluntary humility,” of which he has recorded his contempt (Col. 2:18, 23). This is the character of the worship offered by the State Harlots and Dissenting Abominations of their Great Mother. They are worships according to their unpurified, and therefore evil, consciences; for none of them are to be found in the living word of the Deity of the heaven. All of them, therefore, being of this category or order of things, they are an offence to him, as offerings superseding his appointments, and which he has not required at their hands. Such worshippers as these are the worshippers of the unmeasured or excommunicated court; the worshippers of the Beast and of his Image, and the mark of whose name is indelibly impressed in their foreheads. To such he had granted neither liberty nor rights. The liberty he grants is the freedom with which the truth makes free (John 8:32, 36); perfect law of liberty, into which whoso looketh narrowly and continueth therein, not being a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the work, shall be blessed in his deed (James 1:25). This is the only true liberty, to which none have any right save those who repudiate the worships of the Court, and become the adopted freemen of the Holy City.

But, while all others, not of the Earth and the Holy City, are mere liberty-brawlers, “promising liberty to others, while they are themselves the slaves of corruption,” the Deity of the heaven has granted the right to none to forbid men adopting any worship they please. In this negative sense, the rights of all men are in themselves a common birthright. Hence, the Antichrist has no divine right to compel all men to be papists; nor have the State Harlots such a right, though they often experimented in that direction even to the shedding of blood. The right exercised by the Antichrist he derived from the Dragon Imperiality of the East, styled by Daniel the Little Horn of the Goat; a right afterwards recognized by that other Little Horn, which came up in the midst of, and after, the Ten Horns of the European Commonwealth. “The Dragon gave him his power, and his throne, and great authority” (Apoc. 13:2); and it is by virtue of this, which is mere right based upon might, the right of brute force, that “the Devil and his Angels”—Antichrist and the Sin-Powers of the Court—have sought to force men, thus given into their hands, to worship what they call God according to their dictates. Now, it is in opposition to this blasphemous assumption, and in the negative sense already defined, that the witnessing prophets of the Deity of the heaven, champion civil and religious liberty and the rights of man. The enemies of these are their enemies; for if the spiritual and temporal SinPowers were to deprive society of these, their testimony or prophesying would inevitably be suppressed also. The conflict, therefore, which raged for ages in the Court of the Gentiles was one of life or death to the witnessing existence of the One Body, and the defensive self-devotion of the Earth. This conflict of ages was long and bloody for all concerned. The saints of the Holy City fell by thousands under the savage and merciless hand of the Roman God. His Spouse of Babylon became red and drunk with their blood, which, like the righteous Abel’s, still cries for vengeance upon the ruthless harlot that sits upon the beast (Apoc. 17:3). The Earth valiantly helped her, but could not destroy the murderess. It gave her papistic myrmidons frequent and signal overthrows. It gave them blood to drink, and smote them with the plagues of war; so that, if they were determined to trample the Holy City of the Faith, they should not be permitted so to do with impunity.

But in process of time their power of resistance was diminished. This was attributable to the testimony of the One Body being enfeebled by the admixture of traditions which had crept in, and, in so far, rendered it ineffectual. The pastors, whose business it was to keep the lightstand well supplied with golden olive oil of truth, were deteriorating in faithfulness and aptitude for teaching. Hence, the light grew dim and smoky, and men did not see their way as in former years. In consequence of this enfeebled perception, their christian virtue became too easy and tolerant of the traditions of the apostasy, until at length their individuality converged towards, and was finally lost in, the indefiniteness and confusion of the Lutheran and Calvinistic novelties of the sixteenth century. This fatal termination of their labors is styled in the prophecy, the finishing of their testimony. Their word having lost its power, the energy of their ancient helper, the Earth, was enfeebled likewise. When men's hold upon principles is relaxed, they lack that enterprize and force which is necessary for their preservation in this evil world. A worldly and "charitable" spirit generates indifference, by which the pointedness and sharpness of the truth are destroyed. The word handled in a worldly spirit is always "charitable" or tolerant of traditions, which make it of none effect. The word being ministered thus, the power of energetic resistance, and of a bold and valiant advocacy of their ancient principles, was wanting, and deprived both classes of witnesses of their efficiency. Hence, the spirit had no longer any use for them; for the protestantized testimony they were now only able to give, was not of that brightness necessary to constitute them the Golden Oil Light of the world. Men may testify against the Roman Antichrist, and denounce both him and his co-religionists as idolators, which is unquestionably true; but such a testimony leaves the Court as much in the dark as to what must be believed and done for remission of sins, and for obtaining a right to eternal life, as though nothing had been said. This is Protestantism. Its protests truly, that the pope is a blasphemous impersonation of the Christ; but it cannot delineate Christ Jesus according to the prophetic and apostolic testimony. It is, therefore, simply a negation; it denies every thing, but can scripturally affirm nothing. Such a witness as this is of no account in the premises; its doctrine and institutions are devoid of all power for the salvation of the soul.

III. Concerning the Time during which the Witnesses Prophecy in Sackcloths

"And I will give to my two witnesses, and they shall prophecy a thousand two hundred and sixty days, having been clothed in sackcloths."

I have shown elsewhere that Daniel's "time and times and the dividing of a time," and John's "forty and two months," are the same measurement; and both relating to the same subject—the Saints as the Holy City; and both terminating at the same crisis—the resurrection at the advent of the Ancient of Days; and both constituted of 1260 years. And here we have immediately following, a repetition of the same duration. In the third verse, the Holy City is consigned to a trampling of forty and two months; and in the fourth, the Witnesses are to prophecy in tribulation 1260 days. It will, of course, strike the reader as remarkable, that a coequal length of years should be prefigured in different terms. But the reason is, that the two periods relate to different subjects, and are not coterminal. The trampling of the Holy City was one thing, and its prophesying in sackcloth was another. These two series of events were not to be parallel in the whole of their course; so to prevent confusion, the two periods of equal duration were stated in different terms. As the Holy City was to be trampled forty and two months by the Gentiles; and as these were to trample it under the inspiration of the Antichristian Mouth of the Beast, the power given him for this purpose by the Dragon-Emperor was to be operative for the same length of time, which, in order to show this relation between the Mouth and the Holy City, is also expressed by the same formula of "forty and two months" (Apoc. 13:5). And, for a somewhat similar reason, that is, to connect the sackcloth witnessing of the Holy City community with the fugitive woman and the earth that protected her by its help (Apoc. 12:6, 16), the things affirmed of the woman in relation to her feeding are expressed in the same kind of time as the duration of the witnessing—1260 days; and, furthermore, to show that 1260 symbolic days are equivalent to "a time and times and the dividing of a time" (a formula which occurs nowhere else in the Apocalypse, and pertains exclusively to the measurement of the Holy City) the 1260-feeding of the woman by the earth, in the fourteenth verse of the twelfth chapter, is styled her nourishing "for a time and times and half a time;" for to feed and nourish her are the same idea; so that the one statement of the duration of her feeding, is expository of the duration of her nourishing.

This view of the matter which I believe is the only correct one, helps us greatly in determining the commencement of the saints witnessing after the sackclothes had been put upon them by their enemies. This beginning carries us back to the epoch of the Woman's flight into the wilderness, or two wings of the Great Roman Eagle. Her flight, by which she turned her back with contempt upon the honors and riches of the world; which she left to the leaders of the Catholic Apostasy—the Eusebiuses, Lactantiuses, Ariuses, Athanasiuses, and Chrysostoms of the day—her fugitive separation from these, by which she became a witness for the truth against their worldliness and traditions, occurs after the birth of the Man-Child of Sin—that sanguinary Cain, who, as the Antichrist, in the power of his manhood and impiety, afterwards slew the Abel of the Faith, whose blood cries for vengeance against him from the ground.

The birth of this imperial child of the woman occurred in the enthronement of Constantine in Rome on his defeat of Maxentius at the battle of Saxa Rubra, A.D. 312. This introduced a remarkable epoch in the history of the woman, to be more particularly considered in my exposition of the twelfth chapter. It will be sufficient to remark here, that this was the epoch of her deliverance from pagan persecution by the celebrated edict of Constantine published at Milan, A.D. 313; and of her introduction to an acquaintance with the worse than pagan persecution, which sought to exterminate her in the after years of Catholic ascendancy. Constantine delighted to style himself “THE DELIVERER OF THE CHURCH.” He was truly the deliverer of the Catholic Church; but he was also the first to inflict persecution and death itself upon those, “who kept the commandments of the Deity, and retained the testimony of Jesus Christ.” The edict of Milan, the great charter of toleration, had confirmed to each individual of the Roman world, the privilege of choosing and professing his own religion. But this inestimable privilege was soon violated; with a smattering of truth, the woman's child imbibed the maxims of persecution, and the Dissenters from the Catholic Church were afflicted and oppressed by its political triumph over Paganism. Constantine easily credited the insinuation that the HERETICS, as they were called, who presumed to dispute his opinions, or to oppose his commands, were guilty of the most absurd and criminal obstinacy; and that a seasonable application of moderate severities might save those unhappy men from the danger of an everlasting condemnation. Confounded with these so called Heretics, as has been the case in all ages since, were those who held the testimony, and therefore, the witness of Jesus. Not a moment was lost in excluding their pastors and teachers from any share in the rewards and immunities Constantine had so liberally bestowed on the Catholic Spirituals. But, as the Dissenters might still exist under the cloud of imperial disfavor, the conquest of the East was immediately followed by an edict which announced their total destruction. After a preamble filled with passion and reproach, he absolutely prohibits the assemblies of “Heretics,” and confiscates their public property to the use, either of the revenue, or of the Catholic Church. Some of the penal regulations were copied from the edicts of the pagan emperor Diocletian; and this method of conversion was applauded by the same bishops who had felt the hand of oppression, and pleaded for the rights of humanity.

But Constantine was not the only oppressor whose tyranny bore heavily upon the woman. His imperial colleague, Licinius, also within the limits of his jurisdiction, made her to groan with anguish. “Those who had done no evil,” says Eusebius, “were led away to punishment without any pretext, just like murderers and assassins. Some also endured a novel kind of death, having their bodies cut into many small pieces, and after this savage and terrible spectacle, were thrown as food to the fishes into the depths of the sea. Again the worshippers of God began to flee; again the open fields, the deserts, forests, and mountains, received the servants of Christ.”

The fleeing of the woman was the reduction of her to a state of humiliation and tribulation, far removed from the exaltation and haughtiness characteristic of the region of imperial grace. The gates of this clerical paradise were closed against her. She has nothing to do with emperors and courts. These are only for the votaries of fashion, and parasitic spirituals, who hold the persons of rulers in admiration for the sake of gain. Bishops, cardinals, archbishops, and other princes of the church, flourish in regions of imperial sunshine; but for the woman and her seed, the farther off they flee from such a heavenly, the clearer will they see the truth, and the better able will they be to “keep the commandments of the Deity,” and to testify with the approval of Jesus Christ.

Thus, then, the woman in flight is related both to state and place. She fled because she was persecuted by “the angels of the Dragon”—officials in power, both imperial and magisterial. The interval from the birth of her child, A.D. 312, to the conquest of the East by the overthrow of Licinius, A.D. 324, was occupied in ecclesiastical legislation in favour of the Catholic Church, and against Dissenters; and in carrying off her son unto deity, and the throne thereof. Here was an epoch of twelve years. At the end of this, that is, A.D. 325, he sat as a god, a presidential episcopal god, in the Council of Nice, exhibiting before the world the type of that full grown Man of Sin, who should be worshipped by all the nations of the unmeasured Court as “the Deity of the earth.” Now, it was at some point in this epoch of twelve years, that the 1260 years of witnessing began. As the woman’s seed in their sackcloth witnessing were to “stand before the deity of the earth” in the sense of testifying against him, it is reasonable to refer the commencement of the witnessing period to the time of the formation of an issue between him and them. Let us then see what is the state of the case bearing upon this result.

The complaints and mutual accusations which assailed the throne of Constantine, as soon as the death of Maxentius, A.D. 312, had brought the Roman Africa into subjection to his victorious arms, were ill adapted to edify an imperfect proselyte. He learned with surprise, that the provinces of Africa, from the confines of Cyrene to the columns of Hercules, were distracted with religious discord. The cause of dissension, for the most part, ceases to characterize religious disputes after the fervor of the onset subsides. This is proved in numberless instances. It is so in the case before us; for though the election of two rival bishops fanned the latent heat into a flame, the cause of the Great Secession which was about to ensue, must be sought for in the deep rooted affection of “the faithful” for the ANCIENT GOSPEL AND APOSTOLIC TRADITIONS. In the second of Acts, Luke informs us, that on the Day of Pentecost there were Jews from “Egypt, and the parts of Africa, which are about Cyrene.” Many of these, no doubt, obeyed the gospel preached by Peter, and carried it to their adopted homes, where they would persuade others to embrace the faith of Jesus Christ. The churches thus formed in these parts, secluded from the theatre, and inducements of the ecclesiastical discord and ambition, would be more likely to “retain the testimony of Jesus Christ,” than the churches of those princely bishops, which had transferred their devotion from apostolic to worldly objects. The disciples in the country could not but grieve at the apostasy and corruption of the church in the cities, which would be equally deplored by the “few names which had not defiled their garments” in these assemblies. But corruption may be lamented by the few, and yet continued by the many, unless some incident transpire, often trivial in itself, or some master-spirit arise to unfurl the standard, and rally around it the friends of christian purity, liberty, and truth. Such, I apprehend, was the state of things in the Roman Africa, Italy, and Gaul, at the time we are now considering. The church in Carthage, the metropolis of the Roman Africa, and the second ecclesiastical throne of the Roman West, was the occasion of the dispute which involved the province in the most calamitous convulsions. Mensurius, the bishop of the church, having died in A.D. 311, the majority of the people chose the chief deacon Caecilianus to succeed him. In these times of Laodicean corruption and apostasy it is not to be supposed, that because the majority elected him, he was therefore best qualified for the “good work” of which Paul treats in 1 Tim. 3:1, and Tit. 1:7; nor is it to be taken for granted that because the majority were Laodicean, the minority was all blameless and pure. The ground of their objection to Caecilianus, if true, was certainly just and valid, and honorable to those who made it the occasion of their secession from a church so corrupt and insensible to its christian dignity, as to appoint a man for their episcopal ruler, who had abandoned his brethren under persecution and distress, and had received ordination from an apostate, who had delivered up the Holy Scriptures to be burned.

This traditorial archdeacon, Caecilianus, then, had been elected and ordained by a party. His opponents, however, refused to acquiesce in his ordination. By their influence an assembly of bishops was convened, and Caecilianus was cited before them; but, being contumacious, he was condemned as unworthy of the episcopal office. Majorinus, a deacon, was therefore chosen in his place. The charges in their specification were, that Felix, who assisted at his ordination, was a traditor, and therefore disqualified for the service by his apostasy; and that Caecilianus himself was unfit, because of his cruelty to his brethren under persecution, whom, though a deacon, he had abandoned in a merciless manner, leaving them without food in their prisons, and precluding the grant of relief from those who were willing to succor them. These were grave specifications; and, if true, ought to have placed Caecilianus among "heathen men and publicans." A party which could choose and ordain such a spiritual guide must have been as unworthy as their chief. His principal opponent was DONATUS, a bishop from Casae Nigrae. The excitement spread through all the African Wing of the Great Eagle, so that there were two opponent parties in every city. In A.D. 313, the DONATISTS, as they were now called by way of distinguishing them from the Catholics, carried the affair before Constantine at Rome. The principal bishop there, and eighteen others, were appointed by him to settle the dispute. As might have been supposed, judgment was given against the Donatists. In A.D. 314, the case of Felix was brought before the Proconsul of Africa. The Donatists were again in the minority. Seventy African bishops had condemned Caecilianus; nineteen Italian bishops had acquitted him. In A.D. 315, the whole affair was again agitated before a numerous assembly at Arles, in Gaul. The Donatists were again cast. In A.D. 316, Constantine himself examined the case "in sacred consistory," at Milan. But here again their plea was rejected. He deprived them also of their places of worship, sent their bishops into banishment, and punished some of them with death. Caecilianus was now unanimously acknowledged by the civil and ecclesiastical power as the true and lawful primate of Africa. The Donatists protested against the Emperor's sentence as an unrighteous one; and that his credulity had been abused by the insidious arts of his advisers. But they could get no redress from the Man-Child, whose persecuting edicts drove them into exile from the high places of the State. Thus, "the woman fled into the wilderness," where it was appointed for her to remain, testifying in the sackclothes forced upon her, during 1260 years.

These trials in Rome, Milan, Arles and Arles, would be well calculated to subserve the interests of the truth. They afforded the Donatists scope for their testimony against the imperialized catholicism in Italy and the South of France. They doubtless dropped their word in these regions copiously; and failed not to enlist many in their protestation against it. "What has the emperor to do with the church? And, what have christians to do with kings, or what have bishops to do at court?" These were their inquiries, which, in the face of scripture, the State Church party found to be both inconvenient and unanswerable. In these countries, there were already many dissenters from catholicism, the Novatians, who were in sympathy with them. The DONATIST TRIALS no doubt infused new life into these, who, co-operating with them would develop the evangelism, which, in our seventh chapter, has been considered under the symbolism of the Sealing Angel of eastern origin (Apoc. 7:2). Thus, this whole proceeding, which, from the first appeal to the final sentence, lasted three years, became an important epoch in the woman's history. "This incident," says Gibbon, "so inconsiderable that it scarcely deserves a place in history, was productive of a MEMORABLE SCHISM, which afflicted the provinces of Africa above 300 years, and was extinguished only with christianity itself." The inflexible zeal of freedom animated the Donatists to refuse obedience to the courtly bishops, whose spiritual powers they denied. Excluded themselves from the civil and religious communion of mankind by an edict of banishment, they boldly excommunicated the rest. They asserted with confidence that the Apostolical Succession was interrupted; that all the bishops of Europe and Asia were infected by the contagion of guilt and schism; and that the prerogatives of the universal church were confined to the chosen portion of the African believers, who alone had preserved inviolate the integrity of their faith and discipline. This sounds like the testimony of Jesus Christ in the mouth of his witnesses. Gibbon terms it “a rigid theory,” and says “it was supported by the most uncharitable conduct,” in his opinion. “Whenever they acquired a proselyte, even from the distant provinces of the East, they carefully repeated the sacred rites of baptism and ordination, as they rejected the validity of those he had already received from the hands of heretics and schismatics.” The Novatians before them, and the Waldenses after them, did the same; and so do all those who coincide in faith and practice with the writer of this exposition of the apocalypse. We repudiate the immersion of every one as invalid, who is not, previously to immersion, the enlightened subject of the one faith. Mr. Gibbon would probably regard this “theory” more “rigid” than theirs. We do not, however, accept him, nor our clerical contemporaries of antichristendom, as competent to give a scriptural decision in the case. We know that a man must first believe “the truth as it is in Jesus” before he can obey it. This is as certain as that two and two make four. Being only “christians” of the antichristian type, their preaching, praying, praises, and performances, are but the spiritualism of the unmeasured court—the outpourings of “the spirit that now works in the children of disobedience.” The “divinity” with which they profess to “cure souls” is not therapeutic; and as effective for the transformation of sinners into saints, as the philosopher’s stone for the alchemical transmutation of ignoble metals into gold. This being our conviction from an upwards of thirty years study of the word, we have as little respect for their “ripe scholarship” and scholastic traditions, as Paul had for those of the renowned Barjesus; or Christ for “the wise and prudent” of his day.

This “uncharitable” exclusiveness, and “bigoted” devotion to the primitive apostolic faith, was the truly christian spirit of the woman and her seed at the epoch which initiated the 1260 years of their sackclothwitnessing against the apostasy. In repudiating all its institutions, the Donatists drank of this spirit, and maintained, as Gibbon confesses, the sentiment of a greater part of the primitive church. Such was their abhorrence of the apostasy, that if they came into possession of a church which had been used by the catholics, they purified the building with the same jealous care which a temple of the old idolatry might have required. The learned du Pin, who is their adversary says: “They did not teach anything that was contrary to the (apostles’) creed; but they were so rash as to affirm that all the churches everywhere, which had embraced the communion of Caecilianus and his party, ceased to be the true churches of Jesus Christ; that thus the catholic church was only found among themselves, having ceased to exist in other parts of the world. Besides which, being very fond of the ancient doctrine of the African churches, that baptism and the other sacraments conferred out of the church were null and void, they rebaptized such as had been baptized by the Catholics, trampled upon their eucharist as a profane thing, and maintained that the consecration, unctions, and ordinations performed by the Catholics were of no avail. They burned or scraped the altars which the latter made use of, as being polluted by impure sacrifices, and broke their (communion) cups. They looked upon the vows made in their communion as of no value, in a word, they would not communicate with them. They maintained that the church ought to be made up of just and holy men, or at least of those who were such in appearance; and that, although wicked men might lurk in the church, yet it would not harbor those who were known to be such.”

This was spuing the apostasy out of their mouth as effectually as the Eternal Spirit threatened to do to the Laodiceans, because of their lukewarmness (Apoc. 3:16). They drew as broad a line between themselves and all other churches, as could possibly have been drawn by any claiming to be the Woman and her seed, and the party allied to imperial power that made her flight into the wilderness necessary to her preservation. Their testimony against the catholic church, whose system of tradition had become in this epoch “the religion of the State” was in strict accordance with that of the Spirit, who denounced it as “wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked.” The Donatists testified neither more nor less than this; and their view of what a church ought to be, harmonized with what the Spirit exhorted the Laodiceans to become. I have, therefore, no doubt that the three years’ conflict of the Donatists with the party of the Imperial Man-Child was the epoch which truly marks the beginning of the witnessing period of the 1260 years. Here, then, we take our stand, and, with the following extract from Mosheim, conclude, for the present, what we have to say concerning this notable crisis of the fourth century. “The doctrine of the Donatists was conformable to that of the church, as even their adversaries confess; nor were their lives less exemplary than those of other christian societies, if we except the enormous conduct of the CIRCUMCELLIONS, which the greatest part of the sect regarded with the utmost detestation and abhorrence. The crime, therefore, of the Donatists lay properly in the following points: in their declaring the church of Africa, which adhered to Caecilianus, fallen from the dignity and privileges of a true church, and deprived of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, on account of the offences with which the new bishop, and Felix who had consecrated him, were charged; in their pronouncing all the churches, which held communion with that of Africa, corrupt and polluted; in maintaining that the sanctity of their bishops gave their community alone a full right to be considered as the true, and the pure, and the holy church; and in their avoiding all communication with other churches from an apprehension of contracting their impurity and corruption. This erroneous principle was the source of that most shocking uncharitableness and presumption (poor Dr. Mosheim!) which appeared in their conduct to other churches. Hence, they pronounced the sacred rites and institutions void of all virtue and efficacy among those christians who were not precisely of their sentiments; and not only rebaptized those who came over to their party from other churches, but even with respect to those who have been ordained ministers of the gospel, they observed the severe custom, either of depriving them of their office, or obliging them to be ordained a second time.” If such only was “the crime” of the persecuted Donatists, had I lived in their day, I should have been guilty of their “shocking uncharitableness and presumption” too.

1. “THEIR DAYS OF THE PROPHECY”

In the sixth verse of the chapter are the words, en hemerai auton tes propheteias, about which “the recent editors” are at variance with their predecessors. They recommend that it be changed, and translated, “during the days of their prophesying.” But, with all due respect to their recencies, I suggest that the words be left alone, and translated, “in their days of the prophecy.”

The whole apocalypse is “the prophecy;” for so it is termed in ch. 1:3. But the days in which the witnesses stand bearing testimony against “the God for the Earth,” do not extend through all the days of the prophecy. The God of the earth was undeveloped in all those days of the prophecy extending from John’s location in Patmos to the birth of the Catholic Woman’s Man-child. In all this time, therefore, the witnesses could not stand before him; and, consequently, these years were no part of “their days.” And from the finishing of their testimony to their resurrection and ascension, was over two hundred years. These, therefore, were no part of “their days,” unless a man can be said to stand in the presence of another, and testify against him while he is dead. It must be evident, then, that the days of the prophecy are of much longer measure than the days of the witnessing against the Antichrist. These days are the 1260, and therefore they are emphatically and specially “their days”—the portion of time appropriated to the One Body and its Helper, to contend earnestly for the “one Lord, one faith, and one immersion;” and to testify against the Vice-Christ and his idolatrous institutions.

And these “their days” neither begin nor end with the days of the prophecy. They began, as I have shown, in the three years' epoch of A.D. 312–316, and would consequently end A.D. 1572–76; because $1260 + 316 = 1576$. Thus, their sackcloth-witnessing had its beginning and ending, long before the deliverance of the Holy City from its “forty and two months” of subjection to the Gentile governments. The Holy City still exists under Protestant ascendancy, in the lowest stratum of the abyss—trampled into the dust; but it is nowhere to be found under Catholic ascendancy, witnessing against the Antichrist, and tormenting him and his adherents with their testimony. In all catholic countries the saints have been “prevailed against;” and, though existing in Britain and America to a very limited extent, their witnessing for the truth as originally proclaimed by the apostles, and their testifying against “the spirituals for the wickedness in” protestant and catholic “high places,” and their gospel-nullifying traditions and institutions, command but little attention. Sceptical indifference, and profane contempt for “the testimony of Jesus Christ,” are the characteristic of the times in which we live. The Holy City has but few citizens left, whose voice is overpowered in the unintelligible babble and confusion of the Great City. They testify, nevertheless, as this exposition of the apocalypse evinces; but their witnessing is not “in sackcloth.” Since their ascension, their enemies have been restrained from the use of the whips, and chains, and fire, and faggot. These, which used to be the most powerful arguments against which they had to contend, have been wrested from their destroyers by “the Earth;” so that now they can advocate the truth, and testify against the apostasy, none daring, however willing, to make them afraid. Now, the “forty and two months,” measure of the Holy City is bounded by two events—the giving of the saints into the hand of the Little Horn of the West, for its beginning; and the resurrection, for its ending: so also, the days of its sackcloth-witnessing are placed between the fight of the Woman, of their commencement; and the finishing of her testimony, for their termination. We find this ending indicated in the seventh verse, as, “when they may have finished their testimony, the beast which ascendeth out of the abyss will make war with them, and overcome them, and put them to death.” The beast herein referred to, is that which John saw arise, and describes in chap. 13:1–7. As John saw it arise, it was not extant in his day, but appeared afterwards. It was a new development of powers upon the same territory as that upon which Daniel beheld his fourth beast. It was the ten horns and little horn of this in middle-age manifestation—the Civil and Ecclesiastical Polity of the Gentiles who trampled the Holy City. The Mouth of this beast represents the same power as the Eyes and Mouth of the Daniel’s Little Horn. John says, that the beast’s Mouth made war with the saints, and overcame them; and Daniel says, “the little horn made war upon the saints, and prevailed against them;” by which, John and Daniel identified the horn and mouth as symbolical of the same power.

With such testimony as this before us, we ought to find 1260 years after the Donatist trials in the presence of the Woman’s Imperial Manchild, a people specially obnoxious to the ecclesiastical and civil authorities of the nations with whom they were at war, for the purpose of putting them to silence, and suppressing their principles, by the advocacy of which they were “tormented.” We ought to find, too, that the conflict of this people with the powers was not only unsuccessful, but that it resulted in the death of the cause of civil and religious freedom, and the rights of man, in all the countries of the beast. We are however, not to suppose that they were not made war upon before the end of the 1260 years; I have shown before that there were frequent wars, in which they smote the earth with plagues as often as they willed. But, this at the end of “their days of the prophecy” was a special war, resulting as no previous wars had hitherto done, namely, in the putting of them to death in the symbolic-sense of the prophecy. This war was to supervene upon their finishing their testimony—hotan telesosi, “when they may have finished their testimony” for Jesus Christ, and against the antichrist. The testimony concerning the faith was silenced first; afterwards, that against the Antichrist, and for civil and religious freedom. “The Earth” maintained the conflict longest, having been energized by the accession of new life from the antipapal rebellion of the Lutherans and Calvinists. These not being of the Holy City, but advocates of a reformed national system of religion, were prepared to draw the sword against the papal powers with potent, though not universally subversive results. After a lapse of twelve hundred years, these sturdy combatants arose to disturb the peace, in which the worshippers of the Roman God were glorifying themselves greatly. They fought valiantly, but did not conquer: and, though in Germany, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Switzerland, and Britain, they established governments independent of “the God of the earth;” yet, in all the Breadth of the Great City—epi ies plateias poleos test megales, which is allegorically styled Sodom and Egypt,—in Rome, Italy, Belgium, France, Spain, Portugal, the Austrian states and Poland, “the witnesses were overcome and put to death.”

In the year 1530, the witnesses had been entirely employed in paying the way for union with the German reformers. Those of them residing in the South of France, did not encounter the enemy with their usual fortitude. They shrunk from the cross, and fell into the practice of feigning acquiescence with the national forms of worship. In the middle of this century also those of them residing in Calabria, coalesced with the Presbyterian church under the pastoral care of the celebrated John Calvin and Theodore Beza at Geneva. The consequence of this was, that several Presbyterian ministers of their school settled among the witnesses of Calabria, as pastors of their churches. This was their situation in A.D. 1560. The Calvinists and Lutherans, both princes and divines, claimed fellowship with them; and the claim was unscripturally allowed for, while Swiss and German Protestantism in those days, was a powerful antagonism to popery, it had no affinity in faith and practice to the ancient apostolic religion, of the primitive age. It is an unbaptized speculation, which no true Christadelphian, or Brother of Christ can fellowship without incurring the crime of apostasy from the faith. This was the position of the witnessing prophets in A.D. 1576. “Their testimony,” with which for 1260 years they had tormented their adversaries, “was finished.” “Their days of prophecy” were now expired. They could no longer teach others “the great salvation” by which they might escape the guilt and condemnation of sin unto eternal life in the kingdom of the Deity; and as for protesting against “the God of the earth,” the Lutheran and Calvinistic antipapists, with whom they had fraternized, were effective enough for that.

Thus, then, having finished their testimony, the impending sentence of conquest and death was about to burst upon them in a dreadful storm of massacre and desolation. Exactly 1260 years from the birth of the Imperial Man-Child of Sin (who, they testified had no more to do with the church, than Christians with kings, or their bishops with courts); that is, in the year 1572, the first of a terminal epoch of four years, a dreadful calamity befell them in Paris and other cities of France. This was the celebrated papal massacre of “St. Bartholomew’s Day,” as the 24th of August is termed by the worshippers of the saints. The murderers ravaged the whole city, and in three days butchered above ten thousand lords, gentlemen, presidents, and people of all ranks. From Paris the massacre spread throughout the whole of France. According to Thuanus, 30,000 persons were destroyed in this massacre; or, as others affirm, 100,000. This was a notable beginning of that war which “the beast ascending out of the abyss” was to wage against them. It burst forth upon them most unexpectedly in that section of the plateia, or breadth, of the Great City, styled in the thirteenth verse, to deka-ton, the tenth—one of the Ten-Horn-Kingdoms of the Beast.

I must leave to history the narration of the details of the events of this war between the beast and the witnesses. It will be sufficient to remark that, in the course of it, Richelieu, the cardinal premier of France, was convinced that either the antipapists must be admitted to the full enjoyment of unlimited liberty, and of all the privileges of the state, uncontrolled by Catholics, and even at the hazard of the permanent establishment of the Catholic faith, or that they must be totally subdued. He preferred the latter; and to accomplish it, turned the whole power of France against them; and succeeded in totally disarming them, leaving them, however, in possession of considerable privileges, civil and religious, guaranteed to them by the Edict of Nantes.

In this Tenth of the Papal Breadth they still amounted to over 1,500,000; many of them wealthy merchants, skilful manufacturers, able sailors and soldiers. The question with the Antichrist and his “eldest son” Louis XIV., was, should such a sect be permitted to exist; and whether their power was not now able to subdue it, and extirpate the heresy? The king believed that God had raised him up and prospered him for this very thing. The season seemed to them favorable. There was none of the European States that could protect them. England was weakened by its own discontents. The Emperor of the West was engaged in a war with Turkey. Spain was unable to contend with France. Other states were awed by her power, and however willing to support the Huguenots, dared not to provoke so mighty and unrelenting a foe as the GRAND MONARQUE. He was therefore free to essay their conversion to Romish idolatry, or to exterminate them from his kingdom. He accordingly began this great work of putting to death the witnesses by revoking the Edict of Nantes granted by Henry IV., April 1, 1598. The revocation was decreed October 23, 1685. It provided, that all their churches should be forthwith demolished; that there should be no meeting for religious worship in any place, on any pretence; that every kind of religious exercise in the houses or castles of nobility or gentry should be punished with death and confiscation of property; that all noncatholic ministers should leave the kingdom in fifteen days, or embrace the catholic religion; that all their schools should be absolutely shut up; that their children should be “baptized” by the curates of the parish in which the parents resided, on pain of 500 livres; and that every one attempting to leave the kingdom should be condemned to the galleys or death: but, that all who were not decided, or not prepared to declare themselves, until it pleased God to enlighten them, might remain where they resided, continue their trades or arts, and enjoy their property undisturbed, provided they refrained from all exercise of their religion, and from every kind of meeting on that account. This was putting them to silence, or killing them as witnesses against Romish idolatry. So long as their mouths were closed they were unable to testify; so that as witnesses they were literally dead, though not therefore buried.

Massacre of

St. Bartholomew's Day

Charles IX with his mother Catherine de Medicis watch the slaughter of their Protestant guests from the balcony of their palace. Catherine de Medicis was the moving power behind the massacre. As a result of it, many Huguenots fled the country to Great Britain and America only to return to France to play a part in the French Revolution. Below: St. Bartholomew's Day massacres occurred throughout France.

Henry of Navarre, who became Henry IV of France in 1589, was the most popular king who ever reigned there. He became leader of the Huguenots, and after his victory of Coutras reached an agreement with King Henry III of France, and was recognised as his heir. After the assassination of Henry III in 1589, Henry's succession was opposed by the Catholic league, but in 1593 through expediency he joined the Catholic Church, declaring that “Paris is worth a mass”, and was crowned at Chartres the following year. His sympathies, however, were with the Protestants and particularly the Huguenots, and in 1598, by the edict of Nantes, he secured toleration for them. Henry was assassinated by a roman Catholic fanatic, and was succeeded by Louis XIII. The revocation of the Edict of Nantes, which abolished all the privileges granted the Huguenots was brought about by Louis XIV in 1685. The date of the Edict of Nantes is given as 1599 in previous editions of Eureka, but, in fact, it was granted in 1598.—Publishers.

The execution of this decree was terrible, and its consequences most deplorable. Many were cruelly tortured and put to death; many were imprisoned or sent to the galleys; dragoons, “the basest troops of the kingdom, fellows that would stick at nothing,” were quartered upon them, who insulted and pillaged them, in order to force them to change their religion. Terror and dread marched before them, and the cruelties of 1572 were enacted over again. “Die or be catholics!” was the war-cry of these savages who executed the behests of the Little Horn. M. Claude, in his Short Account, published in 1686, says:

“Amidst a thousand hideous lamentations and horrid blasphemies, they hung men and women by the hair of their heads, or by the feet, to the roofs of their chambers; or to the racks in the chimneys, and there smoked them with wisps of wet hay, till they were no longer able to bear it; and when they took them down, if they would not sign, they immediately hung them up again. They plucked off the hair of their heads and beards with pincers, till they left none remaining.

“They threw them on great fires kindled on purpose, and did not pull them out till they were half roasted. They plunged them again and again into wells, from whence they would not take them up till they had promised to renounce their religion. They bound them as they do criminals put to the rack, and in this posture, with a funnel poured wine down their throats, till the fumes of it depriving them of reason, they were made to say they were catholics. They stripped them naked, and after having offered them a thousand indignities, they stuck them all over with pins. They lanced them with penknives, and sometimes with red hot pincers took them by the nose, and so dragged them about the room till they promised to turn catholics. They bastinadoed them most cruelly, and then dragged them thus bruised to the churches, where this forced appearance was accounted abjuration. They kept them from sleeping seven or eight days together; they tormented them in a thousand ways. They tied them to bed posts, and ravished their wives and daughters before their eyes. They plucked off the nails from the fingers and toes of some; and blew both men and women up with bellows till they were ready to burst.”

Such were the infamous dragoonings by which the Earth was subdued and silenced by the beast of the abyss. A million of them are said to have emigrated into other countries; and to have carried with them two hundred millions of money, besides their skill in arts and manufactures. The flame was smothered, but the embers remained, yet again to be fanned into a terrible and consuming conflagration. But for the present they were prostrated, as “corpses upon the breadth of the Great City spiritually styled Sodom and Egypt.”

Such, then, was the war by which they were overcome and put to death. It continued with intermissions during a period of a hundred and thirteen years from A.D. 1572. But although their testimony was silenced, and they were as dead “among the peoples, and tribes, and tongues, and nations,” upon which the Great Harlot sits in reeling instability, “drunk with the blood of the saints AND with the blood of the witnesses of Jesus”—their inanimate polities did not suffer dissolution. Their corpses remained entire. Communities of them still were seen in “the breadth of the Great City” awaiting “spirit of life from the Deity” to break in upon them for their resuscitation.

The one in the centre has a retractable blade to find so-called proof of guilt. Right: The strappado. The accused, often naked, had heavy weights tied to his or her feet and was then hoisted into the air.

The Medal struck by Pope Gregory XIII in 1572 to commemorate the massacre of the French Huguenots on “St. Bartholomew’s Day”. The slayer holds the Crucifix in one hand and the drawn sword to kill in the other. The words Hugonotorum Strages signifies “Slaughter of the Huguenots”. Thus did Rome “rejoice over them, and make merry, and send gifts one to another” (Rev. 11:10).

2. ROME REJOICES AT THEIR SLAUGHTER

The massacre with which they were overwhelmed at the outbreak of the war against them in 1572, and which was then supposed to have entirely ruined them, when known in Rome was a cause of great joy to their enemies in that city. When the letters of the Pope’s legate residing at the Court of Charles IX., were read in the assembly of the cardinals, by which he assured the Pope that all was transacted by the express will and command of the French king, it was immediately decreed that the pope should march with his cardinals to the church of St. Mark, and in the most solemn manner give thanks to God for so great a blessing conferred on the See of Rome and the “Christian World;” and that on the Monday after, solemn mass should be celebrated in the church of Minerva, at which Gregory XIII., and the cardinals were present; and that a jubilee should be published throughout the whole of “Christendom,” and the cause of it declared to be, to return thanks to God for the extirpation of the enemies of the truth and the church in France. In the evening, the cannon of St. Angelo were fired to testify the public joy; the whole city illuminated with bonfires; and no one sign of rejoicing omitted that was usually made for the greatest victories obtained in favor of the Roman church. In addition to this medals were struck commemorative of the joyous event. A copy of it is before me in Elliott’s work, taken from Sir. W. Cockburn’s work on the Massacre. It is about two inches and five eighths diameter. On one face is the bust of the Roman deity, Gregory XIII.; and on the obverse a winged angel with an uplifted cross in the left hand, and a drawn two edged sword in the right, symbolizing the papal destroyers of “the earth” in France. Men, women, and children are before the angel dead, dying, falling, and about to fall by his sword; while in the background is a woman, with uplifted arms supporting a mantle, and looking complacently upon the massacre, symbolizing the Catholic church. On the margin is the legend, “Ugonottorum Strages, 1572”—The Massacre of the Hugonots, 1572. These medals were for free distribution to one another commemorative of the death blow inflicted upon the hitherto unconquered enemies of the catholic idolatry. Thus was fulfilled the tenth verse of this eleventh chapter, saying, “They that dwell upon the earth shall rejoice over them and make merry, and shall send gifts (of medals) one to another, because these two prophets tormented them that dwelt upon the earth.”

The conquest and symbolic death of the witnessing prophets, then, was illustrated by the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, Oct. 23, A.D. 1685. This was the conviction of the whole anti-papal world at the time. The poor sufferers in France especially who survived, were of opinion that these unequalled persecutions were the slaying of the witnesses; and they were, therefore, in high expectation looking for the end of the “three days and a half,” during which they were to continue politically dead, though not buried, or excluded from the observation of their merciless destroyers. Peter Jurieu, a Hugonot pastor, whose work, entitled, “The Accomplishment of the Scripture Prophecies,” was published in English two years after the Revocation, 178 years ago, treating on the Resurrection of the Witnesses; the Fall of the Tenth of the City; and so forth, says: “It is a truth which must be held as certain (being one of the keys of the Revelation) that the City, the Great City, signifies, in this book, not Rome alone, but Rome in conjunction with its empire; the name of this great city is Babylon.” “This being supposed and proved, that the city is the whole Babylonish and Antichristian empire, it must be remembered, that this empire of Antichrist is made up of Ten Kingdoms, and of ten kings, who must give their power to the beast. A tenth of the city fell, i.e., one of these ten kingdoms which make up the Great City, the Babylonish empire, shall forsake it.” “Now, what is this Tenth of the city which shall fall? In my opinion we cannot doubt that it is France”. The “kings who yet remain under the empire of Rome must break with her, leave her solitary and desolate. But who must begin this last revolt? It is most probable that France shall.” “Seeing the tenth of the city which must fall is France, this gives me some hopes that the death of the two witnesses hath a particular relation to this kingdom. It is the street, or place of this City, i.e., the most fair and eminent part of it. The witnesses must remain dead upon this street, and upon it they must be raised again. And as the death of the witnesses and their resurrection hath a relation to the kingdom of France, it may well fall out, that we may not be far distant from the time of the resurrection of the witnesses, seeing that the three years and a half of their death, are either begun, or will begin shortly. “I lay not down the exact time of the resurrection of the witnesses. I do not say it shall be exactly in such a year; for I have declared, and do still declare, that I know not from what time God shall please to begin the reckoning of the three years and a half; not but I strongly hope that God intends to begin it at the time of the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, but this does not arise to a full assurance.”

3. THE “GREAT CITY WHERE OUR LORD WAS CRUCIFIED”

It was in the plateia, or Breadth, of the GREAT CITY, the witnesses were to be killed and to lie unburied for three days and a half. This is the first place where the phrase, the Great City, occurs in the apocalypse. It is evidently both a city and a country; for it is said to be “called spiritually Sodom and Egypt.” The literal Sodom sunk into the abyss in the days of Abraham; it cannot, therefore, be the city of Lot. But, though destroyed, its memorial remains in the Daughters of Sodom. Since its destruction, the city has “spiritually” existed again in Jerusalem, which was “spiritually called Sodom,” because of the Sodomitish abominations of her rulers and citizens. They were declared to be “a sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evil doers, children that are corrupters; who had forsaken Yahweh; provoked the Holy One of Israel; and gone away backward,” or become apostate: so that “the whole head was sick, and the whole heart faint”. From the sole of the nation’s “foot even unto the head, there was no soundness in it; but wounds and bruises and putrifying sores” (Isa. 1:4–10). Hence, because of this moral likeness to Sodom and Gomorrha, the rulers and people were styled “the rulers of Sodom,” and “the people of Gomorrha;” and would have met with the fate of those cities, but for the saving influence of “a very small remnant.”

Now Jerusalem as a daughter of Sodom, is illustrative of the moral condition of the Great City in whose breadth the witnesses were slain. It is spiritually called Sodom, because its rulers and people are the moral counterpart of the Jews in their worst condition, upon whom that name was imposed because they were even worse than “the cities of the plain” (Matt. 11:23, 24). There is nothing affirmed by Isaiah of Jerusalem as a spiritual Sodom, which is not literally descriptive of the uncleanness and filth of the Antichristian city and dominion. It is spiritually, or allegorically, styled Sodom, because of its moral likeness thereto, and because, being destitute of even “a very small remnant,” the like fate is decreed against it. The original Sodom suddenly went down crashing into hell; so, when the Angel of the Bow, Yahweh Elohim, shall judge the Great City, “as a great millstone cast into the sea,” she will go down surging and plunging into her subterranean abyss, and “be found no more at all” (Apoc. 18:21). But, the Great City is also allegorically styled “Egypt”. It is the great “House of Bondage” in which Israel alter the flesh, and the “very small remnant,” not of the city, but trampled in it, “the Israel of the Deity,” are sojourning, and waiting for deliverance. It is also spiritual Egypt because of its moral likeness to the literal land of Mitzraim. Its superstition, its ignorance of Yahweh, its hatred and oppression of his people, its hardness of heart, its sorcery, adulteries and murders, its darkness that may be felt—transcend the infamy of Pharaoh and his hosts in these abominations. The Great City is, therefore, well and truly styled Egypt. But it is also thus allegorized, because the plagues of Egypt await her; and because, the Eternal Spirit will judge her to an overthrow, as terrible and effectual in the judgment as when he judged the Egyptians by the hand of Moses.

This Sodom-and-Egypt territorial arena of Gentilism is the Great City “where also our Lord was crucified.” This is indicative of the empire allegorized by “Sodom and Egypt.” Christ was crucified by Rome without the walls of Jerusalem. He was, therefore, crucified in a province of the Roman empire; for the Jews then inhabiting Palestine earnestly testified that they had no other king than Caesar—John 19:15. Hence, the Great City is the empire of Rome, whose frontiers were decreed by Caracalla to be the limits of the city. The empire and city, then, are coextensive; in other words, they are the same. In this Great City, three thousand miles in one direction, and two thousand in another, the personal and mystical Christs were both crucified, or put to death by violence of the Fourth Beast power—Jesus in Palestine; and the witnesses of Jesus in the plateia, or western breadth thereof—the special jurisdiction of Antichrist.

In Apoc. 14:8, this Great city is Styled BABYLON, for a like reason that it is called Sodom and Egypt. It is spiritually styled Babylon; for it is as much a city of confusion as was the original Babylon when the language of mankind was confounded in the days of Nimrod. Its name signifies confusion; and certainly, if ever there was a city in which “confusion worse confounded” was enthroned, “the Great City” is that domain. In Apoc. 18:10, 21, it is styled, “that Great City Babylon,” to be hereafter “divided” under the Seventh Vial “into three parts” (Apoc. 16:19). In ch. 17, this Great City is likened to a Drunken Harlot, gorgeously arrayed, and sitting upon a Scarlet-colored Beast, the symbol of the power over which she reigns—verse 18. Her name is emblazoned in the fifth verse as, “MYSTERY, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots and Abominations of the Earth.” She is styled “Mystery,” because she is the embodiment of that “Mystery of Iniquity,” which Paul says, was working at the time he was writing—2 Thess. 2:7. Scaliger testifies that “Mystery” was once worn as an inscription on the Pope’s tiara; but afterwards removed by Julius III. The term “Mother,” as applied to the Great City in its ecclesiastical relations is recognized by all. As Jerusalem is the Mother of all the Saints; so Rome is the Mother of all their enemies—“Romans Ecclesia,” says the Council of Trent, “quæ omnium Ecclesiarum Mater est et Magistra”—The Roman Church, which is the MOTHER and MISTRESS of all churches. The Popes themselves seem determined that there shall be no lack of evidence to prove the identity of the ecclesiastical polity of which they are the deified head, with the apocalyptical Great City Babylon. On occasion of the last Jubilee a medal was struck, a copy of which is given in Elliott. It is the size of a quarter of a dollar; on one face, is the effigy of Leo XII; and on the obverse, a Woman, symbolizing the Roman Church, sitting on a globe, with rays of glory on her head, a cross in the left hand, and a cup, signed with a cross in its mouth, in her extended right hand, as if presenting it to be drunk. Beneath her is the date, and around her face the legend “Sedet super Universam. Anno Iubi. MDCCCXXV—She sits upon the world. In the year of Jubilee, 1825—Apoc. 17:4, 15. Yes, she sits upon the world, or “upon many waters,” the shameless strumpet of the unmeasured court; and like certain notorious prostitutes of pagan times, bears her ignoble name upon her forehead.

The “woman” with the Golden Cup. The medal on the left was struck by Pope Innocent XI in 1680, and that on the right by Pope Leo XII in 1825 as mentioned in the text of Eureka.—Publishers.

But the Great City is not only spiritually styled Babylon because of the confusion of spiritual speech that obtains among all the “Names and Denominations” of which it is ecclesiastically constituted; but because it is the modern development of the same power that existed in the days of the Chaldean Babylon; whose golden head, for the time being, was the Dynasty of Nebuchadnezzar: and because a similar fate awaits her. It is, I say, the same power, only modified by time and circumstances. I do not say by place as well as by time and circumstances; for, when the Gogue of Ezekiel shall have attained to the full extent of his latter day dominion, much of Babylonia, even more than he now possesses, will be his. He will be, in the full manifestation of his power, the very apex of the Little Horn of the Goat—the Hellenistic Horn of the Great City, which even now includes the site of Babylon in its domain. Now, Nebuchadnezzar who was, as it were, the second founder of Babylon, which he had built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of his power, and for the honor of his majesty (Dan. 4:30), was much interested to know what would be the fate of the kingdom over which he ruled. That he might know the thoughts of his heart (ch. 2:30) a symbolical representation was presented before him in a dream, illustrative of the general fortunes and consummation, of the kingdom of Babylon “in the latter days.” Hence, the kingdom of Babylon has been in continuous existence from his reign until now, for we are now living “in the latter days.” It is true, that “the House of the kingdom” has not always been the Babylon, which was the beginning of Nimrod’s dominion (Gen. 10:10); it has been sometimes at one place, sometimes at another until at length Rome became “the House” of the Great City. Various dynasties have become the inheritors of the kingdom of Babylon. After Nebuchadnezzar’s, there was the silver dynasty, and the brazen dynasty, and the iron dynasty, and the clay dynasty—five dynasties ruling over one and the same kingdom; called also, “THE KINGDOM OF MEN”—Dan. 4:17. This Babylonish kingdom in its latter-day manifestation, the Spirit styles apocalyptically, “that Great City Babylon;” and is the arena upon which will stand erect and complete in all its parts the entire Image, which, in these latter days, is to be smitten by THE STONE, or Angel of the Rainbow.

Now, a similar fate awaits the Roman House that in the days of Belshazzar befell the Chaldean House of this same kingdom of men The Median father Darius, and his political son, but fleshly nephew, and Yahweh’s Messiah and Shepherd—Cyrus the Persian, besieged the Shinar House. He dried up “the great river Euphrates” from the city; and marching their “sanctified ones” along its bed, captured the House of the Kingdom, and slew Lucifer, the Son of the Morning, with the sword (Isa. 13:3, 17; 14:12; 44:28; 45:1; Dan. 5:30). But in these things that were transacted against the original Babylon, there was a mystery. Cyrus, whose Hebrew name Choresch, which is a contraction of Chayoraish, and signifies Like the Heir, was, as his name was intended to express, the type of Christ in the execution of his mission against “the Great City Babylon” of the latter days. Yahweh’s sanctified ones, the Medes and Persians, under Cyrus, were also typical of the saints, who with Christ Jesus “the Heir of all things,” and “joint heirs with him,” at the head of the armies of Israel, are to enter the Great City when “the great river Euphrates,” in a political sense, shall be sufficiently “dried up” to admit of their passage through into the Roman House of the kingdom of men, in which they will slay the Papal Lucifer—“the Beast and the False Prophet”—the Little Horn that has Eyes and a Mouth speaking great things and blasphemies. The great river Euphrates, which flows into the Great City, has dried up greatly; that the way of these kings form the Sun’s risings, may be prepared—the power of the fourth, or Ottoman, angel is now only nominal; and the Gallic Forgers have well-nigh performed their mission: what, then, remains, but that Yahweh whom we seek should suddenly come to his temple, even the Messenger of the Covenant whom we delight in? (Apoc. 16:12–15; Ma. 3:1) and having broken, as a thief, into the strong man’s domain, bind him with chains and cause Babylon to fall, no more again to rise and curse the world with her cruelty and deceit.

Thus did the Spirit select three of the most infamous centres of iniquity among the ancients by which to allegorize the Great City, upon the arena of which has been developed and matured the great Greek, Latin, and Protestant apostasy. It is “spiritually,” or figuratively, called by these names, Sodom, Egypt, and Babylon, because of its striking resemblance to them in their beastiality, superstition blasphemy, oppression of God’s people, and fate. Hence in Sodom, in Egypt, and in the Great City Babylon, “our Lord was crucified;” not in his own person only, but in that also of his witnesses; for what is done unto the least of his brethren, is done also unto him (Matt. 25:40); therefore in crucifying, or putting them to death, after their testimony was finished, he was again crucified with them in the Great City, they having been massacred in the noble service of witnessing for him against the deified usurper of his sovereignty and rights.

Louis XVI was a moderate ruler who, at first, welcomed the calling of the States General, believing it would help solve many problems adversely affecting France. But the tide of revolt was too strong for the King, and ultimately he and his family died at the hands of the Revolutionaries. His fate illustrated the prophecy of Rev. 11:12–13. The calling of the States General by the King comprised the “great voice from (the political) heaven saying unto them (the common people) come up hither (to rule) ... and there was a great earthquake (Revolution) ... and the remnant were affrighted” (by the reign of terror that followed).—Publishers.

4. THE DEATH-STATE OF THE WITNESSES

“And they shall see among the peoples, and tribes, and tongues, and nations, their corpses three days and a half, and they shall not suffer their corpses to be put into tombs.”

The ptomata, in this text rendered corpses, are so called because they had fallen down from their former position of “standing before the God of the earth.” They were to be in this prostrate condition until something providential should occur to cause them to “stand upon their feet;” when, of course, they would no longer be corpses. The text before us, then, informs us, that the witnessing prophets having finished their tormenting testimony, were silenced. When witnesses are put to silence, they are symbolically dead; and so long as they are compelled by authority to keep silence, they are in the death-state: and though they may continue associated into bodies, yet being forbidden to assemble, and to propagate their principles upon pain of death, as by the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, they are to all witnessing intents and purposes, dead bodies, or corpses.

They were reduced to this condition of death in all the breadth of the Great City over which the Deity of the earth exercised ecclesiastical sovereignty: not in France alone, but in Italy, and other papal countries also. This appears from the formula blepsousin ek ton laon, &c., they shall see among the peoples, &c., their corpses. They must have been put to silence among these peoples, tribes, tongues, and nations, or they could not have been seen by them as unburied corpses. These nationalities had often experienced the potent effects of their witnessing when “in their days of the prophecy” they had mined the waters into blood: but this they were now no longer able to do, for they had fallen down from their standing in their midst; and the time was come for these “waters upon which the Great Harlot sits,” to rejoice over them in this the day of their prostration.

Now, when people are dead, it is usual for the living to put them out of sight, or to bury them, as soon as possible; but, in the case of these corpses “they would not suffer them to be entombed.” Who would not suffer it? Their enemies? Or some others friendly towards them? Certainly not their enemies; for these did their best to destroy them, and to blot out the remembrance of them for ever. It was the protection afforded them in the Protestant States that prevented their burial and decomposition. The refugee witnesses that fled by hundreds of thousands from the presence of the Deity of the earth and his regal adherents, settled in Holland, Britain, Protestant Germany, and America; where, under the protection of the laws, they existed as corporate societies, but bearing no testimony as of old. Some of these governments remonstrated in their behalf which was not without influence in staying the destroyer’s hand. Hence, an unburied remnant of them was permitted to remain in the breadth of the Great City—a prostrate remnant, no longer able to testify, but waiting in silence for their resurrection to life and power.

5. THE “THREE DAYS AND A HALF”

And what length of time was to elapse from the slaying of the witnessing bodies in A.D. 1685, to their resurrection? The answer of the text is in mystical terms “three days and a half.” Now during all the time of their lying dead and unburied in the breadth of the Great City, no one was able rightly to conjecture what number of years was signified by this enigmatical formula. But, when they arose and “stood upon their feet,” they convulsed the Great City, and made it tremble in all its ten kingdoms. There could be no mistaking the fact, that the advocates of civil and religious liberty and the rights of man, who had been so cruelly massacred by Louis XIV., were again, in the reign of Louis XVI., in intense and terrible activity. This was, therefore, a resurrection of the same class that had been slain. New life had entered into them, and they were again a power in the state.

The opening ceremony of the Estates General at Versailles on 15 May 1789. The clergy are on the King’s right, the nobility on his left, the Third Estate at the back of the hall, with spectators crowded behind the pillars.

The States-General, or Estates-General comprised a Parliament of France, and was forced upon the king by the demands of the Revolution. The objective was to provide for just and equitable rule, and hence half of the deputies was from the people as representing the lower classes, and the other half was made up of nobles and clergy in equal numbers. Brother Thomas gives the number as 601 deputies, 285 nobles and 308 clergy which totals 1194 in all, but he gives the total as 1254. The actual figures are somewhat confusing in the different accounts, and his total may exclude other officials such as the royal party and so forth. The general figures normally given are 600 deputies, 300 representatives of the clergy; 300 representatives of the nobles; 1200 in all. As Bro. Thomas notes, whilst the aim was equality and unity, the higher status of the clergy and nobles was maintained by the form of dress that all were called upon to wear. The deputies were forced to appear in deliberately modest clothes in order to display the immense distance that separated them from the representatives of the privileged orders; the clergy wore their ceremonial dress, the high ecclesiastics in glittering robes; the representatives of the nobility wore silk coats and plumed hats as illustrated above. The dress of the clergy is depicted by the figure on the left; that of the nobles in the centre; whilst that of the common people is shown on the right.—Publishers.

On May 15, 1789, the States General of France, consisting of 601 deputies of the Third Estate; 285 nobles; and 308 clergy; in all 1254 representatives, opened their sitting at Versailles. The Third Estate, which was the popular element, desired that the three orders should form but one assembly. This the nobles and clergy at first refused to do. On the 17th June, however, some of the clergy having joined the Third Estate, the deputies declared their assembly to be the only legal one, and constituted themselves as THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY; which, on the 27th, was joined by all the rest.

On the 23rd of Aug. this new assembly published a decree proclaiming liberty of opinions, religious as well as political; on Oct. 1, it made a declaration of the Rights of Man in society; and on Dec. 24, issued a decree declaring all Frenchmen who are not Catholics admissible to all offices, both civil and military. Civil and religious liberty and the rights of man were the ancient testimony, both of the true believers, and of “the Earth” that helped them; and here we find the doctrine authoritatively reaffirmed by “the Earth” in its National Assembly, which restores these inestimable blessings to all noncatholic Frenchmen, who had been so mercilessly deprived of them in Oct. 1685. A Louis had taken away this liberty from his non-catholic subjects; and his grandson by the same class of people was compelled to restore it.

Here, then, are two important and signal dates—Oct. 1685, and Oct. 1789. These decrees of the National Assembly were as “the Spirit of life from the Deity;” and on the 10th July 1790 “they stood upon their feet;” for the Earth’s Assembly on that day decreed, that the property of the expelled

Huguenots unsold at date, confiscated by the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, should be restored to their heirs. They called this the National Justice, which it was the providential mission of the Third Estate to execute; and with terrible fidelity did they fulfil it in vindicating the oppressed, and in punishing the oppressor.

Now, between 1685 and 1790, is a period of 105 years. This is the duration of the death state in which the witnesses were deficient of all political life; and must consequently be the sum in common years of the mystical formula “three days and a half.” But, then, the enigma still remains to be solved, namely, upon what principle do “three days and a half” represent 105 years? As we have seen, two years after 1685, Peter Jurieu proclaimed to the world, truly, that the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes signaled the death of the witnesses; and three years after the decree restoring to them their unsold confiscated estates; that is, in 1793, Mr. Bicheno, pastor of a Baptist church in Newbury, England, who, though cloudy upon some points, was sufficiently sound to be regarded as one of the resurrected witnesses, proclaimed his conviction in a pamphlet styled, “The Signs of the Times,” that 1789–’90, was the year of their standing again upon their feet; and that the 105 years then terminating were the full measure of the “three days and a half.” But the best of his discovery was, that he was enabled to explain to the public upon which principle “three days and a half” are symbolical of 105 years. The reader will, no doubt, be gratified in perusing what he has to say about the matter; I shall, therefore, reproduce it in this place:

“What length of time,” he inquires, “is intended by these three days and a half? My answer is, that days in this eleventh verse are the same with months in the second verse, or, if you please, lunar days, reckoning as the Jews did, thirty days to a month, and as is the method in calculating the above forty and two months, to make them agree with the 1260 days in the third verse.”

Thirty multiplied by three, adding fifteen for the half day, makes 105. When this way of reckoning first occurred to my mind, I had no idea of the events which this number connected; for I did not recollect the year when the Edict of Nantes was revoked. But looking over Quick’s Synodicon, I found it to be Oct. 18, 1685, to which, if 105 be added, it brings us to 1790; take off the few months (if that should be thought necessary) for the event taking place before the half day is quite expired, and it brings us to 1789, when “the witnesses were to be quickened.” This is not necessary, as the 105 year belongs partly to ’89 and partly to ’90, in both which the quickening was in process of development.

“Whether this may strike others,” he continues, “as it struck me, when I first observed the coincidence, I cannot tell; but from this agreement of the number 105 with the time which elapsed between one of the greatest persecutions ever experienced by christians, and this wonderful revolution which has taken place, a thousand ideas rushed upon my mind. Is it probable, is it possible, that this can be the quickening of the witnesses? What! The Olive Trees? The Candlesticks? I have always supposed these to be all Saints! And can that zeal which hath fired Frenchmen to combat for civil and religious liberty, to be ‘the Spirit of life from God?’ Is this resurrection, in the vision, the rising of this civil and religious liberty, previous to better days?—I will do all that I can to discover the truth.”

“I feel great satisfaction that this interpretation of a most important passage, about the publication of which I felt so much, has been approved by some of the best judges of such matters; and that some have strengthened the hypothesis by additional arguments, and those more apposite than what occurred to me. What the sensible and indefatigable author of Illustrations of Prophecy, has brought forward to show the propriety of this uncommon use of the term day, is very much to the purpose. ‘A prophecy concerning future events is a picture or representation of the events in symbols (I quote from Dr. Lancaster), which being fetched from objects visible at one view, or cast of the eye, rather represent the events in miniature, than in full proportion. And therefore, that the duration of the events may be represented in terms suitable to the symbols of the visions, the symbols of duration must also be drawn in miniature.

Thus, for instance, if a vast empire persecuting the church for 1260 years, was to be symbolically represented by a beast, the decorum of the symbol would require, that the said time of its tyranny should not be expressed by 1260 years, because it would be monstrous and indecent to represent a beast ravaging for so long a time, but by 1260 days'. In the like manner, in the present instance, as Daubuz expresses himself: 'The Holy Ghost was tied to the decorum of the main symbol of a dead body that will keep no longer unburied without corruption.' From these observations, it will, I think, appear evident, why, in the prophetic scenery, it was proper to represent the body of the witnesses as having lain dead only three days and a half antecedently to their symbolical resurrection."

6. REVIVAL OF THE WITNESSING FOR GOSPEL TRUTH

"We have long been praying thy kingdom come, and is there any probability," says Mr. Bicheno, "that the preludes to it are arrived? And shall we be unconcerned about the signs of the times? It is deserving the most serious consideration, whether the revolution in France be not the beginning of the fulfilment of this prophecy. I say beginning; for according to the prophecies, if this be the event pointed out by the resurrection of the witnesses, we have as yet seen but the dawn of what is to come, nor shall we perhaps for some time. Black and conflicting clouds will darken the hemisphere and obscure our prospect; but they will spend themselves and vanish. But were we sure that this event (the resurrection of the witnesses) is what we conjecture, yet no man could say how long it would be before 'the Spirit of Life from God,' by those more excellent operations, and in that larger degree, which we look for, enter into the witnesses for gospel truth; for they may be quickened with political life, and yet remain some time with a small share of spiritual life."

"Although the French people are actuated by an astounding zeal for civil and religious liberty, yet their character seems very far from agreeing with what we expect from the witnesses for gospel truth. In the things of religion they appear to be no further enlightened at present than to see the rights of conscience, and the absurdities and cruel oppressions of the Papal system. This is certainly an important part of truth, and what promises to pave the way for the triumphs of pure religion; and perhaps, considering the greatness of that darkness emerged from, it may be as much as could rationally be expected at the beginning of such a reformation. But of true godliness there appears but little at present; and it is to be feared that they, as well as most other nations, must endure great sufferings before we shall see that repentance which must precede the happy days promised in God's word."

These things were written by Mr. Bicheno seventy-two years ago. He lived at the crisis of the resurrection of the witnesses and at the opening of the Third Woe; consequently, only in "the dawn of what was then coming." Since then, "dark and conflicting clouds" have darkened the hemisphere, spent themselves, and vanished away; for since he wrote, five of the vials of the third woe trumpet have been entirely drained of their wrath; and forty-five years of the sixth, have brought us over the year 1864; when he supposed the 1335 years of Daniel would end; and the work of destroying the remains of tyranny, and purifying and enlarging the Gentile church, would be finished; and the glorious appearing of the Lord be manifested. This work however, we, who are contemporary with 1865, know to be yet in the womb of futurity. Mr. Bicheno did well in stirring up his own generation to the study of the apocalypse; and in discovering for us the true import of the "three days and a half." His labor was not lost; and we thank our Heavenly Father for raising up such witnesses, whose memory the faithful in Christ Jesus do always delight to honor.

The laborers of this class were contributing to that very resurrection he looked for; a resurrection, not merely of political life, but for that more excellent resuscitation of a witnessing for gospel truth. The establishment of the British and Foreign Bible Society in March 1804, by which the scriptures, in defiance of the mandates of the God of the earth, have been circulated greatly among those nations in which the witnesses stood upon their feet again, has strengthened “the earth” in its resistance to arbitrary power; and prepared the minds of many to receive, and to seek for “the truth as it is in Jesus” for eternal life. When the truth gets a sufficient hold of these prepared seekers of the unmeasured court, it makes them restless and dissatisfied with the dry, stereotyped, superstitions of their fathers. Hence, they are caused to make efforts for a return to the gospel and order of things, as preached and instituted originally by Christ and the Apostles. There have been more of these efforts since the resurrection of the secular witnesses to renewed political life and vigor in France, than for upwards of a century before. Indeed, I am not aware, that there was any such effort at all in the great City of Babylon from 1572 to 1789; but since this last date there have been several in the outlying regions of the British Isles and America. The Baptist Sect arose in England before the witnesses were put to death in the papal jurisdiction of the Great City. They were a separation from that class of “the Earth” known as “The Independents.” The Word of God got possession of their minds and affections, and would permit them no longer to remain among “the children of disobedience.” They therefore separated themselves in 1638; and, having renounced the PAPAL ORDINANCE of Baby-Face sprinkling, profanely termed by all Laodiceans, “baptism,” they dispatched one of their number to Holland to be immersed by the ANABAPTISTS (as they were ignorantly styled by Luther and his class) that on his return he might be qualified to immerse his friends at home. Hence, these immersed brethren became witnesses of the Holy City class; that is, of the “One Body.” They preserved the truth from dying out in England during the deathstate of the witnesses in the papal section of the continent of Europe; and after 1789–’90, we find their testimony reviving in the writings of Mr. Bicheno and the organized circulation of the scriptures—a society instituted by “the Woman” and “the Earth” which “helped” her.

During the time the witnesses were lying politically and spiritually dead (and of this death the Baptists partook as well as “the Earth,” adopting Calvinistic, Armenian, and Free Communion traditions, which make void the Word of the Deity), a bootless effort was made to return to first principles by Mr. John Glass, a Calvinist “divine” of the Scottish Daughter of the Roman Mother. To his honor be it said, that he was expelled by this apocalyptic “Harlot,” on the charge of entertaining a design of subverting the National Covenant, and of sapping the foundation of all national religious establishments, by maintaining that the Kingdom of Christ is not of this world; in other words, he was expelled for affirming what Christ himself, “the Faithful and True Witness,” bore witness to before Pilate. Would a church of Christ have been guilty of such iniquity as this? Such papistic deeds only prove that “the churches” committing them have no claims to be regarded as christian in any scriptural sense. Mr. Glass, then, was expelled by this “woman,” with whom he had been apocalyptically “defiled” (Apoc. 14:4), in the year 1728. He and his adherents formed themselves into churches, which they endeavored to conform to the primitive order of the New Testament. Soon after the year 1755, one of their elders, named Robert Sandeman, became a prominent advocate of their principles. He taught that justifying

THE BAPTISTS IN 1660

Eureka makes reference to the Baptists as part of the witnessing body of the 17th century.

The following confession of faith, signed by John Bunyan and forty other elders, deacons, and brethren, and approved by more than 20,000 others, was presented to King Charles II., in London, 1660. They declared: “We are not only resolved to suffer persecution to the loss of our goods, but also life itself, rather than decline from the same.” Where are the Baptists of 1660?

Art. 22: “We believe that the same Lord Jesus who showed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs (Acts 1:3), which was taken up into heaven (Luke 24:51), shall so come in like manner as he was seen to go into heaven (Acts 1:9–11). ‘And when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, we also shall appear with him in glory' (Col. 3:4). 'For the kingdom is his, and he is the governor among the nations' (Psalms 22:28), and 'king over all the earth' (Zech. 14:9); 'and we shall reign with him on the earth' (Rev. 5:10). 'The kingdoms of this world' (which men so mightily strive after here to enjoy) 'shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and His Christ.' (Rev. 11:15). 'For all is yours (ye that overcome this world), for ye are Christ's and Christ is God's' (1 Cor. 3:22, 23). 'For unto the saints shall be given the kingdom, and the greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heaven' (Dan. 7:27). Though alas! how many men be scarce content that the saints should have so much as a being among them; but when Christ shall appear, then shall be their day; then shall be given unto them power over the nations, to rule them with a rod of iron (Rev. 2:26, 27). Then shall they receive a crown of life, which no man shall take from them, nor they by any means turned or overturned from; for the oppressor shall be broken in pieces (Psalms 72:4), and their vain rejoicings be turned into mourning and lamentations, as it is written (Job 20:5, 7).

We believe that there will be an order in the resurrection; Christ is the firstfruits; and the next, or after, they that are Christ's at His coming; then, or afterwards, cometh the end. Concerning the kingdom and reign of our Lord Jesus Christ, as we do believe that he is now in heaven, at his Father's right hand, so do we believe that at the time appointed by the Father, he shall come again in power and great glory; and that at, or after his coming the second time, he will not only raise the dead and judge and restore the world, but will also take to himself his kingdom, and will, according to the Scriptures, reign on the throne of his father David, on Mount Zion, in Jerusalem, for ever.

"We believe that the kingdom of our Lord will be a universal kingdom, and in this kingdom the Lord Jesus Christ himself will be alone, visible, supreme king of the whole earth.

"We believe as this kingdom will be universal, so it will be also an everlasting kingdom, that shall have no end, nor cannot be shaken; in which kingdom the saints and faithful in Christ Jesus shall receive the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls; where the Lord is they shall be also.

We believe that the new Jerusalem that shall come down from God out of heaven, when the tabernacle of God shall be with them, and he will dwell among them, will be the metropolitan city of this kingdom, and will be the glorious place of residence of both Christ and his saints for ever; and will be so situate as that the kingly palace, will be on Mount Zion, the holy hill of David, where his throne was" (Crosby's History of Baptism, vol. 2. App. 58).

faith was a simple belief of the divine testimony, passively received by the understanding; which testimony carries in itself sufficient ground of hope to every one who believes it, without any collateral spiritualistic operation; that the gospel contained no offer but that of evidence, and that it was merely a record or testimony to be credited; that there is acceptance with God through Christ for sinners, while they are sinners, before "any act, exercise, or exertion of their minds whatsoever;" consequently, before repentance. Hence, his theory was, justification by passive belief of the truth alone!

He was very severe, but not more so than was in accordance with the truth, in his criticism of the "popular preachers." "I would be far," says he, "from refusing even to the popular preachers themselves what they so much grudge to others—the benefit of the one instance of a hardened sinner (the thief on the cross) finding mercy at last; for I know of no sinners more hardened, none greater destroyers of mankind, than they."

The Sandemanian section of “the Earth” differed from other sects of the Court, in the weekly administration of the supper; in dining to gether at each other’s houses between the morning and afternoon meetings; these dinings were their love-feasts, of which every member was required to partake. They differed also in the kiss of charity, as the act of receiving into fellowship; in a weekly contribution for all expenses; in mutual exhortation; in abstinence from blood and things strangled; in washing of feet; in a plurality of elders, pastors, or bishops, in each church, who, though unlearned and in trade, are sufficiently qualified for their office, if answerable to the specifications found in 1 Tim. 3:1–7; Tit. 1:6–9. They separated themselves from all such religious societies as appeared to them not to profess the simple truth for their only ground of hope, and who do not walk in obedience to it.

The Baptist churches in Scotland imbibed a considerable part of these principles, by which a nearer approach was made to the apostolic order of things; but not sufficiently to constitute them resurrected witnesses for the Ancient Gospel of Jesus Christ. The theory they professed was an improvement upon that of the Scottish Harlot. It might be assented to as a basis for immersion; but would still leave the confessor “in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity.” The philosophy and vain deceit of Protestantism had so “defiled” the baptist mind in the period of death they had passed through, that their resuscitation as a society witnessing the gospel had become hopeless. It remained, therefore, to be attained in the face of their active endeavors to suppress it.

The effort was renewed in the United States of America, and crowned with the result desired.

Another “reverend divine” of the Scottish Harlot’s family was stirred up to attack the institutions which had given him birth. In 1819, or thereabouts, he separated himself and a few others from her communion, and joined the Baptists. Upon this, he commenced a periodical called the Christian Baptist, in which he ably exposed the unscriptural character of the faith, order, and practices of the so-called “religious world”. He was particularly severe upon his clerical brethren, and “the benevolent institutions of the day,” by which they proposed to introduce the Millennium! His unsparing attacks upon all the “Names and Denominations” caused him to be denounced on every side, as a demoralizing disturber of all ecclesiastical peace and comfort. Papists, Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, and others, were all made to writhe in the anguish of his tormenting testimony against them; and would willingly have extinguished him after the approved fashion of former days, but for his brethren of “the Earth,” who, at the epoch of their resurrection to political life and power, had founded the new government under which he lived. This guaranteed civil and religious liberty to all sects and persons; and protected them in the freest exercise of all their natural and acquired rights. The French army, which was sent to help “the Earth” established its independence of the Anglican Daughter of the Roman Harlot, on its return to France reimported into that land the principles of liberty and the rights of man; which, after the “three days and a half” were ended, as “Spirit of Life from the Deity, broke in upon” the constituents of the Third Estate, and caused them to “stand upon their feet” to the great terror of all who beheld them (Apoc. 11:11).

This onslaught upon the Laodicean Apostasy in the United States produced a powerful effect upon multitudes, who separated themselves from all of its Names and Denominations. These were formed into churches by Messrs. Walter Scott, Alexander Campbell, and their colaborers, upon a simple confession that Jesus is the Christ, and immersion for the remission of sins. Many of the principles taught by Messrs. Glass and Sandeman were engrafted upon this stock; and “Campbellism,” divested of its Calvinism, became a new edition of Scotch Baptistism in America.

The legends of this new sect, which it afterwards refused to practise, were: “Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good;” and, on the obverse of its medal, “Style no man on earth your Father; for he alone is your Father who is in heaven; and all ye are brethren. Assume not the title of Rabbi; for ye have only one Teacher; neither assume the title of Leader; for ye have only one Leader, the Messiah.”

The sentiment of these precepts is admirable; and, had it been carried into practice, would have led the disciples of these reformers into the very Holy City itself. But, as it turned out, they adjudged themselves unworthy of so distinguished an honor, and are now grovelling among the dust of “the Earth.”

In those days, the author of this exposition of the apocalypse, then a young man of about thirty years of age, found himself among them, before he understood their theory in detail. He applied himself diligently to the thorough understanding of it by the study of the writings current among them. This he acquired; so that he needeth not that any should testify of Scotto-Campbellism; for he knows what is in it, and that it falls infinitely short of its pretension to be the “restoration of the ancient gospel and order of things.”

The author adopted with great zest and zeal the sentiment of their legend. He proceeded to “prove all things,” and to “hold fast what” he believed to be “good;” and to call no man father, teacher, or leader, but Christ, THE TRUTH (John 14:6). In doing this, he devoted himself to the study of the prophetic and apostolic writings, under the impression that he was engaged in a good work; and, as he was then publishing a periodical entitled The Apostolic Advocate, he would from time to time report to his brethren for their benefit, what he found taught therein. In pursuing this study, he found many of their principles to be at variance with “the word,” which was made void by them. Perceiving this, and supposing that the spirit of their legend was the spirit of their body, he did not hesitate to lay his convictions before them that they might prove them, and hold them, or reject them, according to the testimony. This raised quite a storm among them, the thunderbolts of which were aimed at him by the thunderer of their sect. This uproar caused the author to discover that he had made a mistake in his reading of their legends; and that their reading of Paul’s words was, “Prove all things which we have proved; and hold fast what we believe to be good;” and of Jesus, “Call no man father, teacher, or leader, but Alexander Campbell.” These were readings that he had never agreed to; and, therefore, he continued to read and publish according to the old method, very much to the indignation and disgust of the Simon Pures who misled the multitude.

But he saw that they did not walk honestly according to the truth, or the principles they professed. The gospel proclaimed by this sect of “the Earth,” was a misunderstanding of Peter’s pentecostian address. It preached “baptism for remission of sins” to every one who confessed that Jesus was the Son of God. This was styled “the Ancient Gospel.” The preachers of the Baptist sect denounced it as a damnable heresy. Many of these same preachers, however, from divers causes, changed their minds, left their own mother, joined the Scotto-Campbellites, and, without reimmersion, became “evangelists” and “pastors” among them. Considering this fact, it occurred to the author to inquire, “If, when ye were baptist ‘divines,’ ye denounced what, as Scotto-Campbellite ‘evangelists,’ ye now preach and believe to be the Ancient Gospel; what was that gospel ye obeyed when ye were immersed into baptism?” They either could not, or would not, answer this question; for they were acute enough to perceive that a scriptural reply would have convicted them of preaching a gospel for remission of sins which they had not themselves obeyed; and, consequently, that they were but pious unpardoned sinners, promising to others liberty while they were themselves the servants of corruption. These “evangelists” were the ruin of the sect. They succeeded in closing the eyes and ears of the multitude against the truth; and they remain closely sealed to this day.

The numerical increase of the sect, without regard to the scriptural qualifications of their proselytes, was the standard of the “good” done. They preached the immortality of the soul; the translation of righteous immortal souls to kingdoms beyond the skies at death; the dismissal of unjust immortal souls into eternal torments in hell at death; the salvation of the immortal souls of infants and pagans—a salvation, consequently, without faith; they proclaimed that the church is the kingdom, and was set up on the day of Pentecost; that Jesus is now sitting on the throne of David; that the apostles are ruling with him, and sitting upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel; that the old testament scriptures are as an old Jewish almanac out of date; that the gospel is, that Christ died for our sins, was buried, and rose again; and that whosoever believed these “three facts,” and confessed that Jesus was Son of God, had the “one faith;” that he was justified by this belief, or pardoned, though he might be in doubt; therefore, to make assurance doubtless, they prescribed immersion for that enjoyment that comes from knowledge of remission of sins; that this was the “one baptism;” that there were three salvations—salvation from present ills, salvation from sins, and salvation from hell-torments; that there were three kingdoms—that of law, that of grace or the church, and that of glory; that the first was entered by birth of flesh; the second, by birth of water, or the right hand of fellowship; and the third, at death. Such were the leading traditions with which the leaders intoxicated and demented the multitude for their own advantage; and surely he must be judicially blind, who cannot see that the Scotto-Campbellite sect, which, indeed, shook American ecclesiasticism severely, was, nevertheless, not the resurrected witnessing of the saints for the veritable ancient apostolic faith.

But, after all, good was done. The influence of the clergy over the multitude was vastly diminished; and great numbers were stirred up to read the scriptures, and to think for themselves. The author and many of his friends were of this “very small remnant.” Under the inspiration of the word believed, he could not be silent, whatever consequences might arise. Hence in October, 1834, he raised his voice against the system in an article upon baptism. He maintained, that before immersion could be scripturally recognized as the “one baptism,” the subject thereof must be possessed of the “one faith”. This was a hard blow upon the baptistic Scotto-Campbellite “evangelists;” and they felt it. It also condemned the author’s immersion; which, however, he did not discover till twelve years after. He maintained—

1. That belief, built on the testimony of the prophets and apostles concerning the Christ; confession that Jesus of Nazareth is that Christ, the Son of the Living God; and immersion into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, for repentance and remission, are part and parcel of, and necessary to, the ordinance of purification of sin, styled by Paul, the “ONE BAPTISM.”
2. That mere immersion is not baptism; but that a man cannot be aqueously baptized without being immersed in water.
3. That they whose immersion is predicated upon “a certificate of former good character,” and a tale of sights and sounds, frames and feelings, called “experience,” with no more faith than amounts to a belief that “the word of God is a dead letter,” and that “if they don’t get religion they’ll be damned”—that an immersion in the name of the Father, &c., predicated on such premises, is not christian baptism.
4. That the subjects of any baptism not predicated upon the “good confession,” are not entitled to the spiritual blessings consequent on the “one baptism.”
5. That the Deity, having placed his name in his institutions, all communicable blessings flow through those institutions, of which christian baptism is one.
6. That every immersed person who is not immersed on “the good confession,” is not founded upon THE ROCK; and consequently forms no part of the Church of Christ.
7. That the reimmersion of such a believer is not a re-baptism, and therefore justifiable—such reimmersion being his first scriptural baptism.

Such was the testimony of A.D. 1834. In the course of the year following he called in question their speculations and traditions concerning the soul, heaven, hell, eternal torment, the Devil, their salvation without faith, and so forth. He was not quite clear upon these topics himself; but their violent attacks, threw him upon the defensive, and compelled him to fortify. By a closer study of the word he attained to full assurance of faith, which was only confirmed by the feebleness of their arguments in debate. He maintained:

1. That "a living soul" was not an "immortal soul," but a Body of Life, exemplified by the first Adam.
2. That immortality was not an abstract essence, but life endlessly developed through incorruptible organic substance, or body.
3. That "the Deity only hath immortality" underived.
4. That incorruptibility and life, or immortality, are a part of the reward promised only to the righteous, on condition of their patient continuance in well-doing.
5. That they only are the righteous who believe the truth and obey it.
6. That "the dead know not anything."
7. That the just and unjust are rewarded at their resurrection from among the dead, and not before.
8. That "the righteous shall be recompensed in the earth," when the meek will inherit it.
9. That the wicked and the sinner will also be recompensed in the earth; from which they will "be cut off and rooted out," as unfit to inhabit it: for being without understanding of the word, they are like the beasts that perish.
10. That the clerical devil is a mythological fiction.
11. That the devil of scripture is, first, sin manifested individually in and through our common nature; secondly, sin in ecclesiastical and political manifestation. Hence, the powers of the world are styled "the Devil and his Angels."
12. That without faith there is no salvation.

The statement of these propositions stirred up the devil on every side, and made him roar like a devouring lion; but the truth of them turned his wrath into great bitterness. He denounced the author as "a moonstricken speculator," "a materialist," "an infidel," "an atheist, fit only for the society of Tom Paine, Voltaire, and that herd." These were the weapons, endorsed with all the influence and power of the sect for evil, against one man, whom he contemptuously spumed as "a stripling," and classed with the unclean beasts of the ark!

But "the Earth that helps the Woman" being in power, these ravings and roarings were permitted to break no bones. Great efforts were made to suppress both the author and his writings, till at length they so far succeeded as to prevent their flocks from reading them and listening to his discourse. Alas, for any people reduced by crafty and designing men to such a case! How can the truth enter those whose eyes and ears are closed? Nevertheless, its advocacy was not abandoned, though the aspect of things was very discouraging. Several, however, avowed their conviction of the truth of these propositions; and though the policy of the Devil was to fight him by letting him alone, the study of "the faith once for all delivered to the saints" was continued; and, as it broke in upon his mind, was dealt out by the press and tongue to all who had "ears to hear what the Spirit had said to the ecclesias."

By the year 1847, he had illustrated and proved the following propositions to the conviction of increasing numbers:

1. That the Gospel preached by the apostles was originally preached to Abraham, announcing blessedness for all nations in him and in his Seed, when he should possess the gate of his enemies.
2. That this Gospel promised Abraham and his Seed that they should be the Heirs of the World, which they should possess forever.

3. That Abraham, “hoping against hope,” was fully persuaded that what the Deity had promised he was also able to perform, and therefore it was counted to him for righteousness.
4. That the land in which he sojourned, and kept his flocks and herds, and in scripture styled the Holy Land, and Yahweh’s Land was promised to him for an everlasting possession.
5. That this promise of the land became a confirmed covenant 430 years before the Mosaic Law was added.
6. That the Seed of Abraham, whose day he rejoiced to see, was to descend from the tribe of Judah in the line of David; and to be at once both son of David and Son of God.
7. That a covenant was made with David, ordered in all things and sure, promising that the Seed should descend from him; that he should possess a kingdom in a future age; that he should be Son of the Eternal Father; that he should be afflicted unto death; that he should rise again; that the throne of his kingdom should be David’s throne; that Christ should occupy the throne in his presence; that he shall reign over the House of Jacob, in the covenanted land, during the age; and that of his kingdom there shall be no end.
8. That these covenants made with Abraham and with David are styled by Paul “the Covenants of Promise,” and that they contain “the things concerning the Kingdom of God,” which must be believed as a part of the faith that justifies.
9. That the Christ is the Eternal Father by his spirit manifested in the Seed of David, and that Jesus of Nazareth is he.
10. That in his crucifixion, Sin was condemned in the same flesh that had transgressed in Paradise, so that in the crucified body he bore the sins of his people upon the tree, that they being dead to sin, should live unto righteousness.
11. That he was raised from among the dead by the power of the Father, for the justification or pardon of those who believe the covenanted promises, and the things concerning him.
12. That the things concerning the Christ as a sufferer, and fulfilled in Jesus, are “the things concerning the Name of Jesus Christ,” which must also be believed as the other part of the faith which justifies.
13. That Repentance is a change of mind and disposition, produced by “the exceeding great and precious promises” lovingly believed, and resulting in “the obedience of faith.”
14. That repentance, remission of sins, and eternal life are granted in the name of Jesus Christ.
15. That the Obedience of Faith consists in believing the gospel preached to Abraham, the preaching of Jesus Christ, and the revealed mystery of his Name, and in being immersed into the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit.
16. That repentance, remission of sins, and a right to incorruptibility and life are institutionally granted to believers of the truth as outlined above in being buried with Christ by immersion into death to sin, from whence they rise with Christ, to walk in newness of life.
17. That Abraham, the prophets, and the brethren under the Mosaic Law, are justified by the belief of the promises covenanted to Abraham and David, which covenants were brought into force by the death of the Testator, or Deity in flesh-manifestation called Jesus Christ; and that the immersed, and they only, whether Jews or Gentiles, from the Day of Pentecost to the return of the Ancient of Days, are justified by belief of the same covenanted promises and of things concerning the Name of Jesus Christ as specified above. Thus, there is one Deity who shall justify the circumcision ek pisteos, by, from, or out of faith; and the uncircumcision dia tes pisteos, “through the faith,” for whether under the Law or since the law, “the just shall live by faith,” “without which it is impossible to please God.”
18. That “the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit,” is equivalent to

“the Name of Jesus Christ;” and expresses “the great mystery of godliness,” the Deity manifested in flesh: that this manifestation was first an individual unity, and then a multitudinous unity, in flesh and blood nature; that the individual divine unity was “justified by spirit” when Jesus was glorified; and that the multitudinous unity, consisting of all saints, will be made like him when he shall appear in power. Hence, when this consummation shall be complete, “THE NAME” will be the Eternal Father by spirit manifested in a multitude of immortals, whom no man can number. The scriptural designation of this DIVINE UNITY is Yahweh echad—the ONE WHO SHALL BE.

19. That this name exists in Two States—the present and the future—which states are separated by the resurrection. In the present state, the Name is apocalyptically symbolized by “the Sealed,” “the Golden Altar,” “the Holy City trampled,” “the Woman and the remnant of her seed;” and in the future state, by “the Four Living ones full of eyes,” and “the four and twenty elders;” by the Rainbowed Angel; by the Nave; by the 144,000 on Mount Zion; by harpists and singers; by the Lamb’s wife arrayed in white; by the armies in the heaven; and by the Great City, the Holy Jerusalem, as a Bride adorned for her husband.

20. That the Gospel is glad tidings, inviting men and women to become constituents of this Divine Name, and therefore Heirs of the World with Abraham, on condition of believing the truth as it is in Jesus, being immersed, and walking in the newness of life, as shown above.

Such is the system of truth in outline elaborated by the author from the word as the result of an earnest contention for the faith which, as I have said, continued about twelve years. Its operation on his own mind was to cause him to be immersed; and, being thus put right himself, to go forth and show the “straight gate and narrow way” to others. “The spirit of life from the Deity,” which Mr. Bicheno was looking for but did not see, had “entered into the witnesses for gospel truth,” as he expressed it, when in 1847, the Gospel of the Kingdom and Name was once more proclaimed for the obedience of faith. A few congregations had been collected upon this basis in America, and “the earth” has been to some extent impregnated with their principles. These earthborns, however, mix up many traditions with what they have learned, which make the truth of none effect for their salvation. They are known by various names, such as Millerites, Adventists, Storrites, and so forth, who while dissatisfied with their old mother and her daughters, have neither intelligence nor faith enough in the word to become citizens of the downtrodden Holy City. This witnessing society is “too exclusive,” “too dogmatic,” “too denunciatory of the christians of other denominations,” “makes too much of baptism,” to suit them. It affords no scope for money-making by preaching, for personal glorification by conventions, conferences, periodicals, and so forth. For these, and other reasons too numerous and burdensome to recount, they turn their backs upon those who are able to enlighten them, and exhaust their feebleness in the work of hewing out for themselves cisterns—broken cisterns—which will hold no water.

But, the author did not confine his testimony to the territory of “THE MODEL REPUBLIC”. In that “wonderful year,” A.D. 1848, signalized by the terrible shaking given to the kingdoms of the Great City by “the Earth,” he reimported the testimony into his native land—a land of Bibles, whose truth was buried under mountains of tradition for want of a living witness to exhume it, and to set it intelligibly before the people. Two hundred and seventy discourses in a little over two years; the circulation of eleven hundred copies of Elpis Israel; and less than a hundred copies of the Herald of the Kingdom, per annum, for eleven years; with about a hundred and fifty copies of the first volume of this work—has been his agency in witnessing for the truth against the Laodicean Apostasy in Great Britain. The “very small remnant” has been increased by acquisitions in Britain. The Holy City has acquired voice; and though feeble, is making itself heard, and attended to, by the people. In 1862, the author revisited that country. He found several churches that had struggled into a semi-witnessing existence. The truth had more real friends than in 1848–’50; but it had also many more dangerous embarrassments to encounter, than at that time. Its worst enemies are its pretended friends. It is from these that the truth now suffers both in Britain and America. “The Earth” is a good breastwork against the Serpent; but it is too ignorant and wise in its own conceit to be “a witness for gospel truth.” I trust, however, that a better day has dawned in the current 1866; when the principles herein outlined will find such an earnest expressor by their adherents, that no teaching will be endured among them, by press or tongue, that is not in strict accordance with the oracles of God.

I shall conclude this section by another quotation from Bicheno, respecting the “three days and a half.” “Days, in the mystical language of prophecy, and particularly in the Revelation, generally signify years. But if that be their meaning here, an essential agreement is wanting; for the time, from the repeal of the Edict of Nantes to the French Revolution, was about 105 years. Terms of time among the ancients were ambiguous. Days, months, and years, had not always their proper signification; for ‘months,’ says Artemidorus, ‘are sometimes denoted by years, and days too; and years and days by months; and months and years by days.’ It was the subject, or the rule of proportion which determined the meaning of the terms. Hence, Daubuz observes respecting the terms of time in the symbolic language: ‘Terms of time being thus ambiguous amongst the ancients, they must, in the symbolic language, be by the rule of proportion determined by the circumstances. Prophecy concerning future events is a picture, or representation, of the events in symbols, which being fetched from objects visible at one view, or cast of the eye, rather represent the events in miniature, than in full proportion; giving us more to understand than what we see. And, therefore, that the duration of the events may be represented in terms suitable to the symbols of the visions, the symbols of duration must also be drawn in miniature.’ “Days, then, may stand for months. And we may here see the reason why the witnesses are represented as lying dead three days and a half, rather than three months and a half, or 105 days. The duration of events must be represented in terms suitable to the symbols of the visions. The symbol is, dead bodies lying in the street. How monstrous would it be to represent dead bodies as lying in such a situation for 105 days! The time of their lying dead is therefore, drawn in miniature suitable to dead bodies lying in a street; and these lunar days, or months, are to be calculated in the same manner as the ‘forty and two months’ in the second verse. Thus $3 \times 30 + 15 = 105$ years; the time which elapsed from the repeal of the Edict of Nantes to the French Revolution.”

7. ASCENSION OF THE WITNESSES INTO THE HEAVEN

“And they heard a great voice out of the heaven saying to them, ‘Ascend hither!’ And they ascended into the heaven in the cloud; and their enemies beheld them.”

By heaven in this place, we are to understand the political heaven which ruled over the plateia of the Great City upon which the corpses of the witnesses were extended:—the political heaven of “the tenth of the Great City.” It was the power of this heaven embodied in the government of the “Grand Monarque,” Louis XIV, that conquered and put them to death; and it was the power of the same heaven that blindly legislated them into an erect position, so that they were able to “stand upon their feet.”

LOUIS XIV (1638–1715) was the most powerful monarch in Europe, presiding over a France at the height of its intellectual, economic and military powers. He exercised dictatorial powers, claiming that he ruled for God. Like Constantine, he claimed the title of the Sun King, representing himself as such in the emblem (left) designed for his glory (see Rev. 12:1). As a Catholic he set about repressing all religious opposition with great cruelty. On 18th October 1685

he revoked the Edict of Nantes that had granted concessions to Protestants. The consequences of this decision were disastrous, for this outrageously intolerant act provoked a mass exodus, with half a million citizens settling in neighbouring Protestant States. It led to the civil war of the Camisards, and the War of the League of Augsburg that lasted nine years; and to the weakening of Louis' power. History thus witnesses to the warfare between Catholics and Protestants symbolised in Rev. 11.—Publishers.

“Contending For The Faith”—Jude 3

Against his will, John Thomas was projected into the study of the Scriptures by the action of Alexander Campbell calling upon him to deliver a public address without prior notice. Recognising his deficiency to do so, he determined to make a close study of the bible, and this led him to publishing his findings in print. Four different periodicals were commenced by him, the first, The Investigator continuing only for a few months. In The Apostolic Advocate he commenced his exposition of The Apocalypse; this was followed by Herald Of The Kingdom And Age To Come was commenced after a lecturing tour of Great Britain and the subsequent publication of Elpis Israel.

The forces operating this result are very clearly exhibited in “Thiers’ Hist. of the French Revolution.” It would occupy too much space for details. The period was stormy and perplexing; and none were able to direct or allay the excitement, that agitated all classes of the people. The Court, the noblesse, the clergy, and the people, were all in antagonism; nor were these orders in the state agreed among themselves; added to which, the army was disaffected, the taxes intolerable to the masses, atheistic philosophy prevalent, depravity excessive, extravagance boundless, and the public treasury empty. Alison writing upon this crisis says: “THE AMERICAN WAR was the great change which blew into a flame the embers of innovation. Such was the universal enthusiasm which seized upon France at its commencement that nobles of the highest rank, princes, dukes, and marquises, solicited with impatient zeal commissions in the regiments destined to aid the insurgents. The passion for republican institutions increased with the successes of the American war, and at length arose to such a height as to infect even the courtiers of the palace. The philosophers of France used every method of flattery to bring over the young nobles to their side; and the profession of liberal opinions became as indispensable a passport to the saloons of fashion as to the favor of the people.”

This combination of influences at length came to a head, and set, in a strong current, against the court. In order, therefore, to divert into another channel what might become an overwhelming flood, Louis XVI was now anxious for the convocation of the States General, the opening of which he fixed by “a great voice,” or edict, “out of the heaven,” saying, “Ascend hither!” on May 5, 1789. The Court ordained that the total number of the deputies should be at least a thousand; and that the Tiers-Etat, or Third Estate, should be equal to the other two orders united. The clergy, the nobles and the deputies of the people, were the three orders of the States General. The third estate comprehended nearly the whole nation; all the useful, industrious, and enlightened classes; for this reason, its deputies by the casting vote of Monsieur, who afterwards reigned as Louis XVIII, were doubled, or exceeded the other two orders united by sixty-seven, the whole number being 1254. This number constituted what, in the prophecy, is termed “the Cloud.”

In nature, by the electrical force exhalations are elevated from the earth to the dew point of the aerial, where they are condensed into visible masses, termed clouds. So, analogously in the generation of symbolic clouds. The sovereign power of a state by its edict elevates from among the people their representatives, who when they reach the place to which they are convoked, become a visible and recognized body in the state, or political aerial, on the verification of the powers of the members. This verification is the condensation of them into “a Cloud.”

The public mind, agitated by events, full of the confused idea of a speedy revolution, was in a continual ferment. In the heat of this the elections took place. “Tradesmen, lawyers, literary men, astonished to find themselves assembled together for the first time, raised themselves up by degrees to liberty.” It was an extraordinary resurrection.

The moment of the convocation at length arrived. The King alone, who had not enjoyed a moment’s repose since the commencement of his reign, regarded the States General as the termination of his embarrassments! It was therefore with joy that he made preparations for this grand assembly; which was opened with great national, military, and religious pomp, by which all hearts were deeply moved.

The first business was the verification of the powers of the members. It became a question whether this should take place in common, or by separate orders. The Democracy insisted upon the verification in common. The nobility and clergy were for each order verifying its own members. The Democracy were determined not to give way. All compromise became impossible. The inertia of the inexorable Third Estate, who would do nothing till the nobility and clergy were merged with itself into one homogeneous assembly, exhausted the patience and prudence of their enemies; who, forgetting the animosities between the Court and the higher orders, sought reconciliation between them, that they might be enabled to repress the audacity of the tiers-etat, “whose power was rising with such rapidity.” The nobles and titled clergy threw themselves at the feet of the King, and implored him to support their rights, which were attacked equally with his own. They strove to procure a dissolution of the States General, which would have been a dispersion of “the Cloud;” and a frustration of the providential purpose of its manifestation. But the commons would not allow their enemies to dispose of them after this fashion. They proclaimed themselves, after a stormy sitting, THE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY on June 17, 1789; whose mission it was to regenerate and restore the nation.

But, we are not to suppose that this heterogeneous cloud of deputies were the witnesses. The National Assembly contained many enemies to liberty and human rights and interests—many who were devoted friends of the Roman Deity and arbitrary power everywhere. Speaking of the Witnesses against these, the prophecy says: “They ascended into the heaven en te nephele, in the cloud.” They were in the States General, and of it; but they were not themselves the States General, nor National Assembly. The following extract will show how the prophecy harmonized with facts:

“In the National Assembly,” says Ferrieres testifying concerning the deputies of his own party, “there were not more than about three hundred really upright men, exempt from party spirit, not belonging to any club, wishing what was right, wishing it for its own sake, independent of the interest of orders or of bodies, always ready to embrace the most just and the most beneficial proposal, no matter from what quarter it came, or by whom it was supported. These were the men worthy of the honorable function to which they had been called, who made the few good laws that proceeded from the Constituent Assembly; it was they who prevented all the mischief that was not done by it. Invariably adopting what was good, as invariably opposing what was bad, they have frequently produced a majority in favor of resolutions, which, but for them, would have been rejected from a spirit of faction; and they have often defeated motions, which, but for them, would have been adopted from a spirit of interest.”

This class of deputies was unquestionably “the Earth”—the ascended political witnesses of Jesus. Of “their enemies,” Ferrieres writes as follows: “While on this subject,” says he, “I cannot abstain from remarking on the impolitic conduct of the nobles and the bishops. As they aimed only to dissolve the Assembly, to throw discredit upon its operations, instead of opposing mischievous measures, they manifested an indifference upon this point which is inconceivable. When the president stated the question they quitted the Hall, inviting the deputies of their party to follow them; or, if they stayed, they called out to them to take no part in the deliberation. The Clubbists, forming through this dereliction of duty a majority of the Assembly, carried every resolution they pleased. The bishops and the nobles, firmly believing that the new order of things would not last, hastened with a sort of impatience, as if determined to accelerate the downfall, both the ruin of the monarchy and their own ruin. With this senseless conduct they combined an insulting disdain both of the assembly and of the people who attended the sittings. Instead of listening, they laughed and talked aloud, thus confirming the people in their unfavorable opinion which it had conceived of them; and instead of striving to recover its confidence and esteem, they strove only to gain its hatred and contempt. All these follies arose solely from the mistaken notions of the bishops and nobles, who could not persuade themselves that the Revolution had long been effected in the opinion and in the heart of every Frenchman. They hoped by means of these dykes, to set bounds to a torrent that was daily swelling. All they did served only to produce a greater accumulation of its waters, to occasion greater ravages; obstinately clinging to the old system, the basis of all their actions, of all their opposition, but which was repudiated by all. By this impolitic obstinacy they forced the Revolutionists to extend the Revolution beyond the goal they had set up for themselves. The nobles and the bishops then exclaimed against injustice and tyranny. They talked of the antiquity and the legitimacy of their rights to men who had sapped the foundations of all rights."

The "Great Voice" from the French throne, in commanding this Cloud of Deputies to ascend into the region of power, or "heaven," did not intend to convoke witnesses against itself, and against the nobles, the bishops, and their dependents, the natural pillars of every abomination in church and state. The electoral body of the nation, however, had different views and purposes. In response to the "great voice out of the heaven, saying, Ascend hither!" the electors sent up some whom they knew not—men of political integrity, lovers of justice, haters of oppression, detesters of hypocrisy and state craft, enemies of corruption, and friends of the people. These "ascended into the heaven in the cloud; and their enemies," the Court, the bishops, and the nobles, "beheld them." We have seen from Ferrieres, how they "beheld them"; and how they treated them. They beheld them with hatred; and would gladly, if they had been able, have scattered, and rolled them into the dust of "the earth," whence they had so astoundingly ascended to the sovereignty of the nation. But this was not to be. The day of vengeance for the national crimes of 1572 and 1685, had arrived; and they were the divinely appointed executioners of judgment upon the court, aristocracy and clergy; so that no device contrived against them was allowed to prosper. When their enemies beheld them, their hatred was the result of fear. History and prophecy both testify this. "Great fear," says John, "fell upon those who beheld them." Having resolved themselves into the National Assembly without regard to the court, aristocracy, and clergy, they performed an act of power, in legalizing the levy of the taxes, though imposed without the national consent; but that they should cease to be levied from the day of their being broken up: and placed the creditors of the State under the safeguard of French integrity: they then proceeded to examine into the causes of the dearth and of the public distress. "These measures," says Thiers, "produced a deep impression. The court and higher orders were alarmed at such courage and energy." The danger was equal for them all. The junction of the clergy with the Assembly was a revolution as prejudicial to the king as to the two higher orders themselves, whom the commons declared that they could dispense with. By the imprudent counsel of the aristocracy, the king endeavored to prevent the meeting of the Assembly, but failed. On June 23, he held a royal sitting, in which, as the mouth of the nobles and clergy, he launched reproaches and issued his commands, which, if not obeyed, he would establish by his sole authority as the representative of the nation. He ordered the Assembly to separate immediately. The nobility obeyed with part of the clergy: but the Commons had bound themselves with an oath, that they would not separate until they had given a constitution to the kingdom, established and founded on a solid basis; and this oath, they declared that nothing but the power of bayonets should prevent them from keeping. The populace applauded the Commons; and the joy of the court and aristocracy was instantly turned into alarm, and the greatest agitation. A minority of the nobles joined the Assembly; but terror seized those who directed the majority. They were exhorted by the court to give way to save the king. Their consent was at length extorted amidst uproar; and the majority, accompanied with the minority of the clergy, took their seats in the National Assembly on the 27th of June. "The family," said President Bailly, "is complete. We can now attend without intermission and without distraction to the regeneration of the kingdom and of the public weal." Thus great fear fell on their enemies when they beheld them.

8. "THE GREAT EARTHQUAKE"

"And in that hour there was a great earthquake, and the Tenth of the City fell."

An earthquake, in symbolic language, is a shaking of "the earth," which, in the political system of the world, is representative of the common people. It answers to the phrase, a democratic and social revolution. There was to be a Great Democratic Revolution "in that hour," characterized by the ascent of the political witnesses of Jesus "in the Cloud" of Deputies "into the heaven," to the great alarm of all interested in the abuses and corruptions of Church and State. The events of that hour have since come to be spoken of as "the Great French Revolution," which has hitherto surpassed all others.

As the result of this great political convulsion, "the Tenth of the City fell." Not the other nine tenths of the Great City, which would have been the fall of the Great City itself; but of one tenth thereof. All the tenths are to continue unfallen, with the exception of the tenth before us, until after the advent of Christ, and the resurrection of his brethren. Then the Great City itself will fall, and be "found no more at all." Its thrones will all be "cast down," and not merely shaken; and the kingdoms which acknowledged their sovereignty will be taken possession of by Christ and his resurrected brethren.

The ten tenths of the Great City are symbolized in Daniel by the Ten Toes of the metallic image seen by Nebuchadnezzar; and by the Ten Horns seen by Daniel and John in their visions of the Fourth-Beast system of powers, commonly styled the European Commonwealth, acknowledging the Papal Supremacy. They are the Ten Kingdoms of the Great City, situated south and west of the Rhine and Danube. Until the late temporary development of the Kingdom of Italy, and as the result of the Treaty of Vienna A.D. 1815, modified by the revolution of 1832, they were Belgium, France, Spain, Portugal, Greece, Bavaria, Hungary, Lombardy, Naples, and Sardinia. The Italian Duchies, Venice, and Switzerland, though upon the territory of the Great City, are not reckoned as horns, because their executives are not diademed. The order of things existing in 1865 is exceptional, and therefore only provisional. Bavaria, Hungary, and Lombardy, with the Roman States of the Church, are concorded with the Little Horn, or Catholic Germany. This symbolic order, however, is disturbed by the ambition of "the Earth," or revolutionary element of the Great City. Lombardy, Naples, and Sardinia, with the Duchies, and without Rome, is the unsymbolic order of things; and with France imperial instead of a simple diademed tenth. This arrangement of the city, I apprehend, will not last long. It contains in it elements of conflict, which will probably result in a threefold division of powers, after the advent of Christ (Apoc. 16:19). Nevertheless, these powers continue to be styled "the ten horns, or kingdoms, which receive power as kings one hour with the beast; to whom, with one mind, they give their power and strength" (Apoc. 17:12, 13). Ten has been the predominant number of the papal kingdoms; and, therefore, though they may vary at times, as the vision does not follow them in all their history, they are symbolically indicated as the Ten. Of these, France is the most conspicuous in its relation to the witnesses. It is therefore styled kat exochen, "the Tenth of the City," which was overthrown as a Diademed Horn by the executioners of the national justice upon the king, nobles and clergy—the class-murderers of the saints.

Celebrated procession of the States General in Versailles. The members of each order were separated by the distinguishing dress they were compelled to wear. But when the deputies of the Commons failed to obtain from the King the concessions they demanded, they made their way to an indoor tennis-court where they took an oath “never to separate” until an acceptable constitution was established “on solid foundations” for proper and equitable government of the nation. Made fearful by this show of force, the King agreed to grant concessions. Thus “they (the representative of the people) ascended up to heaven in a cloud; and their enemies beheld them” (Rev. 11:12).

9. “IN THAT HOUR”

A period is herein allotted for the operations of “the Earth” upon the powers of the City. It is indicated by an hour; which, being a twelfth part of a Jewish circle of time, if that circle be a day for a year, would represent a month of days, or thirty days; or if a year-time of years, a month of years, or thirty years. I believe this is the proportional allotment of time for the earthquake and the events of the first five vials resulting from it.

The court, the nobles, the clergy, and the catholic superstition, were the chief objects of vengeance, and indignation in the earthquake. The epoch from 1789–’90 to A.D. 1794–’5, a period of about four years, was the epoch of this terrible earthquake, in which was demolished the order of things so carefully established in favor of the church by the emperor Justinian, whose Code was the civil law code of the kingdom of France. This code was first promulgated in the epoch between A.D. 529–534. The code was a summary of former laws that still continued in force; the pandects published four years afterwards, of the principles of the Roman jurisprudence; and the novels were Justinian’s additions. These altogether made up the Civil Law of the Great City.

Justinian’s Decretal Letter to “JOHN, the Most Holy Archbishop of the sacred city Rome, and Patriarch,” dated March, A.D. 533, became thenceforth part of the civil law. In this the Roman See was recognized as the chief in all his dominion; and its bishop consequently as the head of all the churches, and to be judged by none. In those days, “magistrates were tyrants, and priests were wicked, superstitious, and intolerant, beyond any former age. Numberless laws and regulations were imposed in violation of Christ’s authority, which defaced christianity, and robbed christians of their dearest liberties. By Justinian’s Code those powers, privileges, and immunities were secured to the clergy; that union established between things civil and ecclesiastical, and those laws imposed in matters spiritual, which have proved such a hindrance to the truth, and so calamitous to mankind. Through the zeal of the clergy this code has been received, more or less, as the foundation of the jurisprudence of almost every state in christendom; and that, not only in things civil, but ecclesiastical; and by this means, as some author has observed, the old fancy of the Romans about the eternity of their command, is thus far verified.”

A sixth-century manuscript of Justinian’s of Digest published 16 december, 533. It epitomised all previous laws, and laid down a basis for the legal and ecclesiastical constitution of Europe. It was translated into Greek, that being the more general language of the people, but the corpus of law was in Latin, the traditional language of law and administration. Justinian’s code governed European law for 1260 years (Rev. 11:2), at which time it was abandoned in France by the French Revolution in 1793 when “the names” or titles of the aristocracy and religious orders of “the tenth of the city” were overthrown. see Rev. 11:13.—Publishers.

Thus Justinian's legislation was all devoted to the building up and strengthening of the Catholic Church; while the legislation of the National Assembly was all directed to its destruction. It is a remarkable fact, that these two mutually antagonistic and subversive systems of legislation flourished exactly 1260 years apart from epoch to epoch; and that the one hour of 30 years added to it, or 1290, brings us to the beginning of the outpouring of the Sixth Vial, A.D. 1820, upon "the Great River Euphrates;" the drying up of whose waters prepares the way of the Sun's Resurrected Kings for the destruction of the Great City, and the redemption of the Holy Land. Is this, indeed, the true ending of Daniel's 1290? And if so, is A.D. 1865–6 the ending of the 1335, as well as of John's "forty and two months"? If it be, then there is an epoch upon us of four years, in any day of which Christ may "come as a thief" (Apoc. 16:15): to enter upon a work which will not intermit until it has fully established the kingdom at the end of Micah's period of forty years, about A.D. 1905.

This appears to me, at this writing, to be the correct interpretation of the times. It is, of course, impossible to say that the interpretation is without error. The ensuing years will determine this point beyond dispute. While I write, it is the most satisfactory to my own mind. I have thought, that Daniel's 1290 terminated in 1864; and his 1335 in 1909. But in writing the exposition of this chapter, the fact of the Great Earthquake-resurrection of the witnesses being exactly 1260 years after the promulgation of the civil law of the City; and the Hour of 30 years added, bringing us to the beginning of "the pouring out upon the Desolator of the Holy Land that determined" (Dan. 9:27), or 1290 years afterwards—I do not feel at liberty to persist in rejecting my original conviction, that the 1290 ends in 1820; and the 1335 forty-five years after, or in the epoch current with 1865–6, or thereabout. Besides that, the same evidence that limits the termination of the Holy City's "forty and two months," also confines the 1335 days to the event of the resurrection. John's symbolical "rising up" measures the continuance of the forty and two months practising (poiesai, to execute, practise, act) of the Beast's Mouth to the subjection, or trampling, of the Holy City (ch. 11:2; 13:5): even so Daniel's rising up measures the utmost limit of the 1335 days; concerning which he was told, "thou shalt arise (tiamod) to thine inheritance at the end of the days." In view, therefore, of all the premises, I submit the following as a

10. SYNOPSIS OF THE TIMES OF DANIEL AND JOHN

Beginning of the Seven Times of the Babylonian Tree, or 2520 years of the Kingdom of Men from the 1st of Nebuchadnezzar—Dan. 4:16, 23
Beginning of the Evening-Morning treading under foot of the holy and the host, or Septuagintal 2400 years in "the third year of Cyrus," being the first of his sole reign
540
3.
Beginning of the Seventy Weeks, or 490 years, in the 20th Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia 456

After Christ

1.
End of the 70 weeks at “the cutting off of Messiah”
2.
Beginning of the “time, times, and dividing of a time” when the Saints were imperially “given into the hand” of the Episcopal Mouth of the Little Horn by the Civil Power—Dan. 7:25; identical with the Forty and Two months of Apoc. 11:2; 13:5; in the Phocan Epoch
604–’8
3.
Beginning of the “time, times, and a half,” sworn to by the “Man clothed in linen” (Dan. 12:7); and by the Rainbow Angel, saying, that “the time shall be no longer” (Apoc. 10:6); which personages are identical
604–’8
4.
Beginning of the “abomination making desolate 1290” years (Dan. 12:11; in the Justinian Epoch 531
5.
Beginning of the 1335 day-years in the Justinian Epoch; they extend to “the time of the dead” when Daniel and John rise to the inheritance (Dan. 12:12, 13)
6.
The Man-Child of Sin “revealed,” being born of the Imperialized Woman at the end of a gestation of nine months, or 280 day-years (Apoc. 12:2, 5); in the Donatist Epoch, in which the Sealing begins (ch. 7:3); and the flying into the wilderness ensues (ch. 12:6, 14)
312–’16
7.
“Silence in the Heaven about half an hour” begins 324
8.
Beginning of a gestative period of 280 years, made notable by the Constantinian, or Laodicean, Pentecost, styled the Council of Nice
9.
The Silence in the Heaven ends at the death of the emperor Constantine

337

10.

The “God of the Earth” fully “revealed” in Rome in the Phocan Epoch, 280 years after the Council of Nice (Dan. 11:36–39)
605–’6

11.

Beginning of the first period of “five months” appropriated to the tormentation of the unsealed by the Saracens (Apoc. 9:4–6) 12.
632

Beginning of the second “five months” at the end of the first (Apoc. 9:10)

End of the second five months, 300 years after the beginning of the first, marked by the fall of Caliphs

14.

Beginning of “the hour, day, month, and year”, or 391 years and 30 days, appropriated to the subversion of the Greek Catholic Empire, or third of the Roman orb (Apoc. 9:15) April 29

End of the 391 years and 30 days, signalized by the capture of Constantinople by the fourth Euphratean angel, or Ottoman, power May 29

“The Remnant of the Woman’s Seed” stands first before the Dragon, and afterwards before “the God of the Earth;” in all, “a time, times, and a half a time,” or 1260 day-years (Apoc. 11:3; 12:6, 14, 17; which end with the beginning of the war upon the witnesses, waged against them by the MOUTH OF BLASPHEMY (Apoc. 13:5, 7); in the St. Bartholomew Epoch

17.

The war against the witnesses having continued 113 years, they are “prevailed against,” or “overcome and killed,” at the Revocation of the edict of Nantes (Dan. 7:21; Apoc. 11:7; 13:7)

Having lain unburied corpses in the Breadth of the Great City “three days and a half,” or 105 years, the witnesses stand alive again upon their feet, and ascend into the heaven in the French revolutionary epoch, 1260 years from the Justinian (Apoc. 11:9, 11, 12)

End of the period of 1290 years of abomination making desolate, signaled by the beginning of the outpouring, in the Greek revolutionary epoch, of “that determined upon the Desolator” of the Holy Land (Dan. 9:27); in the commencement of the Sixth Vial at the end of the Hour of Apoc. 11:13

End of the Evening-Morning of 2400 years; notably signaled by the immediately succeeding quinquennial epoch of the American Civil, the Franco-Mexican, the Russo-Polish, and the Austro-Russian Danish, wars; with financial perplexity, the worst of which has not yet been seen

End of the 42 months of Apoc. 11:2; 13:5, the terminus of the temple and altar measurement; also the end of the “time”—chronon—sworn to by the Rainbowed Angel; that is, of the “time, times, and a half” sworn to by the “Man clothed in linen;” and of the 1335 day-years in the current epoch (Apoc. 10:6; Dan. 7:25; 12:7, 12)

“THE TIME OF THE END.” A period of 40 years—Micah 7:15: in which the Rainbowed Angel finishes the Mystery of the Deity as declared in the Gospel of the Kingdom

23.

The terminal epoch of Micah’s 40 years, and of the Seven Times, or 2520 years, from the 1st

11. INITIAL AND TERMINAL PROPHETIC EPOCHS

THE DONATIST EPOCH, A PERIOD OF THREE YEARS, SIGNALIZED BY THE DONATIST TRIALS AND THEIR CONDEMNATION BY CONSTANTINE

312–’16

The JUSTINIAN EPOCH, a period of four years, signaled by the promulgation of the Civil Law of the Great City; and by great desolation in the Holy Land

529–’34

3.

The PHOCAN EPOCH, a period of four years, signaled by the Bishop of Rome being recognized as Supreme Pontiff by the emperor Phocas

604–’8

The ST. BARTHOLOMEW EPOCH, signalized by massacre and war upon the Huguenots on the day of that Romish saint 1572–'6

The FRENCH REVOLUTIONARY EPOCH, a period of about five years, signalized by the fall of the French Monarchy and the Reign of Terror
1789–94

The CURRENT EPOCH, a period incomplete, and signalized by the American Civil and other wars; to be followed by the development of the Roman Question at the close of 1866
1860–67

The TERMINAL MICAH EPOCH, a period at the end of the ensuing 40 years adjusting the difference between that end and the end of the 2520 years
1905–'8

The POST RESURRECTIONAL EPOCH, a few years at the end of the Millennium, styled "a little season," finishing the Millennary Week of 7000 years from the Creation

12. OF THE 2400

It may be as well to state here in relation to the number in Dan. 8:14, that there are various readings of the text. In some manuscripts seen by Jerome in the 4th century, the number was written 2200. The English Version on his authority reads 2300. But in the Septuagint, translated from the Hebrew, about 265 years before the birth of Jesus, for the use of the Jews in Egypt, who spoke Greek, the number is written 2400. Here, then, are three different periods assigned to the duration of the "evening-morning" trampling of the Holy and the Host by the Little Horn of the Goat—2200, 2300, and 2400. Which of these is correct?

As to the 2400, it does not depend alone upon what some regard as the questionable authority of the Septuagint. The celebrated missionary, Joseph Wolff, states that the Jews of Ispahan and Bokhara possess some ancient manuscripts of the prophetic writings of Daniel, in which chapter 8:14, reads "2400 instead of 2300 days;" also, that, when in Adrianople, in 1826, he saw an Armenian manuscript of the Bible in Greek, supposed to be of the fifth century, and translated by Mesrop, in which the same number occurs. "The greater number of manuscripts read 2300. This, however, proves nothing more than the fact, that 2400, like the truth, is in the minority." "The authorities" and "competent judges," as they are regarded by Laodiceans without authority and incompetent, are most of them in favor of the 2300. They reject the testimony of the Septuagint as a typographical error; but this objection will not hold against the manuscripts seen by Wolff, which "the authorities" and "competent judges" have not hitherto succeeded, if they have attempted even, in convicting of error.

What is the correct reading of the number must be determined by something more reliable than Laodicean "authority." Only one of the three readings can be right; and it is not to be supposed, considering the carefulness with which the Hebrew text was preserved, that they are all wrong. The probability is, that some manuscripts were corrupted in, or soon after, the reign of “Antiochus Epiphanes, the Jewish Antichrist,” so-called, in order to make out a theory of the fulfilment of “the Vision of the Evening-Morning,” in his persecution of the Jews! The 2400 period was too long for the theory, and was probably shortened to suit; hence, the 2300; and, as the theory was “orthodox,” and adopted by the leaders of the catholic idolatry as the true interpretation, of the prophecy, and by them handed down to the present generation of the children of the Great Harlot, as proved by the writings of Rollin, Maitland, Moses Stuart, and so forth, the number, as an essential element of the theory, was patronized by “the authorities” and “competent judges” of the divinely excommunicated court, who, in the multiplication of manuscripts, are careful to insert 2300 instead of 2400.

Be this, however, as it may, the question with us is not so much how came the error, but what is the truth in the case? This is what I shall try to get at; and, in so doing, I remark, that it appears to me that the solution of the difficulty depends upon the working of the matter by a correct rule of interpretation. My rule or reed, then, is this, that the time of the Vision must be calculated from the first event symbolized in the vision. I see no flaw in this rule. I can see no reason why any of the events symbolically represented should be left out of the time given, whatever it may be. The time of the vision is the 2200, 2300, or 2400, as may be determined. Many affirm (and I was once of the same opinion, when I took for granted the correctness of the English text) that the commencement of the Seventy Weeks was the beginning also of the time of the vision, B.C. 456. But to begin at this date would be to exclude the symbolical events of over eighty years. Why should they be excluded from the time of the vision? I can see no reason for such exclusion; and, therefore, cannot consent to it. Besides this, it terminates too soon. This will appear from the Hebrew text, l'eth-kaitz h'khazon, “to the time of the end the vision.” The vision is to extend to the epoch of the manifestation of “the appearance of a man,” answering to the symbolism exhibited in Dan. 8:15–18; 10:5, 6; when “the Holy shall be vindicated,” or avenged—ch. 8:14. If 2300 be assumed as correct, then, commencing as above, it terminated in the vulgar era 1843. This was twenty-two years ago; too long an interval for a correct ending. The Man has not appeared, nor has the Holy been justified, cleansed, vindicated, or avenged, in any sense. I therefore conclude that this beginning and ending in connexion with the 2300 is a mistake.

My rule excludes the idea of the time of the vision beginning with “the going forth of a commandment for causing to return, and for building Jerusalem,” in the 20th of Artaxerxes, B.C. 456. This commencement was assumed on the ground of the word, nekhtak, rendered in the English Version, “are determined,” signifying, cut off. It is true that this is one of its meanings; but it also signifies cut upon, or notched, divided, decided, decreed, determined. Sir Isaac Newton has the following note upon the word: “Cut upon—A phrase in Hebrew, taken from the practice of numbering by cutting notches.” The word in the prophecy for “cut off,” is yikkaraith—ver. 26. The Seventy Weeks were divided off from the time of the vision; but not necessarily from its first years. If a reed of any length represents the time of the vision, the most that can be argued from the cutting import of the word is, that the seventy weeks, or 490 years, were notched into the reed—that they were placed between two notches; of which, the first answered to the decree of Artaxerxes; and the second, to the “cutting off of Messiah” by crucifixion.

But decreed, or determined, in the sense of divided or apportioned, is doubtless the sense of the word in this the only place it occurs in the book. Seventy weeks are apportioned out of the time of the vision for the development of certain specified events. Hence, their beginning or ending affects only themselves; and the commencement of the time of the vision must be sought for elsewhere.

Seeing, then, that it is reasonable that all the events of the vision should be included in the time of the vision, I am prompted to inquire, what was the first event symbolized in the Evening-Morning vision? The answer to this is in the words of Daniel: "The higher horn of the ram came up last." This was the first event symbolized. It represented the Persian Dynasty of the Ram Empire succeeding the Median. Darius and Cyrus reigned conjointly in Babylonia two years, when Darius the Mede died, and Cyrus the Persian became sole ruler, B.C. 540. This was the third year of Cyrus from the death of Belshazzar; the first from the death of Darius (Dan. 1:21; 10:1). Now, if this be admitted as the commencement of the time of the vision, it is fatal to the claims of the 2300; for this number, calculated from B.C. 540, would end; A.D. 1760, since which year over a hundred years have elapsed, in no part of which has the trampling of the Holy and the Host been finished, nor the Holy avenged.

For this reason, then, I reject the 2300 as spurious; and if so, I can have nothing to say for the 2200, which, by the same rule, terminated two hundred years ago. What then remains? One thing only, and that is, if my rule of interpretation be correct, that the 2400 is the best reading of the three, and alone worthy of all reception. Adopting this as the true time, we are brought by it to A.D. 1860-'1, which is the ending of the 2400th year. If I am right, A.D. 1865 is hard on the beginning of "the time of the end," styled by John "the Hour of Judgment." The numbers of Daniel and John all seem to terminate in the epoch now upon us. After the 2400 is finished, "the appearance of the Man clothed in linen," "the voice of whose words is the voice of a multitude," transpires, judgment is given to them, and the Holy is avenged; but how long exactly intervenes between the end of the 2400 and his appearing "as a thief," I see no evidence to prove.

The vision, of which the 2400 is the time, is styled "the vision of the evening and the morning," in allusion to "the daily," which was offered in sacrifice every evening and morning under the law. No movement was to take place for its restoration until the end of a day of 2400 years. That end seems to have arrived, and with it the end of Daniel's "time, times, and a dividing of time," the 1335 days, and John's "forty and two months." I therefore now look for the advent of Christ, and the resurrection, at any time within the epoch ending in a very little season.

13. "THE TENTH OF THE CITY FELL"

The object for which "the Earth" had exhaled from its stratum the Cloud of Deputies in response to the Royal Edict, saying, "Ascend hither!" was the establishment of a Constitution. The instruction given to its deputies energetically expressed its demand for this, with the understanding that the new government was to be monarchical and hereditary. The constituents of the deputies were all agreed in desiring the regeneration of France; and the whole French nation claimed with energy the rights of the citizen, liberty, and property, and the free communication of thought. It insisted on being free; and "the genius of France," says Clermont-Tonnerre, "hurried, as it were, the march of the public mind; and had accumulated for it in a few hours the experience which could scarcely be expected from many centuries."

Clermont-Tonnerre's "Genius of France," was John's "Spirit of Life from God." It was this that "hurried on the march of the public mind," and gave it a certain amount of wisdom for the crisis beyond its experience of ages.

But the instability of the king, and the infatuation of the court and aristocracy, proved an obstacle quite insurmountable by a wise moral force, and precipitated events which threatened, and at length effected, their destruction. Had the estates of the kingdom been left to their own action, the result would probably have been in favor of the old abuses; but there were forces exterior to these orders, vigilantly observing the course of events, and ever ready to shape them into the direction it was considered they ought to go for the development of the public good. These forces were famine and the fury of the people worked by agents invisible and unknown. The parliaments, the nobility, the clergy, the court, all threatened with the same ruin, had united their interests, and acted in concert. They were all pervaded with consternation mingled with despair. Their policy was to have the people commit as much evil as possible, that what they called good might be brought about by the very excess of that evil. In promotion, therefore, of this “political pessimism,” compounded of spite and perfidy, the aristocracy began from the time of the capture of the Bastille to co-operate with the most violent members of the popular party.

Under the influence of these antagonist forces, unexpected events would result to the astonishment and dismay of all parties. The agitation was general. A sudden terror had spread itself everywhere. On the night between July 14 and 15, Paris was to be attacked on seven points, and the National Assembly dissolved. The treachery of the court was revealed by its imprudence, and effectually defeated by the fury of the people, who stormed the Bastille, July 14, 1789, and caused the Assembly to triumph over its enemies.

But the reconciliation was only transitory. The court resumed its pride, and the people its distrust; and implacable hatred recommenced its course. Atrocious outrages were committed throughout the whole kingdom, which were rather increased than pacified by the spontaneous abolition of the feudal system, and the tithes without redemption. The king, who sanctioned this revolution, accepted the flattering but undeserved title of “the Restorer of French Liberty.” His was a struggle of power against liberty; and every concession was a victory gained by the people, and one step nearer the precipice over which “the Tenth of the City” was doomed to fall.

The Storming of the Bastille in Paris

The storming of the Bastille is recognised as a decisive incident in the French Revolution. The Bastille, a huge building of eight round towers linked by walls eighty feet high, had originally been built as a fortress in the fourteenth century. Since then it had been used as a state prison for citizens who had been arrested on political grounds, but were not guilty of an offence punishable under common law. It therefore became a symbol of an intolerable regime by the common people, who stormed it and took it on 14th July 1789, an important date in Bible prophecy and world history, for it clearly showed to the King and Government the violent methods the people were prepared to use to obtain what they considered their rights, for the French Revolution changed the political constitution of Europe, and established the principles of Communism which, since then, have so dramatically affected all countries.—Publishers.

The work upon which the National Assembly was now engaged was the New Constitution. “The nation wills, the king executes:” these were its simple elements, and they imagined that they wished for a monarchy, because they left a king as the executor of the national resolve. Real monarchy is the rule of one, to which limits are set by means of the national concurrence. There the will of the prince in reality does almost every thing. But the moment the nation can order what it pleases, without the king having the power to oppose it by a veto, the king is not more than a magistrate. It is then a republic with one consul instead of several. Such was the monarchy existing in men’s opinions; and they were republicans without being aware of it.

But events were too slow for the impatient populace; for while the court and the aristocracy were intriguing, and the National Assembly discussing, the people were crying for bread. The mob determined to go to Versailles, and call the king and Assembly to account for their hesitation to secure the welfare of the people. From all quarters was heard the cry of “The king to Paris!” which the aristocracy proposed to prevent by carrying him off to Metz where, in a fortress, the court might order what it pleased. All were in commotion. Paris poured forth its thousands, and attacked the palace of the king, whose foreign mercenaries would have been massacred but for the interposition of Lafayette. With frightful howlings, the mob demanded the removal of the royal family to Paris. At length they were gratified, and the procession started. "I hope," says Lavallette, "such a scene will never be witnessed again!" It was the conveyance of the royal representatives of Charles IX., his Queen-Mother, and Louis XIV., the sanguinary murderers of the witnesses of Jesus, prisoners of a mob as ferocious as they, to the place of their future execution. "These madmen, dancing in the mire and covered with mud, surrounded the king's coach. The foremost groups carried on long pikes the bloody heads of the life-guardsmen butchered in the morning. A group of women, ugly as crime itself, swarming like insects, and wearing grenadier's hairy caps, went to and fro, howling barbarous songs. Several of these abandoned women, drunk with wine and fury, rode astride upon the cannon, celebrating by their abominable howlings all the crimes they had committed or witnessed. Others, near the king's carriage were singing allegorical airs, and, by their gross gestures, applying the insulting allusions in them to the Queen. In the transports of their brutal joy, the women stopped the passers by, and yelled in their ears, while pointing to the royal carriage: 'Courage, my friends; we shall have plenty of bread now that we have got the baker, the baker's wife, and the baker's boy.' This scene lasted for eight hours before the royal family arrived at the Place de Greve. They alighted at the Hotel de Ville, their first resting-place during protracted misery, that terminated afterwards in a horrible death. Thus ended the memorable 6th of October, 1789."

The new constitution being finished, it was sworn to by all parties on the anniversary of the destruction of the Bastille, July 14, 1790. Having concluded its labors, the National Constituent Assembly was replaced by the Legislative Assembly. The members of this body were of opinion that enough had not yet been done. Their minds were incessantly recurring to the idea of a republic. The National Assembly had changed an absolute monarchical despotism into a constitutional and very limited monarchy, but the hot-headed republicans of the new legislature, who occupied the highest benches, and thence denominated The Mountain, were all-powerful in the clubs and among the populace, and were determined to be satisfied with nothing short of the abolition of monarchy as an expensive and useless pageant.

The policy of the Legislative Assembly was the curtailing of the prerogatives of Royalty. Its predecessor had already wrested from the king the privilege of pardoning criminals. It continued the work by decreeing that he should no longer be addressed by the titles Sire and Your Majesty; and, on August 11, 1792, they suspended him, and formed an Executive Council to exercise his constitutional functions; and, on August 13, imprisoned him and the rest of the royal family in the Temple.

The Legislative Assembly held its first sitting October 1, 1791. It passed 2,140 decrees relative to administration or legislation, and closed its labor without abolishing monarchy, September 21, 1792.

During the brief reign of this Assembly some very exciting events had transpired in the history of the King. He considered himself as a prisoner in the hands of his enemies; more especially since the failure of his attempt to establish himself and family at Montmady. He had fled with them in disguise from Paris; but was recaptured at Verennes, whence he was brought back by the populace with ignominy.

On June 20, 1792, the mob invaded his palace in great tumult and in arms to lay before him their remonstrances. They highly disapproved of his use of the veto, and demanded that he should sanction the decrees of the Legislative Assembly against the priests, and for the formation of a camp of 20,000 men, for the defence of Paris against foreign enemies. But the king, true to the catholic instincts of his blood-stained dynasty, was indisposed to endorse the decrees which expelled non-juring priests from France, and demanded a vigorous prosecution of hostilities against foreign powers, upon whose success against the revolutionary "earth" he looked for deliverance and restoration to his former despotic authority. He regarded the revolution as merely a transient popular movement that would soon be stopped by a few victories of the invaders. Neither he nor his Queen, Marie Antoinette, could be persuaded of the truth of Dumouriez's words, that the movement was "an almost unanimous insurrection of a mighty nation against inveterate abuses, the flame of which was fanned by great factions." "Thus, by a kind of fatality," says Thiers—yes, a fatality, apocalyptically registered, decreeing the fall of "the Tenth of the City"—by this fatality "the supposed intentions of the palace excited the distrust and fury of the people, and the uproar of the people increased the anxiety and the imprudence of the palace. Despair therefore reigned within and without." Utter detestation of royalty moved the heart of the abyss. "You see me very sad," said the Queen to Dumouriez. "I dare not approach the palace window which looks into the garden. Yesterday evening I went to the window towards the court just to take a little air. A gunner of the guard addressed me in terms of vulgar abuse, adding, 'How I should like to see your head on the point of my bayonet.' In this horrid garden you see on one side a man mounted on a chair, reading aloud the most abominable calumnies against us; on the other, a military man or an abbe, dragged through one of the basins, overwhelmed with abuse, and beaten; whilst others are playing at ball, or quietly walking about. What an abode! What a people!"

On 5th October 1789, some hundreds of women wild with fury through hunger and frustration seized weapons and marched to Versailles where the King and his family were staying. They demanded bread, and insisted upon the King and his family returning to Paris. The above is a contemporary print depicting them departing on their mission.

The King arriving at the Hotel de Ville on 6th October. He and his family returned in the royal carriage, but ended on the scaffold of the guillotine. His death ended an epoch for France, for Europe, and for the world. Out of the French Revolution emerged the spirit of Communism that has influenced world politics since.

The Girondins, who were enthusiasts for liberty and philosophy, ruled in the Legislative Assembly. They despaired of the king's sincerity. Therefore, having Paris at their back, they determined to make their party master of the king, and to forestall his suspicious intentions. Through Roland they declared to the king that "the declaration of rights is become a political gospel, and the French constitution a religion for which the people are ready to perish. That all attacks made upon it are but means of kindling enthusiasm in its behalf. That it was too late to recede, and that means of temporizing no longer exist. That the Revolution was accomplished in men's minds, and would be consummated at the expense of their blood, and cemented with it, if prudence did not prevent the calamities which it was yet possible to avoid. Gracious Heaven!" exclaimed they, "hast thou stricken with blindness the powers of the earth, and are they never to have any counsel but such as shall lead them to perdition!"

The combat had now commenced between the Girondins and the Court—a combat which was for life or death. Lafayette, who was a constitutionalist, offered to deliver the king from his enemies by an armed rescue. But the king and queen refused to be saved by him a second time, hoping that salvation would come from the occupation of Paris by Austrian and Prussian troops. The discovery of Lafayette's intrigue made the popular party absolutely desperate, and it resolved to strike a blow at the court before it could carry into execution the plots of which it was accused.

June 20, 1792, was the insurrection of the Sans Culottes. They bore flags inscribed with the words, "The Constitution or Death." Ragged breeches were held up in the air with shouts of Vivent les sans-culottes! Besides which an atrocious sign was displayed to add ferocity to the whimsicality of the spectacle. On the point of a pike was borne a calf's heart, with the inscription, "Heart of an Aristocrat." The court had called in the disciplined barbarians of the North, by which its adversaries were stirred up to call in those other undisciplined barbarians, who by turns merry and ferocious, abound in the heart of cities, and remain sunk in depravity amid the most polished civilization. This motley multitude filed by thousands through the Legislative Hall, and there forcibly intruded themselves upon the king, whom they compelled to don the red Phrygian “cap of liberty.” He consented to hear them read their petition. This terrible lecture of the rabble was listened to amid uproar and shouts, and the oft-repeated cries of “No Veto,” “No Priests,” “No Aristocrats!” “The Camp near Paris!”

At length, in the evening, these unwelcome visitors were persuaded to retire in peace and order. He was immediately rejoined by his family. Tears flowed copiously from these royal constituents of “the affrighted remnant” (ch. 11:13). The king, with the red cap still perched on the top of his wig, was overcome by the scene. Recollecting that the offensive symbol was still there, he flung it from him with indignation. The Queen perceived tears in the eyes of M. Thionville, a staunch republican deputy. “You weep,” she said, “to see the king and his family treated so cruelly by a people whom he has always wished to render happy.” “It is true, Madam,” replied he, “I weep over the misfortunes of a beautiful, tender-hearted woman and mother of a family. But, do not mistake; there is not one of my tears for the king or the queen—I hate kings and queens.”

The attacks against royalty were as yet only indirect. None seemed to be satisfied with the constitution. One party wished to modify it by the intervention of foreigners; the other to overthrow it by establishing a republic. The report of the committees on public affairs was alarming, and caused the Assembly, on July 11, to pronounce the solemn formula: “Citizens, the country is in danger!” The meaning of this was, that every one should now lay down his life in behalf of the State. The Revolutionary ardour was excited to the utmost. An universal phrenzy seized the public mind. The idea of declaring that the king had forfeited the crown, and of forcing him to abdicate, was regarded as the only possible remedy for the evils which threatened France. Many departments openly defied the authority of government, and without any orders sent their contingents to form the camp near Paris. This was the commencement of the revolt that overturned “the tenth of the Great City.”

Consternation pervaded the court, and a new trial of fortitude awaited the king. July 14, 1792, had arrived—the anniversary of the destruction of the Bastille—which was to be celebrated. An immense tree was planted by “the Earth,” who styled it “the Tree of Feudalism.” It bore on its branches crowns, blue ribbons, tiaras, cardinals’ hats, St. Peter’s keys, ermine mantles, doctors’ caps, bags of law proceedings, titles of nobility, escutcheons, coats of arms, and so forth, and the king was invited to set fire to it. This, however, he declined, saying there was no longer any such thing as feudalism. The concourse of rabble, federalists from the provinces, and troops, was immense. No accident, however, occurred, and the king returned to the palace, glad at having escaped the dangers, which he conceived to be great, but alarmed at those he beheld approaching.

Everything indicated a speedy revolution. The Girondins foresaw and wished for it; but they did not clearly distinguish the means, and dreaded the issue of it. The people accused them of indolence and incapacity. They were weary of eloquent speeches without result, and the leaders of the clubs and sections demanded an active and concentrated direction, that the popular efforts might not prove unavailing.

This demand was supplied by a secret conclave styled the insurrectional committee. It was composed of Jacobins, who concerted the celebrated insurrection of the 10th of August, ’92, “which was due,” says Petion, “to the Guardian Genius which has constantly governed the destinies of France ever since the first meeting of its representatives” “the Spirit of Life from God.”

The plan definitely adopted was to set the people in motion, repair in arms to the palace, and to depose the king. On the 3rd of August, Petion, the Mayor of Paris, was directed to petition the Assembly in the name of the forty-eight sections of the city, to decree the dethronement of Louis XVI. The crisis was now approaching. Everything was arranged by the royalists for the king’s flight, which at the last moment was frustrated by his refusal to fly. A general agitation pervaded Paris. The drum beat the call in all quarters. The cry, "To arms!" was raised, and the insurrection proclaimed on the 10th of August. The dismal sound of the tocsin pervaded the whole extent of the Capital. At length it reached the palace, proclaiming that the terrible night had come—that fatal night of agitation and blood—destined to be the last the monarch should pass in the palace of his ancestors, a sanguinary and cruel race.

At dawn of day the palace was besieged by "the Earth," full of fury against the royal and courtly representatives of the murderers of the saints and witnesses of Jesus. The king had with him about nine hundred Swiss mercenaries, and more than one battalion of the national guard, besides a crowd of hangers-on about royalty. But he lacked the boldness necessary to use them with effect; and though it is said that the Queen presented a pistol angrily at him, and said to him, with energy, "Sire, it is time to show yourself!" it was found impossible to arouse him from that judicial infatuation sent upon him by the Divine Avenger of his own. Instead of staying to defend himself in the royal den of Charles IX. who, from its windows, had glutted his thirst for righteous blood in shooting Huguenot, men and women, while flying from their murderers in the streets, in 1572—Louis took refuge with his family in the midst of the Assembly. Soon after their arrival, the roar of cannon and the roll of musketry was heard. The massacre, retaliatory for that of St. Bartholomew's had begun. The resurrected witnesses were striking terror and dismay into the hearts of their enemies; and a most sanguinary combat raged. The Marseillais and Bretons, boiling with fury, rushed forward with ardor, fell in great numbers, but at length made themselves masters of the palace. The rabble, with pikes, poured in after them, and the rest of the scene was one general massacre. They put to death every person without distinction. Streams of blood flowed everywhere from the roofs to the cellars. All were butchered alike. It was scarcely possible to set foot anywhere without treading upon a dead body. Modesty forbids the description of the mutilation of the slain. Among the perpetrators of these atrocious deeds were found women! Every corner of the palace was plundered by the mob. Devastation and death everywhere prevailed. The butchery did not cease for hours. Carnage was the revelry of the day; and when "aristocrats" were no longer found, the rabble continued to drink blood in mutual slaughter; so that the mangled bodies of the seven hundred and fifty Swiss guards were covered with fresh heaps of the self-destroyed rabble.

The Assembly anxiously awaited the issue of the combat. Shouts of victory at length arose from the populace, intoxicated with joy and fury. They soon filled the Hall, bringing with them plunder, and the few Swiss prisoners they had spared. The king and his family, cribbed and confined in the reporters' box, beheld in these trophies the ruin of their throne, and the joy of their conquerors. The reward of victory was the abolition of royalty. The Assembly dared not refuse this. The celebrated decree was therefore passed to the effect, that

Louis XVI. is, for the time being suspended from royalty;

A plan of education is directed for the Prince Royal;

A national convention is convoked.

The tumult continued to rage with extreme violence, and, in the opinion of the people it was not sufficient to have suspended royalty, it behoved them to destroy it. In their petitions they insisted that the suspension should be changed into dethronement. They were pacified with the assurance that a convention had been decreed to decide irrevocably the great question. In the meantime the Royal Family was imprisoned in the Temple.

Forty days after this event, Sept. 20, the National Convention was constituted at the Tuileries. A new constitution was to be formed, based upon absolute equality, and the sovereignty of the people. After certain motions and decrees, the question of royalty was brought forward. It was insisted that its abolition should be forthwith pronounced. "The people," it was said, "had just been declared sovereign, but it will not be really so till delivered from a rival authority—that of kings." The Assembly and the tribunes rose to express their unanimous reprobation of royalty. Discussion was proposed. "What need is there of discussion,” it was objected, “when all are agreed? Courts are the hotbed of crime, the focus of corruption; the history of kings is the martyrology of nations. Discussion is not needed.” Profound silence ensued, and by unanimous desire, the President of the National Convention declared that ROYALTY WAS ABOLISHED IN FRANCE. This decree was hailed with universal applause. It was then proposed not to date 1792 the year 4 of liberty, but the year 1 of THE REPUBLIC. The year 1789, was no longer considered as having commenced liberty, and the new republican era began on that very day, Sept. 22, 1792; which was 1260 years from Justinian’s delivery of the saints into the hands of the Supreme Pontiff of the Great City.

14. SEVEN THOUSAND NAMES OF MEN

“And in the earthquake seven thousand names of men were put to death.”

In the English version this text reads, “were slain of men seven thousand.” This error has probably crept in through editors not being able to conceive how names could be slain. They have therefore left onomata, names, out of the text, without any good reason. In my translation it is restored as indispensable to the right understanding of the prophecy.

We have seen how “the Tenth of the City fell” by the concussion of “the Earth.” It required the shocks of three entire years to level it with the ground. It was caused to fall by the shaking of “the Earth” in a special sense. It was the fury of the populace, excited and directed by an invisible agency, dictating its will to affrighted assemblies, that overthrew the monarchy. The assemblies left to themselves would not have found the courage needful for such a work. Their sympathy was with royalty even after Aug. 10. The decree of heaven, however, could not be circumvented. “The Earth” had no love for the power that had crushed it in 1685. It hated kings, and all that constituted the pillars of their thrones. It began its work by throwing down the pillars, and having removed these, abolished the throne, and ignominiously executed its incumbent.

The aristocracies and hierarchy of a monarchy are its strongest supports. To these belong names of divers sorts. The names of aristocracy are the titled orders of nobility, such as dukes, marquises, counts, and such like, to which are attached feudal rights, privileges, and immunities, denied to the common people. Hierarchical names are representative of ecclesiastical orders and associations, which are known by their titles—monks and priests, orders of men at once the creatures and supporters of despotism and superstition; the flatterers of princes, and the spoilers of the common people. To put these names to death would be to abolish them, both as to their associational existence, and the titles by which the classes of men, and the individuals of those classes, were distinguished.

These names are put down at seven thousand. This is the symbolical number by which the real number is expressed—a definite totality for an undefined whole; and equivalent to all orders of monks, priests, and nobles related to the Tenth Kingdom of the Papal City. Hence, the interpretation of the text is, that “in the insurrectional agitation of the democracy all the monastic and sacerdotal orders, together with all ranks and degrees of nobility, should be utterly abolished.” Such is the prophecy; and we shall find, that in the epoch of the fall of the French Monarchy, the things predicted were literally and sanguinarily fulfilled.

The destruction of the Bastille by the mob, and the excesses of the day, were a warning to the upper classes of their approaching ruin. Consternation, mingled with despair, pervaded them all. On the 4th of August, 1789, these disturbances and the means of putting an end to them, were discussed. Two of the nobility, members of the National Assembly, urged that it would be silly to employ force to quiet the people: that the right way would be to destroy the cause of their sufferings, and then the agitation which was the effect of them would instantly cease. They proposed the abolition of all feudal rights, which were frightfully oppressive. A sudden paroxysm of disinterestedness seized upon the Assembly, and everyone hurried to the tribune to renounce his privileges. A sort of intoxication seized all orders, all classes, all the possessors of prerogatives of every kind, who sought only to cast them all away. As the commons had no privileges to give up, they relinquished those of the provinces and the towns. The equality of rights was thus established between individuals and all parts of the French territory. The Assembly abolished tithes without redemption, and decreed the maintenance of the clergy by the State, which was very humiliating to their pride.

The feudal system having been abolished, the Assembly proceeded to destroy those great bodies, or “names,” which were enemies in the state against the state. The clergy possessed immense property, conferred on them by princes as feudal grants, or by the pious by way of legacy. Talleyrand, bishop of Autun, proposed to them to renounce the property of the ecclesiastical benefices in favor of the nation. The clergy, however, struggled against this proposition, but without effect. The Assembly decreed that all their possessions were at the disposal of the state; by which it destroyed their formidable power, and the luxury of the high dignitaries of the order; and secured those immense financial resources which so long upheld The Revolution. It declared also, that it ceased to recognize “religious vows,” and restored liberty to all the inmates of cloisters. “From this moment,” says Mignet: “The hatred of the clergy to the revolution broke forth. It had been less intractable than the noblesse at the commencement of the States General, in the hope of preserving its wealth; afterwards it showed itself not less opposed to the new regime.”

The exasperated clergy continued to excite disturbances throughout France. They deemed themselves sacrificed to the creditors of the state. Their property was ordered to be sold. Rendered desperate by the loss of the “filthy lucre” they adored, they circulated writings among the people, declaring that the plan of the revolutionists or John’s resurrected and ascended witnesses, was to attack the catholic religion—that great name by which they had their wealth; and whose functionaries had put them to death. They neglected no means to awaken the ancient fanaticism of Provence and Languedoc. The protestants of these parts excited the envy of the catholics, whose priests took advantage of the dissensions to widen the breach. In this spirit it was proposed in the Assembly to declare, that the catholic religion was the only religion of the State. An ecclesiastic threatened them with malediction for intending to abolish the catholic religion. This was denied. In the course of the debate Louis XIV. was mentioned. “I am not surprised,” exclaimed Mirabeau, “that reference should be made to the reign in which the Edict of Nantes was revoked; but consider that, from this tribune whence I address you, I see that fatal window, where a king (Charles IX.), the murderer of his subjects, mingling worldly interests with those of religion, gave the signal for the massacre of St. Bartholomew!” The Assembly refused to make the declaration. The catholics and protestants had come to blows on the subject in the south; and the former were repulsed.

But, while the clergy were filling up the measure of their fathers, the nobles were not forgotten. On June 19, 1790, it was proposed to abolish the titles of count, marquis, baron, etc.; to prohibit liveries; in short, to suppress all hereditary titles. A noble asked what they would substitute for the words, “Such an one was created count for service rendered to the state?” “Let it merely be said,” replied Lafayette, “that on such a day such a person saved the State.” The motion was carried, notwithstanding the extraordinary irritation of the nobility, which was more galled by the abolition of its titles than by the more substantial losses which it had sustained since the commencement of the revolution. The more moderate portion of the Assembly had proposed that, in abolishing titles, those who chose to retain them, should be at liberty to do so. Lafayette tried to procure its return for amendment; but the king instantly gave his sanction, with the disingenuous intention, as some supposed, of driving things to extremities.

On July 30, 1791, decorations and orders of knighthood were suppressed; and to consummate the whole, the titles of Sire and Your Majesty were taken from the king. The Duke of Orleans assumed the name of Egalite, in English, Equality. Thus, all were reduced to an undistinguished multitude, having no pre-eminence to title one above another. Citizen and citizeness, was the designation common to all the French.

“The clergy,” says Thiers, “stripped of the immense possessions which had formerly been given to it, on condition of relieving the poor, whom it did not relieve, and of performing that worship which it left to be performed by poor curates, was no longer a political order. But its ecclesiastical dignities were preserved, its dogmas respected, its scandalous wealth changed into a sufficient, nay, we may say, an abundant revenue, for it still possessed considerable episcopal luxury.”

But the time had arrived in Nov. 1793, to substitute for the clerical system of blasphemy, another equally profane. The National Assembly had made the dioceses and the departments the same, and caused the bishops to be elective like all other functionaries. This was the civil constitution of the clergy to which they were obliged to bind themselves by oath. From that day a schism had taken place. Those who took the oath, were called constitutional priests; and those who refused so to do, refractory priests. These were condemned by the Convention to exile.

At length people began to ask, why, when all the old monarchical superstitions were abolished, there should yet remain this clerical phantom, in which scarcely any one continued to believe? With the exception of reducing the pay of the bishops to the maximum of six thousand francs, the Convention kept silence upon the subject, leaving France to take the initiative in the abolition of this GREAT NAME OF SUPERSTITION by which it had been cursed for so many centuries. What the Convention feared to do, the Commune of Paris, less reserved, zealously undertook, and set the first example for the abjuration of the catholic worship of dæmonials and idols.

The dogma of the Commune was, that a nation ought to be governed by reason alone, and to allow no other worship, but that of reason. If they had gone a little further, and had said by reason enlightened by scripture truth, there could be no objection to the proposition, except from those who knew that the scriptures of truth and their systems are at variance. In the name of reason, then, the leaders of the municipality, Hebert and Chaumette, launched out against the publicity of the Romish mummary. A resolution was therefore obtained that the ministers of no religion should be allowed to exercise their worship out of the temples appropriated to it. Chaumette caused to be instituted new funeral ceremonies. The friends and relations alone were to accompany the coffin. All the religious emblems were to be suppressed in the cemeteries, and to be replaced by a statue of Sleep. Instead of cypress and doleful shrubs, the burial-grounds were to be planted with such as were more cheerful and more fragrant. All the outward signs of the superstition were entirely abolished. It was also decided that there should not be sold in the streets “any kind of jugglery, such as holy napkins, St. Veronica’s handkerchiefs, Ecce Homos, crosses, Agnus Deis, virgins, bodies and rings of St. Hubert, or any powders, medicinal waters, or other adulterated drugs.” The image of the Virgin was everywhere suppressed, and all the Madonnas in niches at the corners of streets were removed to make room for busts of Marat and Lepelletier.

Anacharsis Clootz, a Prussian baron, and deputy to the National Convention, and who announced himself as the Orator of the Human Race, co-operated with Chaumette in incessantly preaching upon the worship of reason. To him deism appeared as culpable as catholicism itself. He never ceased to propose the destruction of tyrants, and of all sorts of gods, declaring that there is no other God but Nature, no other sovereign but the human race, the people-god; and that it was now high time to destroy religion, the only obstacle to the happiness of mankind.

The hopes of Clootz were all revived by the requisitions of Chaumette. He called upon Gobel, the constitutional Bishop of Paris. He persuaded him that the moment had arrived for abjuring, in the face of France, the Catholic Name, of which he was the Chief Pontiff. Gobel consented to go and abdicate the episcopacy, and prevailed upon the majority of his vicars to follow his example.

Accordingly, on November 7, 1793, all the constituted authorities of Paris accompanied Gobel and all his vicars to the Convention. Chaumette informed it that the Clergy of Paris had come to pay a signal and sincere homage to reason. Gobel was then introduced, with a red cap on his head, and holding in his hand his mitre, his crosier, his cross, and his ring. Addressing the Assembly, he said: "Born a plebian curate of Porentruy, sent by my clergy to the first assembly, then raised to the archbishopric of Paris, I have never ceased to obey the people. I accepted the functions which that people formerly bestowed on me, and now, in obedience to it, I am come to resign them. I suffered myself to be made a bishop when the people wanted bishops. I cease to be so now when the people no longer desire to have any." He spoke for himself and all his clergy, who ratified his declaration. Having laid down his insignia of office, the president replied that the Convention had decreed freedom of religion; that it had left it unshackled to each sect; that it had never interfered in their creeds, but it applauded those who, enlightened by reason, came to renounce their superstitions and their errors.

Several bishops and curates, members of the Convention, abjured catholicism. These abdications were nailed with tumultuous applause by the Assembly and the tribunes. The deputation then retired, and, attended by an immense concourse, proceeded to the Hotel de Ville to receive the congratulations of the Commune.

The example once given, it was not difficult to excite all the sections of Paris, and all the communes of the Republic to follow it. The sections all declared that they renounced the errors of superstition, and acknowledged no other worship than that of reason. The section of L'Homme-Arme declared that it acknowledged no other worship than that of truth and reason; no other fanaticism than that of liberty and equality; no other doctrine than that of fraternity and of the republican laws decreed since May 31, 1793. The section of La Reunion intimated that it would make a bonfire of all the confessionals and of all the books used by the catholics; and that it would shut up the church of St. Mary. The section William Tell renounced forever the worship of error and imposture. That of Mutius Scævola abjured the catholic superstition. That of Les Piques that it would adore no other god than the God of liberty and equality. And that of the Arsenal also renounced the catholic religion.

"In the earthquake seven thousand names of men were put to death" (Rev. 11:13). These "names of men" related to the titles assumed by the aristocracy and clergy, but which were abandoned during the French Revolution. In 1792 the king was obliged to condone the burning of the Tree of Feudalism bedecked with symbols of royalty, aristocracy and the papacy. It was then set alight as a bonfire.—Publishers.

"Thus the sections taking the initiation, abjured the Catholic Name as the established superstition, and seized its edifices and treasures, as pertaining to the communal domains. A great number of the departmental communes seized the movable property of the churches, which they said was not necessary for religion. All the churches were stripped, and deputations were sent to the Convention with the gold and silver accumulated in the shrines of saints, or places appropriated to devotion. They went in procession, and the rabble, indulging in their fondness for burlesque, caricatured in the most ludicrous manner the ceremonies of catholicism, which they took as much delight in profaning as they had formerly done in celebrating them. Men wearing surplices and copes, came singing hallelujahs, and dancing the Carmagnole, to the bar of the Convention. There they deposited the host or Wafer-god, the boxes in which it was kept, and the idols of gold and silver. They made burlesque speeches, and sometimes addressed the most singular apostrophes to the saint-daemonials themselves. 'O you,' exclaimed a deputation from St. Denis, 'O, you instruments of fanaticism; blessed saints of all kinds; be at length patriots. Rise in mass. Serve the country by going to the mint to be melted, and give us in this world that felicity which you wanted to obtain for us in the other.' Having thus trampled on the saints of Romanism, they unveiled the busts of Marat and Lepelletier, and pointing to them, said: 'These are not gods made by men, but the images of worthy citizens assassinated by the slaves of kings.' They then filed off before the Convention, again singing hallelujahs and dancing the Carmagnole, carried the rich spoils of the altars to the mint, and placed the busts of the revered Marat and Lepelletier in the churches, which thenceforth became the temples of a new worship."

Such was the putting to death among the "seven thousand Names of men," of the beast's "Name of Blasphemy," in all the territory of the Tenth of the Great City (Apoc. 13:1). It was a conflict between reason based upon the "vain philosophy" of Voltaire, and idolatry sustained by the power of the State. The power had first to be destroyed, and then the idolatry fall. Unenlightened reason and vain philosophy were too strong for catholic ghost and relic worship, and therefore it was destroyed. Thus one abomination was played off against another, and the most guilty before God was treated by a base rabble even as contemptible and vile. How admirably the Deity avenges his own. He cast down the bloody throne of the Bourbons; caused the royal representatives of the murderers of his saints and witnesses first to be humbled in the dust and impoverished, then tried for their crimes by "vile plebeians," and insultingly condemned, and finally ignominiously guillotined before the mob; and as the crowning expression of his indignation, exhibited the symbols, superstition and imposture of his enemies to the contempt of an awakened world. These were wonderful events, all consequent upon the ascent of the political witnesses of Jesus "in the cloud;" and an earnest of that grander and universal judgment of the Great City, when the Lord God, YAHWEH ELOHIM, shall arise to exterminate its temporal and spiritual power, and to bless all nations in their deliverance.

As I have said, the spiritual bazaars, dedicated to the guardian ghosts of fictitious saints, called "churches," were turned into temples for the worship of Deified Reason! The bazaar, where the archbishops of Paris used to exhibit their spiritual wares, and dedicated to the ghost the Laodiceans style "Our Lady," was converted into a republican edifice called The Temple of Reason. A festival was instituted to be celebrated there every tenth day as a substitute for the catholic mummerly of Sundays. To this Temple of Reason the mayor, municipal officers and public functionaries repaired. Here they read the declaration of the rights of man and the constitutional act, analyzed the news from the army, and related the brilliant actions which had been performed during the Decade or past ten days. A mouth of truth was placed in this temple to receive opinions, censures, advice, that might be useful to the public. These letters were examined and read every Decade or tenth day; a discourse on morals was delivered, after which pieces of music were performed, and the ceremonies concluded with the singing of republican hymns.

"The first festival of Reason was held with pomp, on Nov. 10, 1793. It was attended by all the sections and constituted authorities. A young woman, the wife of a printer, personated the Goddess of Reason. She was draped in white, and a mantle of azure blue hung from her shoulders, and her flowing hair was covered with the cap of liberty. She sat upon an antique seat, entwined with ivy, and borne by four citizens. Young girls, robed in white and crowned with roses, preceded and followed the deified rival of the catholic Queen of Heaven. Then came the busts of the sanguinary Marat and the regicide Lepelletier (assassinated by a soldier because he had voted the death of Louis XVI.), with musicians, troops, and all the armed sections. Speeches were delivered, and hymns sung, upon which they left the Temple of Reason and presented themselves before the Convention.

"Legislators!" said Chaumette. "Fanaticism has given way to reason. Its bleared eyes could not endure the brilliancy of the light. This day an immense concourse has assembled beneath the Gothic vaults, which, for the first time, re-echoed the truth. There the French have celebrated the only true worship—that of liberty, that of reason. There we have formed wishes for the prosperity of the arms of the republic. There we have abandoned inanimate idols (the images of saints) for reason, for that animated image, the masterpiece of nature,”—pointing to the printer’s wife, the new-made goddess of reason. This young and brazen beauty then descended from her seat, and went up to the presiding Jupiter of the Convention, who gave her the fraternal kiss amidst universal bravos and shouts of the Republic forever! Reason forever! Down with fanaticism! This farce being over, the procession, accompanied by the reluctant Convention, returned to the Temple of Reason, sang a patriotic song, and dismissed.

15. “THE REST WERE TERRIFIED”

The rest, styled in the text hoi loipoi, the others not of the titled and privileged orders, became terrified. These terrified people composed that inert and patient part of the population of France, on which political experiments were being made. They were the swinish multitude of catholicism, which still clung to the worship of demonials and the works of men’s hands. The refractory priests were the living deities of these terrified heirs of capture and destruction. In this great judgment the Deity of Heaven first smote “the world rulers of the darkness, and their spirituals of the wickedness in the heavenlies;” He was now about to descend in terrorism upon the guilty devotees of blasphemy, who in a past generation had lent a willing hand in slaying His witnesses, and suppressing their enlightening testimony.

The wicked are Deity’s sword for vengeance upon blasphemers of His word and Name, until the time come to give the execution of judgment into the hands of the saints. We need not, therefore, be surprised at finding among his political witnesses and avengers such men as Marat, Danton, Robespierre, St. Juste, surnamed “the Apocalyptic,” and such like. If He did not employ “the basest of men” to execute terrifying vengeance upon guilty nations, how would such have been punished during the past eighteen centuries? If nations will “blaspheme His name, and His tabernacle, and them that dwell in the heaven;” if they will persist in upholding spiritual impostures, and in making His word of none effect by their absurd and impious traditions, they must be punished as nations; and, as real, scriptural, saints are so scarce, the vengeance of Samuel upon Agag must be in the meantime executed by wicked men as the blind instruments of His will.

A terrified people implies the existence of terrifiers; and that these terrorists were stronger than the terrified. The history of the period is in rigid harmony with this implication. The retributive and righteous providence of Deity, by successive shocks of the great earthquake, had brought the besotted worshippers of the demonials and idols under what has been styled by eminence “THE REIGN OF TERROR.” This power was more terrific than any that has oppressed society since the flood. The twenty-five millions of affrighted catholic French “dared no longer express any opinion. They were afraid to visit their friends lest they might be compromised with them, and lose liberty and even life. A hundred thousand arrests, and hundreds of condemnations, rendered imprisonment and the scaffold ever present to their minds. They had to bear heavy taxes. Sometimes they had to give up their crops, or their most valuable effects in gold and silver. They durst no longer display any luxury, or indulge in noisy pleasures. They were no longer permitted to use metallic money, but obliged to take and give a depreciated paper, with which it was difficult to procure such things as they needed. They were forced, if storekeepers, to sell at a fictitious price; if buyers, to put up with the worst commodities. They had but one sort of black bread, common to the rich as to the poor, for which they were obliged to contend at the doors of the bakers, after waiting for several hours. Never had power overthrown with greater violence the habits of a people. It threatened all lives, decimated all fortunes, fixed compulsorily the standard of the exchanges, gave new names to all things, and abolished with insult the superstition of the ‘terrified’.”

This terrible power that blindly avenged the saints, found vent through the Jacobins of the Mountain.

Of these, the most terrible was Marat. He was born of Calvinist parents, with a hideous face, and head monstrously disproportioned to his size. He had a daring mind, an ungovernable imagination, a vindictive temper, and the heart of a tiger. In the period of the earthquake, his natural enthusiasm rose to delirium, in which he preached upon revolt, murder, and pillage. In one of his speeches he said, "Massacre 270,000 partisans of the former order of things." "His political exhortations," says Sir Walter Scott, "began and ended like the howl of a blood-hound for murder. It was blood which was Marat's constant demand; not in drops from the breast of an individual, not in puny streams from the slaughter of families; but blood in the profusion of an ocean." "None exercised a more fatal influence upon the period in which he lived. To him was owing the idea realized at a later period—the extermination of multitudes. He regarded the French as paltry revolutionists. 'Give me,' said he, 'two hundred Neapolitans, the knife in their right hand, in their left a muff, to serve for a shield, and with these I will traverse France, and complete the Revolution.' It was necessary, he asserted, to strike off several thousand heads, and to destroy all the aristocrats, who rendered liberty impossible. Under this name he included royalists, constitutionalists, and Girondins; and that none might escape, it was only necessary to fall upon those who had carriages, servants, silk clothes, and who were coming out of the theatres. All such were assuredly aristocrats. This pitiless avenger was supported by Danton, Robespierre, and others like them; sat in the National Convention as a member of the Mountain, presided over the Society of Jacobins, and was ultimately deified in this carnival of blood.

"Marat was abhorred by his colleagues; but they did not abhor making use of him. They placed him in their midst, they put him in their van, they bore him as it were upon their breasts, like a head of Medusa. As the horror of such a man was everywhere, you fancied that you perceived him everywhere; you almost imagined," said Garat, "that he was the whole Mountain, or that the whole Mountain was, as it were, he. Among the leaders, in fact, there were several who found no other fault of the misdeeds of Marat, but that they were too undisguised."

From this class of agents issued the sanguinary terror by which "the rest were affrighted." After it had prostrated the Tenth Throne of the Great City, it filled the prisons with crowds of suspected sympathizers with royalty and the recent order of things. These arrests were made by the police under the direction of Marat, "whose name alone," says Petion, "strikes terror into the souls of all peaceable citizens." A rumor was started that there was a plot to liberate all the prisoners, who were then to spread themselves through Paris, to commit all sorts of excesses, and to carry off the king. Apprehensive of this, the secret directory caused the alarm gun to be fired, and the tocsin to be sounded. The mob collected, broke into the prisons, and, on September 2, 1792, began a work of carnage which continued for several days. Twenty-four priests were sent to the Abbaye for refusing to take the oath to the constitution. On descending from the coaches to enter the prison, they were immediately pierced by a thousand weapons, amidst the howls of an infuriated populace. Led by Maillard, they rushed to the church of the Carmelites, where they butchered two hundred priests of the Catholic Baal who had been confined there.

Being refreshed with wine, they returned to the Abbaye. There they organized a criminal tribunal, of which Maillard was the terrible president. A list of the prisoners was placed before him. They were brought out in order and questioned. When he pronounced the words, "Sir, to La Force!" he was passed out at the gate, supposing that he was being transferred to that prison. But, when the door closed upon him, he was suddenly hewn to pieces by the swords of the party posted there.

"Terror," was proclaimed to be "the order of the day," and a secret authority overawed that which was public. The massacre continued through the night. Amidst this carnage, however, they spared some victims, and manifested inconceivable joy in giving them their lives. A young man, declared pure from aristocracy, was acquitted with shouts of "Vive la nation!" and borne in triumph in the bloody arms of the executioners. The Governor of the Invalides was sentenced to La Force. Perceiving him from the prison, his daughter rushed out amongst pikes and swords, and, with piteous supplications, besought them to spare him. Handing her a pot of human blood, "Drink, then," said they, "the blood of the aristocrats!" She drank—and her father was saved.

"After thirty hours of carnage," says Peltier, "sentence was passed on Cazotte. The instrument of death was already uplifted; and bloody hands were stretched out to pierce his aged breast. His daughter, seizing him round the neck, exclaimed, 'You shall not get at my father till you have forced your way through my heart.' The pikes were instantly checked, and a shout of pardon was raised by a thousand voices. Elizabeth embraced the murderers; and, covered with human blood, but triumphant, proceeded to lodge her father safe in the midst of his family." Another of the few capriciously saved was escorted home with great attention by these Avengers. Dripping with blood, they begged leave to witness the joy of his family, and immediately after returned to the carnage. "In this convulsive state," says M. Thiers, "all the emotions succeeded each other in the heart of man. By turns, a mild and ferocious animal, he weeps and then slaughters. Steeped in blood, he is all at once touched by an instance of ardent affection or of noble firmness. He is sensible to the honor of appearing just, to the vanity of appearing upright or disinterested."

During this terrific night, the avengers had divided and carried destruction into the other prisons of Paris. Like massacres were perpetrated, and blood flowed in streams. Consternation pervaded all Paris. The slaughter of the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal by the command of Elijah was nothing in comparison. The members of the Commune declared that the people had been just; that they had punished criminals only; and that, in their vengeance, if they had done wrong, it was merely by anticipating the sword of the law. The only place preserved from attack was the Temple, against the royal inmates of which the popular fury was particularly excited; so that, for six hours, it was very doubtful whether they would be massacred or not.

The climax of the Reign of Terror was the execution of the King, and later the Queen, by beheading. The Guillotine was invented by Dr. Guillotin, a deputy of the States General, who claimed that it swiftly and comparatively painlessly executed criminals. It could not work quick enough during the Reign of Terror, when over one million people were put to death within a short time.—Publishers.

During the Reign of Terror the guillotine became almost a diabolical machine of perpetual motion, to the point where a contemporary print (left) represented Robespierre—the main instigator of the Terror—having executed all others, guillotining the executioner! Actually, Robespierre himself was guillotined on July 28, 1794, in one of the culminating acts of the Terror.—Publishers.

The Bicetre Hospital was the scene of the longest and bloodiest carnage. This prison was the receptacle of every vice; it was an hospital, also, for the foulest and most afflicting diseases. It was the sink of Paris. The avengers of crime put every creature there to death. Not less than 6000 were slain during the eight days and nights of the slaughter. Pikes, swords, and muskets not being expeditious enough, recourse was had to cannon. A long and deadly resistance was made by the victims, but they were all eventually slain. During the three days of slaughter, about eight thousand prisoners were mercilessly put to death.

The prisons having been thus cleared by fire and sword, the terrorists began to fill them again by new arrests founded upon suspicions of incivism. While operating in Paris, terrorist commissioners were despatched to the departments to exhort them to imitate the sanguinary example of the Capital. Collot d'Herbois, surnamed the Tiger, was almost equal to Marat. When he departed for Lyons, he protested that the South should be soon purified. He employed a column of the revolutionary army, with cannon, to make up for the slowness of the guillotine. Freron displayed extreme activity and zeal in the work of death. He proclaimed the purpose of rasing Toulon to the ground. Writing to Bayle, he says: "Things go on well here; every day since our arrival we have caused two hundred heads to fall, and already eight hundred Toulonese have been shot". Eight thousand Toulonese assembled in the Champs de Mars. The commissioners were shocked at the sight of this multitude of victims. Freron himself was terrified. A great number of the most guilty were instantly shot. The musketry shooting being insufficient, they afterwards had recourse to cannon. In another execution of this nature, in order to despatch the victims who had not perished by the first discharge, Freron cried out, "Let those who are still living rise; the republic pardons them." Some arose, when he caused them to be immediately fired upon. On quitting Toulon, he went to finish the depopulation of Marseilles. Here they destroyed more than four hundred persons by a criminal tribunal; and caused some of its finest buildings to be demolished.

"Wearied with the slow operation of the guillotine," says Alison, "they destroyed their prisoners in masses by firing at them with grapeshot." In La Vendee, the noyades became celebrated: men and women, in vessels full or in couples, being there drowned by the victorious avengers, and the noyades called Republican Baptism and Republican Marriage. At Pillau, they roasted women and children in a heated oven. In these horrors, one regiment assumed to itself the title of Infernal. Altogether, the massacres during the Reign of Terror are reckoned at 1,022,351. Thus were avenged the 75,000 slain in France, A.D. 1572; the unnumbered thousands slain in the anti-witness war; the 100,000 destroyed at their political death; and the 800,000, or 1,000,000 ruined exiles of 1685. The kings of France are computed to have put to death in torments a million of the witnesses for Jesus under the Satanic inspiration of the Romish priests. Can we, then, in reading the horrors perpetrated in the Reign of Terror, and which principally fell upon the clergy and their adherents, forbear to exclaim, "Righteous art thou, O Lord, who art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast judged thus: for they have shed the blood of saints and prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink; for they are worthy. True and righteous are thy judgments!" (Apoc. 16:5).

The Terrorists were the sword and scourge of Deity upon the guilty. They were raised up by Him to retaliate upon the king, court, nobility, priests, and people, the murders and crimes of every sort, which had accumulated upon their heads until his longsuffering was exhausted. The nation was paralyzed, as well as astounded and affrighted. It was the Terrorists that condemned the king and queen to lose their heads, by which they broke definitively with royalty and all thrones; and afterwards destroyed the Girondins for their want of zeal in the regeneration of France by the guillotine. This was the overthrow of all legality, and the establishment of the Terrible Dictatorship, developed in the Committee of Public Welfare.

From May 31, 1793, commence scenes a hundred times more awful and more terrible than the massacres of the prisons of Paris. La Vendee, the stronghold of the priests, was all fire and blood. Their forces were styled, "the royal and catholic armies." The partisans of absolute power were simultaneously lifting up their heads for a grand rally against the Revolution. The conflict that ensued resulted in the establishment of the Committee of Public Welfare, which was absolute master of the situation, being empowered to send the people either to the field of battle, to the scaffold, or to prison; and, for the defence of the Revolution, was possessed of a sovereign and terrible dictatorship. The judgment-seat of this fearful committee was the Revolutionary Tribunal, whose institution was caused by Danton. Its familiars pervaded the land, and all the great cities of France experienced its vengeance. "THE MOUNTAINS" was now in the ascendant—it ruled with terror in the heaven into which it had ascended when called up thither by the "great voice," or edict of the king. The ruling power in the Mountain was Robespierre and the Jacobins. The Committee and Tribunal were directed by them; and however great their vengeance upon nobles, priests, the rich, and their adherents, greater vengeance was soon to be displayed in Paris. It is a remarkable fact, that the cities and districts where the blood of the saints and witnessing prophets of Jesus had been poured out most abundantly and with the greatest barbarity, suffered the most horribly in the Reign of Terror. After the decapitation of Marie Antoinette and the Girondins, the sword of execution had no rest. All that was considered most noble and most generous was perishing either by suicide or by the blade of the executioner. "The whole country seemed one vast conflagration of revolt and vengeance. The shrieks of death were blended with the yell of the assassin and the laughter of buffoons."

In conclusion, under this head, I remark, in the words of Alison, that, after April, 1794, "one only power now remained—alone, terrible, irresistible. This was the power of Death, wielded by a faction (of which Robespierre was chief), steeled against every feeling of humanity, dead to every principle of justice. In their iron hands order resumed its sway from the influence of terror; obedience became universal from the extinction of hope. Silent and unresisted, they led their victims to the scaffold, dreaded alike by the soldiers who crouched, the people who trembled, and the victims who suffered. The history of the world has no parallel to the horrors of that long night of suffering!"

16. "AND THEY GAVE GLORY TO THE DEITY OF THE HEAVEN"

This was the last demonstration of "the Earth" in its extraordinary agitations. In the prophecy four things are particularly noted as characteristic of the Great Earthquake which consummated the Sixth Trumpet, or Second Woe, namely:

1. The Fall of the Tenth of the City;
2. The putting to death of Seven Thousand Names of Men;
3. The affrighting of the Rest; and
4. The Ascription of Glory to the Deity of the Heaven.

These four characteristics have met in no other revolution of past ages than in that of the French Epoch from A.D. 1789 to A.D. 1794. It was the earnest of what is yet to come on a grander scale when the whole of the spiritual Sodom and Egypt, that is of the Great Papal City with all its kingdoms, or Tenth, and all its clerical and aristocratic orders, Romish, Protestant, and Greek, shall be destroyed; not by "the Earth," however, but by the Cloud-Invested Angel of the Bow. There will be this difference in the executing of the judgment by the saints. Their judgment will be more sanguinary and terrific; but in executing it, they will be guiltless of personal crimes. They will execute judgment in righteousness. This was not the judgment executed by Marat, Fouquier, Tinville, Collot d'Herbois, Robespierre, and the like. These were bloodthirsty villains, who, in blindly punishing the blasphemous worshippers of saint-ghosts, relics, and images, aristocratic, clerical, and plebeian, accumulated upon their own heads heaps of trespasses, that could only be cancelled by the blood of the transgressors. They were thieves, adulterers, whoremongers, murderers, hypocrites, and atheists. These were the characters that flourished in the work of French regeneration as they styled it and were always babbling about virtue, integrity, fraternity, justice, and so forth; to all of which, in a scriptural sense, they were utter strangers. Nevertheless, they were not worse than the creatures they put to death. They were the mire and dirt of society which is itself infected and foul; and when stirred up from its lowest depths, throws upon its surface its putrefactions. In the reign of death, these were swept into the common sewer of headless humanity. The guillotine, which they termed "holy," was just and impartial in its vengeance; so that those who worked at it with revolutionary fury, were themselves at length compelled to pay justice with their lives.

As we have seen, in the total abolition of the names of men, the CATHOLIC NAME was abolished also. The destruction of this name in France was, in effect, to the glory of God; although its ruin was by the agency of a set of dissolute, fanatical, atheists. But these creatures marred the good work by decreeing likewise, that there was no Supreme Being, who was before all things, who made all things, and by whose power all things are sustained. "The fool has said in his heart, There is no God." The denial of Deity, and the deification of Reason, was, therefore, the work of fools. The prime movers of this blasphemy, however, were soon afterwards sent to the guillotine, which silenced their folly for ever.

The proclamation of the Parisian authorities denying the existence of Deity was exceedingly offensive to the deists of the Committee of Public Welfare and the Convention. The former had paid homage to moral ideas by making "integrity, justice, and all the virtues, the order of the day;" it could not, therefore, tolerate the atheistic deification of reason, which made such order impossible. "They beheld anarchy," says M. Thiers, "rejecting all belief in God, effeminacy and corruption rejecting all idea of order, mental delirium rejecting all idea of morals. They then conceived the republic as virtue assailed by all the bad passions at once. The word virtue was everywhere: they placed justice and integrity upon the order of the day. It yet remained for them to proclaim the belief in God, the Immortality of the Soul, all the moral creeds; it yet remained for them to make a solemn declaration, to declare, in short, the Religion of the State. They resolved, therefore, to pass a decree upon the subject. In this manner they should oppose order to the anarchists, faith in God to the Atheists, and morals to the dissolute. Their system of virtue would be complete. The deistical committee made it above all a particular point to remove from the republic the stigma of impiety with which it was branded throughout all Europe. They resolved to say what is always said to priests who accuse you of impiety because you do not believe in their dogmas—WE BELIEVE IN GOD."

The deistical dictators "had other motives for adopting a grand measure in regard to religion. The ceremonies of the new worship of reason had been abolished; festivals were required for the Decades or Tenth Days; and it was deemed of importance, when attending to the moral and religious wants of the people, to think of their wants of the imagination, and to furnish them with subjects of public meetings. Besides, the favorable condition of public affairs caused them to deem the moment most favorable for prostrating the republic at the feet of the Almighty. The occasion was grand and touching for those who believed. It was seasonable for those who merely complied with political ideas."

"Let us remark," continues M. Thiers, "one singular circumstance. Sectaries, for whom there existed no human convention that was respectable (so he designates the political witnesses of Jesus; and truly affirms, that for the witnesses of both classes, there doth exist no human convention that is respectable) who, from the extraordinary contempt in which they held all other nations and the esteem with which they were filled for themselves, dreaded no opinion, and were not afraid of wounding that of all the world; who, in matters of government had reduced everything to just what was absolutely necessary; who had admitted no other authority but that of a few citizens temporarily elected; who had not hesitated to abolish the most ancient and most stubborn of all religions—the Romish; such sectaries paused before two ideas, morality and faith in God. After rejecting all those ideas from which they deemed it possible to release man, they remained under the sway of the two last, and sacrificed a party to each idea. If some of them did not believe, they nevertheless all felt a want of order among men, and for the support of this human order, the necessity of acknowledging in the universe a general and intelligent order. This is the first time in the history of the world that the dissolution of all the authorities left society a prey to the government of purely systematic minds, and those minds which had outstripped all the received ideas adopted, retained the ideas of morality and faith in God. This example is unparalleled in the history of the world: it is singular, it is grand, it is beautiful: history cannot help pausing to remark it."

M. Thiers did not know that he was pausing to remark upon an event that had been predicted eighteen centuries before by the Exile of Patmos—by that beloved companion of Jesus, who had distinctly spoken of these so-called "sectaries;" and expressly declared that they should do that "singular, grand, and beautiful" thing, of pausing before the idea of faith in God, in "giving glory to the God of the heaven" in the throes of a grand convulsion, that should abolish monarchy, the names of men, and "the most stubborn of all religions." It was an event which no historian of repute could venture to ignore.

Robespierre was reporter on this interesting occasion. He was the head of the Committee of Public Welfare, was consulted on all matters, and spoke only on important occasions. "For him," says M. Thiers, "were reserved the high moral and political questions, as more worthy of his talents and his virtue. The duty of reporter on the question belonged to him of right. None had spoken out more decidedly against atheism, none was so venerated, none had so high a reputation for purity and virtue, none, in short, was so well qualified by his ascendancy and his dogmatism for this sort of pontificate.

ROBESPIERRE (1758–94). The famous revolutionary leader known as "The Incorruptible" is identified with "The Reign of Terror". He was an extreme fanatic, and mainly responsible for the execution of the King. After Mirabeau's death his power and influence increased, and he was elected a member of the Committee of Public Safety in 1793. As a leader of the extreme Jacobin party, he bitterly opposed the Girondists (the more moderate group), and was responsible for the execution of its leaders after a mere mockery of a trial. Robespierre aimed at a dictatorship of Republican France, but in spite of his status, was unable to control the terror he had unleashed. His tyrannical attitude antagonised members of his own party who rose against him. He was arrested, and after a brief trial, was condemned to death. He was guillotined with others on July 28, 1794.

"On May 7, 1794, about ten weeks before he lost his head, he addressed the National Convention upon the subject of 'giving glory to the God of the heaven.' He was listened to with profound attention. He justly observed, that it was not as the authors of systems that the representatives of the nation ought to discourage atheism and to proclaim DEISM, but as legislators seeking what principles are most suitable to man in a state of society. In the eyes of the legislator, all that is beneficial to the world and good in practice, is truth. The idea of the Supreme Being and of the immortality of the soul is a continual recall of justice; it is therefore social and republican."

In his address he strove to counteract the idea that, in proclaiming the worship of the Supreme Being, the government was laboring for the benefit of the priests. "What is there in common," said he, "between the priests and God? The priests are to morality what quacks are to medicine. How different is the God of Nature from the God of the priests! I know nothing that so nearly resembles atheism as the religions which they have framed. By grossly misrepresenting the Supreme Being, they have annihilated belief in him as far as lay in their power. The priests have created a God after their own image: they have made him jealous, capricious, greedy, cruel, and implacable: they have confined him in heaven as in a palace, and have called him to earth only to demand of him, for their own interest, tithes, wealth, honors, pleasures, and power. The real temple of the Supreme Being is the universe; his worship, virtue; his festivals, the joy of a great nation, assembled in his presence to knit closer the bonds of universal fraternity, and to pay him the homage of intelligent and pure hearts."

He finished his report amidst the warmest applause, and proposed the following decree, which was adopted by acclamation:

"Art. 1. The French people acknowledges the existence of the Supreme Being and the Immortality of the Soul.

"Art. 2. It acknowledges that the worship most worthy of the Supreme Being is the practice of the duties of man.”

A solemn festival was ordered for June 8. The decree was read at a meeting of the Jacobins, who caused an address to be drawn up, and presented to the Convention by a deputation of their body. Their address concluded thus: “The Jacobins come this day to thank you for the solemn decree that you have just issued; they will come and join you in the celebration of that great day on which the festival of the Supreme Being shall assemble the virtuous citizens throughout all France to sing the hymn of virtue.” To this the president replied: “It is worthy of a society which fills the world with its renown, which enjoys so great an influence upon public opinion, which has associated at all times with all the most courageous of the defenders of the rights of man, to come to the temple of the laws to pay homage to the Supreme Being.”

A member of the Committee, named Couthon, then made a violent speech against atheists and corrupt men; and concluded by proposing on that solemn day of joy and gratitude to declare that ever since the commencement of the Revolution, the Jacobins had not ceased to deserve well of the country. This suggestion was adopted amidst thunders of applause. The Convention broke up in transports of joy, nay, indeed, in a sort of intoxication.

Congratulatory addresses to the Convention for proclaiming belief in the Supreme Being were very numerous. “The contagion of ideas and words,” says M. Thiers, “spread with extraordinary rapidity among the French. Among a prompt and communicative people the idea that engages some few minds soon engages the attention of the public generally; the word that is in some mouths is soon in all. Addresses poured in from all parts, congratulating the Convention on its sublime decree, thanking it for having established virtue, proclaiming the worship of the Supreme Being, and restored hope to man. The section of Marat of Paris, appearing at the bar, addressed the assembly, saying: ‘O beneficent Mountain! protecting Science! accept also our expressions of gratitude and congratulation for all the sublime decrees which thou art daily issuing for the happiness of mankind. From thy boiling bosom darted the salutary thunderbolt, which, in crushing atheism, gives us genuine republicans the consolatory idea of living free, in the sight of the Supreme Being, and in expectation of the immortality of the soul.’ “From that day, the words virtue and Supreme Being were in every mouth. Instead of the inscription, TO REASON, placed on the fronts of the temples, there was now inscribed, TO THE SUPREME BEING.”

The day fixed for the festival in honor of the Supreme Being at length arrived. The principal part in the performance was unanimously assigned to Robespierre, whom his colleagues strove to flatter and to soothe by dint of honors. Vast preparations had been made, and the festival was to be magnificent. The multitude had collected, and after a considerable time, Robespierre appeared in the midst of the Convention. He was dressed with extraordinary care. His head was covered with feathers, and in his hand he held, like all the representatives, a bunch of flowers, fruit, and ears of corn. In his countenance, usually so gloomy, beamed a cheerfulness that was uncommon to him. An amphitheatre was erected in the centre of the garden of the Tuileries. This was occupied by the Convention; and on either side were several groups of boys, men, aged persons, and females. The boys wore wreaths of violets, the youths of myrtle, the men of oak, the aged people of ivy and olive. The men held their daughters by the hand, and carried baskets of flowers. Opposite to the amphitheatre were figures representing Atheism, Discord, Selfishness. These were destined to be burned. As soon as the Convention had taken its place, the ceremony was opened with music. The president then delivered a first discourse on the object of the Festival. “Republican Frenchmen!” said he, “the ever fortunate day which the French people dedicated to the Supreme Being is at length arrived. Never did the world which He created, exhibit a spectacle so worthy of His attention. He has beheld tyranny, crime, and imposture reigning on earth. He beholds at this moment a whole nation assailed by all the oppressors of mankind, suspending the course of its heroic labors, to lift its thoughts and its prayers towards the Supreme Being, who gave it the mission to undertake and the courage to execute them.”

After proceeding in this manner for a few minutes, he descended from the amphitheatre, and seizing a torch, set fire to the figures of Atheism, Discord and Selfishness. From amidst their ashes rose the statue of Wisdom, blackened by the flames from which it issued. Robespierre returned to his place, and delivered a second speech on the extirpation of the vices leagued against the Republic. After this first ceremony, the Assembly set out in procession for the Field of Mars. The pride of Robespierre seemed redoubled, and he affected to walk very far before his colleagues. But some indignantly approached, and lavished upon him the keenest sarcasms. Some laughed at the new pontiff, and said, in relation to his smoky statue of Wisdom, that his wisdom was darkened. Others uttered the word “tyrant,” and exclaimed that there were still Brutuses. A deputy addressed to him the prophetic words: “The Tarpeian rock is close to the Capitol.”

The procession at length reached the Champs de Mars. There arose a lofty mount, on the summit of which was a tree, beneath whose boughs the Convention seated itself. On each side of the mount the different groups of boys, old men, and women, took their places. A symphony commenced; the groups then sang stanzas, alternately answering one another; at length, on a given signal, the youths drew their swords, and swore to the elders to defend their country; the mothers lifted their infants in their arms; all present raised their hands towards heaven, and the oath to conquer was mingled with the homage paid to the Supreme Being. They then returned to the garden of the Tuileries, and the Festival concluded with public diversions.

Such was the famous festival in which “they gave glory to the Deity of the Heaven”—a glory or homage based on the abolition of the Catholic worship of the Roman God, “the deity of the earth,” before whom they had stood witnessing in sackcloth over twelve centuries. The “they” who gave the glory were the constituted authorities in the republican heaven, and who had been unwittingly invited up thither by the royal edict, and had ascended to their sovereign position “in the cloud.” They were as impious, sanguinary and cruel as “Yahweh’s Anointed Shepherd,” Cyrus, and “his sanctified ones,” the Medes and Persians, who ravished wives, spoiled houses, had no pity on the fruit of the womb, dashed children to pieces, and destroyed adults without mercy. This was the spirit that inspired Robespierre and his colleagues of the Convention and its committees, who all figured in this festival. On the days preceding and following that on which they were giving glory to the Supreme power of the heaven, they sent forty-three victims to the guillotine. Some of his colleagues did not like the festival. They said it had alienated many minds, and that those ideas of the Supreme Being, of the Immortality of the Soul, and those pompous ceremonies, looked like a return to the superstition of former times, and were likely to give a retrograde impulse to the Revolution. Robespierre was irritated by these remarks, and insisted that he never meant to make the revolution retrograde, but had done everything to accelerate its course; in proof of which he had drafted a law to make the Revolutionary tribunal still more sanguinary. The law was passed, and in the forty-nine days succeeding the festival 1386 victims lost their heads on no other ground than suspicion. We are not, therefore, to suppose that the glory given commended the actors in the festival to Deity. John merely predicted it as an event that would obtain in the great earthquake, and as a sign by which that revolutionary crisis might be known to be the epoch of the ascent of the TERRIBLE WITNESSES against the Romish Idolatry to power.

The Third Woe

“The Second Woe has passed away; behold, the Third Woe comes immediately.”

The fifth trumpet, which summoned the Saracens against the Greek division of the Catholic Apostasy, was the first woe, and the sixth trumpet, which sounded forth the four angel-powers to put to death the Greek Catholic dominion, was the second woe. This was not only to extinguish this dominion, but to torment with a terrible testimony the world rulers and spirituals of the European Commonwealth in church and state, symbolized in the prophecy by “the beast with seven heads and ten horns.” Hence, the judgments of the Second Woe were widely diffused over the whole of the Great City from the Euphrates to the Danube, the Rhine, and the ocean. They began their desolating career A.D. 1062, and continued in their work of death upon the worshippers of the Demonials and Catholic Idols, until the demonial worship was destroyed in France, and its national homage transferred from the Roman “God of the earth” to “the Deity of the heaven,” A.D. 1794, a calamitous period of 732 years. The ascription of glory to the Supreme Being was the remarkable act by which the second woe was consummated.

But, notwithstanding all the judgments that had fallen upon the Catholic World, it continued unrepentant of its idolatry, of its murders, its sorceries, its fornication, and its thefts. They had been terribly chastised in France. The blood they had shed there was avenged twofold; their spiritual sorceries had been abolished; the priests had been compelled to marry; and the wealth they had acquired by theft and fraud, they had been forced to disgorge. About two thousand priests had died by the executioner, many abjured their religion; and thousands had been expelled from the bloodstained country they had plundered and ruined. Still the Catholic world clung to its delusions, and repented not of its deeds. The Second Woe had exhausted itself upon “the Tenth of the City.” The Reign of Terror ended with the execution of Robespierre and his collaborators. Forty-nine days after the Festival their heads rolled into the basket of the guillotine. Applause accompanied every descent of the fatal blade; and joy prevailed on every side, and the system of terror was overthrown. The woe had “passed away,” and the time had come for republicanized France to become an angel-power of destruction against the worshippers of the beast in the other Tenths of the Great City.

“The third woe comes immediately” after the termination of the second. Between the predicted events of the first and second woes, that is, from the end of the first to the beginning of the second woe, there was an interval of about 130 years. But between the end of the second and the beginning of the third, there was no appreciable interval. It may therefore be considered as beginning in the year of the Festival, A.D. 1794. This third woe is, of course, the Seventh and Last Trumpet—the Seventh Trumpet Division of the Seventh Seal, and summarized in the following words:

This is the grand result of the sounding—a consummation to be perfected as the result of the sounding of the seventh trumpet. This third woe trumpet has been sounding during the past seventy one years. These are so many of “the days of the voice of the seventh angel” as have hitherto elapsed. But they are not all “the days of the voice.” They have brought us to the terminal epoch of the Holy City’s “forty and two months” and I believe that there are yet forty more “days,” or years, to fill up all “the days of the voice of the seventh angel.” The fall of the Tenth of the city happened in a day, but it did not become the Lord’s. All the tenths are to fall likewise by violence, to which they will be forced to yield, and to become the property of Him who overturns them. This overthrow will be the work of the “Hour of Judgment,” which does not begin till after the advent of Christ, and the giving of judgment to the Saints; and consequently, after their resurrection and ascension to power in the heaven, as prefigured in the resurrection and ascension of the political witnesses “in the cloud.” The judgments of the second woe terminated in the Reign of Terror, the most awful and terrible epoch ever yet experienced by a nation. It was emphatically the Reign of Death, oftentimes in its most appalling forms. But the consummation of the seventh trumpet will woefully surpass the Reign of Terror. This was limited to a single nation, of which the mighty were hurled from their seats into the lowest depths, and the rest sent empty away. But the terminal epoch of the seventh trumpet now upon us, will make the ears to tingle only to hear the report of its terrors. Daniel was informed that it would be “a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation to that same time” (ch. 12:1). “The time of the end” of the third woe trumpet is a time of unsurpassed calamity, and will extend to all nations in all parts of the earth. Their trade and commerce will be ruinously perturbed; their countries devastated by war; their hundreds of thousands prostrated by famine, pestilence and sword; their armies scattered like chaff before the wind; their “religions” abolished as “abominations” and blasphemies; their priests, clergies and ministers punished as sorcerers, murderers, impostors, hypocrites, and plunderers of the poor; and their kings, nobles and gentry destroyed as “the destroyers of the earth.”

The Spirit of the Eternal in Jesus and his Brethren is “the Lord and his Christ,” by whom this world-wide revolution will be developed and directed. The political witnesses of Jesus developed and directed the great French Revolution. Theirs was a great and mighty, as well as a terrible work; but it is the witnesses of the Holy City, the One Body, who will constitute the Revolutionary Government, and to whom the higher and nobler, mightier and more terrible mission is assigned, of breaking in pieces the political fabric of the world; of emancipating the nations from the reign of ignorance and strong delusion, and of blessing them in Abraham and his Seed. This is the work that is before them, and which, when accomplished, will introduce them to the reign of the aions of the aions, or THE THOUSAND YEARS.

And when this Millennial Sabbatism shall be duly established by the Eternal Spirit, the One Body, in glorious manifestation, and symbolized by the Four and Twenty Elders before the Deity, and “on their thrones,” “fall upon their faces and do homage to the Deity, saying, We give thanks to thee, O Lord, the Almighty Deity, who is, and who was, and who art the Coming One, because thou hast assumed thy great power, and reignest.”

But this is all in the future. It is the grand apocalyptic consummation of the gospel of the kingdom. It is the Divine purpose of the seventh trumpet first stated, but the last accomplished. The Spirit’s Body cannot be the Who is, and the Who was, and the Coming One reigning, so long as the saints are sleeping in the dust, and those who corrupt the earth are undestroyed. The resurrection of the holy generation is therefore indispensable to the denouement of the plot. The resurrection first comes in a time of trouble—a trouble which has doubtless begun, and which will not diminish, but increase, until there be great wrath among the nations. And so it is written in the eighteenth verse of this chapter, saying:

“And the nations were made angry, and thy wrath came; and the time of the dead to be judged; and to give the reward to thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, even to those who fear thy name, to the small and to the great; and to destroy those who corrupt the earth.”

The nations of this prophecy are those of “the earth and of the whole habitable” (Apoc. 16:14). They are “made angry” through the operation of the Frog Power, which is the Imperial Democratic Power of France, the policy of which acting upon the governments of Constantinople, Vienna and Rome, causes these powers in their political antagonisms to become threatening and warlike. Thus the nations they govern are “made angry,” and the world is again the theatre of war.

While they are in this international belligerency, developing their wrath upon each other, the wrath of Deity is manifested—“and thy wrath came.” But before this wrath can be manifested, He that is to execute the vengeance must have first come; and those who shall have the honor of co-operating with him in judgment, must be raised from among the dead, and have been themselves examined before his tribunal, accepted and quickened with incorruptible life. When the Divine wrath comes upon these nations, the revolutionary executors and directors of the indignation will be the Lord Jesus and his Brethren—the Saints. The work preparing for them by the Imperial Democratic Power, which is the political witnessing power of “THE MOUNTAIN” imperialized, will be assumed and consummated by the Saints, who are “the Kings from a Sun’s risings.” The Mountain, whose representatives are the members of the Napoleon Dynasty, could not with all the power at its command, do the work of wrath assigned to these kings. The nations have felt the power and wrath of “the Terrible Mountain,” when, under the generalship of the first Buonaparte, it inflicted “a noisome and grievous sore upon the men who had the mark of the beast, and worshipped the Papal Image,” when it “gave them blood to drink” in the plains and valleys of Italy; “scorched with fire” the unrepentant blasphemers of Southern Germany; hurled the Roman God from his throne into captivity; filled his kingdom with darkness; caused his blaspheming priests and worshippers to “gnaw their tongues for pain.” In short, the Imperialized Mountain had executed the wrath of the first, third, fourth and fifth vials of the Revolutionary Hour; and having regained its position in the heaven, from which it was expelled at the fall of Napoleon, &c., into which it originally “ascended in the cloud,” it is blindly preparing a situation for the manifestation of the almighty and terrible power of the witnesses of the Holy City. The Mountain, though terrible and powerful, is not almighty; but the Holy City, when the forty-two months of its subjection shall have fully passed, shall be more terrible, and absolutely omnipotent in the execution of its mission. What “the Mountain” could not do, “the Stone” will fully accomplish, when it will “become A GREAT MOUNTAIN, and fill the whole earth.”

“Thy wrath is come.” The coming of this wrath is marked by the commencement of the Seventh Vial, which is poured out upon “The Air”—the political aerial in which the kingdoms of the kosmos, or fourth-beast constitution of things, shine in all their glory. The wrath falls upon the Governments to their destruction. The Imperial Mountain overturned the Papal Throne; but after the fall of its Emperor, it was reestablished, as were also other thrones. But the Mountain having recovered its position, has the papal throne again in its powerful grasp. It will not be able finally to abolish it. This is not its mission. It is only the Holy City, the One Almighty Body, that can overthrow all thrones in its wrath, and prevent them from being again established. The One Almighty Body by Seventh-Vial wrath is to possess itself of the kingdoms of the Unmeasured Court of the Gentiles. The corruptors of the earth will then have been destroyed, and the coming wrath of the Deity exhausted.

1. “THE TIME OF THE DEAD”

“The time of the Dead” is at “the Time of the End”—at the expiration of Daniel’s 1335 days. This appears from the words, “Blessed he that waiteth, and cometh to the 1335 days. But go thou till the end; and thou shalt rest, and arise to thine inheritance at the end of the days” (ch. 12:12, 13). To wait and come to these days, is to wait during their course, and to come to their end. Daniel has been thus waiting, but has not yet come to their end. During the time he has been waiting he has been resting, or “sleeping in the dust of the earth”—verse 2. So long as he is there he knows nothing, and can inherit nothing; for “the dead know not anything”, and can therefore be neither happy nor miserable. He expected nothing until he should “awake for a living one of the Olahm.” He was told that this should be at the end of the 1335 days, in the words, “thou shalt arise to thine inheritance at the end of the days.” These can only be the 1335 days whose end terminates Daniel’s rest in the dust of the earth. He is to arise to his inheritance, because the inheritance promised is neither in the dust, nor in the sky, but a land from which he was expelled by the Chaldeans, and to which he never returned. He will arise from the dust of Persia, where he has been resting since “the third year of Cyrus,” B.C. 540; and appearing before “Messiah the Prince,” of whom he wrote, and being approved, as doubtless he will be, he will be strengthened, and henceforth be prepared to “speak with the enemy in the gate,” who at present occupies the land.

“The time of the dead,” then, is at the epoch which terminates the 1335 years. This being so, there will, of course, be no more trampling of the Holy City by the Gentiles after their expiration. But the Saints were to be prevailed against “for a time, times, and the dividing of a time,” or 1260 years; and the Holy City was to be trampled “forty and two months,” which are also 1260 years. This is true; and therefore it is evident that these two differently expressed, but identical, periods both terminate synchronously with the 1335. The end of these brings us to “the end”—the end of “the time, times, and dividing of a time;” the end of the forty and two months; the end of the 1335 years; and to the beginning of “the time of the end,” which continues to the end of Micah’s forty years.

The beginning of “the Time of the End” is “the time of the dead.” The work of this time will take time; but how much time it will consume the testimony does not reveal. The Lord Jesus Christ who is “the resurrection and the life,” as well as “the truth and the way,” descends to Mount Sinai while the present Sixth Vial is continuing to pour out. “Behold!” says he, “I come as a thief.” He comes before “the kings of the earth and of the whole habitable” are gathered into the region termed “in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon.” How long before is not revealed; but between his thief-like advent and the Armageddon-gathering is “the time of the dead” and when his work is finished with his dead ones, “He gathers the kings together”—he operates upon a situation already created by the Frog Power; and brings on the catastrophe, which that power is not capable of accomplishing. But, how many months or years the work of setting in order his own Melchizedec Household will consume I know not. It will take time. The Lord is never in a hurry. He is always deliberate and dignified. If He pleased, He could flash everything into order; and all his enemies into destruction. But He has not acted in this way in the past; and it is clear from the word that He does not intend to act flashingly in the future. There is no question about His ability so to do. He can do what He wills; and He has revealed His will, and from that revelation, it is evident that He will be deliberate in all His movements.

In the work of “the time of the dead” every individual saint who has died since Abel in all countries of the earth, has first to be awakened from his sleep of death, and made to stand bodily upon his feet. After this, they are to be gathered together from all parts to the general convention, which brings them into the presence of Christ. In this gathering, the few living saints that may remain have to be visited by his messengers, and to be caused to report themselves to the King; for one who well knew what he spoke, says, “we must all appear before the tribunal of Christ.” Now to accomplish all this will consume time; but it will, doubtless, consume more time in disposing of the business of the Court. For every one gathered to that grand assize will be called upon to give an account of himself. Of this there can be no doubt, for Paul says again, “everyone of us (saints) shall give account of himself to the Deity.” This relation of experiences will consume time; and one would conclude no little time. Some will doubtless be very brief, having little to say, while others will be even “speechless;” but some will have a longer account to give, as in the case of Paul and others like him. Then there will be the verdicts with all their attendant circumstances; for after the accounts given, come the personal recompenses; for they appear at the tribunal that they may “receive in body the things according to that they have done whether good or bad.” For what a man sows in body he must reap in body—“he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting.” Saints who have sown to the flesh, and there have been many such, will, in this “time of the dead,” be left in the body recently created from the dust; and of that body they will reap corruption that will utterly and finally destroy it. “This is the Second Death.” But Saints, who have sown to the Spirit, in “denying themselves of all ungodliness and worldly lusts, and in living soberly, righteously, and godly in the world,” will also in this “time of the dead” not be left in the body recently elaborated from the dust. That body will reap of the Spirit incorruptibility in being quickened in the twinkling of an eye, by which it will become Spirit-body, and so conformed to the body of Jesus Christ. This is what Daniel terms

Thus, in “the time of the dead,” there will be a judicial separation of just saints from unjust saints. A sinner becomes a saint by believing and obeying the truth; and he continues a just saint if he continues in well-doing; but, he becomes an unjust saint if he do not so continue. Now, the appearing at the tribunal of Christ by all the saints of these two classes is, that the just may be separated from the unjust; and that the unjust may be driven from the presence of judicial majesty into the darkness of the outer world, where they may ignominiously partake in the vengeance which is to “devour the adversaries.” This explains the phrase in that text “the time of the dead to be judged.” The judicial separation completed on this basis and the unworthy expelled from the Royal Presence, those who remain are “the called, the chosen, and faithful”—Ch. 17:14. They are the 144,000, having the Lamb’s Father’s name indelibly written in their foreheads; they are “the redeemed from the earth;” the undefiled virgins; the First-fruits unto the Deity, and to the Lamb; the guiltless and faultless before the throne—ch. 14:1–5. These are the saints, who have the honor of executing the judgment written against the kings, priests, and aristocrats of the Great City. They are all like to Jesus, who is their Head; and “equal to the angels.” They constitute the Household, of which He is the High Priest, or PontiffKing, after the order of Melchizedec. To manifest this household, or Divine Family, with all the attributes of Deity, is the great and interesting preliminary work for which “the time of the dead” affords sufficient scope.—The house being thus put in order and strengthened, the constituent members thereof are prepared to “follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth;” which is equivalent to the phrase “whithersoever the Spirit was to go, they went” (Ezek. 1:20). They go with him in all his warlike expeditions, and royal progresses and visitations. They are one and indivisible, and inseparably knit together in all the bonds of love, power, and devotion; being “members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones” (Eph. 5:30).

2. “THE REWARD”

“The time of the dead” was, not only for the judicial separation and exclusion of the unworthy, and the strengthening, or quickening, of the approved; but for the giving of “the reward to the servants the prophets, and to the saints, even to those who fear the name of the Deity, to the small and to the great.” This testimony shows, that whatever “the reward” may consist in, the righteous do not obtain it until after their resurrection and strengthening. Christ himself, in the days of his weakness and suffering, plainly taught this. “Thou shalt be recompensed,” said he, “at the resurrection of the just” (Luke 14:14). And again, he said: “The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and THEN he shall reward every man according to his works” (Matt. 16:27). This is the teaching which belongs to “the simplicity which is in Christ.” Nothing can be more plain and easy to understand. The resurrection has not yet transpired, because “the time of the dead to be judged” is yet future; and because the Son of Man, who is the resurrection and the life, has not yet come with his angels in his Father’s glory. The resurrection being future, then, none of the righteous have yet received “the reward.” Enoch, Elijah, Moses, and the few who came out of their graves after the resurrection of Jesus, have been “strengthened;” but even they have not received “the reward;” for this is only to be obtained upon the earth.

Now, reader, mark and inwardly digest what follows. All Greek, Latin, and Mohammedan “priests,” all Protestant “clergy,” and all Nonconformist, Dissenting, and Sectarian “ministers,” of all the so-called “Names and Denominations of Christendom,” teach the direct opposite to the doctrine of Jesus. In effect, this generation of hypocrites and serpents tells the Lord Jesus that he is either an ignoramus or a wilful deceiver of the people. It might refuse to say in so many words that he is a liar; because these priests, clergy, and ministers, all, save the Moslems, pretend to be called and sent of him, as his ambassadors to the world, to preach his doctrine; and it would be too gross plainly to declare that he is a liar and deceiver. There are, however, other ways of saying the same thing; and the most effectual with the least danger to their craft, is to teach in his name exactly the reverse of his teaching. This they do with the most unblushing effrontery. They tell their dupes, that man shall not be recompensed at the resurrection of the just; and that they have not to wait till the Son of Man comes with his angels, in declaring that men are recompensed as soon as the breath leaves the body in death. Thus, like the generation of vipers and hypocrites, who appeared to men to be righteous, with whom Jesus had personally to contend, by their tradition they make void his word. They convert it by their sorcery into a falsehood, as the old Serpent, their father, did before them in Eden. I testify against them as hypocrites in the classical sense of the word. A hypocrite is one who plays a part on a stage. A priest, clergyman, or minister, is exactly this. He plays a part on the ecclesiastical stage of the world; and a part, too, that is not his real character. He is therefore, a professional hypocrite—a hypocrite by profession. He professes to be Christ's ambassador, and when his credentials are demanded, he has none to show. If I present myself at Washington, and claim to be an ambassador from the court of St. James, and I have no credentials to establish my claim, however sincerely I might believe in my ignorance, that I was an ambassador of Britain, I should be attempting to play a part that was not my true character. I should therefore, be, not only a hypocrite, but an impostor, and worthy of all contempt. Only think, reader, of an ambassador falsifying the instructions of the power by whom he is sent! What confusion this would produce in the counsels of the powers! An ambassador upon whose words no reliance could be placed! And here are spiritual ambassadors, Greek, Romish, Protestant, and Sectarian, all claiming to be sent from one and the same Divine Power, all of them differing and contradicting in a multitude of important particulars, but all agreeing to suppress the teaching delivered by Eternal Wisdom, and to substitute a falsehood of their own! What do you think, reader, of such "ambassadors of Jesus Christ" so-called; of such "ministers of the gospel;" and what think you of professed believers of the truth, who would forbid that these hypocrites, impostors, and wolves in sheep's clothing, should be proved to be such, and being proved, should be so styled? An intelligent and sincere believer is not afraid to strip off the wool, and expose the naked wolf to the public gaze; his rule is to call things by their right names; and if a man be a quack, not to call him a physician, in order to make things pleasant all round. This course is necessary for the defence of the flock from these ravenous wolves. Spirituals are known to be wolves in sheep's clothing "by their fruits." Their teaching is one of their fruits. They teach contrary to Christ and his apostles, and so injure the reputation of their doctrine. This is defaming, reviling, calumniating, blaspheming, the truth. They are therefore blasphemers; and the Names and Denominations, of which they are the spirituals, are "Names of Blasphemy," of which the scarlet-colored beast is full (Apoc. 17:3).

But these priestly, clerical, and ministerial teachers of blasphemy not only contradict Christ and his apostles as to the time when men shall be rewarded according to their works; but as to the place where. Eternal Wisdom has decreed that men shall be rewarded in the earth—in the arena of their contention and suffering for the truth. "The righteous shall be recompensed IN THE EARTH; much more the wicked and the sinner." "No, no!" say the blasphemers; "no such thing! The righteous shall be recompensed at death, beyond the skiey realms of time and space; and the wicked and the sinner in the hell-flames of eternal torture, where they shall be tormented day and night by the Devil and his angels!" I do not know how it is with you, my reader, but I feel, with such contradictory propositions before me, that I am reduced to the necessary alternative of turning my back upon one or other of these parties. I find it utterly impossible to believe with Eternal Wisdom and with the so-called "ambassadors of Jesus Christ." One or the other must be trying to impose upon me; for it is logically impossible that both parties can be right. The reader can make his own election. I believe the teaching of Eternal Wisdom; and, therefore, repudiate the dogmata of blaspheming hypocrites with indignation and contempt; and, at the same time, burn incense of thanksgiving from the golden altar to His name, for His goodness in preserving me, by the enlightening influence of the engrafted word, from the evil machinations of impostors, who would have practised their sorceries upon me, and have made me twofold more a son of hell than themselves!

The time when, then, and the place where, the just and the unjust are to be rewarded, is in the earth at the resurrection. This is the fiat of Eternal Wisdom, which cannot be reversed. But what is the promised reward the righteous shall enjoy? “Of the Lord,” said Paul to the saints at Colosse, “ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance.” In writing to the saints in Galatia, he says, “The Deity gave the Inheritance to Abraham by promise.” By these testimonies we are taught that the subject-matter of the reward is an inheritance, or an estate to be possessed, when the time for the fulfilment of the promise shall arrive; and that this estate was given to Abraham, not actually donated and received before he died, but promised to him as an estate to be possessed when he should rise from the dead. “He died in faith,” says Paul, “not having received the promises, but saw them afar off, and was persuaded of them and embraced them.” And he tells us why he did not obtain immediate possession of the reward: it was because “the Deity has provided some better thing for us, that without us he might not be made perfect.” There is no difficulty in learning what the estate is, and where it is situated, if we attend to what has been revealed in the word. Moses tells us that it was promised to Abraham that he should possess the country in which he was then living, the land of Canaan, in a certain far off age. That he should possess it for ever; and that his seed should be numberless as the stars; that he should be the father of many nations, which should be blessed in him and his Seed. Paul tells us, that these promises were made to Abraham and the Christ who was to descend from him; and that they were consequently to be “THE HEIRS OF THE WORLD.” Thus, the possession of the world was annexed to the possession of the land of Canaan; so that he who could prove that he was the divinely constituted heir of the one, proved also that he had a right to the other.

The Holy Land and the World of Nations were promised to Abraham and Christ; and people of all nations were invited by the gospel preached to become heirs with them of the same promise; on condition of believing the promises, the Christship of Jesus, and the things concerning his name; and of being immersed into Christ, and thenceforth patiently continuing in well-doing. In this way they become Christ’s; and, says Paul, “if ye be Christ’s then are ye Abraham’s Seed, and heirs according to the promise.”

But, the apostle also saith, the reason why Abraham did not receive the Land and World at the time the promises were made, was because the Deity had predetermined “some better thing for us.” This “better thing” is all that constitutes the world more desirable in the nineteenth century after Christ, than it was over nineteen hundred years before. It had not then been sufficiently subdued, improved, and replenished. There was too much unhewn forest; too many wild races of untamed humanity; too few of the conveniences and elegances of life; and the existing civilization itself was too barbarous to constitute a gift worthy of Deity to His saints. He therefore deferred the fulfilment of His promises until He had developed a world of kingdoms and nations of a higher order of civilization—such, in short, as now occupies the globe. This is the “better thing provided,” the preparation of which has hitherto delayed the perfection of Abraham. When “the time of the dead” arrives, he, and all the prophets and postpentecostian believers, will stand upon their feet again, and be “made perfect;” and, when perfected in putting on incorruptibility, will receive the Holy Land and Modern World of kingdoms and nations for their reward.

This is “the reward” to be given “in the time of the dead.” In writing to the saints in Corinth, Paul says: “The world and all things are yours,” and “all things are for you sakes;” and, in arguing that the World was promised to Abraham, and that they who are Christ’s are Abraham’s Seed, he testifies that the World annexed to the Holy Land was promised to saints. The prophets, Jesus, and the apostles, all taught this doctrine; for the Eternal Spirit spoke by them all, and therefore their teaching was a unit. Hence, by David the prophet, he taught that “those who wait upon Yahweh shall inherit the earth;” and again, “The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein forever.” Jesus also says: “Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of the heavens. Blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth.” And James says: “The Deity hath chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, as heirs of that kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him.” From all these testimonies, then, it is evident that “the reward” to be given to the immortalized saints is the Holy Land, occupied by Abraham’s descendants, constituting a kingdom, with dominion, absolute and uncontrolled, over all the kingdoms of the world, annexed thereto. This is the kingdom and glory to which men are invited in “the gospel of the kingdom.” The events of the “Hour of Judgment” are for the purpose of wresting this world-wide dominion from those who now possess it; and of transferring it to “the Saints of the Most High, who shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for the Olahm, even for the Olahm, and beyond” the thousand years.

But here come in the modern scribes, pharisees, and hypocrites, with their blasphemous and word-nullifying traditions, and make all this teaching of none effect. “Yes,” say they, “the meek shall inherit the earth;” they do now inherit the earth in the farms they possess, which is as much of the earth as is good for them; but, as to the earth itself, it is not to abide for ever, but to be burned up in “the wreck of nature and the crash of worlds.” And as to the Holy Land, called also “the Promised Land,” they say: “True; Abraham did not possess it before he died; nor was it ever intended that he, Isaac, and Jacob, should. They were to possess it in the sense of their posterity possessing it under the Mosaic Law; for the Land of Canaan lying between the Euphrates and the Great Sea, was only typical of that ‘heavenly country,’ the true Canaan and happy land beyond the Jordan of Death, where souls immortal bathe in seas of endless bliss! This celestial country was the land promised to Abraham, to which he soared away upon the wings of angels, when his precious immortal soul was released from its ‘mortal coil’ in the article of death.”

Reader, one’s powerlessness alone restrains one’s indignation. No wonder Deity gave these hypocrites “blood to drink,” and caused them to “gnaw their tongues for pain,” in the great earthquake. It is because of their blasphemies vengeance has fallen upon this “MODEL REPUBLIC,” and will, ere long, descend in an avalanche of wrath upon “the kingdoms of the world.” The blasphemies of the clergy are enough to wreck any nation that upholds them. Even now, where they have the most power and influence, society is most rotten, most ignorant, and most miserable: what, then, will be the fate of all peoples, when “the time of the dead” arrives, to “execute the judgment written,” and to “destroy these corrupters of the earth?”

“The Reward,” in relation to its several elements, is exhibited apocalyptically under a diversity of symbols. These have been considered at large in the first volume of this work. To be strengthened with incorruptible life in the time of the dead, is “to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of the Deity” (ch. 2:7). To be an immortal king, is to receive “the crown of life” (ver. 10). To be approved, and acquitted of all guile and fault before the throne, and to be physically like Jesus Christ, is to eat of the hidden manna, to receive a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, and known only to the receiver—ver. 17. To operate with the Lamb in the setting up of the promised kingdom, is to receive power over the nations, to rule them with a rod of iron, and to shiver their image to pieces as a potter’s vessel—ver. 26, 27. To be endued with a clean and incorruptible nature, and to be divinely honored, is to be clothed in white raiment, and to be confessed before the Father and his angels (ch. 3:5). To become Deity manifested in glorified nature, and a constituent of the New Jerusalem, is to be made a permanent pillar in the Nave or Most Holy of Deity, with the Name of Deity, and the name of the city of Deity, the new name written upon him (ver. 12). And to reign with Christ, is to sit with him in his throne (ver. 21). Such is “the reward to be given to the prophets, to the saints, to them that venerate the Name of Deity, small and great;” so that, “even the least in the kingdom of the heavens,” though a star of the smallest magnitude and glory, will be greater than the greatest of all the prophets in the mortal state (Luke 7:28); “the reward” offered to all who believe the glad tidings of this glorious and powerful kingdom, and are immersed into its Almighty King, and thenceforth seek for its glory, honor, incorruptibility, and life, by a patient continuance in well-doing (Rom. 2:7); the reward to be received in “the time of the dead,” and not before.

3. “THE NAVE OF DEITY OPENED”

“And the Nave of the Deity was opened in the heaven, and the Ark of his Covenant was seen in his Nave.”

This nineteenth verse is parallel with ch. 4:1, in which John says, “a door had been opened in the heaven;” and looking through the door, he saw “a throne and one sitting upon it.” This throne and its glorious occupant is identical with the Ark of the Covenant. In the typical Mosaic Tabernacle, the Ark stood in the Nave, or Most Holy Place. It was Yahweh’s throne in Israel, on which He was said to sit between the Cherubim. From thence proceeded all His decrees for peace or war issued through the Prince of the host, the High Priest of Israel. It was a symbol of great significance in its appointed place. Had it been placed in the Holy place, and the Golden Altar in the Most Holy, that expressive significance would have been wholly destroyed. This transposition would have represented the Lord Jesus Christ as personally and visibly resident among the saints in all the past eighteen hundred years; and that when “the time of the dead” arrived, he would take his departure, and leave them to burn incense to his name in prayer and praise, as they do now. This would have been an entire reversal of the Divine Order of Manifestation.

The Nave and the Ark were beyond the Veil, which represents the flesh (Heb. 10:20). The opening of the nave is therefore equivalent to that which constitutes the nave, being no longer simply holy in the flesh, but most holy in spirit-nature, having passed from flesh to spirit. The opening of the nave is a wonderful manifestation of power. It implies the descent of him, who is the resurrection and the life; the reorganization of the ashes of the saints, and the restoration to each of them of their identity; and their subsequent transformation into spirit-bodies by the instantaneous operation of the Spirit. And when this process is complete, to give them a commanding position “in the heaven,” that, as the Ark of the Covenant, they may be the depository of almighty power, and prepared for the work of ruling in righteousness all the kingdoms, or heavens, of the world, and retaining undisturbed possession of them for a thousand years.

Thus, the Ark of the Covenant seen in the opened nave, is the Deity in most holy manifestation—manifested by spirit in Jesus and his Brethren “glorified together.” Collectively they form the Ark and Cherubim, the Spirit answering to the manna, the budding almond-rod, and the testimony. This is evident from the discourses of Jesus as recorded by John. The anointing Spirit, or Christ-Spirit, speaking by Jesus, declared, that he is the bread of life, or true manna; the resurrection, or budding rod; and the covenanted truth, or testimony. The container of such a power is the chest, or ark thereof; and therefore styled the Ark of the Covenant—of the New Covenant, the Abrahamic; with a blood-sprinkled propitiatory or mercy seat, even Jesus; and all in him who worshipped in the altar. This is the throne, the Eternal Spirit’s throne, to be established as such in Jerusalem, the Mother City of the Kingdom of the Ancient of Days.

In the fourth chapter, the Ark of the Covenant is distributed. The mercy seat and ark of which it is the coverlid, are exhibited there as the throne encircled with the rainbow of covenant-testimony; and the cherubim full of eyes, are taken down and placed about the throne, surrounded with a circle of representative royal presbyters. This distribution, when synthesized, or put together, constitutes the apocalyptic Ark. The time of the fourth chapter symbols is synchronous with “the time of the dead,” when the judgment of the House of Deity shall have been completed; and the saints shall be ready, by their immortalization, to execute the judgment written against the world without.

“And there were lightnings and voices and thunders, and an earthquake, and great hail.”

These are the same that burst forth out of the throne, as represented in ch. 4:5; and are the consummation of the wrath of the Eternal Omnipotence upon the objects of apocalyptic vengeance. These lightnings, voices, thunderings, earthquake, and great hail, of the fourth and eleventh chapters, are symbolical of the judgments of the Seventh Vial; which is the consummation of the judgments of the Seventh Trumpet, and of the Seventh Seal. “No one can enter into the nave until the seven plagues of the seven angels be finished”—ch. 15:8. This entering into the nave, is in the sense of entering into the kingdom, consisting of “the kingdoms of the world;” for it will require all the judgments of the Seventh Vial to complete the transfer of those kingdoms from the grasp of the wicked, or, “the Devil and his Angels,” who now hold them, to the Saints who are to possess them for a thousand years. In all the period of the Seventh Vial “the Nave is filled with smoke from the glory of the Deity.” The nave then exists, as constituted of glorified Christadelphians, or Brethren of Christ; but they smoke with burning and consuming indignation against the governments of the world and their armies; and until that smoke has passed away in victory, by which their wrath is assuaged, the Nave, in the sense of the most holy and blessed constitution of the thousand years can be entered upon by none.

The thunderings are the Seven Thunders of the last vial. They burst forth against the powers of the aerial in which they roll. They are accompanied with an earthquake, whose shocks surpass every thing of the kind experienced by men since they began to dwell upon the earth. It is described as “a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great” (ch. 16:18). As the result of it, the cities or states, of the nations, are overturned: and great dismay pervades all classes. Besides this, a great hail falls upon the people, whose wickedness is great. It falls upon them “out of the heaven.” It descends upon them from the Nave, “every hailstone about the weight of a talent.” A talent is figurative of an individual. When he descends as a hailstone, he falls from the heaven of power upon the enemy to be judged. A multitude of such descending upon their enemies, becomes to them as a storm of hail. They constitute a mighty and strong power, “which, as a tempest of hail, and a destroying storm, as a flood of mighty waters overflowing, shall cast down to the earth with the hand” (Isa. 28:2). With such a hail will men be plagued; but instead of repenting of their iniquity, transgression, and sin, they will “blaspheme the Deity; for the plague of the hail will be exceeding great” (ch. 16:21).

We have now arrived at the conclusion of the eleventh chapter of that admirable symbolic representation of the things concerning the kingdom of men, in its antagonism to the kingdom of Deity, the Name of Jesus Christ, and to them who are “the called according to His purpose.” There still remain eleven chapters to be expounded. These will constitute the subject-matter of the Third Volume of Eureka. This second volume has brought us down to the appearing of THE ANCIENT OF DAYS in the midst of THE MANIFESTED SONS OF DEITY, in judicial and beligerent activity against the Four Mediterranean Dominions, symbolized by the Beasts, which Daniel saw coming up out of its tempestuous waters (Dan. 7:2, 3). This is the wonderful denouement of the tragic drama of the Apocalypse. There is another grand development a thousand years afterwards. This is vastly important and intensely interesting to all the sons of men; for it reveals nothing short of the CESSATION OF EVERY CURSE by which humanity has been continuously afflicted since its primeval transgression of the divine law (Apoc. 22:3). But, of these two developments, the former is the most interesting at this crisis to the Brethren of Jesus Christ; for to them, the coming of the Ancient of Days is their speedy deliverance from “all the ills that flesh is heir to.” In relation to them, Mortality and Death will be swallowed up of life and victory (1 Cor. 15:54; 2 Cor. 4:4); and the curses, which now cleave to flesh and blood with leprous inveteracy, shall afflict them no more. They shall be “like Jesus” and “equal to the angels” (1 John 3:2; Luke 20:36). This is a consummation, not only to be devoutly wished and prayed for, but to be earnestly sought for, and labored for, “by a patient continuance in well-doing”—which is the only effectual seeking that will be wreathed with that which fadeth not away.

The end of this chapter conducts the faithful to this glorious consummation, in which, being immortalized, “judgment will be given to them” (Dan. 7:22, 26). The “lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and earthquake, and great hail,” burst forth from them in occupancy of the throne conjointly with the Ancient of Days. These are their judicial outpourings of wrath upon the “POWERS THAT BE.” The whole of the Seventh Vial, as well as the closing scenes of the Sixth, are assigned to them. We are now contemporary with the development of the preadventual FROG-SIGN in the third and last stage of its operation. Before this is completely finished, “the Ancient of Days comes as a thief;” so that Apoc. 16:15 and 11:17–19, are identical crises. This is the crisis now upon the world. The first throes of the parturient mountain which are to evolve THE STONE (Dan. 2:34, 35, 44, 45) are being felt in all the Habitable of the two hemispheres. “No man is master of the situation.” This has been well said by an Austrian Journal. The Deity alone holds the key of the position. His servants know what that is; for to them He has made known His secret (Psa. 25:14; Prov. 3:32; Amos 3:7); and by its signs they are forewarned. That key is upon his shoulder, who opens and none shuts; and shuts and none opens even upon his, who shall be for a glorious throne to THE HOUSE OF DAVID (Isa. 22:20–25; Apoc. 3:7). He will “open a door in the heaven,” and lead “his sanctified ones” into the royal palace of Babylon the Great; where all the might of the power, and the honor of the majesty of the kingdom of men, is temporally and provisionally enthroned. While the governments of the nations are unconsciously contributing to the formation of a situation to be signalized by their irretrievable and final overthrow, the Master of that situation proclaims to his Brethren, “Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame.” May we, my reader, be of that happy number, who shall be found of him watching, and duly and fitly clothed.

Volume 4

The massive city wall of Rome, pictured above, was built between 271–280 A.D., during the reign of Aurelian (270–275), the restorer of the Empire, and the man who met the widespread monotheism of Christianity by introducing the cult of the sun, the symbol of the Empire. It was probably he who introduced the feast of the birth day of the invincible sun—natalis solis invicti—on 25th December, which was later (in A.D. 330) taken over by an apostate Christianity, and given the name of Christ. Constantine was not only the “first so-called Christian Emperor”, but also an avid worshipper of the Sun. He identified himself closely with its worship. Eusebius wrote: “Aurelian builds a temple for Sol and surrounds Rome with stouter walls”. But though the enormously stout wall of Rome completed by Probus (276–82), has been preserved almost intact in spite of the ravages of time, it has not been able to protect the city against the barbarians or against treachery from within. The Apocalypse predicted the fall of Rome from these causes, and all the efforts of man to prevent it were in vain. PREFACE

THE APOCALYPSE has now been before the world 1770 years. Since its first appearance among the Seven Ecclesias of Asia Minor there have been various short expository notices of certain parts of the prophecy by some of the earlier overseers of the Christian community, who flourished from about the middle of the second to the middle of the third centuries: such as Justin Martyr, Irenæus, Tertullian, Hippolytus, and the pseudo-Sybilline Oracles.

The earliest essay at a systematic exposition of the wonderful and ingenious prophecy now extant, is one by Victorinus, overseer of an ecclesia at Pettau in Pannonia; who was put to death in the period of the Fifth Seal, or “ten days’ tribulation” of the Diocletian persecution, from A.D. 303 to A.D. 313.

The next hundred and sixty years, extending from the accession of Constantine to the wounding of the Sixth Head of the Beast, and the manifestation of the Seventh Head upon the Seven Hills, several scribes belonging to the Laodicean Apostacy, enthroned by Constantine as the religion of the Roman State, bestowed upon their contemporaries some bewildering speculations, by which the prophecy was intensely darkened. These were the ecclesiastical historian Eusebius; the tutor of Crispus, murdered by his father Constantine, the chief bishop of the Apostacy named Lactantius; Athanasius, Hilary, Cyril, Euphrem Syrus, Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, and Tychonius, who was said to be a Donatist, reclaimed from Donatism by Augustine.

After these came certain Latin expositors, named Primasius, Bede, Ansbertus, Haytoo, Andreas, Arethas, and Berengaud. These flourished from the wounding of the Sixth Head, and in the period of the rising of the Ten Horns, to A.D. 1,100. They were no more luminous in their expositions than their predecessors. They failed to discern the signs of their own times; and either endorsed the foolishness, or made more manifest the impenetrable obscurity, of them that preceded them.

Anselm, Joachim Abbas, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, the “angelic doctor,” Pierre d’Olive, and Walter Brute, followed after them; and set to their hands in the work of making darkness visible. They had no misgivings as to the divine origin of the Apocalypse. In this Luther, “The Great Father of the Reformation,” who came after them in the 16th century, was not in the same assurance. He had doubts of the genuineness of the Apocalypse as an apostolic or inspired book; though he came at length when he perceived how it might be wielded against his late master the Pope and papacy, to hold his doubts in abeyance, and presumptuously to venture upon its exposition.

But this “great father” made out no better than the Laodiceans who preceded him. The “Mighty Angel,” says he, “with a rainbow and a little bitter book, is Popery: the open book being that of papal laws, given to John to eat!” The Seventh Head he supposed to be Spain: while the three frog-like spirits depicted papal sophists, like Faber, Eck, and Emser, stirring up opposition to what he called gospel. His conceptions of the Millennium were as cloudy as those of Jerome and Augustine, who could see nothing in it but the triumph over Satan in the hearts of true believers! In short, to men in the fog even the truth itself is foggy but where the light within is not darkness, all things are bright and resplendent. Jerome, Augustine, and Luther did not understand “the truth as it is in Jesus,” nor the voices of the Old Testament; it was impossible, therefore, that they could discern the import of the Apocalypse, which is “the Mystery of the Deity as He hath announced the glad tidings to His servants, the prophets” (Apoc.

10:7). Luther was as a useful anti-papal element of “the Earth that helped the Woman” in her tormenting witnessing against “the god of the earth;” but, as a guide to the blind, and a teacher of babes, in the way of salvation; or an expositor of apocalyptic mysteries, his incompetency was only second to the Pope himself.

In the 16th century also appeared as apocalyptic expositors, Bullinger, Bale, Marlorat, Foxe, Brightman, Pareus, Ribera, and Alcasar. Bullinger interpreted the ascent of the witnesses of the ascent of their departed spirits entering Paradise! He dated the Millennium from Christ’s ascension; or from A.D. 60, when Paul speaks of the gospel “having been preached to every creature under heaven;” or from A.D. 73, the date of the destruction of Jerusalem. In either case, of course, it has long since passed away. Bale commenced it at Christ’s ascension. From these two may be learned all. It was only a question between them of more or less foolishness. Ribera and Alcasar were Spanish Jesuits who sought to expound the Apocalypse so as to deliver the Papacy from any identification with its symbols. Alcasar’s Commentary was the result of over forty years’ study; but a worshipper of the beast might study it twice forty years, and at the end thereof his speculations would not be worth the paper consumed. The true meaning of the Apocalypse is accessible only to the Brethren of Christ, and the fellow servants of the apostle, who keep the sayings of the book. All others will prove but vain and fanciful theorists with whom the secrets of the Deity are never found.

Next after the æra of the Lutheran rebellion against papal authority came Mede, Jurieu, Cressener, Bossuet, Vitringa, Daubuz, Sir Isaac Newton, Whiston, and Bishop Newton. Mede first published his Clavis Apocalyptica in 1627, and his Commentary in 1632. He was regarded by his contemporaries in England as a man almost inspired for the exposition of apocalyptic mysteries. And assuredly in comparison of all his predecessors who had written upon the subject, he was a great light shining into thick and incomprehensible darkness. In several important points he much advanced the science. He interpreted the prophetic periods on the year-day principle; made the resurrection and ascension of the witnesses an ascent to political eminence; made the Sixth Head under which John lived, the Imperial Caesars; adopted Lateinos as the Beast’s name and number, explained the sun of the fourth vial of the German Dynasty, as the chief luminary in the Papal Imperial system; indicated Rome as the throne of the beast upon which the fifth vial would be poured; interpreted the drying up of the river Euphrates of the exhaustion of the Ottoman power; and coincided with Justin, Irenaeus, and others of the earliest date, in the first resurrection, being the literal resurrection of the saints to be developed on Christ’s coming to the Antichrist’s destruction; after which the Millennium will be introduced. This is quite refreshing after all the absurdity to be waded through in the writings of fifteen hundred years.

Jurieu, who wrote in 1685, indicated the death of the Witnesses as occurring in that year; and that they would lie dead and unburied in the street of the great Papal city, or empire, which he judged to be France, where, of course, their resurrection and ascension would ensue.

Cressener seems to have been the first who, in my judgment, rightly, in 1690, concluded that the Seventh Head was the Ostrogothic, which continued but a short time: the Eighth being the revived secular imperial, confederated with a Roman ecclesiastical head, somewhat as under the old emperors; that is, the secular Western Emperors combined with the Popes. The Image of the Beast he makes to be the Roman Church, and the name Lateinos.

Vitringa’s exposition was no improvement upon Mede, Jurieu, and Dr. Cressener. He was a spiritual Millennialist, whose future age was to be characterized by a thorough evangelization of the world, by what he regarded as “the Church,” which would then answer to the New Jerusalem! Alas, for the world if its evangelization depend upon the ecclesiastics of Vitringa’s church! He was a very learned man, and well versed in the wisdom current a hundred and fifty years ago; but in apocalyptic intelligence, his wisdom was the foolishness of a babe.

Daubuz, who published in A.D. 1720, was about as luminous as Vitringa which is not saying much for the result of his apocalyptic labors.

Sir Isaac Newton published his brief commentary in A.D. 1733, appended to his treatise on Daniel. Many of his opinions were very crude. He generally agreed with Mede, but not always. The five-month period of tormenting in Apoc. 9:5, 10, he expounds as I have done, as signifying two periods of 150 years each, or 300 years for the times of the Saracens. The "hour day month and year" he reckons to signify 391 years; namely, from Alp Arslan's first victories on the Euphrates, A.D. 1063, to the fall of Constantinople, A.D. 1453. Generally speaking, his commentary was not equal to his reputation.

Whiston Sir Isaac Newton's successor in the Mathematical Professorship at Cambridge, combated the opinions of others without shedding upon the subject any particular light of his own, save that the seven vials ought to be deemed contained in, and the evolution of, the Seventh Trumpet.

When the great French Revolution caused the astonished world to shake to its foundations, a shock was given to the minds of men whose vibrations have not yet subsided. The murdered witnesses, slain by the sanguinary Bourbons, had started into life, and ascended into political eminence, as Mede had taught his readers to expect. This, and the coincidence also, that this ascension was exactly 1260 years from the epoch of the delivery of the saints into the hand of the episcopal element of the Little Horn by Justinian, in A.D. 533; all concurred in arousing some to a renewed and earnest study of the prophetic word. Prominent among these was Mr. Bicheno, who published his "Signs of the Times" in 1793. His writings were interesting, though abounding with many speculations proved fallacious by the lapse of time. One thing, however, he did which should not be forgotten. He showed that the three days and a half during which the two witnessing prophets were to lie unburied in the platea of the great city, should be interpreted as three lunar days and a half of years; and that Jurieu, therefore, was right in his conjecture that their death ensued, A.D. 1685.

Since Mr. Bicheno's time several writers on prophecy have risen up. Of these may be mentioned Irving, Faber, Keith, Cuninghame, Frere, Bickersteth, Elliott, and others. But I am not aware that they have added anything that would at all increase the intelligibility of the Apocalypse. Of this I am well assured, that from the days of Justin Martyr in the beginning of the second century, to the publication of Mr. Elliott's elaborate commentary, there has been produced by no writer, a systematic and thorough exposition of the Apocalypse that will stand the test of scripture, history, and reason enlightened by the truth. If there ever were such a work, it is certainly not extant. A perusal of a digest of their apocalyptic speculations, has convinced me that none of them, from Justin Martyr to Elliott, understood the prophecy. With no other guides to the blind than these, it is not to be wondered at that men should give the Apocalypse the go-by, and, with a reviewer in a London weekly, conclude "that nothing is more ridiculous than for any one to arrogate to himself the power of interpreting the prophecies contained in Daniel and the Revelation; being convinced that it would require as divine and miraculous an inspiration to interpret and apply those prophecies as was necessary to utter them." This is the conviction of the general public, which, like the public of the third century that had no ear for what the Spirit said to the ecclesias, pronounced it "without sense and without reason;" and denied that it was even a revelation. If so, then the man that composed it was the most extraordinary genius of the ancient or modern worlds. But it is not necessary to defend the Apocalypse at this crisis. The Constitution of Europe for the past thousand years which it so accurately exhibits, is evidential of its inspiration. It was revealed to be understood by the uninspired: and that it can be understood by them is proved to a demonstration by the three volumes of EUREKA, which are now, through the munificence of a few CHRISTADELPHIANS, who desire to understand this neglected portion of "the Word," and have confidence in the author's ability to expound it, in the hands of their fellow-servants and brethren. I claim no "divine and miraculous inspiration;" yet, I maintain, that whatever failures others may learnedly have accomplished, the exposition I have given in these three volumes, however “ridiculous” and “arrogant” it may be considered to affirm it, cannot be set aside by a fair and candid appeal to the testimony of Jesus, political geography, and the truth of history.

Since the publication of the second volume, and even since the writing of the third was finished, events have been progressing steadily and stealthily to the appointed end. The most striking characteristic of the times is the neglect, or indifference to, tending to the repudiation of, the PUBLIC WOMEN OF EUROPE, apocalyptically styled “the Mother of Harlots, and all the Abominations of the Earth.” The “women” with whom the Lamb’s Virgins are undefiled: Apoc. 14:4. Behold the changed policy of the Two-Horned Beast of the Earth since the overwhelming defeat of its hosts at SADOWA. This power, that formerly gave life to the Image, enabled it to speak, and caused that as many as would not worship it should be killed, has now taken almost all the life out of it, so that it can no longer speak in terror to the worshippers of the beast in all the Austrian Empire. Territorial continuity with “St. Peter’s Patrimony” being interrupted, through the intervention of the revolutionary kingdom of Italy, the Concordat, the political bond between “His HOLINESS” and “His Apostolic Majesty,” is dissevered, and the worshippers of the beast are freed from the audacious inspection, and profane decrees, of the “EYES like the eyes of a man and the MOUTH speaking great things and blasphemies.” Inspired by “the Spirit of the Age,” which is “the Spirit of Life from the Deity” that entered into the slain prophets, who ascended to power in 1789, the Reichsrath, or Imperial Legislature of Austria, practically abolished one of the seven sacraments of the Church of Rome in authorizing “civil marriage.” Besides this, it proclaimed “liberty of worship” to all sects: and has taken the education of the people out of the hands of an accursed priesthood, and given it to schoolmasters of their own choice. By the Concordat the Roman Pontiff King, was above the emperor in all the spiritual affairs of the Austrian Empire; throughout which, all such things were “given into his hand” as absolutely as when Justinian made him “Head over all the Churches” of his estate. But behold how great a reverse of fortune hath befallen the “UNIVERSAL BISHOP” in this False Prophet section of his dominion. What doth all this mean. What else than that the 1335 and 1260 years of his ascendancy from the times of Justinian and Phocas, are come to an end; and that he is doomed no longer to “practise and prosper” to the ruin of saints, and the quenching of the Spirit of the Age; which is a spirit of liberalism, and of democratic hostility to the old order of things in Church and State—a spirit that may be impeded, but cannot be extinguished till the manifestation of THE ANCIENT OF DAYS.

Then, if we turn our attention to Spain, the “Most Catholic,” from which the virtuous and immaculate ISABELLA, the last of the infatuated and atrocious Bourbons, the ensanguined murderers of the saints, hath so recently been expelled, what see we there? Do we not behold the Spirit that rose and ascended to power in 1789, notwithstanding all its misfortunes, and frequent discomfitures triumphant in 1868? The virtuous, pure, and most catholic daughter of His Papal Holiness, his last and most devoted friend among the Ten Horns, driven into exile at the end of the 1335 and 1260? A letter from Spain to La Liberte, dated Sept. 22, says: “Isabella has lost her throne. She seized it in 1839, supported by the Spanish Liberal party, which, in 1837, made her proclaim the Constitution, which suppressed les seigneuries, les droits des aines, and tithes. It was this party which caused her to sell the mortmain property, suppress privileges, shut up the convents, sending away with a pension 30,000 monks useless to the country, and hurtful to public prosperity. But as soon as the Queen was married to Prince Francis of Bourbon, in 1846, reaction gained the upper hand everywhere. All the conquests made by the Liberal party were lost again. In 1863, Conservatives, Progressists, and moderate Liberals, wished to resist the reaction. Marshall O’Donnell, the head of this party, recognized Italy, and promulgated several liberal laws in 1866. The Revolution was vanquished. O’Donnell could not profit by his success, for, to the great amazement of everybody, he was suddenly replaced by Narvaez two days after his victory Since then all the constitutional system has disappeared; and Spain is in the same condition as if Don Carlos and his ideas had triumphed in 1840.

”The Queen has become the humble servant of the Pope. All Spain nearly burst with laughter, when, a year ago, she read the papal letter announcing to the whole world that Pius IX sent the ‘golden rose’ to Isabella, in recompense for her virtues and the purity of her life!

“The struggle has now begun between the Liberal and the reactionary party. Everything would incline one to believe that the latter will be beaten; for, in fact, the Liberal party, composed of all shades opposed to absolutism, form a very compact whole”.

Here is the last pillar of the papal throne levelled with the dust. While yet upon the throne, the same correspondent wrote, “the clergy is above the Queen.” But where will they be now that the spirit of ’89 has driven into exile the humble servant and most catholic daughter of their UNIVERSAL BISHOP, the lambskin-invested wolf of the Seven Hills? Will Louis Napoleon now be able to send 40,000 troops through Isabella to garrison Rome and protect the Pope against Italy, while he combats Prussia for the Rhenish frontier of France? May we not rather expect that the Spanish section of “the Revolution” will ally itself with the Italian section, and revive the work with renewed energy of “hating the Harlot and making her desolate and naked, and eating her flesh, and burning her with fire?” Further developments will soon illustrate this point in the Roman Question; though it is not to be expected that Rome will become the capital of any other dominion than is enthroned there. No Ninth Head can constitutionally exist upon the Seven Hills.

And what see we in England? We behold there the Spirit of ’89 in its British manifestation, carrying out the principle of hatred and desolation, of stripping and eating, in regard to the Anglo-Hibernian Harlot, a daughter of ROME, “Mother and Mistress of All Churches,” and sister to those other “Harlots” of England and Scotland, “as by law established”. This, hating, desolating, stripping, eating, and burning of ecclesiastical establishments has been a striking characteristic of the past seventy-five years. The abolition of the Gallican harlot is “only a question of time.” The world will progress until the ignorance, superstition, hypocrisy, and spiritual wickedness in the high and low places of old, worn out, ANTICHRISTENDOM, shall come to be abolished by Christ and his Resurrected Brethren, whose apocalypse is soon to be revealed. With all these signs of the times before the faithful, well may they rejoice and lift up the head; for assuredly “the redemption draweth nigh.”

In conclusion, as the Corsican remarked concerning the leadership of his victorious hosts, “it is the hand of God that leads my armies;” so when I consider the difficulties surmounted in the development of this Exposition, I may truly affirm, that the power of the Deity has performed the work. The labor has been diffused over twelve years; but, if I had not well understood “THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM;” which “is the Power of God,” I might have contained in my earthen vessel all the lore of ancient and modern times, and consumed twelve years thrice told in the study of its mysteries, yet should I have signally failed; and have had to confess with Dionysius, “the great bishop of Alexandria,” as Eusebius styles him, that the words of the Apocalypse were “too lofty to be comprehended by me.” I have been careful to treat nothing as non-essential or unimportant because of apparent difficulties. The work is now finished by “the power” aforesaid through my instrumentality—a work concerning which it may be said in the words of an old Roman exile, this generation may not appreciate it, but one in the future will.

Eregi monimmentum perennius ære:

The following (see pg. 12) is my scheme of the prophecy to be studied in connexion with the Chron. Tab. in Vol. 1, p. 428, and the Tab. Analysis, Vol. 2 p. 110.

PUBLISHERS' NOTE

Originally, the Third Volume of Eureka was a large book of over 700 pp. Subsequent editions divided it into two volumes called Volumes IIIA and IIIB. They comprised books of over 300 pp. each. However, with the additional matter that we have included in the form of illustrations and footnotes, a single Volume would make too unwieldy a book. As it is, the present volume, answering to Volume IIIA of previous editions exceeds 400 pp. And we anticipate the final Volume will exceed the present one in the additional information we hope to include; for in the form of footnotes, we shall try to bring up to date the fulfilment of Bible prophecy in accordance with the Author's anticipations of over 100 years ago.

CHAPTER 12

1. THE FIRST GENERAL DIVISION OF THE SEVEN SEALED SCROLL

The first four and THE SIXTH SEALS representative of the judicial manner of "taking out of the way" the PAGAN CONSTITUTION of the "Dreadful and Terrible Fourth Beast," which withheld the revelation of "THE LAWLESS ONE;" (Dan. 7:7; Apoc. 6; 2 Thess. 2:3–9) and the consequent manifestation of the CATHOLIC MYSTERY OF INIQUITY, or Man of Sin Power, in the Heaven of the said beast, or "GREAT FIERY-RED DRAGON" (Apoc. 12:1–5, 7–13).

SIXTH SPECIAL DIVISION OF THE SEVEN SEALED SCROLL

ACT VI—SEAL 6

A GREAT EARTHQUAKE INAUGURATES THIS JUDICIAL PERIOD. WAR IN THE HEAVEN, (APOC. 12:7) RESULTING IN AN ECLIPSE OF THE SUN, IN THE MOON BECOMING BLOOD, IN THE STARS OF THE HENVEN, THE STARS DRAWN BY THE TAIL OF THE DRAGON, (APOC. 12:4) FALLING INTO THE EARTH, AND OF THE CASTING OUT THEREINTO OF THE GREAT FIERY-RED DRAGON (APOC. 12:9). THE HEAVEN OF THE DRAGON-POLITY DEPARTS AS A SCROLL ROLLED UP; AND EVERY MOUNTAIN AND ISLAND CHANGE THEIR PLACES. THE ANGELS OF THE DRAGON ARE CAST OUT WITH HIM (APOC. 12:9).

NO PLACE FOR THEM ANY MORE IN THE HEAVEN FROM WHICH THEY ARE EJECTED, HAVING BEEN EFFECTUALLY CONQUERED BY THE ARCHER OF THE FIRST SEAL—THE FELLOW-SERVANTS AND BRETHREN OF THE SOULS UNDER THE ALTAR; WHO CONQUERED HIM BY THE BLOOD OF THE LAMB, AND BY THE WORD OF THEIR TESTIMONY, ON ACCOUNT OF WHICH THEY WERE SLAIN, NOT LOVING THEIR LIVES UNTO DEATH (APOC. 12:11; 6:9). GREAT REJOICINGS IN THE HEAVENS BY THEM WHO SUCCEED THE EJECTED DRAGON AND HIS OFFICIALS, WHO RAGE WITH GREAT FURY IN THE EARTH AND SEA OF THEIR LATE DOMINION (APOC. 12:12). THE GREAT DAY OF WRATH UPON PAGANISM.

The woman Jezebel who calls herself a prophetess, the Laodicean Apostasy, imperialized, and the Man of Sin Power revealed (Apoc. 2:20).

THE LAODICEAN STATE

Vol. 1 pp. 428, 449; Vol. 2 pp. 87, 89, 276

The “little strength” of the Philadelphian State exhausted, and Laodiceanism fully established, Pagan persecution having ceased, and “the Catholics,” as nominal Christians were now called, being in high favor with the authorities, they say “We are rich, and increased in goods, and have need of nothing”—Apoc. 3:17. Being “lukewarm,” the Spirit “spues them out of his mouth.” This state continues until abolished by the judgments of the Seventh Vial, which are executed by the Saints after the resurrection.

Summary

End of the “rest for a little season,” when the “Despot Holy and True” avenges the blood of the souls under the altar, upon them that dwell upon the earth. A great earthquake inaugurates this day of vengeance. The woman Jezebel, who calls herself a prophetess, appears in the Roman Heaven invested with imperial dignity and glory. Her son, having triumphed over the Great Red Dragon, which sought to destroy him, becomes the sovereign ruler of the nations.

The Spirit “spues” her Laodicean element “out of his mouth,” and a remnant of her seed, as the woman fugitive, is found in the wilderness.

War ensues in the Roman Heaven between the powers there, which results in the ejection of the great Draco-Serpent Devil and Satan from thence. The “Brethren” and “Fellow-servants” of the souls under the altar rejoice at his expulsion. But woe betides the inhabitants of the earth and sea, where the Dragon retains power for a “short time” longer; and persecutes the constituents of the woman dwelling in his dominion.

The woman being in the wilderness is protected there for a period of 1260 days; and in her flight thither is pursued by the Serpent, which seeks to sweep her away; but the Earth helps her, and defeats her enemy. The Dragon is wroth with her; and resumes the war with the remnants of her seed.

Translation

Apocalypse 12

1. And a great sign appeared in the heaven; a woman who had been invested with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head and a wreath of twelve stars. 2. And being pregnant she cries being in pangs and straining to bring forth.

3. And there appeared another sign in the heaven, and behold, a great fiery-red Dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his heads seven diadems: and his tail draws the third of the stars of the heaven, and he casts them into the earth. And the dragon stood in the presence of the woman about to bring forth, that when she may have brought forth, he might devour her offspring.

5. And she brought forth a male child, who is about to rule all the nations with an iron sceptre: and her son was forcibly carried up to Deity and his throne. 6. And the woman fled into the wilderness where she has a place that had been prepared of the Deity, that they may sustain her there a thousand two hundred and sixty days.

7. And there was war in the heaven. The Michael and his angels waged war against the Dragon; and the dragon waged war and his angels. 8. And they prevailed not; neither was their place found any longer in the heaven. 9. And the great dragon, the old Serpent, surnamed Diabolos, was cast forth; and the Satan which deceives the whole habitable was cast into the earth; and his angels were cast forth with him.

10. And I heard a great voice saying in the heaven, Now is the salvation and the power and the kingdom of our Deity, and the dominion of His Anointed; for the prosecutor of our brethren, who accused them in the presence of our Deity, day and night, has been cast down. 11. And they overcame him through the blood of the Lamb and through the word of their testimony; and they loved not their life unto death. 12. On account of this let the heavens rejoice and those who tent in them.

Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and the sea, because the Diabolos has fallen among you having great wrath, foreseeing that he hath a short time.

13. And when the Dragon saw that he was cast into the earth, he pursued the woman who brought forth the male. 14. And the two wings of the great eagle were given to the woman, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, in which she is sustained there a time and times and half of a time, out of the sight of the serpent.

15. And the serpent cast out of his mouth after the woman water as a flood, that he might cause her to be carried away by the flood. 16. And the earth ran with help for the woman, and the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed up the flood which the dragon cast out of his mouth. 17. And the dragon was enraged against the woman, and went away to wage war with the remnants of her seed who keep the commandments of the Deity and have the testimony of the Anointed Jesus.

Introductory Remarks by Which the Second and Third volumes are connected

1. "The Time of the End"

The end of the eleventh chapter of the Apocalypse conducts the reader into what Jeremiah styles, "the time of Jacob's trouble," out of which he shall be saved (ch. 30:7)—a time in which there are "lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and an earthquake, and great hail" (Apoc. 11:19). This is that "TIME OF THE END" of which Daniel prophesied, saying, "There shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time." This is that time which certain chronologists term "an unchronological period"; that is, a period which is left scripturally undefined, having no revealed commencement nor termination: so that it may be a moment exemplified by a flash of lightning, a year, or several years, for anything that is, or can be, known.

But to such a conclusion as this, it is impossible that any one intelligent in the word can come. It is, on the contrary, a period well and clearly indicated. Its commencement is synchronical with the ending of “the time of the vision” seen by Daniel “in the third year of the reign of King Belshatzar”; for, it is written, “to the time of the end the vision”—l’eth kaitz he khazon—ch. 8:17. Now in an answer to the question, “How long the vision?” it was replied, “for an evening-morning of two thousand four hundred.” This, according to what time has proved to be the best reading, is the time of the vision—a period of 2400 years; which, having expired A.D. 1860, bring us to the time of the end, in which “the holy shall be vindicated” from the violence and injury resulting from so long a period of subjection under the feet of the Gentiles.

The world must therefore now be in the eighth year of the Time of the End. The termination of the 2400 years, and the synchronical beginning of the time of the end, were both signaled by the outbreak of the American civil war, which in its development proved to mankind, that with all their boasted science, civilization and religion, they are not one whit in advance of the beasts that perish (Psa. 49:12, 20). The time of the end thus portentously begun continued to unfold itself in the events of the Franco-Mexican war, and in those of the Russo-Polish, and Prusso-Austrian Danish, and Prusso-Austrian Italian wars. By the American civil war several millions of Southerners have been subjected to an ignoble military despotism, and social degradation and ruin; while the fanatics used by Providence in its judicial visitation upon the South, have blasted the prosperity of the North, filled its families with lamentation and death, and laid the foundations of trouble that will only be finally assuaged in the absorption and obliteration of the so-called United States in the NEW UNIVERSAL EMPIRE of the Ancient of Days. The invasion of Mexico by France, England, and Spain, resulted in the fall of a republic—a corrupt and worthless popular sovereignty; and in the provisional establishment (for it will prove to be nothing more) of a Franco-Austrian imperialism, which has this redeeming quality, that it is hostile to the Papacy, and inimical to the priests. These events in Mexico are, it is most likely, only preparatory elements of the situation being now organized in the providence of the Deity. They are preparing for a future complication, by which the trouble of the latter days will pervade not Europe and Asia only, but America as well.

The Russo-Polish war was most ferocious. In the ratio of its extent it was as savage a conflict as the American civil war, though of shorter duration. It was a contest between Russo-Greek and Polish Latin, in which the Greeks, “the worshippers of the Dragon,” destroyed the Polish nationality of the Latins, “the worshippers of the Beast.” Poland was blotted out from the political geography of the world. It became a monument of the dead, whose epitaph forewarns the nations of the fate that awaits their kingdoms and republics when judgment shall be given to the saints, and the time comes that they shall possess the dominion under the whole heaven (Dan. 7:22, 27). In devouring Poland, “Gog, the Prince of Rosh, Mesech, and Tobl,” has prepared, and become a guard to so much of “Gomer and all his bands” as it contains. Nor has the Prince of Rosh, whom we style the Autocrat of All the Russians, being negligent of his mission in the direction of “Togarmah of the north quarters and all his bands” (Ezek. 38:2, 6, 7). Since the end of the 2400 years, he has advanced his frontier so as to include Khokan and Bokhara, so that there is now but one state between him and British India, namely, Afghanistan, all of whose sympathies are in accord with the enemies and rivals of British rule in India. Thus “Gog of the land of Magog,” the great king of the north, who is to figure so conspicuously “in the time of the end”—b’aith kaitz, styled by Ezekiel “the latter years” and “the latter days,” is standing almost face to face with “Sheba and Dedan, and the Merchants of Tarshish;” whose young lions ere long will need all their strength and prowess for the repression of the further aggrandizement of the Russo-Assyrian power in the East.

Nor is the alliance of Austria, Prussia, and Germany, the two-horned beast of the earth, against Denmark, for the possession of Schleswig and Holstein, without significance in this eventful time of the end. It is a question pregnant with trouble; and a necessary complication of a situation in which “the kings of the earth and of the whole habitable” will be engaged in an angry and sanguinary conflict, preparatory to “the war of the great day of AIL-Shaddai,” when their thrones will be cast down, and the Ancient of Days shall sit (Apoc. 16:14; Dan. 7:9).

And besides all this, not to dwell upon the increase of taxation, financial embarrassment, pestilence, destruction of mankind and their fellow-beasts, and all the minor evils by which humanity is grieved, there is the all-important and inevitable Roman Question. This is preeminently the question of the time of the end. It can only be solved in the final and complete abolition of the Papal Kingdom. This result, however, can not be developed by the action or policy of France, Italy, or the Roman people. They are blindly preparing this consummation; and will doubtless develop for “the Great Harlot that sitteth upon many waters” a hatred of the European Powers, that shall cause them yet more than ever to “make her desolate and naked, and to eat her flesh and burn her with fire” (Apoc. 17:1, 16). But the final and complete destruction of the Papacy is an honor decreed for a more noble and powerful class of agents than these. It is a glory reserved for “the Heirs of the Kingdom which the Deity has promised to them that love him” (James 2:5). These are the destroyers of the Papacy in the time of the end. They are the Avengers of the Holy—the avengers of the blood of the saints and witnesses of Jesus, and of all slain upon the earth in defence of righteousness and truth (Apoc. 18:6–8, 20, 24). It is from these proceed the lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and earthquake, and great hail” (Ch. 11:19).

The Roman is a question that cannot be evaded or postponed. A policy must be pursued towards the Pope that will cause his government to use all its influence to enlist the powers in his defence against the Red Republicanism of the Italians and their allies. The cry of these is “an united Italy with Rome for its capital, or death!” To give effect to this would be the expulsion of Austria from Venetia; and the incorporation of the States of the Church with the kingdom or Commonwealth of Italy. If Red Republicanism can acquire the ascendancy in Italy, it will assuredly adventure the experiment of giving effect to its cry. In this event an appeal to arms would be inevitable. First, because Austria will never consent to the surrender of Venetia without a struggle; and secondly, because the spiritual influence of the Pope, which is still great in all the ten kingdoms of the beast, would go forth with all its unclean and demoniac activity to stir up war in his behalf. In this array of belligerents the combinations will be for a trial of strength between the expiringfeudality of the middle ages, and the revolutionary principles of 1789—a sanguinary and final conflict between the adherents of Church and State Absolutism, and the partisans of popular sovereignty as “the voice of God.”

Thus, by the intervention of the Roman and Eastern questions, a situation is created in the time of the end in exact accordance with the description of it in the prophetic writings. These questions create a trouble for all the nations and governments symbolized by the four beasts seen by Daniel arising out of the great sea (Dan. 7). They are all questions affecting the vested interests of the Image seen by Nebuchadnezzar in his dream. This great image, whose brightness is excellent, and its form terrible, appears in all its majesty and power in the time of the end. In the terminal epoch of the sixth vial, which obtains after the advent of the Ancient Days, the great Russo-Assyrian Gogian Image stands prepared for conflict with “the Prince of princes,” whom Daniel styles “Michael, the Great Prince” (Dan. 8:25; 12:1). When the image stands thus in the time of the end the crisis will be of the most troublesome and exciting character. “The nations” will have been “made angry,” nor will their anger subside henceforth until the image shall be utterly broken, and all its fragments ground to powder. This result, however, will be beyond their power to accomplish. No combination short of the mighty angel clothed with cloud and rainbowed (Apoc. 10:1) can shiver it to pieces reduce these to chaff, and sweep them away that no place shall be found for them (Apoc. 2:27; Psalms 2:8, 9; Daniel 2:35).

The time of the end, which is notably chronological, commences with the termination of the 2400 years, and ends with the exhaustion of the Seventh Vial. Hence the time of the end embraces part of the sixth and the whole of the seventh vials. It embraces so much of the sixth as pertains to the development of the Roman Question after 1860; the events attendant on the coming of the Ancient of Days; and those consequent on His appearing to the beginning of the seventh vial. Here are three epochs—the present, characterized by the three wonder-working, unclean, frog-like demon-spirits, proceeding out of the mouth of the papal false prophet; the adventual epoch, characterized by the visible presence of Christ in Southern Asia; and the third, or terminal epoch, characterized by the gathering of the military forces of the powers into the Holy Land for that signal discomfiture, which constitutes the place of slaughter the apocalyptic Armageddon. The events of the sixth vial in the aggregate prepare “the way of the kings” which arise in the light of the Sun of Righteousness. The way of these kings is the career of judgment marked out for them in the full development of the seventh vial, which is at once the consummation of the Seventh Trumpet, and the Seventh Seal; and the filling up of the wrath of the Deity upon the nations. The angriness of these, the coming of divine wrath, and “the time of the dead that they should be judged and rewarded,” are series of events which synchronize with the adventual epoch of the sixth vial. In this epoch, the dead in Christ, both just and unjust, are caused to stand upon their feet again among the living. This anastasis, or standing again, precedes the destroying of them “who destroy the earth” Rev. 11:18. The honor of executing the judgment written belongs to all those saints whose names may, in the judgment which begins at the house of Deity, be found registered in the Lamb’s book of life Rev. 20:15; Psalms 149:9; Daniel 7:22. Hence, resurrection must precede the setting in of judgment; and this must begin at the house of the Deity; “and if it first begin there, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of the Deity?” 1 Peter 4:17. It will be “destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power” 2 Thess. 1:9.

The destruction issuing from this glorious presence, is styled in Rev. 14:10. “tormenting with fire and brimstone in the presence of the Holy Angels, and in the presence of the Lamb.” The end of the eleventh chapter expresses this torment in the words, “lightnings, and voices and thunderings, and an earthquake, and great hail.” Hence the conclusion of the eleventh chapter, with which the second volume of this exposition is concluded, is synchronous with all of the fourteenth chapter from the beginning to the end. I say from the beginning of it, because all the things therein represented are subsequent to the saints standing with the Lamb on Mount Zion. Now, when Christ comes, as I have shown in my second volume, he does not come direct to Zion. Moses, in his prophetic blessing of the sons of Israel, says, “Yahweh came from Sinai and rose up from Seir unto them; he shined forth from Mount Paran; and he came with ten thousands of saints” (Deut. 33:2). He comes to Sinai before he can come from Sinai; and to Seir and Paran before he can rise up and shine from them. He comes to Sinai in the adventual epoch of the sixth vial; and to Mount Zion consequent upon the Armageddon overthrow, by which the sixth Vial is closed, and the Seventh Vial period is inaugurated.

The time of the Seventh Vial is that portion of the time of the end chronologized in the words of Micah, “according to the days of Israel’s coming out of the land of Egypt” (ch. 7:15). It requires no proof that these days were a period of forty years. Hence, in the vindication of the Holy from injury and violence after the termination of the 2400 years, a judicial period of forty years will be manifested. The object to be attained in the vindication of the holy, is the deliverance of the holy and the host from the treading under foot “the transgression of desolation” to which they have been subjected for 2408 years to the date of this work: in other words, the putting an end, or accomplishing, to scatter the power of the people of the holy yad-am-kodesh (Daniel 8:13–14; 12:7). The full import of these words is the restoration of the kingdom to Israel, in building again the tabernacle of David, that it may be as in the days of old; with the additional glory of Christ and his Brethren, the glorified Israel of the Deity, in possession of the throne (Amos. 9:11; Acts 15:16; 1:6; Matt. 19:28; Luke 1:32–33).

The work then of the seventh vial will be the setting up of the kingdom by the ELOAHH of the Heavens (Dan. 2:44). This work cannot be fully accomplished until the now widely scattered tribes of Israel are concentrated in the Holy Land, and restored to the independence they enjoyed under David and Solomon. No prosperity in the “breadth of the Great City spiritually called Sodom and Egypt,” can compensate the loss of this. They must be brought out of this Egypt in the seventh vial section of the time of the end, as was the generation out of the literal Egypt in the days of Moses, “with a mighty hand, and with a stretched out arm, and with fury poured out” (Ezek. 20:33). In other words, the seventh vial is the exodal period of Israel’s return from their enemies’ lands; and of the punishment of all peoples who have burdened themselves in any way with the Holy City (Zech. 12:2–3; Rev. 11:2). In the accomplishing to scatter the power of the people of the holy in this second exodus of the nation, the Spirit, who will co-work with the saints in their seventh vial execution of the judgments written, says in the testimony already cited from Ezekiel, “I will bring you out from the peoples, and will gather you out of the countries wherein ye are scattered, with a mighty hand and with a stretched out arm, and with fury poured out. And I will bring you into the wilderness of the peoples, and there will I plead with you face to face; like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I plead with you, saith the Lord God. And I will cause you to pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the bond of the covenant. And I will purge out from among you the rebels, and them that transgress against me: I will bring them forth out of the country where they sojourn, and they shall not enter into the land of Israel.” But concerning Israel cleansed from the rebellious; and, by continuing no longer in unbelief, prepared for the blessedness promised in Abraham and his seed, He saith, “in mine holy mountain, in the mountain of the height of Israel, there shall all the house of Israel all of them in the land, serve Me: there will I accept them, and there will I require your offerings, and the first-fruits of your oblations with all your holy things. I will accept you with your sweet savour when I bring you out from the peoples, and gather you out of the countries wherein ye have been scattered; and I will be sanctified in you before the nations. And ye shall know that I (the Anointed Jesus) am YAHWEH when I shall bring you into the land of Israel, into the country for the which I lifted up My hand to give it to your fathers.” This regeneration of the twelve tribes of Israel, and resettlement of them in the Holy Land, is a grand and important result of the seventh vial outpouring of judgment. When it is consummated, “Yahweh’s servant David will be a Prince among them, and be their Shepherd.” They will have stood upon their feet an exceeding great army in their enemies’ lands; and from thence have opened for themselves a way by divine cooperation into the land of Israel, upon the mountains of which they will be, for the first time since the fourth year of Rehoboam, B.C. 982, one nation, and one kingdom, under one king. “They shall no more be two nations neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all.” The sanctuary will be in the midst of them, and the tabernacle also; and Yahweh will be their Elohim, and they shall be His people (Ezek. 34:23; 37:10, 11, 12; 22–27). This restitution of all things pertains to the seventh vial, which embraces “the times of” that “restitution of all things which the Deity hath spoken by the mouth of all His holy prophets since the days of Moses” (Acts 3:21). Jacob is saved out of his trouble; the yoke of Esau is at length broken from off his neck; and the first dominion, the kingdom, has come to the daughter of Jerusalem (Gen. 27:40; Mic. 4:8). The vindication of the holy is complete.

Now, as the reader may well suppose, this wonderful and mighty operation of Deity becomes an affair of world-wide interest and importance. It will not be a work of peace. The Frog-Dominion has been proclaimed to be peace: l’empire c’est la paix but not so the kingdom proclaimed in the gospel. This kingdom, in the period of its establishment, is not peace; but war, until it has been broken in pieces and subdued the four beasts of Daniel; and planted itself without a rival in all the earth. Such an enterprise as this may be planned and prepared, but cannot be executed in secret. It is therefore testified that “the nations shall see and be confounded at all Israel’s might: they shall lay their hand upon their mouth, their ears shall be deaf. They shall lick the dust like a serpent, they shall move out of their holes like worms of the earth: they shall be afraid of YAHWEH our Elohim, and shall fear because of thee” (Mic. 7:16). The testimony of Micah is developed in the forty years of the time of the end immediately preceding the Millennium, as the result of the Seven Thunders, by which, not the earth, but those who corrupt the earth, are destroyed (Rev. 11:18).

2. The End, Though Last In Development, First Revealed.

In studying the Apocalypse, the student cannot fail being impressed with a notable peculiarity, frequently illustrated, of its structural arrangement. The peculiarity is that of stating in the beginning first, that which is to be executed last. Thus, in the first chapter, the coming of Yahweh in clouds is announced; and his presence is symbolically exhibited: but it is not until the preterminal epoch of the sixth vial that He actually appears. So that it takes all “the things that shall be hereafter” exhibited in all the six seals, and so much of the seventh seal as is contained in the six trumpets; and so much of the seventh trumpet as is contained in all the five vials, and at least half the sixth, to develop the Advent. The apocalypse of the Ancient of Days, or his manifestation in his kingdom, is the end proposed in the prophecy. It is therefore first announced. It is the grand proposition to be illustrated and proved by the logic of events. The end divinely purposed is not stated first because it is to be first established, as the first thing to come to pass, after John had the vision; and because all “the things that shall be here-after” are to happen after it. The logical order of a prophecy in statement or fulfilment is first state, then illustrate, and afterwards prove. “Behold, he comes, and every eye shall see him.” This is a proposition, or purpose, stated; but after eighteen hundred years, not yet proved by its coming to pass. By what course of events will that coming be developed? By the events coursed out in the seals, trumpets, and vials, which are the illustration of how the end proposed is to be made identical with the proof. Hence, the end, though first in purpose, and therefore first verbally stated in the prophecy, is the last in development; and consequently not to be looked for as the first event of a prophetic series. The Son of Man in the midst of the lightstand-embodiment of the Spirit is the symbolical prefix to the prophecy of the seven epistles; but the actual manifestation of the Spirit’s presence in the midst of the redeemed is not revealed until he occupies the throne in the time of the ending of the Laodicean state (ch. 3:20–21). Again; this peculiarity is exhibited in the fourth chapter. Here the whole is occupied with a symbolical exhibition of the Spirit in covenant-manifestation. The throne and kingdom of David, termed Yahweh’s by the prophets, have been covenanted to Jesus and his Brethren, who are to possess them when “glorified together.” This purpose, or end proposed, is first represented to John; not because it existed then or since; but because all to be shown him, called “the things which shall be hereafter”, are to result in the development of that revealed purpose. It would be a great mistake to look for the subject-matter of the fourth chapter as extant in heaven or upon earth while John was in Patmos. There was no counterpart to them. The figuration was simply a symbolic vision, showing, that at some future time not specified in the chapter, there should be a throne established in the air, or firmament, of the Romano-Dragonice Universe, which should be possessed by an Omnipotent Theocracy, from which should “burst forth lightnings, and thunderings and voices;” and having thereby established its sovereignty, should rule with universal dominion. But, though so early exhibited in the scroll, it is not until the seventh trumpet period that the announcement is made of its actual development, saying, “The kingdoms of this world are become Yahweh’s and His Anointed’s” (Ch. 11:15). Thus the end, though first in purpose is in development the last; and we are taught that to establish this throne of omnipotence will require, according to the divine predetermination, the full development of all the events prefigured in the seals, trumpets, vials, and thunders.

Another notable instance of this structural characteristic of the apocalypse is found in the eleventh chapter. It occurs in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth verses. In these is announced the end purposed in the complete sounding of the trumpet, and therefore the consummation of the seventh seal; or, as it is expressed in ch. 10:7, the finishing of the mystery of the Deity, as he hath declared the glad tidings to his servants the prophets. This is finished en tais hemerais hotan melle salpizein, in the days when he (the Seventh Angel) shall sound; not “when he shall begin to sound,” as in the Common Version; nor while he is sounding; but when he shall have finished sounding, then the mystery shall be finished in the kingdoms of this kosmos or constitution of things, the unmeasured court of the Gentiles becoming Yahweh's and his Anointed's. The sounding being over, and the wrath of Deity, consequently, all expended, the mission of the FOUR LIVING ONES FULL OF EYES is completed: the “lightnings” flash no more, the “voices” are hushed, the “thunderings” burst forth no more from the throne, the vibrations of the “earthquake” have ceased, and the “hail” falls no more out of the heaven upon men. In other words, the “judgment given to the saints” has accomplished its work in putting them in possession of “the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven” (Dan. 7:27). For this cause, therefore, in the ascription of thanks to YAHWEH AIL Shaddai, the four belligerent Living Ones are withdrawn from the figuration; and the four and twenty elders only are in prostration before the Everliving One. The reader is aware that the saints are symbolized both by the Four Living Ones and the Elders, only in different relations. The Four represent them in their militant antagonism to the powers that rule the nations; while “the elders” represent them as victorious kings and priests in the glorious and peaceful possession of their conquests. When “the war of the great day of AIL Shaddai” is over, and peace obtains in all the earth, there is no more pre-millennial work for the saints to do as the “Four Living Ones full of eyes.” As militants they have “gotten the victory,” and their community is wreathed with the coronals which “they cast before the throne.” These are cast there when the cause of thanksgiving, rejoicing, and prostration has been developed. Hence, ch. 4:10, is parallel with ch. 11:16. The saints, no longer belligerent, give thanks because YAHWEH AIL-Shaddai has acquired great power on the earth and reigned. When this thanksgiving was dictated to John in Patmos, it was the revelation of a purpose—an end which Deity had predetermined. The “great power” had not been taken, nor the reign commenced, when the apocalypse was given to John. Nor have they yet; nor will they be till the end of the seventh trumpet. Hence, the eighteenth verse of the eleventh chapter does not treat of what is to ensue after the reign mentioned in the seventeenth verse has commenced. “The nations are angry,” not when the divine wrath is fulfilled, but when it comes. “The nations were made angry, and thy wrath came.” This arrival of the divine wrath is synchronous with the advent of Christ, and with the operation of the Frog-Power in the final development of its working upon the Papal False Prophet, as prefigured in the sixth vial (ch. 16:14–15). The arrival of the divine wrath in the advent of the YAHWEH-NAME from far with anger burning (Isaiah 30:27) is at the epoch of the resurrection of the saints. It is from this epoch that ch. 11:18 originates a series of events, which ultimate in the destruction of the destroyers of the earth, and in the conquest and appropriation of their kingdoms by the Four Living Ones constituted of the prophets, the saints, and the venerators of the divine name, small and great. So that the order of the prophecy according to its succession of events is first verse 18, then 19, and after this verses 15, 16, 17: but, as a verbal revelation, the last event which crowns the whole series is first indicated; and then an outline is given of the series which ultimates in the victorious consummation.

This structural characteristic of the primordial statement of the end, is illustrated also in ch. 14. In this the primordial statement is contained in the first verse. It specifies a great predetermined end—the occupation of Mount Zion by the son of the Divine Father, together with those upon whom he has previously written the name of his Deity (Ch. 3:12). But this predetermined end is not the first thing executed. On the contrary, it is the last. The redeemed get possession of Mount Zion consequent upon the effect of the "voice out of the heaven" indicated in verse 2 the voice of a belligerent multitude, even the roaring voice of the Rainbow and Cloud-invested Angel, who takes victorious possession of the City where David dwelt.

Thus, the end, first in purpose, is the last developed, but first revealed in the prophecy. Not attending to, or ignorant of, this structural peculiarity, some have committed grievous errors in their efforts at interpretation and exposition. It has led them to affirm, that the apocalypse is all to be fulfilled after the advent of Christ; while others declare that its revelation has been fulfilled long ago. Both these extremes meet in absurdity, where they embrace and kiss each other. They are mere assumptions, and too ridiculous for a serious refutation. The former theory is very convenient for the ignorant and the indolent; for if the apocalypse as yet is none of it fulfilled, nor even to begin to be fulfilled till after the advent of Christ, all are upon one low, common level respecting it. He that knows much of doctrine and history is at equal disadvantage with him who knows nothing of either, and thus ignorance is strengthened and consoled.

There are others again who think that much of the apocalypse is fulfilled but have not discernment enough in things past and present to draw the line between the future and the past. Some of these have taken up a notion that all the vials are poured out after the advent of Christ! This imagination has been conceived in a misunderstanding of the fifteenth chapter. They have not perceived that the whole chapter is declarative of the end purposed to result from the outpouring of the vials. It is declarative of the victory of the saints over the constituted authorities of the nations; and the subjection of these to the King of Kings because of manifested national judgment. They err also in supposing, that "the seven last plagues" are identical with "the seven vials." The seven vials contain "the seven last plagues;" but the plagues and the vials are not severally synchronical. On the contrary, the seven last plagues are synchronical only with the seventh vial; and so much of the sixth as obtains between the advent of Christ and the opening of the judgments of the seventh, is the epoch when One of the Four Living Ones gives the plagues to the angels. The seven last plagues are identical with the Seven Thunders; and as they are comprehended in the seventh vial, the giving of the plagues is represented in the presentation of the "seven golden vials." These vials contain much more than the "seven last plagues." They contain first plagues, styled "these plagues" in ch. 16:9, as well as last plagues. The plagues of the vials exhibited in this chapter are separated by the thief-like advent of Christ. "Last plagues" imply others that are not the last. The former plagues precede the advent; and all developed after it are "the seven last plagues." What extraordinary blindness to affirm that none of the vials are poured out till after Christ comes, while his coming is predicted under the sixth! This sixth-vial prophecy is subversive of the notion. The position it occupies as a speaking hieroglyphic shows, that five of the vials, and a considerable part of the sixth, were to be poured out before the advent. It is impossible therefore for the outpouring of all the vials to be delayed till that event. When it takes place, then in giving judgment to the saints recently raised, judged, and chosen, as signified by the "golden girdles" and "pure and white linen," the golden vials are given to them; and they consummate in their seventh vial mission the work of the whole seven vials, which without their intervention would never ultimate in victory over the beast, his image, his mark, and the number of his name.

This structural feature appears in the prophecy of the seventh vial itself. This is given in the last five verses of the sixteenth chapter; while the result of the whole is briefly stated in three words of the first of them "it is done!" It is done consequent upon the pouring out of the vial into the air. The mystery is finished. But this finishing results only when there is no more wrath to pour out upon the air. Before the end thus primordially stated is developed, the voices, thunders, lightnings, earthquake, and hail, must do their work upon the Great City, the cities of the nations, and their political islands and mountains. When these are all disposed of judiciously, then, and not till then, will the consummation, primarily announced in the words “it is done” be established.

3. A Great Sign in the Heaven.

“And a Great Sign appeared in the Heaven; a Woman who had been invested with the Sun, and the Moon under her feet, and upon her head a wreath of Twelve Stars.”

Thus reads the text of Rev. 12:1. In the sixth verse this “great sign” is styled a “a great wonder.” The word semeion signifies “a work by which something is known.” A footstep in the sand is a mark by which it is known that a human being had been there. Hence the footstep is a sign, or mark with a signification; a mark by which something is signified. The mark is not the foot; but the impression stepped by the foot—the sign of the foot, in a like sense is the sign of the text to be taken. This first verse exhibits a mark, or sign, by which something may be known. To constitute the sign there is a woman, the sun, moon, and stars, an investment, and a wreath. These are but lesser marks or signs of the “great sign.” The woman, and the luminaries in the great sign are no more, as some imagine, a real human being of the female sex, and the lights of the sky, than the step of the foot is the foot itself. They are merely signs of something else, between which and them there is an analogy, or resemblance. These lesser marks when grouped together, as in the text, constitute “a great sign,” which must, therefore, be regarded as representing a notable development, a wonderful appearance in the apocalyptic heaven.

The sun, moon and stars of this great sign, belong to the heaven in which the sign appears. It is the same heaven as that in which “silence, as it were a half hour,” supervened after the departure like a scroll of the heaven which preceded it (Rev. 8:1; 6:14). These two apocalyptic heavens are evidently revealed in these texts. In my exposition of the sixth seal (see Vol. 2. pp. 276, 292), I treated of the abolition of the former of these two heavens, in the taking out of the way that which hindered the revelation, or manifestation of the Anomos, or Lawless One (2 Thess. 2:7). The removal of this obstacle is predicted apocalyptically in these words, “the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood; and the stars of the heaven fell into the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken by a mighty wind.” And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together. This prediction was fulfilled in the change of the constitution of the Roman Orb consequent upon the success of Constantine, crowned by the victory of Chrysopolis, A.D. 324. Until this epoch of eighteen years, “the heaven” of Daniel’s Fourth Beast styled apocalyptically the Dragon, had been in all its constituents pagan. The emperors were all worshippers of Jupiter, and his associate gods. The sunlight of their imperialism was reflected from the idol superstition, of which they were ex-officio the High Priests or Supreme Pontiffs. This was the moon of the heaven shining by reflected imperial light. So long as the Roman constitution of the Fourth Beast continued pagan, none but pagans could constitutionally execute the functions of the imperial office; for none but a pagan could be Pontifex Maximus of the Roman Orb. But the victories of Constantine changed all this. He shook the Dragonic Fig tree with a mighty wind, and caused the stars of the heaven to fall into the earth, as perished figs from the parent tree. He slew with great and sanguinary defeats the adherents of the State Superstition, so that “the moon became as blood.” She no longer walked in the brightness of imperial favor, reflecting to the earth the glory of the Roman Sun. The testimony of Jesus Christ against idolatry, borne by his witnesses, had alienated the popular mind from Jupiter and the gods, though it had failed to convert it to the gospel. The priests of the idols having lost their hold upon the affection of the multitude, the way was prepared for the subjection of Roman Idolatry to the Catholic, or Laodicean Apostasy. The consummation was necessarily sanguinary; for the testimony of history, and present experience, show that a minority in arbitrary power can only be brought to abdicate by the arbitrament of the sword. This award was appealed to by the contending parties of the day. The issue was between the PAGANS and the CATHOLICS; or between a pagan minority in place and power, and a majority of anti-pagans of all varieties and shades, who desired a change in the civil and ecclesiastical constitution of the Roman State. In their appeal to arms the power of the minority was broken. It could no longer bring an army into the field to defend the interests of the idols constitutionally vested in their priests; so that nothing remained but the favor of an infidel and alienated multitude, inconstant as the wind. The revolution was complete. The ancient order of things incorporated with the reigning idolatry was cancelled, and the scroll of its constitution rolled up out of the way. The pagan imperialty became black as sackcloth of hair. Since the death of Licinius, the last of Constantine's rivals, only one worshipper of Jupiter has occupied the Roman Throne. The total eclipse of the pagan sun, the sanguinary obscuration of the brightness of the pagan moon, and the hurling of the pagan stars into the lowest walks of life among the people, finally and effectually signalized the departure of the pagan heaven as a scroll rolled up. We have witnessed the departure of a heaven as a scroll when it is rolled up, in the collapse of the Southern Confederacy. The dispersion of the southern forces resulted in the abolition of its civil constitution, and the consequent suppression of all things related to it; so that with the exception of the calamities entailed, it is as though it had never been. Such was the collapse of Roman Idolatry in its church and state constitution, or heaven. Its forces were overpowered and dispersed, and as the world never "wonders" after a sinking cause, but is always ready to worship success, it easily transferred its allegiance to the more powerful rival which had dethroned it.

Thus the idol-heaven of Daniel's Fourth Beast-dominion was rolled out of the way by the judgments of the Sixth Seal to make room for a new heaven with its own appropriate luminaries. This "heaven" was a church and state constitution of things, in which the Apostasy, foreshadowed in the epistle to the ecclesia at Laodicea, shone with all the brightness and glory an unscrupulous world lying under the wicked could confer upon a system of delusion congenial to it. Its sun, moon, and stars shone brightly. Though a new constitution of the aerial was proclaimed, the sun was not abolished. The storm-clouds of a departing idolatrous institution had blackened it. It no longer shone in the splendor of pagan majesty which was totally eclipsed; still the supreme power continued to be a diademed imperiality. It was the same twelve-starred Sixth Head which was developed in the Augustan epoch of Daniel's "dreadful and terrible" beast. When the half hour's silence invaded the heaven, the "mighty wind" which had been rudely shaking the Roman Fig-tree for eighteen years, was calmed; and the sun of imperial power and majesty emerged again from the hair-sackcloth blackness of the darkening and sanguinary revolution by which it had been obscured. It emerged again to shine with an unclouded blaze upon an entirely new order of things—an order, such as the sun in the natural heaven had hitherto never shone upon since he was placed there to rule the day; an order therefore, which, in the words of the apocalypse, might fitly be represented as "a great sign in the heaven."

In the "great sign" of ch. 12:1, the Roman Sun is no longer invested with blackness, but invests a sign-woman with a blaze of glory peculiar to himself—"a woman invested with the sun." Whatever the woman may signify, this investiture symbolizes the clothing of the thing signified with supreme imperial authority; so that whatever might emanate from the woman would be by the sanction and co-operation of the highest orders of the state.

The woman, or Laodicean Community, could not have been invested with a more appropriate symbol than "the sun," expressive of the imperial embrace, as well as of the particular emperor by whom she would be patronized. Gibbon informs us that Constantine had a particular veneration for

Apollo, or the sun, to which Julian alludes in his orations. His words are, “The devotion of Constantine (while yet in embryo) was more peculiarly directed to the genius of the sun, the Apollo of Greek and Roman mythology; and he was pleased to be represented with the symbols of the god of light and poetry. The unerring shafts of that deity, the brightness of his eyes, his laurel wreath, immortal beauty, and elegant accomplishments, seem to point him out as the patron of a young hero. The altars of Apollo were crowned with the votive offerings of Constantine; and the credulous multitude were taught to believe, that the emperor was permitted to behold with mortal eyes the visible majesty of that tutelary deity; and that either waking or in vision, he was pleased with the auspicious omens of a long and victorious reign. The sun was universally celebrated as the invincible guide and protector of Constantine; and the pagans might reasonably expect that the insulted god would pursue with unrelenting vengeance the impiety of his ungrateful favorite in his becoming a Laodicean Catholic. Diocletian had chosen Jupiter, and Maximinian, Hercules; but Constantine preferred the sun before all the gods of his fathers, as his guardian and protecting deity.” When, therefore, Constantine came to occupy the Roman throne, and was manifested as Supreme Bishop of the Catholic Church, this Laodicean community might fitly be said to have been “invested with the sun.”

The position of the imperially invested woman in this “great sign” with “the Moon under her feet,” indicates that she occupies the former place of the Roman Moon. In the heaven which had departed as a scroll, there was no woman standing upon the moon. There was simply the moon-hierarchy invested with the light of imperialism by which it shone; and between this hierarchal moon and the throne of the Dragon power, nothing intervened. But the Constantinian Revolution, or “great earthquake” of the Sixth Seal, had baptized the idol-hierarchy in blood; so that the moon became AS BLOOD.” The sun and moon were not annihilated, but only subjected to changed conditions consequent upon the great earthquake revolution. This popular convulsion exalted one from among the people, and placed her in the moon’s orbit. The light and glory of the imperial majesty fell upon her. The rays whose brightness had formerly glorified the priests of Jupiter, and conferred dignity upon his superstition, were now intercepted by a Hierarchy more favored by the state. This new hierarchy had been elevated by the earthquake above the old one; so that, in the “great sign,” their relative position is symbolized by the former moon being subjected, or placed under the woman’s feet.

4. The Sun-Invested Woman

This ch. 12:1 is the second place in the general prophecy where a figurative woman is introduced. The first place in which the Spirit speaks specifically of one is ch. 2:20. In his epistle to the Star-Angel presbytery of the ecclesia in Thyatira he charges it with suffering, or tolerating, teachers and seducers within its jurisdiction, whose traditions were destructive of those “servants” who received them. Those teachers and seducers constituted a class of men of which Balaam is a representative. They “ran greedily in the error of Balaam’s reward” (Jude 11). They were seducing spirits and demons who spoke lies in hypocrisy (1 Tim. 4:1, 2): false teachers privily bringing in destructive opinions, and denying the Despot who bought them. Through covetousness, with feigned words, they made merchandise of professors unstable in the faith, sporting themselves with their own deceivings. They had once known the way of righteousness, and by the obedience of faith it inculcates had become children of God. But they afterwards forsook the right way, and went astray. Their heart was exercised like Balaam’s with covetous practices; and without regard to the honor and interests of the truth, they zealously and volubly entertained their hearers with crotchety conceits and speculations. Their teaching and practices favored the wantonness and lusts of the flesh. The inconstant and unstable among the saints favored their traditions, which proclaimed a liberty in things which the word condemns. This licentiousness strengthened the flesh to which it is congenial; and as this was developed, the power of the word became impotent; their hold upon it was relaxed; they became entangled again in the pollutions of the world, and were overcome of their inordinate desires. Thus these teachers and seducers, with the disciples they had drawn away after them by the perverse things they taught, though they zealously contended for one God against the idolatry of the Roman State, adopted opinions and practices applauded by the profane. They “committed fornication, and ate things sacrificed to idols.” For this contemptible “mess of pottage” they sold their birthright; and not only ruined themselves, but caused the truth to be evil spoken of by those whom it was designed to benefit (2 Pet. 2).

The gold medallion depicted above, commemorates the entrance of the triumphant Constantine into Rome after the defeat of Maxentius, and shortly before the defeat of Licinius. The coin gives honour to the Invincible Sun-god, whilst the Emperor also acknowledges the God of the “Christians”. In his coins and monuments, Constantine honoured the pagan gods (and particularly the Sun god) as well as the so-called Christians.

This illustration is taken from a Roman Catholic catechism, and pictures Mary with twelve stars circling her head and the crescent moon under her feet. It is significant that the Egyptian goddess of fertility, Isis, is similarly pictured, and that The Apocalypse identifies the Apostasy with Sodom and Egypt (Ch. 11:8).—Publishers

Now teachers and seducers of the Balaam type either gained the ascendancy in the ecclesias, or not being able to maintain themselves therein, separated from them, and organized “churches” to suit themselves in which they could lord it over their flocks. But whether tolerated within the ecclesias, as in Thyatira, or separated in distinct and independent congregations, they were all prefigured by a woman. The character of this figurative woman is known to the faithful by the name she bears. She is in certain relations apocalyptically styled JEZEBEL, because of the analogy subsisting between the character of the infamous daughter of Ethbaal and wife of Ahab, and that of the teachers and seducers by whom the Laodicean Catholic Apostasy was organized and perfected within the Anti-pagan Community. The original Jezebel essayed the utter abolition of Yahweh’s worship in Israel; and substituted the adoration of other deities, with the lascivious abominations which had formerly brought extermination upon the Canaanites. Her fate also made her a fit emblem of the apocalyptic Jezebel, whose children will be eaten by dogs in the day of Jezreel (Psa. 68:23). The false teachers and seducers of the first three centuries, although they did not avow it as their purpose, effected completely what Jezebel aimed to accomplish in Israel. They utterly abolished “the doctrine of Christ” by their traditions; and if it had not been for “a little strength” found among a very small remnant that kept the Spirit’s word, and had not denied His name, “the Israel of the Deity” would have been entirely transformed into “the Synagogue of Satan.” The Star-Angel Presbytery of Thyatira was too tolerant of “the depths of Satan as they taught,” for the Spirit’s approval; for, after commending the angel’s love, service, faith, patience, and works, he adds, “Notwithstanding, I have a few things against thee, because thou sufferest that woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and seduce my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed to idols.” In this toleration the Star-Angel or Eldership, was culpable. They ought to have silenced their false teaching, and to have permitted nothing to reach the ears of the flock not in harmony with the written word. This would have preserved “the unity of the faith and knowledge of the Son of God;” and have prevented the development, out of the One Body espoused to Christ, of a self-complacent Catholic Jezebel, who in the epoch of the “great sign” was at once wretched, and miserable and poor, and blind, and naked” (Ch. 3:17).

Such was the figurative antipagan woman we behold exhibited in the heaven invested with the sun’s majesty, and his ancient lunar idolharlot made subject “under her feet.” The “great sign” represents her situation as it appeared, to the outer world, for under another aspect of things, the “few names not defiled” of the same figurative woman are represented by “the remnants of her seed who keep the Commandments of the Deity, and hold the testimony of Jesus Christ.” Hence the figurative woman of ch. 12, invested with the Roman Sun, and fleeing from the Dragon, represents the whole ANTIPAGAN COMMUNITY; the vast majority of which answered to Jezebel and her children; while the remainder, with whom alone the doctrine of Christ was to be found, refused to have anything to do with a church in alliance with the “dreadful and terrible beast having seven heads and ten horns.” These two divisions of the antipagans, though opposed on the question of church and state alliance, were agreed in their hostility to the ascendancy of the existing Imperial Idolatry, which grievously afflicted them all. The first ecclesiastical separation of these two divisions did not occur till after the birth of the woman’s son, who was to rule all the Greek and Latin nations with an iron sceptre. When this event transpired, the anti-state church party repudiated the desecrating alliance with emperors and their courts. They refused to recognize the emperor’s claim of being at once the representative of the Sixth Head of the Dragon, and Bishop of the Bishops of Christ. The truth was with this party. They seceded; and by their secession incurred the enmity and bitter hostility of the New Church imperially established. The secessionists became the subject of virulent persecution by this new power, which caused them to take refuge in the wilderness. In this flight they are prefigured by the woman, who therefore leaves behind her the sun and moon, and wreath of twelve stars^u

But this transient appearance of the woman in the heaven characterizes the sun, moon and stars she had repudiated. They had become the catholic luminaries of a new heaven; which, under the sounding of the fourth wind-trumpet, are found ruling the day and the night of the Catholic Roman Orb. The transient standing of the woman upon the moon indelibly stamped the character of Jezebel upon it; and proclaimed it to be the lunar representative of the Laodicean Synagogue of Satan; which ever since has been allied, in some form or other, to the blasphemous and ferocious despotisms of the world.

But, though “the Lamb’s Woman” refused to be allied to the Roman State, and retired into the wilderness, the State-Church Woman, Jezebel, was not so scrupulous. As “the church by law established” she retained her place in the heaven; and became “the Great Harlot” of the world. Little notice is taken of her apocalyptically until she is exhibited in ch. 17:1, in all the enormity of her profligate career. In this scene, she appears in the wilderness, into which the Anti-State Church Woman fled. She is seen “drunk with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the witnesses of Jesus;” and sitting upon a scarlet-colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns. She represents a “great city” of polity, “reigning over the kings of the earth.” Her name in the beginning was Jezebel; but in the crisis of her fate it is also “Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots, and Abominations of the earth.” She reigns until the Ancient of Days is revealed, who “casts her into a bed, and them who commit adultery with her into great tribulation, and kills her children with death” (Ch. 2:22). This is the end of Jezebel in the day of Jezreel (Hos. 1:11).

A different destiny, however, is apocalyptically indicated for the woman espoused as a chaste virgin to Christ. She entered the imperial presence, but soon found that it was impossible to enjoy imperial favor and protection and maintain her honor and allegiance to her Divine Husband in purity and truth. She therefore fled from the sunshine of royalty, and left behind her the Jezebel of her communion, to whom the meretricious blandishments of courts were altogether congenial.

While her Jezebel counter-self remained invested with the Roman sun, and acquired and exercised dominion over the kings of the earth, she was sojourning in the wilderness; in which, however, Jezebel afterwards succeeded in establishing her blasphemous, licentious and sanguinary rule. The Anti-Jezebel Woman dwelt in the wilderness as many months of years as Israel did years in the exodus from Egypt; and two months of years more. She remained there 1,260 years, or forty-two generations of years after her flight; and will continue trodden underfoot by the lovers and protectors of Jezebel until the end of another period of 1,260 years, when the Ancient of Days will come, and avenge the wrongs she has suffered, in the judgment which shall sit. At this crisis, she is carried to the Lamb to whom she has been so long espoused. Her husband who is her head is Christ. In “the time of the dead,” having “made herself ready”, she is “arrayed in fine linen clean and white” (ch. 19:7, 8). Her marriage with the Lamb establishes such a oneness between those she represents and Christ, as exists between him and the Father in heaven. She is then “the Holy and Great City, the New and Holy Jerusalem, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband” (Ch. 21:2, 10). When thus “glorified together with Christ” (Rom. 8:17), the Jezebel-Synagogue of Satan will “be made to come and worship before her feet, and to know that Christ has loved her” (Ch. 3:9). Jezebel’s children will have been slain with death, and her communion and sovereignty abolished; and the only woman seen in the heaven will be the glorified fugitive of the wilderness; clothed with the sun of Righteousness, the moon of the Laodicean Apostasy under her feet. and upon her head a wreath of twelve Apostolic Stars.

What a remarkable contrast between these two apocalyptic women. The one, Jezebel, the Great Harlot and the Mother of Harlots; the other, the Lamb’s wife and the Mother of all the Saints. The former, sovereign in all times of the Gentiles; the latter, trampled underfoot of the Gentiles in all their times; and persecuted with the utmost rancour and bitterness of hate: the former, “arrayed in purple and scarlet-color, and decked with gold and precious stones, and pearls, and reigning over the kings of the earth;” the latter, clothed in sackcloth, and the habiliments of subjection: the former, the embodiment of ignorance, superstition, cruelty, blasphemy, hypocrisy, and vice; the latter, holy, harmless, undefiled, and without fault before the throne. Nor is the difference of their destiny less striking. Jezebel is first hated by her subject kings, who make her desolate and naked, and eat her flesh and burn her with fire (Ch. 17:16); and afterwards, having somewhat of intermission from his rough usage, she is utterly and forever destroyed out of the way by YAHWEH ELOHIM, who avenges on her the righteous blood she has caused to be poured out upon the earth. The world being thus freed from the accursed presence of the Jezebel-superstitions of “Christendom” so-called; the nations henceforth enlightened, regenerated, and saved, walk in the glorified fugitive’s light; who, for a thousand years, sheds the glory of the divine majesty with which she is invested upon all peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues; all of them blessed with faithful Abraham, in Abraham and his seed (Gal. 3:7–9). This blessedness under the government of Christ and his Bride is the theme which concludes the Apocalypse given by the Deity to Jesus Christ.

5. The Wreath of Twelve Stars

In this “great sign” is seen upon the head of the Sun-Invested Woman “a wreath of twelve stars”. Thus I have rendered in my translation the words stephanos asteron dodeka. The twelve stars were set in a stephanos, not in a diadema. If there had been seen upon her head a diadem of twelve stars, it would have indicated that she was an integral part of the diademed sixth head of the dreadful and terrible dragon, all of whose heads are diademed. But no; the “crown” of the C.V., was a stephanos, and not a diadem.

Now, the reader of the former volumes of this exposition is aware of the important apocalyptic difference there is between a stephanos and a diadem. The former was given to a combatant when victorious in his conflicts; the latter is the symbol of regal and imperial, or elective sovereignty of an established order. The Antipagan Woman was a combatant community, to whom dominion and power over the nations were promised, as a prize to be contended for, and bestowed upon the victor (Ch. 2:26, 27). This prize was signified by a stephanos. If she were victorious, her success would be indicated by a stephanos upon her head, as in the “great sign”.

It may be remarked here, that the antipagan Woman and the arrowless Archer of the first seal are representative of the same community in its warfare “against the principalities, powers, world-rulers of the darkness, and the spirituals of the wickedness in the heavenlies of the Roman Orb (Eph. 6:12). The Antipagan Archer went forth to conquer the Græco-Latin Dragon. He had first to overcome and dethrone Jupiter and the gods, “by the blood of the Lamb, and the word of his testimony;” and afterwards to take possession of the diadems enthroned under the whole heaven, and to rule their nations for a thousand years. Significant of this it is written in ch. 6:2, edothē auto stephanos, there was given to him a stephan, or wreath. John saw that the archery of this communion, to which he himself belonged, was prevailing “against the darkness of the course of things”—tou aionos toutou—which obtained while he was in Patmos. He saw it, therefore, going forth “conquering, even that it might conquer.” Its career of conquest, though harassed by the enemy, was not to be stopped. The stephan was to be placed upon the woman’s head by the highest authority in the state, as the result of “a great earthquake,” or revolution, which should place her son upon the throne. When John in vision saw the archer ride forth upon the white horse he had not then won the stephan. He had a combat for the faith of over two centuries before him; at the end of which the fraternity he represented was seen in the heaven invested with the sun, the moon in subjection, and the stephan of victory emblazoning her head with its stars. Thus far the triumph was complete: nevertheless, the earnest or type only of a greater yet to come.

But, the placing of a simple stephan upon the Woman’s head would have merely signified that she was a victor. But what was the prize of victory? What had she gained by her victory over the Dragon persecutor, which accused her people incessantly before the Deity? This question is apocalyptically solved by the TWELVE STARS inserted in the wreath. These were the twelve most conspicuous stars of the Roman Firmament. They were stars of the first magnitude which excelled all the other stars in the glory of their position. There were none brighter in the political astronomy of the state. They were the stars of that imperial dragon-headship of which it was remarked to John in chapter 17:10, saying “ONE IS.” These stars of this Sixth Head at the time of the apocalyptic going forth of the archer of the first seal were exactly twelve, and may be enumerated chronologically thus—

2.

The SECOND STAR was Tiberius Caesar, successor to Augustus. In the 15th year after being made the colleague of Augustus, “the word of God came to John the son of Zachariah in the wilderness;” and he began to preach. This was 483 years from the 20th of Artaxerxes, the beginning of Daniel’s seventy weeks. John was aged 27; Jesus 26 years and six months A.D. 26

At the end of three years and a half, Jesus having been immersed, and John cast into prison, Jesus began to preach the gospel of the kingdom. This began the second half of Daniel’s seventieth week A.D. 30

At the end of Daniel’s Seventieth Week, or 490 years from the 20th of Artaxerxes, which was the 22nd of Tiberius Caesar, sin was condemned in our common nature by the crucifixion of Jesus Christ

3.

Tiberius dies in the 23rd year of his reign, and is succeeded by the THIRD STAR, named Caius Caesar Caligula

A.D. 33

Of this human monster Tiberius said, that he had brought up a serpent for the Roman people; concerning whom he expressed the wish that they had but one neck, that he might cut it off at one stroke. He died

The FOURTH STAR was Claudius Caesar. The famine mentioned in Acts 11:28, pervaded the whole Roman Habitable under this star. He reigned not quite fourteen years, and died aged 63

5.

The FIFTH STAR was his successor Tiberius Claudius Nero. This Caesar for the first five years reigned with applause, being provoked to good conduct by the perpetual admonitions of the renowned Seneca. But changing his manners, he sunk to the lowest depths of degradation. He reduced the greater part of Rome to ashes, and charged it upon the christians, upon whom he inflicted the most exquisite torture. He died by his own hand in the fourteenth year of his reign, aged 32

The SIXTH STAR, was Galba, who reigned 8 months.

7.

The SEVENTH STAR was Otho, remarkable for his wickedness, and the shortness of his reign, which scarcely exceeded three months. He died by his own hand, and was succeeded by a man of incontinent gluttony.

8.

Vitellius was the EIGHTH STAR, whose reign of seven months was signalized by the expenditure of thirty millions of dollars in feasting and riot. In the 57th of his age, he was dragged half-naked by a Roman mob into the forum, and with exquisite tortures torn to pieces, and thrown into the Tiber.

9.

The NINTH STAR was Vespasian. He emulated the excellences of Augustus, and grieved to inflict punishment when justice demanded it. He was, however, extremely avaricious. He reigned ten years, and died aged 69

10.

The renowned Titus was the TENTH STAR. On account of his singular humanity, he was called “the delight of mankind.” In the life-time of his father Vespasian he destroyed Jerusalem. He reigned rather more than two years, and died aged 41. He is supposed to have been poisoned by his brother who succeeded him

11.

Domitian was the ELEVENTH STAR of the Imperial Stephan. He persecuted the christians with the greatest rigour. He was a second Nero. John, the Apostle, was banished by his decree to the isle of Patmos, where the Apocalypse was revealed to him for the benefit of all true Christadelphians, or Brethren of Christ. After a reign of fifteen years, being detested on account of his cruelty, he was put to death by his own guards, aged 55

12.

The TWELFTH STAR of this “dreadful and terrible” succession Cocceius Nerva, a man of prudence and moderation, who acquired the dominion late in life. During his brief reign of one year and four months, John was restored to the society of his brethren and companions in tribulation. He died, aged 66, and was succeeded by Trajan

A.D. 94

In the foregoing chronological table the dates are given according to the true time, which is four years earlier than the regular era.

Such was the WREATH OF TWELVE STARS extended by the Deity as a prize to be gained by the conquest of the Dragon. All the twelve were imperial supreme pontiffs. For the archer-and-woman fraternity to carry off the prize, was for it to be wreathed with the imperial stephan of the Caesars; and to subdue their pontificate under their feet. This it did most effectually; and, as a sign prophetic of this great victory over the principalities, authorities, world-rulers, and spirituals of the Roman Heaven; and for the encouragement of all engaged in the good fight of faith against the gods, who had eyes to discern the import of the vision, the woman was photographed in the firmament of the Roman Orb, wreathed with the supreme pontifical authority

For two centuries after the reign of the twelve stars, the soldiers of the faith, when they perused the verbal description of the “great sign in the heaven,” would understand what was the stephan to be conferred; and would be filled with a full assurance of hope, that they would go on conquering until they obtained it. It was under this conviction, that on the opening of The Fifth Seal, they are represented as crying with a loud voice from underneath the altar, “How long?” How long till their brotherhood should wear the dodecal Caesarian starry stephan? They knew that this wreath of victory was Caesarian. A believer living in the beginning when the apocalypse commenced to be fulfilled; that is, at the accession of Trajan; knew that twelve Caesars had occupied the draco-Roman pontifical throne. From Augustus to Constantine there were about fifty-four emperors. Why, then, were there not as many stars upon the imperial stephan, seeing that it was gained when so many had sat upon the Italian throne? Because, I conceive, the number of the stars was given to indicate, that the opening of the apocalyptic seals was to begin when the twelfth imperial star had set; that is, with the reign of Trajan, who was a thirteenth, or number one of a new series. Trajan and his pagan successors may be said to have worn the crown of the Twelve Caesars But they could not retain it. It was wrested from them by the Woman, whose Jezebelson claiming to be her Head—the Supreme Pontiff of the Catholic Church—wreathed himself therewith; and then caused her to become a fugitive in the wilderness of the Great Eagle.

Ignorance and superstition have sadly misinterpreted the significance of this “great sign in the heaven.” An engraving published with the sanction of the authorities of the Mary-worshipping synagogue of New York City, as a frontispiece to a book entitled “The Glories of Mary,” interprets the sign as a signification of the “Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary.” In the centre of the picture is a woman standing upon a cloud. She stands, as it were, in the sun, with beams of light issuing from the palms of her hands downwards towards the earth, as if they were rays of grace being shed upon her worshippers. Around her head is a halo, in which is a circlet of twelve stars; and over these a diadem supported by winged angels resting upon the upper margin of the cloud on each side of the woman. Under her feet is the moon, and beneath this, the ocean and rocks of earth. Thus is represented the ghost of a dead woman having been taken up into heaven and being on exhibition there as queen; for the legend of the picture is “salve regina,” Health to thee, O Queen! Assuredly, nothing can be more remote than this from the true import of this “great sign”. The reader, unless he be a Mariolator or a Puseyite, need scarcely be told, that the sign is wholly irrelevant to the mother of Jesus; and but for the adoption of the heathen dogma of the immortality of the soul by the Laodicean Apostasy, such a signification could never have been invented. There is no such woman in being, whether in heaven above or in the earth beneath, as the Virgin Mary, body or ghost. The dust of what was once Mary is in “the pit of corruption,” or Sheol, and will there remain until “the time of the dead,” when she will stand again upon her feet the “blessed among women,” and “thenceforth all generations will call her blessed.” In all “the times of the gentiles,” however, she is non-existent. This is well known to all who are not drunk—drunk with the wine of the abominations and filthiness of Jezebel’s fornication (Apoc. 17:4; 18:3). Hence the object of the adoration of Romanists is the merest fiction that can be conceived. They have deified nonentity, and fall down and worship the conceit as the goddess-queen of heaven. This is not only folly, but the idiotcy of pietism notably characteristic of the ecclesiasticism of our day.

But not only have Romanists missed the truth of this great sign, but their Protestant brethren likewise. Dr. Newton, a former Bishop of Bristol, in his work on the prophecies, page 600, in commenting most meagrely upon this sign, says, “St. John resumes his subject from the beginning, and in ch. 12:1, 2, represents the church as a woman, and a mother bearing children to Christ. She is ‘clothed with the sun,’ invested with the rays of Jesus Christ, the sun of righteousness; having ‘the moon,’ the Jewish new moons and festivals, as well as all sublunary things, ‘under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars,’ an emblem of her being under the light and guidance of the twelve apostles.” This is all he can see signified by this great sign! The bishop of Jezebel’s English daughter has certainly made a nearer approach to the import of the sign than Jezebel herself. He does perceive that the woman represents church of some kind—that she is a sign-ecclesiastical woman, and not the emblem of a phantasma yclept the Queen of Heaven. But more than this he sees nothing signified.

The Rev. E. B. Elliott, however, does not agree with the interpretation of his ecclesiastical superior. He admits with him that church in some sense is meant by the woman in the sign; but this is all. On page 8, vol. 1, he says, speaking of the sign, “But what the things prefigured hereby? This is the question. And first there can scarce be meant by the solar emblem, I think, what so many commentators have suggested in explanation—the church’s investiture with Christ, as the sun of righteousness. The sun is no where in the Apocalyptic imagery made the representative of Christ. His countenance with its own intrinsic light is described as like the sun, not as borrowing the sun to enlighten it: and, when fully revealed in the heavenly city, as altogether superseding it to the favored inhabitants. Nor, again, by her having the moon subjacent can there be meant a trampling upon things sublunary. Can the moon signify things under the moon? Consistency requires that we explain these greater luminaries to signify the chief rulers of the state, according to the general prophetic use of the symbols; and in the same way the stars, also seen in symbol, to signify lesser rulers in it. As to the precisely defined number of twelve stars—considering that the professing church on the Apocalyptic scene, including the true, was in an earlier vision (though one depicting somewhat later and worsen times) numerically symbolized as the twelve tribes of Israel, we can not well err, I think, in explaining them to signify the heads, or ecclesiastical rulers, of those twelve tribes. The rather so, since this interpretation agrees with that which is given by inspiration itself of almost precisely the same symbol in the earliest of all emblematic visions, the dream of Jacob's son Joseph: and indeed with that explanatory note given at the very commencement of the Apocalyptic visions by the revealing angel himself; 'the seven stars are the angels (or chief and presiding ministers) of the seven churches.'

"And thus we are led to see that the figuration here given of Christ's faithful church was not one universally or generally true; but designative of it at some remarkable and particular time and conjuncture, viz: when the ruling powers in the Apostolic world would be associated with it, as its decoration and support; and its ecclesiastical rulers, or bishops, would be recognized as dignified authorities before the world. And indeed much the same thing is indicated by the very representation of the woman as in heaven. For the heaven meant is evidently that of political elevation; just as in the vision, a little while since discussed by us, of the ascent of the witnesses; it being one in which the dragon might occupy a place as well as the woman; and one, the position in which is contrasted with dejection to the earth, as of a change from political power to political degradation."

Thus far Mr. Elliott, in whom there is certainly more light than in bishop Newton. Still Elliott's light is but darkness after all. The woman church being crowned by the heads, or ecclesiastical rulers, of the twelve tribes of the apostolic Israel, is a very far-fetched conceit. He admits, that the sun and moon of the sign belong to the heaven common to the woman and the dragon; what consistency then is there in not recognizing the twelve stars as belonging to that heaven also! Why interpret the sun and moon of the Roman Heaven, and twelve stars of the woman's own polity in apostasy? The stars are Roman as well as the sun and moon; and stripped of these in flight, the twelve stars remain with the sun and moon in the same heaven from, or out of, which she flies; otherwise, we ought to behold her a fugitive with a wreath of beauteous stars upon her head in the wilderness; a symbolization which would be incompatible with her trampled condition there.

6. The Woman Pregnant

"And being pregnant she cries being in pangs and straining to bring forth"—verse 2

En gastre echousa, literally, having in belly. She contained something within the pale of her communion afterwards to be manifested, or brought forth. She contained it, according to the fitness or decorum of the symbol, previous to her cries in parturition. She did not cry being in pangs and straining to bring forth after her investiture with the solar mantle of imperialism. Her being invested with the sun was consequent upon her giving birth to what was contained within her, and its being placed upon the Italian throne. Had her child not been born, the "great sign in the heaven" would not have there appeared. The Italian throne in Rome had first to be vacated by its pagan occupant, before anything produced from the Laodiceanized Christian Body, pre-figured by this woman, could be herpasthe, carried up from its birth-place in the Roman heaven to godship and its throne—pros ton Theon, kai ton thronon autou. Hence the "great sign" described in the first verse, was representative of the consummation of certain antecedents; and though first stated, was the last thing in the situation developed before the world.

The woman's pregnancy, then, preceded her cries. With what was she pregnant? This is now the question to be solved.

Zion and Jerusalem not only signify the geographical and topographical things so called, but all those, whether Jews or Gentiles, who have acquired citizenship in the Commonwealth of Israel by adoption through Jesus Christ. These all constitute a community, which in Isaiah 66:7, and Jer. 6:2, is likened to "a comely and delicate woman". In the former text the Spirit saith of her, "before she travailed, she brought forth; before her pain came, she was delivered of a man child." It was the same comely and delicate woman the exile in Patmos saw in the heaven invested with the sun. Isaiah's woman and John's woman are both represented as pregnant, and bringing forth, or giving birth to, a man child. But the difference existing is this, that John's woman brought forth under the Sixth Seal, A.D. 312–313; while Isaiah's woman brings forth under the Sixth Vial at "the time of the dead." There is difference also in the things brought forth. Isaiah's woman brings forth a multitudinous man child; that is, a nation, the "holy nation" (1 Pet. 2:9) consisting of the children of Zion, whom the earth is made to bring forth in one day. This nation is "born at once" before the travailing of Zion in the bringing forth her children after the flesh. As the saints are still mostly in the grave, and Israel and Judah in captivity among the nations—entombed in national graves—Zion is now a pregnant woman waiting until her time come to be delivered.

But we have to do with the comely and delicate Zion-woman as pregnant neither with Israel and Judah, nor the Saints, but with some other thing. What was that thing?

In writing to the Corinthian section of the Zion-community, Paul says, "I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present a chaste virgin to Christ" (2 Cor. 11:2). By this we are taught, that the "One Body," likened to a woman, is to be considered in the absence of Christ, not as a married, but as an espoused woman—a bride elect. Paul desired that she might be presented in all the purity of her original espousals, when she was "sanctified and cleansed in the laver of the water with doctrine" (Eph. 5:26). But, though this was his desire, penetrating the darkness of the future by the light of the Spirit, he could not forbear the expression of his fears lest the fate of Eve, the espoused of the first Adam, who was corrupted from the simplicity of the truth, should become the unhappy condition of the betrothed of the second Adam. "I fear," says he, "lest by any means, as the Serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ."

What Paul feared, and to prevent which he was "jealous over all with a godly jealousy," was even then secretly at work, impregnating the Christian Eve with principles which in fruition caused her to give birth to a Cain, who has been murdering his brother Abel for fifteen hundred years. It was even then at work. He styles it "the Mystery of the Iniquity"—the secret principles of that lawlessness which would develop itself into the Lawless One, or Man of Sin—anthropos tes hamartia—THE MAN OF THE APOSTASY. The seed-germ of this man was already in the womb of the espoused. "The mystery of the iniquity is already effectually working," says the apostle in 2 Thess. 2:7. Yes, it was this working, which, in verse 9, he styles "the inworking of the Satan," gave him so much trouble, and caused him such great anxiety, as evinced in his epistles. The principles of the apostasy were being inwrought, as he informs us, "with all power, and signs, and miracles of falsehood, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish." So effectual and specious was this inworking that, as Jesus predicted, even the elect would be endangered (Matt. 24:24). How could it be otherwise when, as Paul said to the Star-Angel of the Ephesian section of the betrothed woman, "Of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them" (Acts 20:30). These Star-Angel men had been made overseers of the ecclesia of the Deity by the Holy Spirit. They were the apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers, who had been supernaturally qualified by spiritual gifts "for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ" (Eph. 4:12). With all the sanction of these gifts from the ascended Lord himself, they had been recognised by the flock they episcopized as the ministers of Christ. How unlikely therefore, that they would speak perverse things, and, becoming deceivers, rend the flock as grievous wolves, instead of feeding it, as they were exhorted to do by Paul. But, unlikely as it might seem, such was the fact. It is true that the Lord had bestowed upon them spiritual gifts; but these gifts did not act compulsorily upon those who had them. They did not compel them to speak only the truth, and to use them aright; they only qualified them so to do if they were disposed; but if, under the temptation of the flesh, they were indisposed, they could falsely teach, and speak perverse things, and misapply the signs and miracles they were able to work, to confirm what they said; for Paul says plainly that “the spirits (or spiritual gifts) of the prophets are subject to the prophets” (1 Cor. 14:32): the prophets were, therefore, responsible for the right use of them. They could abuse them, and many of them did, to the overthrow of the faith of those who heeded them.

It was by the inworking of these unfaithful teachers constituting “the Satan”, “the Serpent,” that the Christian Eve was “corrupted from the simplicity which is in Christ.” The depths of the Satan as they taught (Apoc. 2:24) impregnated her with the mystery of iniquity. They formed within her the embryo of the Man of Sin. They preached a Jesus which was not according to the Jesus Paul preached; they taught another gospel than that proclaimed by him; and denied a future resurrection of the dead; or, which was equivalent thereto, said that it was already past. The inworking of this mystery, or perverse teaching, showed itself very early in the history of the Christian Eve. The first intimation on record of this subverting of souls is found in Acts 14:1–5. In this place we are told that certain who believed were not satisfied with the sufficiency of the simplicity which is in Christ for salvation. The belief of “the things concerning the kingdom of the Deity and of the Name of Jesus Christ;” and the immersion of such a believer for salvation from the sins of the past did not satisfy them. They required that Moses should be obeyed as well as Jesus; and that no gospel short of this would save any one: “Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses, and keep his law, ye cannot be saved.” This was their perversion of the gospel, which Paul terms “another gospel,” the preachers of which, though of celestial angelic origin, he pronounced “accursed.”

But these accursed preachers did not regard the anathema of Paul. They did not desist from the sowing of tares; but continued to heap tradition upon tradition until the distinctiveness of the truth was lost in “the commandments and doctrines of men” (Col. 2:22); and the way of truth came to be evil spoken of. Many followed their pernicious ways. Nor were the apostles able to extinguish their evil influence. Their reasonings and denunciations and threatenings, although sanctioned by the Spirit, failed to check or restrain the rapidly developing apostasy. Whole houses were subverted from the faith by these mercenary, unruly and vain talkers and deceivers (Tit. 1:11): and as error always progresses more rapidly than truth, the apostles found their influence waning, and the faithful falling into a minority; which steadily increased until there remained but few names who had not defiled their garments; and only a little strength to maintain the truth before the world (Apoc. 3:4, 8).

From these premises then, we perceive, that the Zion-woman community was no longer, as a whole, “a chaste virgin.” She had been corrupted and defiled by the subtilty, or “slight of men and cunning craftiness, whereby they laid in wait to deceive,” after the example of the beguilement of Eve. Hence, the woman-community, originally a chaste virgin, and all her constituents virgins undefiled, came to be pregnant with a multitude of “children tossed to-and-fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine.” These were tares, or “children of the wicked one, and sown of the enemy, the devil” (Matt. 13:38, 39). In the seven Apocalyptic Epistles, the constituents of this embryo apostasy are termed “liars,” “Nikolaitanes,” blasphemers, spurious Jews, “the synagogue of the Satan,” “Balaam,” “that woman Jezebel,” “her children,” “the Satan,” “the dead,” “the wretched and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked.” In the pentecostal beginning, these constituents were not found in the Christian Eve. Then “the multitude of them that believed were of one heart, and of one soul” (Acts 4:32). They had not yet been distracted and thrown into confusion by “grievous wolves,” and “men speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them,” for their own glory and advantage, reckless of the truth. But, in the course of three hundred years, all this was changed. The multitude of them who styled themselves Christians, were destitute of all unity of heart and soul; and had degenerated into a “wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked” set of catholic politicians. These gave character to the woman-community in the beginning of the fourth century. The Christadelphians or Brethren of Christ, at that crisis, were the “few names left, who had not defiled their garments.” These alone were the pillar and support of the truth;” and but for them, it would have died out from among men; and there would have been no woman to fly into the wilderness, and to be sustained there 1,260 years. But the Deity had reserved to Himself a remnant, styled “the remnants of her seed, who keep the commandments of the Deity, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ” (Ch. 12:17).

Thus the woman, who had become excessively attenuated, as it were skin and bone, a living skeleton, in all the period of her pregnancy, was grieved with a multitude of nominal professors ready for any enterprise by which they might acquire power and office in the state. This was the party with which she was pregnant. It styled itself “the HOLY APOSTOLIC CATHOLIC CHURCH;” and only waited for a catholic man of power to lead them in their attack upon the pagan Roman government. This was “THE COMING MAN” of the fourth century—a leading politician, a Man of Power, who should be able to make the party to which he should belong the ruling power of the state. With this party, waiting for the manifestation of its chief, the woman was pregnant before “she cried being in pangs and strained to bring forth.”

7. The Period of Pregnancy

The decorum of the symbol requires that the period of the woman’s pregnancy be analogous to the time during which in nature a woman compasses a child before she gives it birth. Now it is well known, that the time of gestation from conception to birth, is a period of forty weeks or 280 days. This being the “set time”—the time appointed by Deity for the development of children from the womb of humanity—it became a law of nature. If, therefore, one of “the deep things of Deity” in a revelation has to be symbolized by the natural result of a woman’s pregnancy, which is the birth of a child, it is necessary that the law of nature in the case become the measure of the duration of the symbolic pregnancy before the symbolic child is manifested in the world. This is styled “the decorum of the symbol,” and must be regarded in the interpretation of all symbols. To neglect it would produce sad confusion in an exposition. We must therefore find the woman in espousable existence 280 years before the manifestation of any MAN OF POWER, who in any sense could be decorously styled “her child.”

The espousal of the “one body,” symbolized in this prophecy by a woman, occurred on the day of that Pentecost, which first followed the crucifixion of the anointed Jesus. The apostles were instrumental in this betrothal, and promising the virgin bride of believers marriage to the Lamb when He should return to celebrate his nuptials with all who should be found faithful to the end. “I have espoused you,” says Paul, “to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ” He had begotten them to this honorable and glorious destiny by the truth he had taught them, and which they had received in its simplicity; therefore he says in another place, “to Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel” (1 Cor. 4:15).

But the Christadelphian Eve had not been espoused twelve months before it became manifest that iniquity was working within her. The case of Ananias and Sapphira was illustrative of this. The evil manifested through them was the evil principle which generated that “Mystery of Iniquity” which at length developed the Lawless One or Man of Sin. It was the spirit of falsehood, which Paul styles “the deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish” (2 Thess. 2:10).

This case of Ananias and Sapphira marks the commencement of the woman’s symbolic pregnancy. It occurred A.D. 33. This was the epoch of her impregnation. From this year of apostolic espousal to what Mr. Whiston styles “the famous proclamation and edict for the universal liberty and advancement of christianity (more correctly, “the Apostasy”) by Constantine and Licinius, A.D. 313, which put an end to the pangs of birth in the heaviest persecution that ever was then known, was exactly 280 years.” A pregnancy of forty weeks of years, at the end of which there was manifest a Man of Power, who professed the faith of the majority of the woman’s community; delivered her from the sanguinary oppression of the pagan “Devil and Satan,” whom he cast out of the heaven into the earth together with the stars of his tail; and who set himself up as the Bishop, or Overseer, episkopos (the Eyes and Mouth) of all the bishops of the Roman world.

8. The Woman Cries Being In Pangs

The woman was pregnant, and therefore, if she lived through the period of her painful gestation, her time would certainly come to bring forth. It is therefore written of her, “she cries being in pangs and straining to bring forth.”

The period during which she was tormented with the pangs of parturition were the “ten days,” or years, preceding the proclamation and edict of Constantine and Licinius, which were issued, as I have said, A.D. 313. This parturient crisis in the woman’s history is foretold in the letter to the ecclesia at Smyrna in these words—“the Devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried; and ye shall have tribulation ten days” (Apoc. 2:10). This ten days’ parturient tribulation came upon her with the opening of the fifth seal, A.D. 303. This is known in history as the great Diocletian Persecution, the severest ever inflicted by the great red pagan “Devil and Satan” upon professors of christianity. In this fifth seal period her “cries” were uttered “with a loud voice, saying, Until when, O Despot, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on the dwellers upon the earth?” Her pangs produced these outcries, which need not to be expounded here in detail, seeing that they have been sufficiently treated of in the second volume at p. 264. After the death of the Augustan emperor Galerius, in A.D. 311, her straining efforts began. Her pains now became forcing. She felt that she must die, if she did not give birth to a deliverer. The time of judgment and vengeance was to come at the end of “a little while,” chronon mikron; and of that little while about two years only remained for the manifestation of her son upon the throne of the Roman Orb. The straining efforts of the woman were synchronous with the opening of the sixth seal, by which was initiated that “war in heaven” which resulted in casting the pagan Dragon out, and her own investment with the sun; in allusion to which, Eusebius, in his Life of Constantine, says, “In short, as the sun, when he rises upon the earth, liberally imparts his rays of light to all, so did Constantine, proceeding at early dawn from the imperial palace, and rising as it were with the heavenly luminary, impart the rays of his own beneficence to all who approached his person”—lib. 1 ch. 43. The totality upon which these rays of the imperial beneficence fell, was all of the woman’s adherents previously to his drawing the line between those who recognized his EPISCOPAL SUPREMACY and those who rejected it as the usurpation of the ANTICHRIST. After this line was drawn, the rays of his beneficence were reserved exclusively for what he styled “The Holy Catholic Church,” of which he was the acknowledged episcopal head. All others were regarded as perverse and wicked.

9. “Another Sign in the Heaven”

“And there appeared another sign in the heaven, and behold a great fiery red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his heads seven diadems. And his tail draws the third of the stars of the heaven, and he cast them into the earth”—Verses 3, 4.

John saw “another sign in the heaven.” The first sign which he terms “a great sign,” was the woman invested with the sun. The same heaven was the scene in which the two signs were exhibited to all who observed them. It was the heaven of the Roman Orb in which shone all the luminaries of the Graeco-Latin body politic. The Dragon had long occupied the heaven of Italy; but it was not until the judicial crisis of the sixth seal that he was exhibited as “a sign.” He was significative of a power occupying a position of hostility to the Christian Eve, and to all who favored her. This third verse is the first place in the Apocalypse where this hostile power is mentioned by the name of Dragon, though it is not the first where the power itself is indicated. The power is referred to in ch. 2:10, where it is styled “the Devil.” Here the Smyranean section of the woman is exhorted to “fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer: behold, the Devil shall cast some of you into prison that ye may be tried.” The Devil was the power which owned and controlled the prisons into which then, as now, he casts all whom his prosecuting attorneys convict of violating his laws. All the sufferings of the woman in her gestation of 280 years were inflicted upon her by “the Devil and his Angels,” who reigned in the heaven of the Roman Orb. These were her opponents who sought her destruction. The Devil was her adversary, who, “as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour;” but she resisted him being steadfast in the faith; nevertheless, though cast down by the afflictions he heaped upon her, she was not destroyed (1 Pet. 5:8); but overcame him in the epoch of this other sign in the heaven (Apoc. 12:11).

This illustration is taken from The Apocalypse And Gospels by F. Bilton. Rev. 12:3 states: “Behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads”. This is not to be confused with the beast of the sea with its “seven heads and ten horns” (Rev. 13:1), for the description of the latter symbol represents the crowns as on the horns. The position of the crowns illustrates the time sequence. The dragon of Rev. 12:3 represents Rome before divided among the horns or kingdoms of Europe, and so the crowns are on the heads, or Rome proper; the beast has the crowns upon the horns, not on the heads, and so represents the period when Rome no longer dominates the horns which have secured independence of rule.—Publishers.

10. The Great Fiery Red Dragon

A dragon is a kind of beast, and therefore partakes in the characteristics of beasts. These in prophetic writing are the well-known symbols of destroying monarchies or powers; and, where the people of the Deity are found sojourning under their authority, the persecutors of the saints. But, though the dragon is a beast, he is apocalyptically distinguished from the beast of the earth, and the beast of the sea; nevertheless, he possesses certain characteristics in common with them both: for they are all found upon the same arena, though not contemporary in all their history.

The four beasts in Dan 7:3, the winged lion, the bear, the winged leopard, and the anonymous fourth beast, are explained in verse 17, as representative of four kings or powers, styled kingdoms in verse 23. The nameless fourth beast, that is not named by Daniel, is styled by John diversely a dragon and a beast, according to the subject he may be treating of.

The Hebrew tannin, and the Greek drakon, rendered in our English version dragon, it is evident from Ezek. 29:3, signifies a crocodile; the great scaly serpent-fish of the Nile, the symbol of the Egyptian power, styled “Pharaoh king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers.”

The dragon, then, whose force is in his tail, symbolized the power of the old Egyptian Polity. This, in the days of Moses, was the great enemy of Israel after both flesh and spirit. It embodied in its institutions all the filthiness, and superstition, and tyranny of human nature; and stood before the world as the great SIN-POWER of antiquity—"the Old Serpent, the Devil and the Satan."

But the empire of the Dragonic-Sin-power was westward. It did not remain enthroned in Egypt. Yahweh's servant Nebuchadnezzar transferred it to Babylon; whence in due time it migrated, and was at length found in the city of the Seven Hills. The power there, in the epoch of the sign, was the old Egyptian Dragon incorporate in the Graeco-Latin polity, which possessed Egypt, Syria, and the East. Hence, the territory of the Dragonic fourth beast of Daniel is apocalyptically and "spiritually called Sodom and Egypt, where our Lord was crucified" (Ch. 11:8); "the great city Babylon."

"The Dragon," says Daubuz, "is a crocodile, a creature which is ranked among the serpents by Horus Apollo; and is called by the Arabians Pharaoh, and which was held by the Egyptians as the symbol of all mischief. And therefore Typho being, in their belief, the author of all evil, was supposed to have transformed himself into a crocodile, or dragon. So that the principle of all evil, or Typho, was in the symbolical character represented by a crocodile or dragon; and under this symbol was the said principle worshipped. Agreeably whereunto in the Chaldean theology the principle of evil was called Arimanius; that is, the crafty serpent, from 'aruwm, crafty, and nachash, serpent.'"

Amongst profane writers may be mentioned Horace, who compares the Roman people, not only to a beast because of its ferocity, but to a many-headed beast—lib. 1 Ep. 1 ver. 76. The apocalypse denominates that Egypto-Roman monster a great seven-headed dragon.

The dragon was one of the military ensigns of imperial Rome. Ammianus Marcellinus, as quoted by Elliott, thus describes it: "The dragon was covered with purple cloth, and fastened to the end of a pike gilt and adorned with precious stones: its wide throat being opened, so that the wind blew through it; and it hissed, as if in a rage, with its tail floating in various folds to the breeze." He elsewhere often gives it the epithet of purpureus, purple-red; "purpureum signum draconis." In another note Mr. Elliott remarks that "in Trajan's time the dragon was a Dacian ensign, not a Roman; as appears from the bas-reliefs on Trajan's arch. A century afterwards it was, as a Roman ensign, sculptured on Severus' arch of triumph. Later in the third century it had become almost as notorious among Roman ensigns as the Eagle itself: and is in the fourth century noted by several authors. Among these John, surnamed Chrysostom, who flourished then, says that "the emperors wore among other things to distinguish them, silken robes embroidered with gold, in which Dragons were represented." Speaking of the procession of Constantine from Milan to Rome, Gibbon says, "he was encompassed by the glittering arms of the numerous squadrons of his guards and cuirassiers. Their streaming banners of silk, embroidered with gold, and shaped in the form of Dragons, waved round the person of the emperor".

At one time a purpurcus or purple-red dragon was used as a standard for Rome. It was first used as an ensign near the close of the second century, though it was not until the third century that its use had become common. It is most appropriate, therefore, that The Apocalypse should introduce it at this particular point of the prophecy.

Daniel's nameless "dreadful and terrible" fourth beast is a contraction, or condensation, of John's great fiery-red dragon, ten-horned beast of the sea, two-horned beast of the earth, image of the beast, and scarlet beast and drunken woman. These apocalyptic symbols are illustrative amplifications of the head, ten horns, eleventh horn, and eyes and mouth, of Daniel's "dreadful and terrible" beast, in its relations with the saints in all the 1260 years of their subjection, or down-treading by the Gentiles. In Daniel's description of it no mention is made of more heads than one. "The ten horns that were on his head." This is all recorded of its head. Daniel says nothing about "seven heads" on any beast shown to him. He only saw one; but behind this one were concealed seven others, of which we should have no more knowledge than he, had not the Apocalypse brought them into view. In this, the seven heads are brought out conspicuously. They are seen upon the Dragon, the Beast of the Sea, and the Scarlet-coloured Beast of the Wilderness. Though seen on different symbolic beasts, they are not different sets of seven; that is, one set of seven heads for the Dragon; and a set of different seven heads for the Marine Beast; and yet a different seven from either, for the Scarlet Beast of the Wilderness. They are one and the same seven heads upon all three beasts; so that the signification of them in connexion with the scarlet beast, is their signification as the heads of the Dragon and the Beast of the Sea.

11. The Seven Heads of the Dragon

I have said that behind the head seen by Daniel there were seven other heads which he did not perceive. This is equivalent to saying, that the head seen by him was an EIGHTH HEAD. This is the truth. The beast he saw was headed with this eighth head contemporary with its destruction by the saints. The seven heads, except the sixth, which precede this, have now no other political existence than what may be found on the page of history. They are things of the past, save only so far as the eighth is a partaker of the political character of the seven. The eighth head, in Apoc. 17:11, is styled a beast; as, “the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth in to perdition.” The eighth head is styled the beast, because a headless beast is a mere carcase, and incapable of action. All the seven heads, topographically viewed, being politically defunct ages before the judgment sits for the slaying of the Beast, it became necessary to give it an eighth that it might live on to the time when judgment should be given to the saints. The Eighth Beast is therefore the “dreadful and terrible fourth” in eighth head manifestation. Its history begins after the fall of the seventh head, and winds up in its perdition after the advent of the Ancient of Days.

But the seven heads have not only a political, or ecclesiastical and secular, signification; they have also a topographical one. By this, I mean, they represent the particular place, or city, where the seven heads, in their political manifestation, were to be enthroned. The heads were politically anchored to the capital of the body politic. They must be sought for there, and only there; for the legislative head of a dominion is constitutionally located at the seat of government.

Now “here is the mind which hath wisdom”—here is the sense or meaning which is true. “The seven heads are seven mountains, where the woman is sitting upon them.” This is a Hebraism; an idiom, in which “are” is used for represent. It is a form of speech often used in Scripture; as, of the rock smitten by Moses, it saith, “that rock was Christ” (1 Cor. 10:4); it represented Christ: “this bread is my body;” it represents my body: “the seven lightstands are the seven ecclesias;” they represent them: and in many other places too numerous for reference. The seven heads have a two-fold signification, the first whereof is given in Apoc. 17:9. They represent seven mountains. But, if nothing more had been said, we should have been at a loss with regard to the particular seven represented. It was therefore added, “where the woman is sitting upon them.” But what does “the woman” represent? There can be no doubt about the signification of this symbol; for John was informed that the woman represented “a Great City”—an Imperial City; even “that great city, which,” while he was in Patmos, is “having dominion over the kings of the earth” (verse 18). From the description, it was impossible that John could mistake as to the signification of this imperial woman. He knew, as we may know, that no other city could be meant than “the Seven Hilled City”—ROME. This is the only city situate upon seven mountains, in John’s day or since, that can be said to have dominion over the rulers of the earth. Her topography is seven heads, or elevations, of the land drained by the Tiber; and are thus named:

1. Mount Coelius;
2. Mount Viminal;

3. Mount Aventine;
4. Mount Esquiline;
5. Mount Quirinal;
6. Mount Capitoline;
7. Mount Palatine.

Upon these seven mounts Rome, styled by its historians, “the Eternal City,” is sitting; and, when the Apocalypse was revealed to John, contained a population of millions. She was founded by Romulus 753 years before the birth of Jesus Christ; so that in A.D. 1868 she is 2621 years old. Her limits are now greatly reduced. About thirty years before Christ, and in the days of Augustus Caesar, Rome contained two millions of inhabitants; and was fifty miles in circumference; but in 1847, she contained only 175,883 inhabitants, exclusive of Jews, whose number was computed at 8000. As long as she continues above ground she will be an interesting city. She contains 354 edifices, termed by Daniel mivtzeraï mauzzim, BAZAARS OF GUARDIANS; but, by “the daemons, foul spirits, and unclean and hateful birds” of “Christendom” so-called, “churches;” which, in their ignorance and folly, they have dedicated to ghosts or phantoms, which they have decreed to be immortal, and protecting guardians to all who worship them therein. Among these bazaars of Romish saints, St. Peter’s, the temple of the Roman God, holds the first rank, being the largest temple in the world. It is 666 feet long, 284 wide, and its magnificent cupola rises to the height of 408 feet. It was 200 years in building. It is the temple of “the god of the earth”, before whom, in belligerent antagonism, the saints and witnesses of Jesus stood; prophesying in sackcloths 12606 years (Dan. 11:39; Apoc. 18:2; 11:3). It is the temple in which is worshipped “the Man of Sin and Son of Perdition,” styled also “the Lawless One”; who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called a god or is revered: so that, as a god, he sits in the temple of the god, publicly exhibiting himself that he is a god” (2 Thess. 2:4). Such are the capital and chief temple of the apocalyptic Sodom and Egypt; the Queen City of the Gentiles, and most holy sanctuary of Satan.

The interior of the Basilica or temple of “the god of the earth” in the Vatican. Its painted walls depict the “pleasant pictures” against which judgment is to fall (Isa. 2:16).

The second signification of the seven heads is expressed in Apoc. 17:10; as, “And they are seven kings”; the “and” connecting them with the seven mountains—“the seven heads are seven mountains, and they are seven kings,” or governing bodies, as basileis also signifies. These seven forms of government belong to the seven hills; and are therefore Roman and Italian. John was informed, that at the time of the revelation of the mystery being made, five of the heads had fallen; and that the one in existence, consequently, was the sixth head; and that the other, or seventh head, had not yet appeared; but that when it came up, it would continue only a short time: “they are seven kings; the five have fallen, and the one is, the other not yet come; and when he may come, it behoves that he continue a short time.” The two greatest historians, Livy and Tacitus, have enumerated the five from the building of the city, as,

1. The Regal Head, which continued 240 years;
2. The Consular Head, which continued 11 years;
3. The Dictatorial Head, which continued 5 years;
4. The Decemviral Head; and,
5. The Tribunitial Head with consular authority, which continued till it was superseded by
6. The Imperial Head, B.C. 31. John the apostle and Tacitus the historian, lived under this head, which continued in Rome 507 years. It was then wounded as it were to death by the
7. Or Gothic Head, A.D. 476. But, as this was only to continue “a short time” compared with the sixth, it was slain after reigning 60 years, in A.D. 554.

Rome seated on seven mountains as depicted on a Roman coin in the British Museum struck A.D. 69–79.

There was this peculiarity about the sixth head, namely, that, about A.D. 330, Constantine, the first catholic emperor, dedicated a new city, which, after his own name, he called CONSTANTINOPLE. This new Rome was also built upon seven hills; nevertheless, it is impossible to mistake it for “the woman”, or “great city”, of Apoc. 17, inasmuch as it has never been the capital of hoi hepta basileis, the seven governing bodies enumerated by the historians of the Italian Rome. On the dedication of Constantinople, the imperial residence and court were established there; while the ancient Senate of the empire continued its sittings and the exercise of its functions in Rome, until it became contemporarily extinct with the seventh head A.D. 554, after a continuance of 1307 years from its institution by Romulus, the founder of the Roman State. Thus, from the dedication of the City of Constantine to the establishment of the Seventh Head upon the seven mountains, the Sixth Head of the Dragon had two capitals and two thrones to which the governing orders of the state were related. This was an arrangement peculiar to the sixth head, and doubtless providentially ordered with reference to future predetermined constitutional developments, to be manifested after the fall of the Seventh Head. The sixth head continues enthroned in Constantinople, though not in Rome, to this day. Rome has witnessed eight heads upon her seven mountains; but Constantinople only one. The government in Constantinople has always been imperial, whether administered by a Roman or Ottoman dynasty. The imperality of the Ottoman capital has descended, through Constantine, from Augustus Caesar, the founder of the sixth head of the Dragon. The loss of old Rome by the sixth head did not deprive the governing power in Constantinople of its sixth headship. The sixth head there still rules over the eastern section of the territory of the Dragon; and perpetuates the Dragon Power for the developments of which it is to be the subject in “the time of the end”. Hence, the Constantinopolitan power, without regard to the particular race administering it, be it Italian, Greek, Turkish, or Russian, is the Dragon, as opposed to the Beast of the Sea, and the Beast of the Earth, of Apoc. 13. The Constantinopolitan power, as we have seen, originally owned both Rome and Constantinople; but in after times “yielded to the Lion Mouth of the Beast of the Sea his power, and his throne, and great authority”; reserving to itself what it was able to keep: so that the Roman Orb came to be divided between the Eastern Dragon and the Western Beast; and the populations of the two sections “worshipped” each respectively, as it is written, “they worshipped the Dragon which yielded power to the Beast: and they worshipped the Beast” Apoc. 13:4.

Further details concerning the Imperial Sixth Head will be exhibited when I come to treat of the Beast of the Sea. I would, however, call the attention of the reader to the remarkable feature in the symbolism of the Dragon in contrast with that of the Beast, namely, that upon the seven heads are “seven diadems”, while upon the seven heads of the Beast there are none. Now, a diadem is a symbol of sovereignty. Upon the ten horns of the Dragon are no diadems, but only upon its seven heads. Had there been seven diadems upon the heads, and ten diadems upon the horns, seventeen in all, there would have been no Beast of the Sea and Image of the Beast, to have divided with it the political “worship in all the earth.” The heads of the Dragon being only diademed indicates that its heads are sovereign; and that the Dragon symbol during the continuance of the Beast has specially to do with apocalyptic developments connected with the heads. Therefore it is we find the Dragon in existence after the destruction of the Beast and his Image in “the Lake of fire burning with brimstone” (Ch. 19:20). These are entirely destroyed when “judgment is given to the saints”; but the Dragon is not. This power is bound in the abyss for 1000 years; but at the end thereof, he lifts up his diademed sixth head, of which is the eighth, and by which the nations are again beguiled into the old delusion of the sovereignty of the people, and independence of all power but that which is inherent in themselves (Apoc. 20:7, 5). But this is the last effort of flesh and blood to rule itself imperially upon the earth. The power that binds the Dragon, and destroys the Beast and his Image, premillennially, Will at the end of the thousand years crush the Dragon's Sixto-Octavian Head, and so rid the earth forever of man's accursed nature, which is the Devil and Satan, in apocalyptic eight-headed and ten-horned manifestation—verses 9, 10.

12. The Ten Horns of the Dragon

The difference between the ten horns of the Dragon and the ten horns of the Beast of the Sea, consists in the ten upon the Beast being diademed, while the ten upon the Dragon are not. This indicates that the Beast symbol represents things concurrent with the Horns in their exercise of sovereignty; while the Dragon, as far as old Rome is concerned, had to do with the sovereignty of the heads before the horns had received their kingdoms.

John in the wilderness saw the horns in what may be termed their Dragon-state, and writes of them thus, "the ten horns which thou sawest", said the angel to him, "are", or represent, "ten kings", or sovereignties, "which have received no kingdom as yet" (Apoc. 17:12). This was their apocalyptic status until the Sixth Head of the Dragon had been wounded. After this had been slain almost to death, then we may look for the ascending of the Beast out of the abyss, in the dragon-horns receiving their kingdoms at the cost of the Dragon power (Apoc. 11:7; 13:1).

We have seen that the heads were interpreted to John by the revealing angel, topographically and politically; thus conferring upon them a two-fold signification. So it is with the Horns: they are to be interpreted chronographically and politically. Until they had received their kingdom, they were mostly chorographic appendages of the Dragon-empire; that is, they existed as provinces, territorial regions, of the dominion, upon which ten kingdoms were afterwards established by the barbarians, who founded the seventh head upon the seven mountains; wounded the Dragon's Sixth Head, which was afterwards "healed", and subverted the Dragon's jurisdiction over extensive regions.

The Pagan Dragon Dominion called the Old Serpent or Satan's Kingdom.

Those regions were styled, by anticipation, horns—undiademed horns. In the time of John, they might be enumerated as, Greece, Moesia, Illyricum, Pannonia, Noricum, Rhoetia, Italy, Gaul, Spain, and Africa. The Dragon had then, and afterwards, other provinces in the east; but those only are to be reckoned as horn-provinces upon which kingdoms "receiving power as kings one hour with the Beast's" eighth head, horns sustaining the Papacy, were established. The political organization of the peoples that was developed upon these Dragon-horn provinces, became the apocalyptic Beast of the Sea; while Macedonia, Thrace, Asia Minor, Syria, and Egypt, remained to the Dragon, as at this day.

13. The Tail of the Dragon

"And his Tail draws the third of the stars of the heaven."

The tail of the old Roman Dragon swayed by this power must have partaken of the character of that power, as the tail of a beast partakes of the peculiar vitality of the beast. The dragon in the heaven, heads, horns, body and tail, as a sign there, is to be viewed chronologically, in his tail-conflict with "Michael and his angels". This tail-conflict was the last conflict of the Pagan Roman Serpent-power, or Dragon, with the partisans of the Christian Eve. "The ancient and the honorable he is the head, and the prophet that teaches lies he is the tail” (Isa. 9:15). All the pagan priests and philosophers were the teachers of lies in this, the crisis of the sixth seal. They would therefore constitute a very important element of the Dragon’s tail. Added to these would also be all “the rulers of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains (or chiliarchs, commanders of a thousand men), mighty men, and every slave, and every freeman” (Apoc. 6:15) who adhered to the pagan prophets. Of these were “the Stars of the heaven” in which the Dragon was a sign. Entering into the composition of his tail, his tail is said to “draw” them. The tail of a power in motion, represents the fierce anger of that power against its enemies, as manifested in its movements of an army to destroy them. This appears from Isa. 7:4, where the armies of Syria and Israel, in march against Jerusalem, are styled the two tails of as many smoking firebrands, or their fierce anger. The tail of the Dragon is represented as in motion; for it is written, “his tail draws the third of the stars of the heaven, and did cast them to the earth.” The power of the Dragon, or crocodile, is in its tail. It sways it violently in its anger; but if the power of its tail is overcome, all composing the tail, or attaching themselves to the party of the tail, will be laid prostrate under the feet of the victor; or, in the words of the prophecy, be “cast to the earth.” The conflict was between Michael and the Tail of the Dragon, both being in the heaven. A third of the stars of this heaven sided with the Dragon’s Tail; while the two thirds ranged themselves under the Standard of “the Cross,” by which sign “Michael” proposed to conquer. At that time, the Dragon dominion was divided into three parts—the Eastern, the Western, and the Illyrian, praefectures. On the defeat of Maxentius, Constantine ruled the Western, Licinius the Illyrian, and Maximin the Eastern, Third. Maximin was the champion of Jupiter and the gods. This third was chorographically the Dragon’s Tail, his Head being in Rome. Maximin dying in great torments, was succeeded in the Eastern Third by Licinius; who, apostatizing from the Catholic profession, solemnly professed himself at an idolatrous altar the champion of the gods. He was now the Pontifex Maximus of Paganism, or Chief Prophet of the Tail of the Dragon. He was the centre of attraction to the stars of the Eastern Third of the Heaven; and therefore to a “third of the stars of the heaven.” He drew them after him to a final struggle against the Archer of the First Seal. But he was defeated and dethroned, and ignominiously ejected from his high position in the state; and, in his fall from the heaven, drew with him to the earth, all the men of power, philosophers, and priests of Paganism, the stars of the Dragon’s Tail, who had staked their all upon his success.

CONSTANTINE REIGNS SUPREME

Constantine in Italy (Rome) and Licinius in Illyricum issue a joint decree proclaiming religious toleration. Constantine attacks and defeats Licinius in Illyricum and Pannonia. Licinius retires to Byzantium but is there defeated by Constantine’s land and sea forces. Withdrawing to Asia Minor, the “Eastern third” of the Roman Empire, he is finally defeated and then murdered by the “first “Christian Emperor” who then reigns over a “Christianised” Empire.

Constantine becomes Sole Ruler replacing Galerius, Maxentius, Maximin, and finally Licinius.

14. The Old Serpent

“The Great Dragon, the old Serpent, surnamed the Diabolos and the Satan, who misleads the whole habitable.”

The whole habitable, ten oikoumenen helen, was that portion of the earth comprehended within the limits of the great Pagan-Dragon dominion, which, in the epoch of the Sixth Seal, acknowledged the jurisdiction of the great city Rome. The head of this dominion was the Roman emperor, who united in his own official person the supreme pontifical, civil, and military authority. He was the sovereign living incarnation, for the term of his official existence, of the power resulting from the combination of the dwellers upon the habitable into a body politic, or kingdom of men. Human power enthroned upon the seven mountains, and exercising authority over the whole habitable—imperial human power—is apocalyptically styled “the Old Serpent,” ho ophis, ho archaios—the Serpent which was in the beginning.

The apocalyptic dominion ruled by this Serpent was Mediterranean. It enclosed this sea within its territory. On the north, it was bounded by the Caucasus, the Euxine, the Danaster, the Danube, the Rhine, and the German Ocean. On the south, by the Roman Africa, a strip of land lying between the Atlas range and the sea, and extending from the Atlantic to the Red Sea: on the west, it was washed by the Atlantic: and on the east reached to the Tigris, Euphrates, and the Arabian Desert. This territory, two thousand miles by three thousand, extended into Scotland; but did not include Ireland, Germania, Sarmatia, nor Persia. The former three were peopled by savage hordes; but at the epoch of the Sixth Seal they did not belong to the dominion of the apocalyptic Serpent.

But an inquirer might ask, were not all the outlying countries as much ruled by the Serpent, as the inhabitants of the Roman earth and sea? To this I reply, not in the apocalyptic sense. The apocalypse prefigures the conflict between “the Seed of the Woman” and the Serpent, for the sovereignty of the world (Gen. 3:15). This conflict was not between the Woman’s Seed and the governments outlying the Roman empire. At the opening of the Sixth Seal, the time had not come for that. The time to deal with the sin-powers of Asia and America had not then arrived. It was therefore necessary only to indicate by appropriate symbols that section of the general enemy with whom the saints would have especially to contend; and this was the Serpent in his Graeco-Latin, or Roman, manifestation upon the territory defined.

But, if the Pago-Roman Dragon Power be the Old Serpent, did that power exist in the days of the serpent that tempted Eve? To this question the answer is, it did unquestionably exist. The testimony before us, bears witness to the fact. It is there styled archaios, which signifies, not only old, ancient; but primeval, from the beginning, original. The Roman Dragon was the original serpent power. This is not to be disputed.

The reader will bear in mind that we are treating of a power styled the old serpent,” not of the reptile styled nahkash, which Moses says, “was more sagacious than any beast of the field, which Yahweh Elohim had made.” The animal was not the power, but only the type of it. He was quick of thought, penetrating, and acutely discerning. He was the most intellectual of all the creatures, and had but one superior among the living, and that was Man. The difference between man and the serpent was diversity of organization. They were both dust of the ground; but the one more highly and perfectly organized than the other. The organism of the serpent embodied faculties whose functions placed him in harmony with man’s nature. The lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, were common to them both; so that their intellectual and animal tendencies were on a par. Hence, man was more nearly related to the serpent than to any other animal—so nearly, that the serpent-nature and the man-nature, without much exaggeration, might be termed identical. I have said that man was intellectually his superior. This, however, must not be taken absolutely. The serpent showed himself to be more of an adept than Eve. He purposed to make her and Adam eat the fruit; and to do so by reasoning them into the commission of the act. In this he succeeded, and thereby proved that his intellectual subtilty was superior to theirs. Had they been as quick of thought and penetrating as he, he would have found his match, and the temptation would have failed. They, however, were over-matched by the serpent, who succeeded in deceiving them. He was the intelligent deceiver who darkened their understandings; while they stood in the humiliating position of the serpent-deceived.

Man has a class of faculties which the serpent had not. These are the moral faculties. The possession of these is the mental difference between the two creatures. The moral faculties are the basis of man's accountability. If he had been destitute of these he would have been as little accountable as the serpent. This organic difference is a matter of capacity for the reception of ideas. The mental capacity of the man was more ample than the serpent's, though less acute. He had more knowledge of things in general, and was capable of higher attainments in knowledge than the serpent, but he was not so sharp-witted in the use of what he knew as the subtile beast, whose wisdom has passed into the proverb, "Be ye wise as serpents, and harmless as doves."

The moral faculties, I say, are the basis of man's accountability. The mere fact, however, of their possession would not have made him responsible to the Deity. The possession of them gave the man no advantage over the serpent. The serpent was "very good," and the man was "very good;" for it is written, "Elohim saw everything that he made, and behold, it was very good" (Gen. 1:31). As mere material creatures, then, the capacity of one of them for the reception of moral, or spiritual ideas, did not destroy the analogy, or rather the identity, of the serpent nature and the man nature. The truth of this is apparent in mankind at this day. The Fejees, Japanese, New Hollanders, and such-like, have the same number of cerebral organs as Adam when pronounced "very good." Among those are organs capable of high moral developments. But, what better are they for the possession of them under existing circumstances? Manifestly none. They are as thoroughly serpent in nature as though they had but the intellectual and animal faculties of the serpent, and no more.

Morally, then, the serpent could not respond to the thoughts, principles, and the institutions of the Deity; but man could, because of his organic capacity for the reception of them. The serpent could not, and the man would not; so that in relation to the way and principles of the Deity, both man and the serpent were reprobate; and of the two the man who could but would not believe and do, was unquestionably the worse.

Man was the only creature of the Deity's "very good" animal creation, whose action was restrained by a law. It was said to him, "Of every tree of the garden eating thou mayest eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day of thine eating thereof, dying thou shalt die." This was spoken to man only; but in the hearing of the serpent. Had the serpent, or any other animal, eaten of it he would not have transgressed, because the eating, or touching of the tree, was only prohibited to man. The law demanded of man the recognition of the Deity as his ruler and lawgiver by a faithful abstinence from the thing forbidden. The law was the spoken word, or oracle, of the Deity; and threatened the man with death if he despised it. No greater offence could be committed by the man; because "the Deity hath magnified his word above all his name;" so that to despise his word is equivalent to despising him.

The serpent saw the lawgiver, heard the law, and could distinguish the trees. Being very quick of thought, he instinctively speculated, or reasoned, upon what he saw and heard. "The eyes of the Elohim are open, and they know both good and evil, and yet are immortal. Adam is made in their image and after their likeness; and is doubtless like them in all things but the knowledge of evil as well as good. This knowledge, it is clear, may be obtained by eating of the tree forbidden. If they eat thereof, the man and the woman would be like the Elohim; their eyes would be open, and they would know good and evil. And as for dying, that is by no means a necessary consequence. The Elohim are immortal, and Adam and Eve may be so too; for all that is needful to be done to avoid the threatened penalty of the law, is for them to go to the other tree, called the Tree of Lives, and to eat of it, and they will live forever." Such was the intellectualizing of the serpent upon what he had seen and heard. It brought him to conclusions, not altogether false nor entirely true. His conclusion was a mixture of truth and error, in which the error neutralized the truth and made it void. It was therefore "a lie;" and he, though ignorant of the falseness of the theory he was thinking out, "a liar, and the father of it."

Highly satisfied with his newly discovered views of the situation, he presented himself before the mother of all living, and opened a conversation with her upon the subject of the law and its penalty, in which he submitted to her the conclusions to which he had come from the premises before him. He introduced the conference by showing that he knew what the Elohim had said, “Yea,” said he, “hath Elohim said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden!” The “yea” implies that he knew the fact; but he put what he knew interrogatively to draw the woman out. She admitted that it had been so said, and specified the particular tree, and its locality in the midst of the garden, and added that they were forbidden even to touch it upon pain of death. This was the point he wished her to come to as it enabled him at once to state the discovery he had made of what Deity really intended contrary to his word. He replied, “Dying ye shall not die:” that is, “Your dying shall not end in death.” This was a point-blank denial of what the Deity had said. He had said they should die, and the serpent said they should not, and undertook to establish his position by declaring his acquaintance with the secret of the Deity hidden from her—“Dying ye shall not die; for Elohim knows that in the day of your eating thereof then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as Elohim, knowing good and evil.” The Elohim do not die, they know good and evil, and you will become like them.

The woman listened to his sermon on the law, and thought his exposition of the word might be its true spiritual import. It was possible that the Deity did not mean what he said; that it was the letter of the law only that killed; but the spiritual or secret meaning expounded by the intelligent and eloquent serpent, was the real life-imparting truth. She entertained this supposition, since become so popular with her descendants; and, half convinced, she moved towards the tree to take a look at it, and more practically consider the matter. Her faith in the unadulterated Word was shaken. She believed the spiritualizing serpent, and she believed the Deity; for she believed the eating of the tree would impart the knowledge of the good and the evil divinely indicated; but then she believed also, that the death-penalty might be evaded according to the doctrine of the serpent. The tree, she knew, was “good for food,” it was also “pleasant to the eyes.” Here were two classes of human lusts co-working in favor of the serpent’s conclusion. There remained only one class more to be gained and his triumph would be complete. She was ambitious. She knew the Elohim, how wise and exalted they were, and how superior to Adam and herself. She wanted to be like them, and the serpent had assured her that she had the power of this desirable self-exaltation in her own hands. But then, might she not lose all by the operation of the death-penalty? True; but the serpent had assured her that Elohim did not intend to carry it into effect; and besides, was there not that other tree—the tree of lives—as accessible as the tree of the knowledge of good and evil? could she not also eat of that, and be immortal as the Elohim? Surely, this was a well-combined scheme of the serpent’s by which they might easily and speedily attain to wisdom and immortality upon their own terms! With the earth in their possession, what independent, glorious, and powerful ones they would be when like the Elohim! The thought was charming; it was quite fascinating to contemplate! What more could “the pride of life” desire? They would live on the earth forever; and all the world that might inhabit it would be subject to them and to the principles of the serpent, by which they would have attained their high Elohist estate!

Thus was the mother of all living “drawn away of her own lusts, and enticed.” She was attracted by “the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life.” These instincts of the flesh predisposed her to believe the serpent and to follow his suggestion, regardless of the divine law. Lust conceived within her. The doctrine of the serpent sown in her heart inflamed her desires, and stirred them up into rebellious exercise. Faith in the word was obliterated; her mind was darkened by false teaching; she was beguiled and corrupted from the simplicity of the truth; her thinking was serpentized, and she “brought forth sin,” or the transgression of the law; and when the sin was perfected, contrary to the serpent’s theory and her own expectation, “it brought forth death” (James 1:14, 15).

Such was the first lie, the father of it, and the consequence of believing it. YAHWEH Elohim admitted that the lie contained some truth. As the serpent said, their eyes were opened, but opened to discover their own shame; they became as the Elohim in the knowledge of good and evil of an evil state adapted to the formation of character under trial; but independence, glory, honor and power, they were not permitted to attain. Nor could they so easily as they imagined eat of the tree of lives, and live forever. When the sin was finished they were too much occupied with their new discovery of their nakedness, and devices to conceal it from their expected Elohist visitors, to promptly follow out the serpent's programme. In the midst of their perturbation they perceived their approach, and fled for concealment among the trees from the presence of YAHWEH Elohim. This appearing of "the Lord the Spirit" was an incident not provided for in the programme of the serpent. It marred the whole scheme, and stamped his speculation with falsehood and deceit. The Lord's appearing arrested the guilty in their career of sin, and brought them before the Judge for trial and sentence according to their works. The offence was charged upon Adam, who accused the woman as the first in the transgression; and when she was interrogated she confessed, saying, "The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat." The serpent was the progenitor of the whole transaction. Animal intellectuality, or the thinking of flesh in accordance with its own lusts, emanating from the serpent in discourse, was the spirit that worked in the disobedient, and caused them to stumble at the word. The divine Judge did not interrogate the serpent. It had preached according to its instinct, making proclamation simply of its own reasoning in the premises. The subtle beast, however, was visited with reprobation for the mischief incurred by his ignorant presumption in prating about what he did not understand. He had given expression to what had proved to be a lie, and therefore, he was truly the father or inventor of it. This particular serpent that beguiled Eve by his subtilty, spent all the days of his life in the dust upon his belly; and from being the most sagacious, he became "cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field." The intellectualism of the serpent had been transferred to the man. The serpent-system of ideas and mode of thinking had become characteristic of the man, whose lustful nature, inflamed to rebellion by the serpent's reasoning, came to occupy the same relation to the word of the Deity in all after ages, that the original speaking beast did before the fall of man. All the primeval serpent, or any other kind of serpent, has had to do with serpentine developments since that important crisis has been merely as the expressive and appropriate symbol of the nature of man.

The serpent, then, is the reasoning of the flesh, which is inseparable from it, and tends only to death. This is human nature, and styled by Paul in Rom. 8:3, sarx hamartias, SIN'S FLESH, in which, in ch. 7:18, he says, "dwelleth no good thing." In its original creation, this flesh, like the serpent, was "very good" of its kind. It had its affections and desires, which, like the affections and desires of other creatures, were innocent and harmless; and the man would not have known sin in the gratification of them, except the law had said, Thou shalt not eat of the tree. There would have been no scope for the serpent's speculation if no law had been enacted; for without the law his doctrine could have no existence. The serpent's reasoning was sin in conception. "Sin is the transgression of law," and this transgression was originally conceived in the brain of the serpent, and by reasoning on false premises, was transferred into the woman's, where, taking occasion by the commandment ordained for life, and in itself holy, just and good, it wrought in her all manner of intense and unlawful desires. Had she been contented to believe the Deity, and to obey the commandment, her course would have resulted in life eternal. But, instead of this, she found the commandment to be for death; because the reasoning of the serpent, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived her, and by it slew her. Thus, the serpent's reasoning which she adopted as her own, worked death in her by the good and just and holy law, by which, when the reasoning was perfected in transgression, Human Nature displayed itself as an exceedingly great sinner—kath' hyperbolon hamartolos.

The theory generally entertained concerning "the old serpent" is, that "an Evil Genius under the semblance of a serpent styled the Devil, was the primary cause of man's fall, and that he used the serpent as his instrument. This theory is founded in incredulity, or unbelief of the Mosaic account. A brute beast, they say, was incapable of reasoning the woman into the transgression of the law. They might as well say that the dumb ass upon which Balaam rode was incapable of speaking with man's voice and rebuking the madness of the prophet. The one is as improbable as the other; yet improbable as the story of the ass, and incapable of speaking and rebuking madness, as by experience we know asses to be, the fact is attested by both Moses and Peter, and, therefore, rests upon as good evidence, and is as worthy of belief as any other fact in Scripture. He that made the serpent and the ass—"very good" brutes of their kind, and not so much inferior to man, their fellow brute, as is generally supposed—could also for any special occasion or emergency confer upon them the power of expressing their thoughts in human speech. No reasonable being will deny the power of the Creator to do this. Whether he did so is a matter of evidence, and no evidence can be more plainly, pointedly, and intelligibly testified than that the serpent was a beast of the field, pre-eminently subtle, and capable of expressing his thoughts in man's speech rationally. There is not a word said about any other "evil genius," devil or satan, than the serpent himself; and to bring in another in an interpretation is only to spoil the narrative, and to confess ignorance of its meaning, and inability to expound it as it stands. No, the whole transaction is referable exclusively to the serpent and the woman. There was no third party behind the scenes styled "the great enemy of mankind". The greatest enemy of mankind is man, and more to be feared than any devil or evil genius incredulity and ignorance of the word are able to invent. The serpent was an acute observer and an attentive listener; and all the inspiration he was the subject of consisted in the things he had seen and heard.

As to the incapability of a woman being reasoned into transgression by a brute beast, we are every day familiar with the contrary. Man that is in honor and does not understand the word has no pre-eminence over a beast. This is the doctrine of Scripture. He is as an ass or a serpent, whether performing in a pulpit, a temple, a mosque, or in the private walks of life. The folly that hisses from their mouths is but the teaching of the serpent less speciously expressed than in the beginning; so that it is not a question of principles and brains, but of external configuration, that establishes an apparent difference between them and "their father who abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him" (John 8:44). These "natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed," serpent-like, speak evil of the things that they understand not; "and creeping into houses, lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts, ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth." They reason them into transgression of the word, and into self-satisfaction and contentment in sin, as effectually as their father did the mother of all living.

After the death of the particular serpent that beguiled Eve, the only speaking serpent was within man. His own lusts are the internal serpent by which he is drawn away and enticed. He is hungry. This condition of stomach creates a strong desire for food. This is a lust. He may have power to convert stone into bread for the satisfying of his hunger. He begins to reason, what harm is there in exercising one's power for the appeasing of one's hunger? Manifestly none. But would it be right to exercise the power under the circumstances of the case? I have been placed thus in order to be made to know that man lives not by bread only, but by what proceeds out of the mouth of Yahweh. If I exercise the power, I distrust him, and express my conviction to the contrary; and in effect declare, that without bread supplied by my own providence, I should die. I have the power, it is true, to put an end to this painful craving for food; but I will not frustrate Deity in placing me here, by anticipating his deliverance.

In this example, the reasoning suggested by the hunger, and counselling its immediate satisfaction by any means within reach, is the innate serpent, or devil, speaking within the man. It is the "I carnal sold under sin"—the sin dwelling in the man; the sin-law in the members. Such reasonings are the writhings and twistings of the serpent, or the motions of sins working in the members, which, if unchecked and unrestrained by “the engrafted word” as the law of the mind, bring forth fruits unto death. All unenlightened men are what the Scripture terms “the natural man.” This man does “not assent to the things of the Spirit of the Deity; for they are foolishness to him; and he is unable to know them because they are spiritually discerned”. This was exactly the serpent’s case. He was without the power of spiritual discernment. And so with all men in default of a revelation of spiritual things from the Deity. If he had not made known his purposes none of Adam’s descendants could have discovered them. Hence, while ignorant of the word, they are as the serpent, and Scripturally classed with him as his seed or children.

Thus, mankind in whom the truth is not, being the Seed of the Serpent, the flesh of sin, is their natural parent. This is “their father the Devil, whose lusts they do.” But when the truth obtains entrance into a serpent-man, or sinner, and makes a lodgment in his understanding and affections, a power gets possession of him, and generates there “a new man,” styled also “the inward man;” so that a Christadelphian, or brother of Christ, is not what he appears to be in the eyes of ordinary men. The serpent-world of sinners does not know them. To the eye of sense they appear as serpent-men. Their outward man differs nothing from the seed of the serpent; while their inward man is beyond the range of the perceptions of the serpent-man, or sinner. It is this new man of the heart, within the old man of the flesh, which constitutes an individual a saint, a son of the Deity, and a brother of Christ. Collectively, the saints or brethren of Christ, constitute his woman or spouse; they are, therefore, styled the Seed of the Woman. This arrangement distributes mankind into two unequal and opposite classes—THE SERPENT-WORLD, and the Woman-Seed; the former, being based upon a lie; the latter, upon the truth. In the beginning, the Serpent-World consisted of no more than two sinners—Adam and his wife; yet small as was its extent, all the evil that has since manifested itself, was latent in them. Their symbol was the Serpent, or Dragon, and represented falsehood, unbelief, and rebellion against the Deity. Wherever these three have been found politically organized, and in conflict with the saints, there is the Serpent which was in the beginning—“the old serpent.” Of this serpent-world the Scripture saith, “Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. For all that is in the world—the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life—is not of the Father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of the Deity abideth for ever” (1 John 2:15–17).

Now, after Adam had brought sin into being by transgression of the law, the Deity proceeded to organize the “evil” to which man had subjected himself by his rebellion. He had come to know it elohistically, as the serpent had said; but he was not also to be like the Elohim in abiding for ever. He had sinned, and the law he had violated was now to take its course. YAHWEH Elohim therefore proceeded to expound the penalty of the law, and to teach him the practical import of the phrase, “Dying thou shalt die.” He began with the instinctive whispering promoter of the mischief, whom having cursed, he addressed as the representative of the disobedient in all future time, and said, “I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between THY SEED and HER SEED; this shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.” To the woman, as first in the transgression, he said, her progeny should be greatly multiplied, her desire should be to her husband, who should rule over her. And to Adam, because he hearkened to his wife instead of to him, he said, “Cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life;... till thou return to the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for thou art dust, and to dust shalt thou return” (Gen. 3:15–19). The specifications in these sentences upon the serpent, the woman, and the man form THE CONSTITUTION of the Serpent-World, or KINGDOM OF SIN; and termed in Scripture “the Kingdom of Men”—dominion hostile to the Divine law administered by the Serpent’s Seed. It matters not what form the dominion assumes, whether imperial, regal, republican, or papal, its basis is one and the same; and most appropriately symbolized by the serpent which was in the beginning—ho ophis, ho archaios.

In after times, far distant from the beginning, the serpent-world acquired an immense development. From two persons it had increased to myriads of millions; and without specifying the outlying savages of the dominion, is treated of in Scripture as “the kingdom of Egypt;” which, in the days of Moses, had attained great political proportions—a kingdom of kingdoms. It was “the dragon, the old serpent,” of his day—the great enemy and bruiser of the woman’s seed, who sought their extirpation from the earth. This was the political relation of things then. The “Woman’s Seed” was identified with Israel; the “Serpent’s Seed,” with all that had enmity against, or oppressed, them; while the “Head of the Serpent,” styled in the sentence upon the serpent “thy head,” is that chief government of the Gentiles, or nations, which directs, controls, or influences, the policy of the world for the time being.

The Scriptures oftentimes connect the beginning and the end without taking cognizance of the interval of a multitude of generations and ages, or, if at all, only very slightly. Thus, in Psa. 74:12, the Mosaic salvation from Egyptian bondage, and the future Messianic salvation from the down-treading of the mystic Babylon, apocalyptically and “spiritually called Sodom and Egypt” (ch. 11:3), are so connected: as it is written, “My King of old is Elohim, working salvation in the midst of the earth. Thou didst divide the sea by thy strength.” Then, predictive of what will assuredly come to pass, and befall the same Serpent-power in its latter-day manifestation, as apocalyptically displayed in the binding of the Dragon, it proceeds in verse 14 to state, “Thou bruisedst the heads of leviathan, and gavest him to be meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness.” LEVIATHAN signifying “a serpent coiling himself in folds,” is the Dragon of Apoc. 20:2; and embraces all the intermediate dragonic manifestations of previous ages and generations, which are the folds of his coil. The “heads of leviathan” are those apocalyptically exhibited. “The people inhabiting the wilderness” are the saints, and Israel after the flesh made willingly subject to them. “The wilderness” is “the two wings of the Great Eagle” where the fugitive woman was fed and “nourished for a time, times, and half a time from the face of the serpent,” or, for 1260 symbolic days (Apoc. 12:6, 14); and where John saw Leviathan as he will be seen by the discerning after the thief-like advent of the Ancient of Days (ch. 17:3).

In the thirteenth verse of the Psalm brief and passing reference is made to the dragon-powers of the interval; as, “Thou breakest the HEADS OF THE DRAGONS upon the waters.” In the English Version, “breakest” occurs in relation to the “heads of the dragons” and “the heads of leviathan;” though in the original different words are used. In reference to the dragon-heads the word used is shivbarta; while the other is ritzatza. This verbal difference was doubtless not accidental. The former signifies “to break the power of, destroy;” the latter, “to bruise.” Leviathan is bruised and bound for a thousand years, and at the end thereof revives, and embraces the serpent-world in his coils: but the power of the dragons and their heads in the long interval antecedent to the epoch of the binding, is destroyed.

Now there have been different dragon-manifestations of “the old serpent” in the long interval between the Mosaic salvation of Israel and the Messianic, which is at the door. That contemporary with Moses, and styled “Rahab” in Isa. 51:9, was developed into what Ezekiel describes in ch. 29:3. Here the power of Egypt, called Pharaoh, is thus addressed by the Spirit, “Behold I am against thee, Pharaoh, King of Egypt, THE GREAT DRAGON that lieth in the midst of his rivers”—the mouths of the Nile, representative of the subjects of the power: “which hath said, My river is my own, and I have made it for myself.” For this arrogance, and blasphemy against the source of all power, YAHWEH Elohim sentenced it to destruction, so that Egypt should no more exalt itself above the nations to rule over them; and, as Nebuchadnezzar had received no recompense for executing the sentence of Deity against Tyre, therefore YAHWEH Elohim gave the land of Egypt to him for his labor. Thus Egypt became a part of Babylon; the great Egyptian Dragon was abolished; and the power of “the old serpent” thus symbolized, transferred to the FIRST of Daniel's four Mediterranean empires; which under Nebuchadnezzar stood man-like upon its feet, with a lion's head, and the heart of a man (Dan. 7:2, 4). Hence, at this epoch, when the Seed of the Woman; of which Daniel, Ezekiel and Jeremiah were constituents, was heel-bruised in Babylon, the wing-plucked lion-power was "the Great Dragon, the old serpent, surnamed the Devil and the Satan."

Rome in the 4th Century A.D.: City of Destiny—but not of eternity.

The Head of the old serpent, in this first beast manifestation, was the dynasty represented by Nebuchadnezzar, who had conquered Egypt, and plucked the wings of the Assyrian Lion. This dynasty was "the Head of Gold"—the cockatrice, or adder, which came forth out of the Egypto-Assyrian Serpent's root, whose fruit the world has found to be "a fiery flying serpent" (Isa. 14:29).

The Dragon under this dynastic form continued only seventy years. At the end of this period it was changed; and "Lucifer, son of the morning, who weakened the nations, was cut down;" and made to give way to YAHWEH'S "sanctified ones," the Medes and Persians; who, under the command of Darius and Cyrus, "took the kingdom" (Isa. 14:12; 13:17; Dan. 5:28, 31). This was the Medo-Persian dynasty of "the old serpent". It answered to the second of Daniel's four beasts; and is represented in Nebuchadnezzar's Lion-Man image by the breast and arms of silver; and by the two horns of unequal height upon the ram (Dan. 2:32; 8:3).

The old serpent continued under the Bear, or silver, dynastic manifestation some two hundred and six years. Another change was then developed. Power set in from the west, and diffused itself "over the face of the whole earth." The Medo-Persian Bear, or Ram dynasty was made to give place to Daniel's third dominancy, symbolized by the four-winged and four-headed Leopard, the brass of the image, and the four-horned goat (Dan. 7:6; 2:32; 8:5–8). These symbols represent "the old serpent" in the Era of the Greeks. Dominion was given to this people over the whole Dragon territory, which was enlarged towards the west. But the power of the old serpent was not to remain in the form of the four heads of the leopard, and four horns of the Grecian goat. The Greeks of "the whole earth," the sovereign race, were to yield the dominion given to them, to "A LITTLE HORN," or power; which, in relation to the Lion-Man territory of Daniel's first beast, which included the Holy Land, was to appear in the country of the Northern Horn of the Goat. This is evident from Dan. 8:9. The power, which was new to the Asiatic, came from Europe west of Greece; and planting itself in Syria, north of Palestine, extended its dominion eastward, and southward, until it had absorbed within itself the power of all the Four Horns of the Goat.

The Little Horn power was that of a rude and uncultivated people inhabiting Italy; and known in the history of that country, as Etrurians, Umbrians, Ligurians, Sabines, Veientes, Latins, Aequi, and Volscians. About five hundred years after the foundation of ROME, Italy was subdued to the authority of this city of the seven mountains; and all these tribes came to bear indiscriminately the name of Romans. After the subjugation of Italy, the Little Roman Horn proceeded to conquer all the nations round the Mediterranean. It subdued Greece about 146 years before Christ. In 67 before Christ, it appeared in Syria; and from thence "waxed exceedingly great, toward the south," and "toward the pleasant land," absorbing Palestine and Egypt; "and toward the east," to the Tigris and lands of Euphrates.

Thus the Little Horn became an exceedingly great power. Its empire, which, seven hundred and thirty years before the birth of Jesus, was confined to the walls of a small city, in the second century of our era, was about two thousand miles in breadth, from the walls of Antonine and the northern limits of Dacia, to Mount Atlas and the tropic of Cancer; it extended in length more than three thousand miles from the Western Ocean to the Euphrates, and was supposed to contain 6,000,000 square miles. The number of subjects, who, either as citizens, provincials, or slaves, observed the rule of Rome, is estimated at 120,000,000.

This Little Horn become so great was now the fourth of Daniel's beast-dominions. It planted itself in Jerusalem B.C. 63; and in A.D. 33, was popularly and pontifically acknowledged as "the King of the Jews" (John 19:12, 15). It had acquired identity with "the old serpent" by its incorporation of the Syro-Babylonian, or Northern Horn power (out of which, in relation to the Holy Land, it came forth), into its Italian dominion. It was now "the Dragon, the Old Serpent"—Leviathan, the flying and very tortuous serpent, the dragon that is in the sea (Isa. 27:1). But when it conquered the Syro-Babylonian Horn, B.C. 67, it did not thereby acquire the apocalyptic "surname" of "the Diabolos and the Satan." It was not until the Little Horn had "magnified itself against the Prince of the Host," or Messiah the Prince; and undertook, as "a roaring lion, prowling about, seeking whom he might devour," to exterminate the saints from among the living; that it acquired the character signified by the terms "fiery red," "diabolos," and "Satan" (Apoc. 12:9).

This crocodile, or Egypto-Romaic Babylonian, embodiment of falsehood and rebellion is styled purros, "fiery red," or red as fire. Daubuz, on the authority of certain heathen writers, says, "the Roman emperors and empresses had fire carried before them; also kings and generals at the head of their armies; it serving instead of trumpets as signs to begin the fight." This was notably the fact in the aggressions of the Dragon. Fire preceded him when he stood before the woman and her seed. During 280 years he had contended with her in all the fire of his fury, blazing forth against her with all the power of destruction at his command. He became red with rage and slaughter, especially in the period of the fifth seal, in which he vowed the extermination of the very name of christianity, which he likened to a hydra. But the archer of the first seal, who continued his warfare through all the six, was Divinely commissioned to go on conquering until he conquered him "through the blood of the Lamb, and the word of their testimony." The fiery redness of his wrath caused multitudes of the woman's seed to lie beneath the altar weltering in their blood. But their death availed him nothing in the end. The truth is stronger than human wrath—too mighty for the Dragon though confederate with all the potentates of earth.

I have termed this symbol of fiery destruction, the Egypto-Romaic Babylonian Crocodile. The propriety of this designation will appear from what has been said in this section; and from the fact, that "the Great City" of the Seven Hills, which in John's day, as also in ours, "reigns over the kings of the earth," is styled Babylon and Egypt (Apoc. 11:8; 17:5, 18). These specifications identify Rome, Babylon, and Egypt, as well as Sodom, with "the Great City;" so that the crocodile, dragon, or serpent, symbolizing the power of which Rome was the capital until ceded to the Beast (ch. 13:2) is properly designated Egypto-Romaic Babylonian.

This Roman golden coin depicts the emperor Valentinian holding the labarum and Victory on a globe. His right foot spurns a kneeling captive—indicative of Rome as ruler over "the kings of the earth" (Rev. 17:18).

15. The Devil and the Satan

This crocodile, or dragon, is said to be at once ho laloumenos Diabolos, kai ho Satanas ho planon ten oikoumenen olen;—"surnamed the Diabolos, and the Satan who deceives the whole habitable."

A surname is a name added to the original name. The original name for the embodiment of falsehood, unbelief, and disobedience, was "the Serpent". In all the five Books of Moses we do not once find it styled "the Diabolos," nor "the Satan." This surname was not bestowed upon the Egypto-Romaic Babylonian Dragon until, as the Little Horn of the Macedonian, or Grecian, Goat, it "magnified itself against the Prince of the Host (Christ)" (Dan. 8:11). It did this when it falsely accused and crucified him. I need not repeat here what has been written in the first volume of this work on the Diabolos and Satan. The reader can refer to this on pages 234 and 241, at his leisure. Suffice it in this place to say, that the Roman power acquired the surname of the diabolos, because, being falsehood and transgression politically incarnate, it enacted the part of the Old Serpent in tempting the Brethren of Christ to cross the line of their allegiance to him in burning incense to Caesar as the god of the earth—diabolos, in its etymological import, being that which causes to cross the law-line of Deity.

But, it also acquired the surname of “the Satan.” This word sahtahn, signifies an adversary; and without the definite article the, may signify any adversary in general. It is applicable to persons and things of whatever kind they may be. Thus, when the sons of Zeruiah counselled the death of Shimei, David rejected their impolitic advice, and styled them, Satan, (2 Sam. 19:22). So also when Yahweh became adverse to Israel because of transgression, He is styled Satan. This appears from 2 Sam. 24:1, where it is written, that Yahweh moved David against Israel to say, “Go, number Israel and Judah:” while in 1 Chron. 21:1, it is written, “And Satan stood up against-Israel, and provoked David to number Israel.” There is also the case of Job. Job was a man of substance and power, being “the greatest of all the men of the East”. He was one of “the sons of the Deity” belonging to that generation. There was among them also another man of power, an oriental, who was nominally a coreligionist, but full of envy and unfriendly feeling towards Job. This is not an unusual circumstance, even in societies reputed apostolic. In these, Satans too often abound, and become the adversaries of those they cannot imitate. In Job’s day, there were general gatherings of the Men of the East, with the sons of the Deity, at the place where the symbol of Yahweh’s presence was established. If I might hazard a conjecture I should say, they assembled at Salem, in the days of the High Priesthood of Melchizedek. Be this, however, as it may, “the sons of the Elohim came to present themselves before Yahweh, and the Satan hassahtahn, came also among them.” Here were two classes of worshippers, the nominal and the true; the former constituting the Satan; the latter consisting of the Sons of Deity, of whom Job was most eminent and conspicuous. Among his adversaries, one seems to have been more notable than the rest. This was probably the Chief of the Sabeans, a tribe of Arabia Felix, who fell upon Job and did him much mischief. To this man Yahweh said by His priest (for, in Scripture, what is said by his priests and prophets, Yahweh is said to say Himself) “Whence comest thou?” To which he replied as any marauder would, “From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it. His attention was then directed to Job, whose character was highly eulogized. This developed the latent enmity of the Sheikh, who insinuated that Job’s fear of Elohim had been purchased by extraordinary favors; but that, if these were withdrawn, and he were reduced to poverty, he would curse Him to his face. Yahweh, however, knew Job better; nevertheless, He was willing that he should be tested, that his enemies might be confounded; and a triumph of principle in adversity might be exhibited, as an example for the Sons of Deity in all future times. Therefore to Job’s adversary He granted permission to do what he pleased against him, short of personal injury. Having obtained this grant, he returned home, and organized his Sabeans and Chaldeans for raids, which, with the fire of heaven, soon stripped Job of all he possessed. Now, in the first chapter of Job, this is all attributed to Satan, as though, according to popular tradition, it had been done by a Fallen Angel, the world has agreed to call “The Devil.” But, in the second chapter, the Eternal Power informs us, that it was He that brought Job to poverty; for addressing his adversary, He says, “thou movedst me against him, to destroy him without cause.” All that was done being adverse to Job, it was attributed to his personal enemy, who was the moving cause; though the efficient cause was the power of Deity Himself.

Such was the Satan in Job’s case. In the case of Jesus Christ the satanic development assumed a different phase. Jesus was tempted by both the Diabolos and a Satan. These were both concerned in the trial to which he was subjected; and as the one co-operated with the other, they are spoken of as if the same. Jesus was “led up,” or “driven,” of the Spirit, into the wilderness “to be tempted of the diabolos,” or that which causeth to transgress, and “hath the power of death”—sin’s flesh. This was subjected to the long abstinence of forty days, at the end of which he felt a hunger that must have been very keen. We all know what would be the promptings of our flesh in a like situation. “Hunger,” it is said, “will break through stone walls.” It is very obstreperous, and will do any thing to satisfy itself. If any one had the power, under the pressure of intense hunger, he would convert stones into bread and eat them. Jesus had that power; and there was one acquainted with the Scripture, introduced himself to his notice at this crisis, and suggested that he should use it. Paul doubtless alludes to this personage in 2 Cor. 11:14 saying, “the Satan is transformed into an Angel of Light.” Such an angel is a messenger enlightened in the word, who handles it in such a way as to test the fidelity of others to it. Such an one becomes a Satan in suggesting a course of action in conformity with the promptings of the flesh. And if Deity became Satan to Israel, and to Job, it is not to be denied that an angel may have assumed the same attitude in the case of Jesus Christ.

Peter, though a good man and devoted friend of his Master, was styled Satan by Jesus. He had told his disciples, that he must go to Jerusalem, and be killed, and be raised on the third day after. But Peter rebuked him, saying, “Be merciful to thyself, Lord; this shall not be unto thee.” He could not endure the idea of such a catastrophe. But Jesus said to him, “Get thee behind me, Satan; thou art an offence unto me; for thou savorest not the things that be of the Deity, but those that be of men.” Had Jesus been merciful to himself, as Peter advised, he would not have been “obedient unto death;” in the event of which he would have frustrated the Father’s purpose, incurred the fate of the first Adam, and failed in the dedication of the Abrahamic Covenant by which alone man can be saved. Peter’s well-meant advice was adverse to the first and last of these things, and therefore as such an adviser, he was for the time a Satan to Jesus.

On another occasion, the Lord said to his disciples, “I beheld the Satan fall out of the heaven like lightning”. This was the Satan in heaven contemporary with his sojourn upon earth. He beheld his fall as the prophets beheld things not yet come to pass: for this Satan was still in the heaven after his assumption to the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens. This is evident from Paul’s assurance to the saints in Rome, the Capital of the Satan’s empire, that “the Deity of peace should bruise the Satan under their feet shortly” (Rom. 16:18). When Paul wrote this, the Satan was still in the heaven. It was the same Satan that prevented Paul more than once from visiting the saints in Thessalonica (1 Thess. 2:18). It was their great and potent adversary in the Dragon government, the Pagan Roman Church and State. It was this Great Red Dragon Diabolos and Satan, that “magnified himself against the Prince of (Israel’s) host: and by whom the Daily Sacrifice was taken away, and the place of its sanctuary was cast down” (Dan. 8:9–12). It is symbolized in this place by “a Little Horn, which waxed exceeding great.” It was by this Satanic Power, “Messiah the Prince was cut off;” and by which the city and sanctuary were destroyed” (Dan. 9:26). It was the great adversary of Judah, and of the Saints, whom it reckoned also as Jews. When the Lord Jesus saw it in vision fall like lightning from heaven, he saw their adversary expelled from the Roman Heaven, as symbolized in this twelfth chapter of the Apocalypse. Paul said it would be bruised “shortly” after he wrote. It was ejected by the lightning of war from the heaven, about 250 years after, when the Michael and his party fought against the Dragon and his angels (ch. 12:7). It fell out of the heaven, as Jesus said; and John records, that “he was cast out into the earth,” to the great terror of those among whom he fell (ver. 9, 12).>

The Dragon-Power of Rome, then, was surnamed THE SATAN, because it was the great and persistent Adversary of Christ, and His Brethren. No one intelligent in the word would confound the Satans related to Israel, Job, Jesus and Peter, and merge them into one and the same Satan, identical with such a Devil, as is pressed into the service of the Clergy, to aid them in scaring sinners into church-membership. The clerical devil and satan belongs to the mythology of the heathen, and is as unreal as their gods: nevertheless, this mythical phantasm has a real and tenacious hold of their worshippers; who are much more careful to treat him with reverence, than to praise and honor Him by whom they live and have their being.

The apocalyptic or Roman-Satan is the great enemy of Jerusalem, and of all related to her. Zechariah saw it in vision, when he saw the Satan standing at the right hand of Joshua to resist him. In all the times of the Gentiles, during which Jerusalem and the saints are trodden under their feet, the Holy City is subjected to the Satan. When these are fulfilled, then Yahweh who hath chosen Jerusalem, will rebuke the Satan, in “rebuking strong nations afar off,” and making them powerless (Mic. 4:3); and “pluck Jerusalem as a brand out of the fire”. Her warfare will then be accomplished; and her deliverer will be a wall of fire round about her, and the glory in the midst of her (Zech. 2:5; 3:1, 2).

The Satan of Apoc. 12, is characterized as the power “which deceives the whole habitable”—ten oikoumenen olen; not “the whole world,” as in the English version, in the sense of all the inhabitants of the globe; but the whole of that portion of it subject to the Dragon-Power of Old Rome. When the apocalypse was communicated to John, the Satan in the heaven was pagan. It deceived the people of the empire by the priests and poets (and the emperor was the High Priest) of the reigning superstition. But while this Satan flourished in the heaven of Italy, there was another Satan in embryo preparing to occupy the same heaven from which the pagan Satan was foredoomed to fall like lightning. This was the Satan enthroned in Pergamos (Apoc. 2:13); where his principal synagogue was situated (ch. 2:9, 24; 3:9). This Satan consisted of nominal christians; professors, who claimed to be Jews by adoption through Christ; but not being what they claimed, the Spirit denounced them as liars and blasphemers. They were zealous anti-pagans, as Protestants are, or used to be, zealous anti-papists; but their spiritual condition was that of Saidians and Laodiceans; and fit only to be “spued out of the Spirit’s mouth.” These pretenders styled themselves “the Church of God;” or “the Holy Apostolic Catholic Church.” They contended earnestly against paganism; from which “with all power and lying wonders,” styled by Paul “the working of the Satan” they alienated multitudes; but failed to indoctrinate them with “the love of the truth that they might be saved” (2 Thess. 2:9, 10). Their Satan was enlarged, and their political influence increased; so that, when the pagan Satan fell from the heaven, the “Holy Catholic” Satan was prepared to occupy the Bishoprick vacated by his fall. The revolution of the Sixth Seal substituted the one Satan for the other. The Catholic Satan is still in the heaven; and will remain there, until he is ejected by Christ himself, after the type or pattern, exhibited in this twelfth chapter. This final expulsion of the Satan from the heaven, is represented in Apoc. 20:1–3. In this scene, his head is bruised; and “the Dragon the Old Serpent, which is Diabolos and Satan,” is bound in the abyss, and shut up and sealed, so that the nations may be no more deceived for a thousand years.

16. The Dragon Stands Before The Woman

“And the Dragon stood before the Woman about to bring forth, that when she may have brought forth, he might devour her offspring”—verse 4.

Understanding that the “Great Red Dragon” is symbolical of the blood-stained power of Rome-pagan; and that the Woman represents the Anti-pagan Community of the Roman empire; the only points for exposition under this head are the standing of the one before the other; and the time when the standing occurred.

For a power to stand before that which is offensive to it, is to assume a hostile attitude. In Esther 9:16, the Jews against whom a decree of extermination had gone forth, and who were afterwards permitted to use their weapons for attack upon all assailants, are said to have “stood for their lives.” In

Jer. 46:15, it is said of the Egyptians “they stood not, because Yahweh did drive them.” And in Dan. 8:7, speaking of the relative power of the Macedonian Unicom, and the two-horned Persian Ram, it says, “there was no power in the ram to stand before him.” Hence, to have power to stand, is not only to be able to struggle for victory, but to do it with effect.

The standing of the Dragon before the Woman indicates that he was in an aggressive attitude. His standing had no courtesy in it, for he stood before her that he might devour her offspring.

The time when he stood before her with this ferocious intent, was before her delivery. She was “about to bring forth” while he was standing, or making war upon her. Her child had not been manifested to the world. Hence, the historical illustration must be applicable to a time of the Woman’s career when she had no champion, but when that “Coming Man” was just about to be manifested. The time, then, of this standing was the period of the Fifth Seal; or the ten years preceding the development of Constantine, as the imperial chieftain of the anti-pagan party. The exposition of the Fifth Seal will be found in Vol. 2 p. 264. Its historical illustration shows the attitude assumed by the Dragon, and how that sanguinary power deported itself towards her in its standing. The following extract from Gibbon will furnish an exhibition of the situation at the crisis of the Woman’s delivery:

“The fame of Constantine has rendered posterity attentive to the most minute circumstances of his life and actions. The Great Constantine was most probably born at Naissus, in Dacia. He was about eighteen years of age when his father (Constantius) was promoted to the rank of Caesar. Instead of following Constantius in the west, he remained in the service of Diocletian, signalized his valor in the wars of Egypt and Persia, and gradually rose to the honorable station of a tribune of the first order. The favor of the people and soldiers, who had named him as a worthy candidate for the rank of Caesar, served only to exasperate the jealousy of Galerius (the chief emperor of the Dragon): and though prudence might restrain him from exercising any open violence, an absolute monarch is seldom at a loss how to execute a sure and secret revenge. Every hour increased the danger of Constantine, and the anxiety of his father, who, by repeated letters, expressed the warmest desire of embracing his son. For some time the policy of Galerius supplied him with delays and excuses, but it was impossible long to refuse so natural a request of his associate, without maintaining his refusal by arms. The permission of the journey was reluctantly granted, and whatever precautions Galerius might have taken to intercept a return, the consequences of which he, with so much reason, apprehended, they were effectually disappointed by the incredible diligence of Constantine. Leaving the palace (of the Dragon) at Nicomedia in the night, he travelled post through Bithynia, Thrace, Dacia, Pannonia, Italy and Gaul, and amid the joyful acclamations of the people, reached the port of Boulogne in the very moment when his father was preparing to embark for Britain.” Such was the narrow escape of the Woman’s future imperial chief from being “devoured” by the imperial Pontifex Maximus who “stood before her” in ferocity watching to that end.

17. The Woman’s Son

“And she brought forth a male child, who is about to rule all the nations with an iron sceptre”—verse 5
The Spirit is here careful to designate the sex of the child that was to be born of the Woman. It is termed in the original, huion arrhena, literally, a male offspring. He was brought forth at length; but not “devoured” by the Dragon-Power; for he was destined to “rule all the nations with an iron sceptre,” in the Italian Heaven, from which the Woman’s adversary, or Satan, was to be ejected. It was not a female child that was to be born; but a man, whose birth had long been foretold in the prophets. In Psa. 10:15, 18, he is styled “the wicked and evil man,” and “the Man of the Earth,” whose arm is broken in the epoch when “Yahweh” becomes “King of the hidden period and beyond; and the heathen are perished out of His land.” The Spirit in David makes the following address to him in Psa. 52: “Why boastest thou thyself in mischief, O Mighty Man? The mercy of AIL is all the day. Thy tongue deviseth mischiefs; like a sharp razor working deceitfully. Thou lovest evil more than good; and lying rather than to speak righteousness. Thou lovest all devouring words, O thou deceitful tongue! But AIL shall beat thee down forever, He shall take thee away, and pluck thee from thy dwelling-place, and will root thee out of the land of the living. The righteous shall see and fear, and upon it they shall laugh, saying, Behold the man that made not Elohim his strength; but trusted in the abundance of his riches, and strengthened himself in his wickedness.”

Daniel styles this Mighty Man, “THE KING”—a man of power; ruling potentially and sovereignly over nations, during many centuries to the epoch of his destruction in the time of the end. “He is thus described in Dan. 11:36–39. “And the King shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every ail (or Power); and shall speak marvellous things concerning the AIL of ails (the Power of powers, or the greatest, and the source, of all power); and he shall flourish till the indignation shall be accomplished: for that that is determined shall be done. Neither shall he regard the gods of his ancestors, elohai avothahv; nor the desire of wives, nor regard any eloahh, “or god”. “But upon his place (or throne) shall he do honor to the eloahh mahuzzim—the god of guardians: and to an eloahh, ‘or god,’ which his ancestors knew not shall he do honor with gold, and silver, and with costly gems, and durable things. Thus shall he do to the Bazaars of the guardians pertaining to a FOREIGN GOD (eloahh) whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory: and he shall give them authority over many: and shall divide the land for gain.”

Thus, we see exhibited in the ancient and remarkable oracle of the Deity, an Absolute Sovereign Power, which repudiates the gods of his predecessors, and sets up in their place a god of foreign origin, who becomes a constituent of the power by which he is enthroned. Hence, the power consists of, or is represented by, the King and his god; who exalt and magnify themselves above every power, temporal and spiritual, claiming sovereignty and lordship upon the whole habitable. The King has the priority of existence in the New Constitution of things—new in relation to the old, under which the gods of his predecessors bore rule through their priests. The priority is manifest from the fact, that he is the founder of the glory of his New God—“whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory.” The acknowledgment of the candidate for divine honors, must be accepted as the date of his creation: that is, the aspirant became a god, as soon as he was recognized by the King. Until this recognition, the King would be supreme in all the spiritual and temporal affairs of his dominion. He would be the chief magistrate, the commander-in-chief of the military forces, and the chief bishop, of his empire; but when he should come to set up his new god, he would in so doing, delegate to him the supervision and administration of all spiritual and ecclesiastical affairs. This arrangement would make his god “the Head of all the Churches” of the habitable; while he would reserve to himself the headship of the State.

This foreign god unknown to his predecessors, is styled Eloahh Mahuzzim—a god of fortresses. A fortress is a strong place affording defence and protection. “The way of God,” is termed in Proverbs 10:29, “a fortress to the upright”. Upon the same principle, “saints and angels” are regarded as fortresses, or guardians, to those who worship them. These are the fortresses, or Mahuzzim, of the system of superstition, whose Supreme Pontiff is the god created by “the King”. His special fortress, is a phantasm he styles St. Peter. This is the guardian of his godship; besides which, he claims the protection of all the supposed existences of “the spirit-world”. The Virgin Mary, whom he styles “the Queen of heaven,” is conspicuous among these. No god, according to his own tradition, was ever so strongly fortified as he. All the conceivable saints and angels of the invisible world are his fortresses, protectors, or guardians. One cannot help but think, however, that they must be very negligent of their duty at the present time; for his godship is manifestly dying for want of protection by the powers of heaven and earth. Illustrative of these fortresses are the remarks of Chrysostom, a subject and priest of the King, who flourished in the 4th century. In his homily on the martyrs of Egypt, he says: "The bodies of those saints fortify the city more effectually for us than impregnable walls of adamant; and like towering rocks placed around on every side, repel not only the assaults of enemies that are visible, but the insidious stratagems also of invisible dæmons, and counteract and defeat every artifice of the devil as easily as a strong man overturns the toys of children."

The buildings pertaining to this God of Guardian Saints and Angels are styled by Daniel, "the Bazaars of the Guardians". The noun mitvzahr, is derived from the root bahtzar, which among other meanings signifies to enclose with a wall. As a noun betzer signifies ore of gold and silver, precious metals, store, or treasure so secured. Parkhurst has the following upon the word: "Derivative, Bazaar, a kind of covered market-place among the eastern nations, somewhat like our Exeter 'Change in London; but frequently much more extensive. Latin, or rather Punic, Byrsa, the Burse at Carthage ;" equivalent to the French Bourse. In the English version, the phrase is rendered, "the most strongholds," with which those who compiled the marginal readings were not satisfied; and therefore they have tried to improve it by substituting the words "fortresses of munitions". Moses Stuart renders it fenced strongholds; and the foreign god he styles, "the god of strongholds; that is, the god that has power over them." He confesses, however, that verse 39 is "a difficult verse, which has occasioned many discrepant interpretations." He refers to Lengerke, who, he remarks, "makes the fenced strongholds to mean temples, and the sentiment to be, that the tyrant will do for temples and their foreign gods the same thing that verse 38 says he will do in respect to the god of strongholds, that is, he will bestow many liberal presents upon them." As neither Lengerke nor Moses Stuart seem to see anything in Daniel (the last chapter, perhaps, excepted) beyond the times of Antiochus, some hundred and sixty years, or so, before the birth of Jesus Christ, their temples and "strongholds" have relation to "fortified strongholds of foreigners" attacked by Antiochus, and temples of idols. Lengerke has almost fallen upon the correct meaning. Had he referred the betzer, heemantively written mitvzar, to the temples of "guardian saints" instead of to those of the pagan Greeks, he would have hit the mark exactly; but then, how could he be so uncharitable as to turn the "Holy Father" of Christendom so-called, into a foreign god, and all the ecclesiastical edifices of his bishoprick dedicated to the disembodied ghosts of reputed saints, into Bazaars, or places of traffic in spiritual merchandise, and in "the bodies and souls of men!" (Apoc. 18:13).

The churches, chapels, and cathedrals, then, are "the most strongholds" of the King's superstition, which has spread itself over Europe and America. They are the houses of business dedicated by the prospering craft to "Guardian Spirits". There are laid up in store the images and pictures of reputed saints. They are Saints' Houses in which are deposited their shrines; silver, gold and ivory crucifixes; "religious, articles" of all sorts; together with old bones, and various kinds of votive trumpery. They are literally, "Dens of Thieves," without ever having been houses of the Father—dens, where people are hoodwinked, and by "sharp practice" robbed of their money under divers false pretences. They are places where pews are sold by auction, the proudest sittings being knocked down to Mammon's greatest favorites; places where fairs of vanity and deceit are held for "pious objects;" and whose spiritual empirics pretend to "cure souls" in consideration of so much per annum. In view of these facts, the Scriptural epithet bestowed upon the ecclesiastical edifices of the Apostasy, is most appropriate. They are truly bazaars of spiritual merchandise; and the prospering craft, "the great men of the earth," papal, catholic, and protestant, made rich by trading in their wares, are the Bazaar-Men, who extort all kinds of goods from their deluded customers by putting them in sulphurous and mortal fear; and comforting them with counterfeits upon some transpatial bank when time shall be no more! They "buy and sell" under license from the Ecclesiastical Power, having received its "mark upon their foreheads, or on their right hands." The reader may find their inventory of merchandise in Apoc. 18:12, 13. Among the articles received in exchange for their “spiritual things,” are tithes, bodies (somata) and souls of men. But the trade of these soul-and-body merchants is in anything but a satisfactory state at present. Great numbers of their customers have discovered that the profit is all upon one side; nor are they backward in proclaiming that when a favorable opportunity presents they will break up the iniquitous concern, and make the cheats disgorge their unhallowed gains. This will be to them a sad day—a day of universal bankruptcy for the weeping and wailing merchants of “Babylon the Great;” for “no man buyeth their merchandize any more.” When a man’s trade is thus extinguished, nothing but ruin stares the shattered tradesman in the face. This is the fate that awaits the preachers of all the “other gospels” of the bazaars—gospels other than Paul preached, and which leave men in ignorance and disobedience; gospels which make them partisans of human crotchets and traditions; and the apologists of anything sincerely professed as a substitute for the truth.

It is a remarkable feature in this prophecy that the Bazaars for priestly and clerical wares are distinguished from houses or shops of fair and honorable trade, by being styled Bazaars of Mahuzzim. When jewellers, bakers, hardware-men, and such-like, open stores, they emblazon their signs with their own names. When people go to the baker’s or the butcher’s, they do not say they are going to St. Paul’s or St. Barnabas’, as if the stores were theirs. But when the clergy of “the King” and his foreign god, whether they be loyal or non-conformist, open bazaars for the sharp practice of their trade, they impose upon the credulous and strongly deluded public the idea that they belong to the apostles and their brethren! They say that these ancients “of whom the world is not worthy,” are still alive and in heaven, and greatly interested in human affairs, especially in church edifices, and in the orchestral and pulpit demonstrations therein! Hence, they set up statues in niches, and on parapets, which they call by their names, and make them presents of their churches, as is evident from the names they bear; as St. Sophia’s at Constantinople, St. Peter’s at Rome, Our Lady’s at Paris, St. Paul’s at London, and so forth. The flagrancy of the imposture, however, consists in this, that while they profess to give these houses of the king’s god to the “departed spirits” they call by these names, they will not permit the gospel the apostles preached, and the institutions they ordained, to be announced in their walls; but, by various arts, perversely persist in its exclusion, and in making it of none effect by their vain and foolish traditions. But the whole system is a cheat, and a very profitable one for the present to those who live by it. It is ecclesiastical craft caused to prosper by the Civil Power, or “the King;” and it will continue to prosper “till the indignation shall be accomplished;” when Israel’s Commander will bring it to an end, and cause the truth, by the energy whereby he is able to subdue all opposition, and to unmask all impostures, to prevail at last.

This king, or Imperial Power, and its foreign god, are presented in Dan. 7:8, 20, 24, 25, under the symbol of a Little Horn, in which were EYES like the eyes of man, and a MOUTH speaking very great things. In this, the Eyes and the Mouth are representative of the foreign god; while the Little Horn itself is significative of “the king,” or power, that glorifies him. This remarkable constitution of Church and State did not obtain in the days of Paul and John. The former in 2 Thess. 2 predicted its manifestation as the result of apostasy from the faith; and that when that apostasy was well developed, the power would be revealed. Not, however, in full manifestation at the beginning. The power had to receive its birth, and to grow to manhood, or maturity; so that when it had fully established itself above all, it might be in a position to set up its foreign god. Paul styles the power, “the Man of Sin, the Son of Perdition;” and foreseeing the extraordinary arrogance of the spiritual element of the power, he speaks of it as one “who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called a god, or an object of reverence; so that he as a god sitteth in the temple of the god, showing himself that he is a god.” This is the god Daniel styles “a foreign god;” and by John in Apoc. 13:2, 5, “the Mouth of the Beast as the mouth of a lion, and speaking great things and blasphemies;” and in verses 14, 15, “the Image of the Beast,” which received life and ability to speak from the Civil Power.

Now, the Pagan Imperial Roman Power existed before the Woman; and so did Jesus Christ. Neither of them, therefore, could be the son to be born of her. But in the days of Constantine, there was a great revolution in the State, the effects of which are felt in all Europe and America to this day. When he became Emperor of Rome, the constitution of the empire was modified in Church and State. He assumed supremacy in both; and became the Chief Bishop—"the Bishop of the bishops"—of "the Holy Apostolic Catholic Church," so called. He established the Catholic Apostasy as the most favored religion of the Roman State; but, according to Labanius, "made no alteration in the legal worship; the temples indeed were impoverished, but the sacred rites were performed there." Though the Court was transferred to Constantinople, the Senate continued to hold its sessions in Rome, where by solemn decrees it still presumed to consecrate the divine memory of their sovereigns; and Constantine himself was associated, after his death, to those gods of his predecessors whom he had renounced and insulted during his life. "The titles, the ensigns, the prerogatives, of SOVEREIGN PONTIFF," says Gibbon, "which had been instituted by Numa, and assumed by Augustus, were accepted without hesitation, by seven christian emperors, who were invested with more absolute authority over the religion which they had deserted, than over that which they professed." Hence, this Son of the Woman, styled by historians "the first christian emperor," was at once Sovereign Pontiff of paganism, and Chief Bishop of the Catholic Church! Such a child born and son given could be no other than "THE MAN OF SIN." The historical testimony of Gibbon concerning this personage is demonstrative of the true character of the Woman's Son. "The first of the christian emperors," says he, "was unworthy of that name till the moment of his death." This he clearly proves in his great work. In the days of the apostles they only were christians who believed "the gospel of the kingdom," and were immersed; but Constantine was ignorant of it, and therefore could not believe it, and was not immersed until three days before his death, A.D. 337. During many previous years he was reputed a christian by the Catholic Church. He assumed the character of a bishop, presided at ecclesiastical councils, gave judgment against christians reputed "heretical" by his party, enjoined the solemn observance of the first day of the week, which he called the day of the sun, Die Solis, after his once favorite god, and in the same year, A.D. 321, directed the regular consultation of AURUSPICES. § He was permitted by the Catholic Woman to enjoy most of the privileges of her communion. Instead of retiring from the congregation, when the voice of the deacon dismissed the profane multitude, he prayed with the faithful, disputed with the bishops, preached on the most sublime and intricate subjects of theology, celebrated with "sacred rites" the vigil of Easter, and publicly declared himself, not only a partaker, but, in some measure, a priest and hierophant of the "christian mysteries". In view of such premises as these, what shall we say of such a church, and of such a religion, whose professors could permit, and even applaud, such flagrant violation of the first principles of the doctrine of Christ? The only conclusion attainable is that such a community is the CHURCH OF ANTI-CHRIST, and her imperial protector and chief, THE MAN OF SIN..

18. The Manner of His Birth

The Man-Child of Sin, or "the King," was born, or made manifest, after this wise. We have seen how Constantine escaped the designs of the Dragon-Emperor Galerius. Having arrived at Boulogne, he accompanied his father to Britain, who died soon after in the imperial palace at York, A.D. 306. According to the constitution of the empire, the appointment of a successor to the vacant office of Augustus, was the prerogative of Galerius. The flower of the western armies had followed the deceased monarch into Britain. The opinion of their own importance, and the assurance that Britain, Gaul, and Spain would acquiesce in their nomination, were diligently inculcated on these legions by the Woman's partisans, and other revolutionary adherents of Constantine. The throne was the object of his desires: and the attainment of it was his only means of safety. He was well acquainted with the character and sentiments of Galerius, who in vowing the destruction of the christian name, was implacable towards those who favored it. He was therefore sufficiently apprised, that if he wished to live he must determine to reign. After a show of decent and even obstinate resistance, affected to justify his usurpation, he yielded to the acclamations of the army, which saluted him as Augustus, and emperor. Upon this, he immediately despatched a letter to Galerius, informing him of his father's death, modestly asserting his natural claim to the succession, and respectfully lamenting, that the affectionate violence of his troops had not permitted him to solicit the imperial purple in the regular and constitutional manner. The first emotions of Galerius were those of surprise, disappointment, and rage; and as he could seldom restrain his passions, he loudly threatened that he would commit to the flames both the letter and the messenger. But his resentment insensibly subsided. Without either condemning or ratifying; the choice of the British army, Galerius accepted Constantine as the sovereign of the provinces west of the Alps, but gave him only the title of Caesar, and the fourth rank among the Roman princes, whilst he conferred the vacant place of Augustus on his favorite Severus. The apparent harmony of the empire was still preserved, and Constantine, who already possessed the substance, expected, without impatience, an opportunity of obtaining the honors of supreme power.

For the first, and indeed the last time, the Roman World was administered by six emperors, A.D. 308. The opposition of interest, and the memory of a recent war, divided the empire into two great hostile powers. In the west, Constantine and Maxentius acknowledged the superior influence of Maximian; while in the east, Licinius and Maximin honored with more real consideration their benefactor Galerius: but upon the death of the elder princes, Maximian and Galerius, a new direction was given to the views and passions of their surviving associates.

During six years Maxentius reigned in Rome. He was repeatedly heard to declare that he alone was emperor, and that the other three princes were no more than his lieutenants, on whom he had devolved the defence of the frontier provinces, that he might enjoy without interruption the elegant luxury of the capital. In the crisis thus formed, A.D. 312, Constantine was convinced that the hostile and ambitious designs of the Italian emperor made it necessary for him to arm in his own defence. Maxentius was constitutionally the head of the Dragon-Power, being enthroned in Rome, and identified with the Roman Senate. He openly avowed his pretensions to the whole monarchy of the west, and had already prepared a very considerable force to invade Constantine's jurisdiction on the side of Rhoetia.

That Constantine at this crisis was in the womb of the Catholic Woman, appears from the fact, that while he exercised his limited sovereignty over the provinces of Gaul, his christian subjects were protected by his authority, while, says Gibbon, "he wisely left to the gods the care of vindicating their own honor. If we may credit the assertion of Constantine himself, he had been an indignant spectator of the savage cruelties which were inflicted by the hands of Roman soldiers on those citizens whose religion was their only crime." The example of Galerius, his implacable enemy, had made this severity odious to him. By the authority and advice of his dying father, he determined to pursue an opposite course. He immediately suspended or repealed the edicts of persecution, and granted the free exercise of their religious ceremonies to all those who had already professed themselves members of the church. They, were soon encouraged to depend on the favor as well as on the justice of their sovereign, who had imbibed a secret and sincere reverence for the name of Christ, and for the God of the christians.

The colossal head of Constantine's stature in Rome (the rest of which is now in fragments). Constantine is the man child of sin of Rev. 12:5. He was a very skilful and powerful ruler. He united the empire under his sole rule, and established the authority of the Church. He is claimed to have been the “first Christian Emperor” but, in fact, only submitted to baptism a short time before his death.—Publishers.

“The warm and active loyalty of the Catholics exhausted in Constantine’s favor every resource of human industry; and they confidently expected that their strenuous efforts would be seconded by some divine and miraculous aid. The enemies of Constantine,” continues Gibbon, “have imputed to interested motives the alliance which he insensibly contracted with the Catholic Church,” or the Woman, and which apparently contributed to the success of his ambition. In the beginning of the fourth century the Catholics still bore a very inadequate proportion to the inhabitants of the empire; but among a degenerate people like the Romans and Greeks, who viewed the change of masters with the indifference of slaves, the spirit and union of the Catholic minority would assist the popular leader, to whose service, from a principle of conscience, they had devoted their lives and fortunes. The ranks of his legions were filled with the proselytes of the new faith; so that when they marched against Maxentius, a great number of the soldiers had already consecrated their swords to the service of Christ and of Constantine. In the Catholic councils assembled under Constantine’s protection, the authority of the bishops was employed to ratify the obligation of the military oath, and to inflict the penalty of excommunication on those soldiers who threw away their arms during the enjoyment of peace by the church. But the Woman was not confined to the dominions of Constantine. She overspread the Dragon empire; so that while he increased his adherents from her communion in Britain, Spain and Gaul, he could depend on the support of the Catholics in the provinces, which were still possessed or usurped by his rivals. Thus a secret disaffection was diffused among the Catholic subjects of Maxentius and Licinius—the Dragon Power against which he was about to contend. The regular correspondence which connected the bishops of the most distant provinces, enabled them freely to communicate their wishes and their designs, and to transmit without danger any useful intelligence, or any pious contributions, which might promote the service of Constantine, who publicly declared that he had taken up arms for the deliverance of the Catholic Church.

By this declaration he constituted himself the Woman’s champion against the Dragon, in all the Roman World; nevertheless, he had not yet announced himself as one of her sons. The real and precise date of Constantine’s conversion to Laodicean Catholicism has been variously stated. Eusebius has ascribed the faith of Constantine to a sign alleged to have been displayed in the heavens whilst he was waging war against Maxentius. A contemporary writer affirms with the most perfect confidence, that in the night that preceded the last battle with Maxentius, Constantine was admonished in a dream to inscribe the shields of his soldiers with the celestial sign of God, the sacred monogram of the name of Christ—thus ; that he executed this command, and that his valor and obedience were rewarded by the decisive victory of the Milvian Bridge. But it is not easy to determine if this were a real miracle, or merely a “lying wonder.” Probably it was the last. Be this as it may, the victory of the Milvian Bridge developed Constantine as the FIRST IMPERIAL SON OF THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, commonly, but absurdly, styled, “the first Christian Emperor.” Previous to that victory he was an usurper of imperial rank, unrecognized by the Roman Senate, and the Coming Man of the Catholic party; favoring its policy, but temporizing between them and their opponents. He was in the womb of his mother, but not yet born of her, as the chief ruler of the Roman nations.

His birth could not be accomplished without the pains of parturition. His mother was “in pangs, straining to bring forth.” These pangs and strainings were the pains of persecution, and the efforts of war for deliverance. The threatened invasion of his territory by Maxentius caused Constantine to hesitate no longer. He gave private audience to ambassadors, who in the name of the Senate and people, conjured him to deliver Rome from a detested tyrant; and without regarding the timid remonstrances of his council, he resolved to prevent the enemy, and to carry the war into the heart of Italy. The enterprise was as full of danger as of “glory.” Maxentius was prepared to resist him with 120,000 foot, and 18,000 horse. But Constantine was not to be deterred by this array. At the head of about 40,000 soldiers, he descended into the plain of Piedmont by the road across the Cottian Alps, now styled Mount Cenis, with such activity, that his army arrived there before the court of Maxentius had received any certain intelligence of his departure from the banks of the Rhine. He stormed, and entered Susa sword in hand, and cut in pieces the greater part of the garrison. About forty miles from thence, in the plains of Turin, he encountered the lieutenants of Maxentius, commanding a force largely consisting of heavy cavalry, horses and men clothed in complete armor. Their weight was almost irresistible, and they flattered themselves that they would easily break and trample down the army of Constantine. But his skilful evolutions divided and baffled them. They fled towards Turin, which shut its gates against them, so that very few escaped the sword of their pursuers. The result of this victory was the submission of Milan, and almost all the cities of Italy between the Alps and the Po, which also embraced with zeal the party of Constantine.

From Milan to Rome the Æmilian and Flaminian highways offered an easy march of four hundred miles. But he preferred for strategic reasons the route by Verona. He was met by a large body of cavalry which he defeated near Brescia, and pursued to the gates of Verona. He crossed the Adige, a rapid river encompassing three sides of the city, and laid siege to it. Pompeianus, finding that he could not successfully defend it, escaped from Verona, and with indefatigable diligence collected an army sufficient either to meet Constantine in the field, or to attack him if he obstinately remained within his lines. But leaving part of his legions to continue the siege, he led those troops on whose valor and fidelity he more particularly depended, in person against the enemy. The engagement began at the close of the day, and was contested with great obstinacy the whole night. The return of light displayed the victory of Constantine, and a field of carnage covered with many thousands of vanquished Italians. Pompeianus was found among the slain; Verona immediately surrendered at discretion, and the garrison was made prisoners of war.

The resources of Maxentius, both in men and money, were still considerable. A third army was soon collected, more numerous than those which had been lost in the battles of Turin and Verona. The contempt of the Roman people, who tumultuously reproached his pusillanimity and insolence, while they celebrated the heroic spirit of Constantine, compelled him to assume the command of the army in person. But before he left Rome he consulted the Sibylline books. These were the ancient oracles of the old Roman superstition, whose guardians were as well versed in the arts of this world, as they were ignorant of the secrets of fate; they returned him the very prudent answer that, Illo die hostem Romanorum esse periturum, “on that day the enemy of the Romans would perish;” which might adapt itself to the event, the vanquished prince, of course, becoming the enemy of Rome.

On arriving at Saxa Rubra, about nine miles from Rome, Constantine discovered the army of Maxentius prepared to give him battle. Their long front filled a very spacious plain, and their deep array reached to the banks of the Tiber, which covered their rear, and forbade their retreat. Constantine charged in person at the head of the Gallic horse, whose impetuosity determined the fortune of the day. The defeat of the two wings left the flanks of the infantry unprotected, and the undisciplined Italians precipitately fled. The praetorians, conscious that their offences were beyond the reach of mercy, were animated by revenge and despair. But they were unable to recover the victory. The confusion then became general, and the dismayed troops of Maxentius, pursued by an implacable enemy, rushed by thousands into the deep and rapid Tiber. Maxentius endeavoured to reach the city by the Milvian Bridge, but he was forced into the river by the crowd, where he was immediately drowned by the weight of his armor. On the recovery of his body from the mud next day, his head was exposed to view, which convinced the people of their deliverance, and admonished them to receive with loyal and grateful demonstrations the victorious Constantine, “who thus achieved,” says Gibbon, “by his valor and ability the most splendid enterprise of his life.”

This “most splendid enterprise” was his birth as the Woman’s Son. Before, he was an usurper and adventurer, but by these splendid defeats of the forces of the Dragon, and the acquisition of his throne and capital, he was assigned by the decree of the Roman Senate, the first rank among the three Augusti who governed the Roman World. He was now exalted to a position of great influence, which he speedily exerted in favor of the Catholic Church. He had not yet attained to Supreme Godship in the Roman heaven, by which he could “rule all the nations” of the empire “with an iron sceptre.” By the overthrow of Maxentius he annexed Italy and Africa to his dominion; but there still remained the territories held by Licinius and Maximin, the two other Augusti. The former ruled the nations of Illyricum; the latter, those of Egypt and Syria. But the destiny marked out by Deity for the Woman’s Imperial Son, was that he should rule all these nations with an iron sceptre; so that we may expect to find that his career will be onward until he acquires the sole dominion over the whole Roman Habitable.

About five months after the conquest of Italy, in March, A.D. 313, Constantine made a solemn and authentic declaration of his sentiments, by the celebrated Edict of Milan, which restored peace to the Catholic Church. After the death of Maximin, it was received as a general and fundamental law of the Roman world. Constantine, with the ready, but not hearty, concurrence of Licinius, provided for the restitution of all the civil and religious rights of which the catholics had been deprived. It was enacted that the places of worship, and public lands, which had been confiscated, should be restored to the Catholic Church, without dispute, without delay, and without expense; and this severe injunction was accompanied with a gracious promise, that if any of the purchasers had paid a fair and adequate price, they should be indemnified from the imperial treasury. The two emperors proclaimed to the world, that they had granted a free and absolute power to the catholics, and to all others, of following the religion which each individual thinks proper to prefer, to which he has addicted his mind, and which he may deem the best adapted to his own use. Thus, as expressed by Eusebius, while the East was involved in the shades of infernal darkness, the auspicious rays of celestial light warmed and illuminated the provinces of the West. The piety of Constantine was cited as an unexceptionable proof of the justice of his arms; and his use of victory in their favor confirmed the opinion of the catholics, that their hero was inspired, and conducted, by the Lord of hosts.

19. The Son’s Ascent to the Deity

“And her son was forcibly carried up to the Deity, and his throne”

Before the Woman’s Son could “rule ALL the nations” of the Roman Habitable, it was necessary that he be placed upon the throne of the Deity. “There is no power but of the Deity,” says Paul; “and the powers that be are ordered of the Deity.” The throne of the Deity upon the Roman Habitable would be the seat of the Supreme and Sole Sovereignty of the empire, wherever it might be located. Jerusalem is styled “the throne of Yahweh” in Jer. 3:17. That city is the place where supreme power will be established in the Millennium. It was also Yahweh’s throne when occupied by David and Solomon — 1 Chron. 29:23. But in the days of Constantine, supreme power had long before departed from Jerusalem. Israel and Judah had been broken and divorced; and a people formed from among the Gentiles for the Divine Name. This people came to contend with the Pagan Dragon for supreme power. After a long and bloody conflict they acquired it by the will of the Deity, “of whom are all things” (1 Cor. 8:6). Their military commander is, therefore, said to have arrived at the Deity and his throne. Hence Constantine, as sole emperor of the Roman world, invested with supreme power in all spiritual and temporal affairs, is the illustration of the import of the text predicting the translation of the Woman’s Son “to the Deity and his throne.”

But under the circumstances of the case it was not possible for him to attain that high position without further conflict. He had fought his way up from a Caesar of the fourth rank of Roman princes, to be the first of the three Augusti of the empire; but he could ascend no higher while his two colleagues, Licinius and Maximin, ruled Illyricum and the East. These had to be removed by force of arms; for they were not the men voluntarily to abdicate position and power in favor of a rival as ambitious as themselves.

The word in the original indicating this necessity, is herpasthe; rendered in the Common Version, “was caught up.” The phrase “to the Deity” implies ascending from a lower to the highest position. Hence the word “up.” The word implies violence in the action it represents; as, to convey, take or carry by force. I have, therefore, rendered it, was forcibly carried up. Her son did not forcibly translate himself into the possession of supreme power; but he was carried up to that high position by his victorious armies, whose hearts and arms were energized by Divine power.

War In The Heaven;

Or,

20. The Ascent Historically Illustrated

“And there was war in the heaven; the Michael and his angels waged war against the Dragon; and the Dragon fought and his angels, but prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in the heaven.”

When Constantine was declared by the Roman Senate the first of the three Augusti, Licinius, the Illyrian Augustus, seemed cordially to endorse his policy with respect to the Catholic Church. But his subsequent conduct soon betrayed the reluctance with which he had consented to the wise and humane regulations of the Edict of Milan. The convocation of provincial synods was prohibited in his dominions; his catholic officers were ignominiously dismissed; and if he avoided the guilt, or rather danger, of a general persecution, his partial oppressions were rendered still more odious, by the violation of a solemn and voluntary engagement.

The interview between Constantine and Licinius at Milan was brief. In the midst of the public festivity these allies were suddenly obliged to take leave of each other. An inroad of the Franks demanded the presence of Constantine on the Rhine; and the hostile approach of Maximin required the immediate presence of Licinius. Maximin had been the secret ally of Maxentius, and without being discouraged at his fate, he resolved to try the fortune of a civil war. He invaded the dominion of Licinius with a disciplined and veteran army of about seventy thousand men. Licinius encountered him with thirty thousand, and after a severe contest, gave him a signal and decisive overthrow. Maximin, perceiving that all was lost, fled with great precipitation. He was the most implacable of all the enemies of the Catholic Church; but he did not long survive his defeat to torment it. Three or four months after he died by Divine justice; and the provinces of the east, delivered from the terrors of civil war, cheerfully acknowledged the authority of Licinius.

The Roman world was now divided between Constantine and Licinius; the former being master of the West, and the latter of the East. Constantine, as the military chieftain of the Catholic Church, which the Deity had predetermined should have the rule instead of the Pagan Priesthood, is styled in the prophecy ho Michael, the Michael: that is, the Michael of the situation. This name is Hebrew in a Greek dress. The Hebrew is resolvable into three words put interrogatively, as Miyka’el, or Mi, who, cah, like, ail power? Or Who like that power Divinely energized to cast the Pagan Dragon, surnamed the Diabolos and the Satan, out of the Roman heaven? There was no contemporary power under this Sixth Seal that was able to contend successfully against it. Hence Constantine, as the instrument of the Deity in the development of his purpose, is styled “the Michael”. He was not personally the Michael, or “first of the chief princes” spoken of in Dan. 10:13, nor the Michael termed in Dan. 12:1, “the great Prince who standeth for the children of Daniel’s people;” but for the time being he filled the office that will hereafter be more potently and gloriously illustrated by the Great Prince from heaven, who will bind the Dragon and shut him down in the abyss for a thousand years (Apoc. 20:2, 3). The militant mission of Constantine and the Great Prince, Jesus Christ, are similar, but not identical. The power of the Deity was with Constantine, as it was with Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus, Alexander, and the first Napoleon; while Christ is the great power of the Deity corporealized. Constantine was to rule all the nations of the Roman Habitable with an iron sceptre from the time he attained supreme power till he died, which was about fourteen years. Christ Jesus and his brethren are to rule all the nations of the globe with an iron sceptre for a thousand years (Apoc. 19:15; 2:26,27). Constantine stood up with Catholics and for them and Christians, against the Pagan Dragon. Christ Jesus will stand up for the saints, and with them, against the Catholic Dragon and Beasts whom he will bind and destroy. Thus the word parallelizes the greater and the less in their military antagonism, to the powers hostile to the Divine Name. It may, therefore, be fairly admitted that in his military career against the Dragon, Constantine was a typical Michael—typical of that Michael who shall stand up in the resurrection period, and bring all the nations of mankind into subjection to his almighty power.

THE ROMAN EMPIRE UNDER CONSTANTINE

The extent of the Roman Empire was very great. It reached from the Atlantic coast to the Caspian Sea, and from the coast of North Holland to that of Africa comprising the then known world, fulfilling Revelation 12:5.

But the Michael, Constantine, was not alone in his wars. There were associated with him “his angels”. Angels are agents employed to execute the will and pleasure of those who commissioned them. They may be mortal or immortal agents, and hold their commission of the Deity or of men. In the prophecy, the Divine Power, or AIL, commissioned certain mortal agents, known as Constantine and his adherents, to cast the Dragon and his adherents out of the Roman Heaven. The same power that co-worked with Constantine co-operated with his retainers. They were, therefore, the Michael-power and its angels—the corrupt and militant class of the Woman’s children.

“And there was war in the heaven.” “Wherever the scene is laid,” saith Daubuz, truly, “heaven signifies, symbolically, the ruling power or government; that is, the whole assembly of the ruling powers, which, in respect of the subjects, or earth, are a political heaven, being over and ruling the subjects, as the natural heaven stands over and rules the earth: so that according to the subject is the term to be limited.” The scene is laid in “the whole habitable of the Dragon;” hence “the heaven” in the prophecy signifies the whole assembly of the ruling powers of the Roman Dragon. This being the subject of the prophecy, the term must be limited to the official region of the Roman world.

In the Roman Heaven, then, there was to be war. There had already been a war there; that namely, between Licinius and Maximin. But this could not be the war predicted; for, although Maximin was defeated, he was not cast out by Licinius; having died in office and from disease: neither were Licinius and his adherents “the Michael and his angels.” The chief difference between Licinius and Maximin was, that the former was a hypocritical and cruel politician and pagan; while the latter was all this and more ferocious, but without the hypocrisy. No; the particular war predicted was to be waged between “the Michael” and the Dragon; and not to reach its final termination until the place of “the Dragon and his angels” should be “found no more in the heaven.” Constantine took no part in the war against Maximin, being engaged in checking the incursions of the Franks across the Rhine.

Since the death of Maximin, Licinius by his patronage of “the gods of his ancestors,” and his hatred, ill-concealed, of Constantine and the catholics, came to be represented from A.D. 314 to A.D. 324, by the Dragon-tail which “drew the third part of the stars of the heaven”—Ver. 4. I say from A.D. 314, because previously to this date, he was the chief luminary of two-thirds; of his own Illyrian third, and of Maximin’s Asiatic third which he acquired by his death.

Now, he was reduced from a tail, or following, of two-thirds to one-third of the stars of the Roman firmament by a war with Constantine. A year had scarcely elapsed after the death of Maximin, before Constantine and Licinius turned their arms against each other. This was a war, but not the war predicted. It was a war for the development of the Dragon’s Tail—the tail end of the pagan dragon-power. The character of Licinius was perfidious. He secretly fomented a conspiracy against the authority of Constantine. But this vigilant ruler discovered it before it was ripe for execution. Licinius haughtily refused the extradition of the criminals who had sought refuge in Illyricum. This confirmed the suspicions of Constantine; who, without further loss of time in the interchanges of diplomacy, marched against him with twenty thousand men. Licinius met him near Cibalis in Pannonia with thirty-five thousand. Licinius was defeated with a loss of twenty thousand. After this he retreated, but halted in the plain of Mardia in Thrace, where he determined to hazard another battle. This was no less obstinate and bloody than the former; the troops on both sides displayed the same valor and discipline; but the superior abilities of the Woman’s Son again decided the fortune of the day in his favor. The loss of two battles, and of his bravest veterans, reduced the fierce spirit of Licinius to sue for peace. His situation was almost desperate. Constantine, however, consented to retain him in “the heaven,” but with a dominion considerably reduced. He left him in possession of a third part of the Roman Habitable, consisting of Thrace, Asia Minor, Syria and Egypt; now comprehended in Modern Turkey: but the provinces of Pannonia, Dalmatia, Dacia, Macedonia, and Greece, the other third, were annexed to the Western Empire; so that the dominions of Constantine now extended over two-thirds, from the confines of Caledonia to the extremity of Peloponnesus.

Thus terminated this war in the heaven. It had reduced the dominion of the pagan element; but had not given the Woman’s son rule over all the nations of the habitable; nor had it cast the great red dragon and his angels out. The overthrow of Maxentius, with whom Maximin was allied, that is, the birth of the Woman’s son; left “the earth and the sea” in the possession of Licinius and Maximin: who, in relation to “the inhabitants of the earth and sea,” constituted “THE DIABOLOS.” The signs of the times convinced them, that the pagan political power was doomed to speedy extinction, unless its fall could be arrested by the overthrow of the catholic party and its military chief. This they were determined to compass if possible. Hence, the two wars in the heaven, which brought “Woe to the inhabitants of the earth and sea: because the diabolos had come down (from Italy where he had reigned before the defeat of Maxentius) unto them, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time”—verse 12. This “short time” was a period of about twelve years; that is, from A.D. 312 to A.D. 324, when Constantine became sole emperor of the Roman world.

The recent treaty of peace between the Diabolos-emperor, Licinius, and the Woman’s Son, Constantine, maintained the tranquillity of the empire above eight years. A very regular series of imperial laws commences about the period of this treaty, the most important of which were intimately connected with the new system of policy and religion, which was not perfectly established till the last and peaceful years of his reign.

In the exalted state of glory to which he had attained A.D. 323, it was impossible that Constantine should any longer endure a partner in the empire. Confiding in the superiority of his genius and military power, he determined to exert them for the ejection of “the dragon and his angels out of the heaven.” For this purpose he commenced the war predicted in the seventh verse. Licinius prepared himself for the contest, collected the forces of his Eastern Third, the “Angels” of his power, and soon filled the plains of Adrianople with one hundred and fifty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse; and the straits of the Hellespont with a fleet of three hundred and fifty galleys of three ranks of oars. The troops of Constantine, the Michael of the situation, amounted to a hundred and twenty thousand horse and foot. Constantine’s naval preparations were in every respect much inferior to those of Licinius. They did not exceed two hundred small vessels. With this naval preponderance he might have carried an offensive war into the centre of his rival’s dominions, and so have changed the whole face of it. But the prudence of Licinius was at fault in contending with “the Michael and his angels,” whose attack he awaited in a fortified camp near Adrianople. Constantine’s advance from Thessalonica was arrested by the broad and rapid Hebrus, the steep ascent from which to the city was filled by the army of Licinius. Here were now assembled Licinius and Martinianus, whom he had made Caesar, “the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chiliarchs (chiefs of a thousand men) and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman” (Apoc. 6:15). This was the great day of the Lamb’s wrath upon the pagan dragon-tail, and the third part of the stars of the Roman firmament that followed it. “The Michael and his angels,” the executioners of the Lamb’s wrath, “waged war against the Dragon.” Many days were spent in doubtful and distant skirmishes; but at length the obstacles of the passage and the attack were removed by the intrepid conduct of Constantine. Zosimus, an historian who was the partial enemy of his fame, relates a wonderful exploit of Constantine. He says that the valiant emperor threw himself into the Hebrus, accompanied only by twelve horsemen, and that by the effort or terror of his invincible arm, he broke, slaughtered, and put to flight a host of one hundred and fifty thousand men. Other causes combined to develop this result; for while he was perplexing Licinius with his artful evolutions, a body of five thousand archers deployed from a thick wood in his rear, and made it necessary for him to take up a new position in the plain. The advantage of position being lost, the contest was no longer equal. “The Dragon fought, and his angels, but prevailed not”. His confused multitude of new levies was easily vanquished by “the Michael,” and his experienced veterans of the West. Thirty-four thousand of the Dragon’s forces were slain; their fortified camp was taken by assault on the evening of the battle. The greater part of the fugitives “hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains.” The logic of their flight hither was that they might hide from the conqueror; and the language of it was, “Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne” (Apoc. 6:16). Next day they came forth from their hiding places, and surrendered themselves to the discretion of the victor.

This battle of Adrianople had been a consummation of “woe to the inhabitants of the earth.” the time had now come for a like consummation of “woe to the inhabitants of the sea.” Here were five hundred and fifty vessels full of combatants, drawn together from the maritime part of the Roman earth, to engage in the great conflict between the worshippers of the idols, and the catholic believers in the Divine Unity. While Constantine was besieging Byzantium, to which Licinius had retired after his defeat at Adrianople, Crispus, the eldest son of Constantine, was entrusted with the daring enterprise of forcing the passage of the Hellespont. This he performed with great courage and success. The engagement between the contending fleets lasted two days. A south wind springing up about noon, carried his vessels against the enemy, and as the advantage was improved by his skill and intrepidity, he soon obtained a complete victory. A hundred and thirty vessels were destroyed, and five thousand men were slain. The Hellespont being now open, Licinius perceived that he could not hold Byzantium much longer. Therefore, before the place was surrounded, he prudently removed his person and treasures to Chalcedon in Asia.

Such were still the resources and abilities of Licinius, that, after so many successive defeats, he collected in Bithynia a new army of fifty or sixty thousand men, while Constantine was still actively employed in the siege of Byzantium. The vigilant Michael did not neglect the last struggles of the Dragon. He transported a considerable part of his victorious army across the Bosphorus; and soon after their landing fought the decisive battle of the war on the heights of Chrysopolis, or, as it is now called, Scutari. “The angels” of the Dragon, though lately raised, ill armed, and worse disciplined, made head against “the Michael and his angels” with fruitless but desperate valor, till a total defeat, and the slaughter of five and twenty thousand men, irretrievably determined the fate of the Supreme Pontiff of the Idols and his adherents. Licinius retired to Nicomedia from whence he opened negotiations with Constantine. Peace and affluence were granted to him on condition of sacrificing Martinianus, whom he had created Augustus, and of resigning the imperial office. Licinius accordingly solicited and accepted the pardon of his offences, laid himself and his purple at the feet of his Lord and Master, was raised from the ground with insulting pity, was admitted the same day to the imperial banquet, and soon after was sent away to Thessalonica, which had been chosen for the place of his confinement, which was soon terminated by death at the hand of the executioner.

Such was the result of this last “war in the heaven.” “The Dragon and his angels fought and prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in the heaven”—verse 8. “He was cast out into the earth; and his angels were cast out with him”—verse 9: and in his projection, “his tail drew the third part of the stars, and cast them to the earth”—verse 4. The memory of Licinius was branded with infamy, his statues were thrown down, and, by a hasty edict, all his laws, and all the judicial proceedings of his reign were at once abolished. By this victory of Constantine, A.D. 324, the Roman world was united under the authority of one emperor; and he the first of a long line of emperors, who, though not christian, but catholic, repudiated “the gods of their ancestors.” The immediate and memorable consequences of this revolution were the foundation of Constantinople, and the establishment of the Laodicean Catholic Apostasy as the religion of the State.

While these stirring and exciting events were transpiring, their connexion with apocalyptic prophecy was not unperceived by Constantine and his adherents. In a letter to Eusebius he writes of “that dragon having been deposed from the governance of affairs, by God’s providence”. And Eusebius further relates, that in a picture elevated by Constantine over his palace gate, there was represented the cross placed over his head; and beneath his own and his children’s feet, his enemies under the semblance of a dragon cast down headlong into the abyss. In a letter also to Eusebius he says, “But now that liberty is restored, and that Dragon driven from the administration of public affairs by the providence of the Supreme Deity, and our instrumentality, we trust that all can see the efficacy of the Divine power.” A dragon is a symbol stamped on some of the coins of Constantine. I have the representation before me of two, on which the cross, the symbol of the catholic church, is erected over a fallen dragon, the symbol of Roman superstition in its political constitution.

Licinius himself seems to have been aware that the conflict was not simply a matter of personal rivalry and ambition between him and Constantine, but the great question which system of belief and practice was genuine and designed of the Eternal Power, be that power the gods of the Roman Habitable, or “the foreign God” whom the adherents of those gods derided, to prevail. This question was considered by both parties as on that in the contest of the “short time,” and to be determined by its issue.

Licinius (left) and Constantine (right) are depicted upon contemporary gold medallions. Every attempt was made to emphasise the serene, pious features of Constantine in contrast to those of Licinius.—Publishers.

As a religious preparation for the impending conflict, Licinius collected around himself Egyptian seers and diviners, enchanters, jugglers, and the priests and prophets of his idols, and having propitiated his deities with sacrifices, then inquired what was to be the issue to him of this “war in the heaven.” If he had inquired of an enlightened Christadelphian of the period he could have told him that it would be to cast him out of the heaven into the earth, and his angels (the Egyptian seers and diviners, enchanters, jugglers, priests, prophets, and all his officials) with him; but there was none such in his tail, or following, to testify the truth; he therefore, had recourse to the stars drawn in his tail, who unanimously assured him that he would undoubtedly prove the stronger in the contest, and be victorious; a judgment everywhere reiterated in long and elegant songs by the Oracles of the Idols. Elated by these deceitful promises, he advanced with great confidence, and prepared for battle. When about to begin, he summoned his trustiest attendants and friends to meet him in a consecrated grove, spacious and irrigated, in which were set up all kinds of idol-statues, and having lighted wax tapers, in the after-fashion of papists and ritualists, and offered the accustomed victims to them, he delivered the following address:

“Friends and fellow-warriors, these are the gods of our ancestors, whom, received from our earliest predecessors as objects of worship, we honor; but he who commands the army that is drawn up against us, having adopted an atheistic opinion, violates the customs of the fathers, venerating a god from abroad, I know not whence, and disgraces his troops with his ignominious standard (the Cross with the monogram of Christ) trusting in which he arms not so much against us as against the gods whom he offends. This occasion therefore will show which of us errs in his belief, and will decide between the gods who are honored by us, and by the other party; for either by showing us victors, it will show our gods are most justly regarded as auxiliaries and saviours; or, if the Deity of Constantine, come from I know not whence, shall prevail over ours, which are many, let no one thereafter doubt what Deity ought to be worshipped, but go to the strongest, and present to him the reward of the victory. If the foreign god, whom we now deride, should appear the mightiest, we must acknowledge and honor him, and bid farewell to those to whom we have vainly lit wax tapers. But if ours prevail, Which is not to be doubted, then, after the victory, we must proceed to war against the atheists.”

Thus, the contest was considered by both parties as between the christians’ Deity and the many gods of paganism. Each party regarded itself as the respective instrument of these. Hence the propriety of the apocalyptic title bestowed on the enemy of the dragon-tail, “the Michael.” Constantine’s victory was regarded by him, by the church, and by the people at large, as the victory of the Deity, that is living and true, over the false deities, of christianity over idolatry. Eusebius says, that “when the whole was, by the power of Deity, the Saviour, subjected to Constantine, he made known to all the Giver of his prosperity, and testified that the Deity, not he, was the author of his victories.”

Illustrative of the chicanery, of the Church in its relation to the State, is the so-called Donation of Constantine. This was a document advanced by the Church in the 8th century to support its claim to exercise temporal power with the emperor as the secular arm of the church wielding the sword on behalf of the vicar of Peter. It was claimed that Constantine, on transferring the civil and military authority to Constantinople, conferred dominion over Rome on pope Sylvester I (314–35). This document was proved to be a complete forgery. The illustration above is a fifth-century fresco entitled the Donation of Constantine. No such authority was ever conferred by the Emperor, but the Church is notorious for using any means to gain power—Publishers.

21. The Great Voice in the Heaven

“And I heard a great voice saying in the heaven. Now is come the salvation and the power and the kingdom of our Deity, and the authority of His Anointed; for the prosecutor of our brethren who accused them in the presence of our Deity, day and night, has been cast down.

11. “And they overcame him, through the blood of the Lamb, and through the word of their testimony; and they loved not their life unto death. 12. On account of this let the heavens rejoice and those who tent in them.”

“The heaven,” in which John, in prophetic vision, heard this “great voice,” was the same heaven as that in which the Woman, the Dragon, the Michael, and the war, had contemporary existence. I say contemporary existence; for, on the defeat of Maxentius, A.D. 313, the Catholic Church, or “Woman clothed with the Sun, and the Moon under her feet, and a stephan of Twelve Stars upon her head,” was the established religion of Constantine’s dominion; but not of the whole habitable, the rest thereof still rejoicing in the ascendancy of the Dragon and the gods of antiquity. Hence there were two contemporary established religions in the empire, each of them sustained by rival political factions. The Dragon had been cast out as the result of the recent war in the heaven. His “short time” was at an end. He had no longer any place in the heaven, nor his adherents. He who ruled there had no regard for the defeated gods of his ancestors. The heaven had been effectually cleared of all who rejoiced in them; so that there were now found therein only the Sun-clothed Woman and her Son.

This woman and her son constituted “the heavens and those who tent in them.” In other words, they were the constituted authorities of the Church and State, who were now all real or pretended catholics. Their religious and political adversaries and oppressors had been turned out of place and power; and they had been turned into them by the wonderful revolution, with all the comforts and advantages accruing to those who by victory may claim the spoils. It was these in the heaven from whom the “Great Voice” ascended joyously. They had been long looking for “the salvation,” “or deliverance,” and “the power,” which they now enjoyed without fear; and what could that constitution of things, exhibited in the Woman and her Son, be, but “the kingdom of our Deity and the authority of His Anointed?” So they thought; for Eusebius, the ecclesiastical historian, who was one of the most prominent among those who then tented in the heaven, being one of the bishops of the Woman, and a companion of her Son, speaking of the new order of things in Church and State, says, “The event surpassed all words. Soldiers with naked swords kept watch round the palace-gate. But the men of God passed through the midst of them without fear, and entered the heart of the palace. And they sat down, some at the emperor’s table, the rest at tables on either side of his. It looked like the very image of the kingdom of Christ; and was altogether more like a dream than a reality. And on the occasion of opening a new catholic temple at Tyre, he said to the multitude assembled, ‘What so many of the Lord’s saints and confessors before our time desired to see and saw not, and to hear and heard not, that behold now before our eyes! It was of us the prophet spake when he told how the wilderness and the solitary place should be glad, and the desert rejoice and blossom as the lily. Whereas the church was widowed and desolate, her children have now to exclaim to her, Make room, enlarge thy borders: the place is too strait for us. The promise is fulfilling to her, In righteousness shalt thou be established: all thy children shall be taught of God: and great shall be the peace of thy children’.”

From these quotations which have reference to the real kingdom of Christ, Eusebius in his application of them to the Catholic Church, in the good fortune of which, he says, they were fulfilling; manifestly concluded that it was not only “the image”, but the very kingdom of Christ itself! This was his opinion, and that also of the clergy and people of his communion generally. Their belief was that “the salvation, power, and kingdom of the Deity, and the authority of His Anointed” had really come; and that now, all that remained was for professors to lead moral lives, or at all events to live at peace with, and in the favour of “Mother Church,” which would secure to them an abundant entrance into the only other kingdom known to them, termed “the kingdom of glory,” situated afar off from earth, “beyond the realms of time and space!” This opinion of Eusebius and his coreligionists, that the church is the kingdom of God, took deep hold of the catholic mind of his generation; and in the nineteenth century is a characteristic of those who know not the truth. Catholics, papists and protestants all believe that what they call church is the kingdom of God, or the kingdom of heaven. Of course, Millennialists may claim exception from this rule. Still, few of them are free from the tradition; for while they expect the reign of Christ upon earth, they hold the church to be the kingdom in some sense; and send off disembodied “immortal souls” to transkyanal regions, there to await the terrestrial millennial reign! If Eusebius had restrained his fancy, and contented himself with saying, that the New Order of things was the shadow, type, or pattern, of the kingdom of Christ, there would have been little ground for objection. But “the very image of the kingdom of Christ”, is that kingdom itself; “the very image,” being used by Paul in Heb. 10:1, for the reality of things shadowed forth, or typified. The kingdom of “the Michael and his angels” shadowed forth the kingdom of Christ, the real Michael, and his angels, the Saints. Constantine, like Cyrus, in his military career, and in his ecclesiastical relation to the Catholic Church, was a type of Christ. The typical hero established his kingdom in its fullest extent on the ejection of the pagan dragon from the heaven; Christ will establish his by binding the Catholic Dragon, and shutting him down in the abyss (Apoc. 20:2, 3). The typical hero attained “to Deity and his throne;” Christ will sit down with Deity upon his throne (Apoc. 3:21). The typical hero acquired all the kingdoms of the Roman earth; Christ will acquire all the kingdoms of the globe (Apoc. 11:15). The typical hero ruled all the Roman nations with an iron sceptre; Christ will rule all the nations of the globe with an iron sceptre (Apoc. 19:15). The catholic clergy shared with the typical Michael the glory, honor, and power of his kingdom; the Saints will share with Christ the glory, honor, and power of his (Apoc. 2:26, 27; 3:21). After his birth of the unprivileged and persecuted woman, the sun-clothed catholic church became the Spouse of the typical Michael; the glorified Saints become the married wife, or bride adorned for her husband, Christ (Apoc. 19:7, 8; 21:2, 9). The power of the Deity was with Constantine in measure; Christ is the great power of Deity without measure. Constantine established a new religion, the catholic; founded a new administration of affairs; and built a new capital, called Constantinople, or New Rome: Christ will establish a new system of worship for all nations, the Millennial; will organize a new government of the world; and establish a new capital for the throne of the Deity, Jerusalem rebuilt, in the midst of which he will be the glory (Isa. 56:7; Zeph. 3:9; Acts 17:31; Eph. 1:10; Jer. 3:17; Zech. 2:5; 8:21–23).

Now, I take it, that these parallels are not accidental, but designed. Michael and the Dragon was literally enacted as previously explained. Its performance is the history of the last twenty-five years of the life of Constantine. This history in its most striking particulars was like much of the history of the Jews. Jewish history is not like common history—a story of the past unprophetic of the future. The things that happened to Israel as narrated in their history, happened unto them for types (tupoi); and they were written for our admonition, “upon whom,” says Paul, “the end of the aeons is come” (1 Cor. 10:11). Typical history is the past representative of the future. This is the character of Michael and the Dragon. It is a past series of events, typical of a future contest between the Michael of Dan. 12:1 and the Dragon of Apoc. 20. This view of the prophecy imparts to it an interest for us which it would be devoid of if it were regarded merely as belonging to a past epoch over fifteen hundred years remote. There was war in the heaven then; and when the door shall be opened in the heaven, and the throne shall be set therein (Apoc. 4:1, 2) there will be a war in the heaven again, “the war of that great day of AIL-Shaddai,” which will terminate in similar, but grander results; for “the very image” is always greater and more magnificent than the type. The great voice in the heaven, celebrative of the victory over the great red dragon, partakes of this typical character. It not only expresses what then obtained in shadow; but by anticipation celebrates the greater realities of the victory of Christ and the Saints over all the apocalyptic beasts; when the great salvation, and power, and kingdom of Yahweh, consisting of the kingdoms of the world, and the authority of His Anointed, the One Body of which Jesus is the head, shall have actually come. Then there will be in the heaven a great voice indeed—"a voice as the sound of many waters; and as the voice of a great thunder; the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Praise ye Yah: for Yahweh Elohim omnipotent reigneth. Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honor unto him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready" (Apoc. 1:15; 14:2; 19:6, 7).

But to return to the "great voice" of the Constantinian period. The things spoken were uttered in the heaven: namely, by those appointed to the vacancies created by the ejection from the heaven of the adherents and worshippers of the gods. In other words, the voice proceeded from the officials in church and state, who all professed the catholic religion, and said they were now "rich, and increased with goods, and had need of nothing:" but "they knew not that they were wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked" (Apoc. 3:17). Such was the choir which sang:

"Salvation now, and pow'r, are come,
The kingdom also of our God,
And the dominion of His Christ:
For he who did our brethren try,
And night and day 'fore God accus'd,
Hath from the heaven been cast down.
And they through th' Lamb's blood him o'ercame,
And also through the word they taught:
Nor yet their life lov'd they till death.
Because of this, O heavens, rejoice,
And all ye who sojourn therein!"

It is not to be wondered at that such a people who imagined that "they had need of nothing," should mistake the shadow for the substance; and rejoice in what then existed as the full accomplishment of the Divine purpose. Salvation, or deliverance, had indeed come from the tyranny of the Public Prosecutor (ho kategoros) who continually accused them falsely, and punished them with torture unto death. But the "great salvation," preached by Christ and his apostles, has not come yet. A new power, and a new kingdom, and a new dominion, had taken possession of the Roman Heaven, to the exclusion of the old order of things; and to the generation witnessing so wonderful a revolution, it seemed "more like a dream than reality." The prophecy attributes it all to the power of Deity, as symbolized in the apocalyptic name Michael. The salvation, power, kingdom and dominion, therefore, are very properly predicated of the Deity and Christ; for assuredly, if they had stood by Licinius instead of by Constantine, this epinikon, or song of victory, would never have been heard in the heaven. But we must be careful not to fall into the error of Eusebius and his Laodicean Catholic companions, who had need of nothing more, and to take the type for "the very image of the things." The typical "kingdom of the Deity and dominion of His Christ" had come; and therefore it was, that the Woman's Son, when he had fought his way up, by the providence of Deity, to supreme power in the heaven, is said to have been "carried up by force to Deity and his throne." The power of the Deity was enthroned in the New Capital, Constantinople. But the shadowy representation of the kingdom of the Deity and the dominion of His Christ, passed away with the death of the typical hero, Constantine. The reigns of David and Solomon were prefigurative of the reign of Christ; but the typical character of their reigns was not transferred on their decease to their successors. And thus it was in relation to Constantine and those who came after him. His career of conquest, and "half-hour's peaceful reign" (Apoc. 8:1), typified the future career of Christ in the conquest of the world, and the succeeding tranquillity of his times. But all this typical manifestation was dissolved when his three sons succeeded him, and divided the empire between them. The Heaven was still catholic; but, as the Spirit had “spued them out of his mouth” on their indifference to his “counsel” (Apoc. 3:16, 18), he left them to their delusions; and “the Serpent” by whom they were beguiled; that is the Sin-power of the flesh, in a catholic instead of a pagan, political manifestation was enthroned; and became the future antagonist of the ANTICATHOLIC WOMAN and her seed (vers. 14–17).

The Laodicean officials in their victorious declaration refer to those they style “our brethren, whom the public prosecutor accused day and night before the Deity.” All passed for brethren until the Spirit formally spued the state party out of his mouth. Politically, they might truly claim all the saints who had, for two hundred and eighty years previous, been engaged in the conflict with the pagans. They were all “brethren and fellow servants,” as all democrats are brethren politically; while, religiously, they are scattered among sects of the most perverse and contradictory opinions. This is true of all other political factions in all ages; and it was true of those who uttered this great Voice of triumph over the fallen adversary of their party. As anti-pagans, they belonged to a common brotherhood; but, when it became a question of religious doctrine, this political brotherhood resolved itself into two great hostile parties, between which no fellowship obtained.

In this great voice, the whole brotherhood might to some extent concur. It was a deliverance to them all from the Great Red Dragon; but to many of them, it was only a change from his oppression to that of a new form of tyranny. They allude to the fallen power as the kategoros. This signifies one who speaks against another, especially before judges; one who appears as a prosecutor. The fallen power is said to have spoken against them as prosecutor “before the Deity,” enopion, in the sight of the Deity. This was literally true; for during the first five seals, which, at the end of the fifth, brings us down to the birth of the Woman’s Son, A.D. 312–313, the Seven Eyes of the Deity, which are his Seven Spirits (Apoc. 5:6) were present in the ecclesias. In the first four seals, their presence is symbolized by the Four Living Ones full of eyes; and their absence from the scenery of the fifth is supplied by the phrase “and it was said unto them.” The Deity dwelt in the encampment of the saints; and by His spirit, or power, “dwelt in them, and walked in them” (2 Cor. 6:16). Whatever, therefore, was transacted against them was done “in his sight,” or “before his eyes.” He was therefore the Judge before whom the Dragon unconsciously displayed his malignity. He seemed to prevail for a time; but when the end of the “little season,” or ten years persecution of Diocletian arrived, the Deity stepped into the arena, and judicially vindicated his elect.

The victory of the souls weltering at the altar base is attributed by the “great voice” “to the blood of the Lamb and the word of their testimony.” These brethren, “who were slain for the word of the Deity, and for the testimony which they held” (Apoc. 6:9) were brethren, of whom those in place and power giving utterance to the great voice, were not worthy. “They loved not their life until death” laid them at the altar base. “The word of the Deity,” in the prophecy of the fifth seal, is parallel to “the blood of the Lamb,” in the great voice. The official utterers of this voice did not venture to say, “WE have overcome the fallen power by the word of the Deity concerning the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of our testimony.” They knew very well that they had overcome him by hard fighting. No; the honor and glory of the victory was not due to them who drew the sword; but to those faithful brethren, who had so leavened the Roman world with the truth, as to make the strongholds of paganism no longer tenable. “The blood of the Lamb,” as opposed to the blood of idol-sacrifices, was the great theme of “the word of the Deity.” The word of their testimony demonstrated the efficacy of the one; and the inutility and utter worthlessness of the other. Every pagan convinced by the word and their reasoning in exposition of it, was alienated from the party of the Dragon, and added to the faithful. The threatenings and torments unto death, inflicted upon them by the pagan authorities, could not put their testimony to silence. Where one fell others stepped in and stopped the breach; so that, “the blood of the witnesses became the seed of the church.” Thus, the power of the word accumulated, until society, but superficially acquainted with “the deep things of Deity,” had become too much enlightened any longer to tolerate the licentiousness and absurdity of the old superstition. Therefore, having no conscientious scruples as to war, they repudiated the passivity of the faithful; and having found in Constantine an ambitious politician and skilful general suited to their purpose, they unsheathed the sword against the idols, and cried, “Victory or Death.” As we have seen, they gained the victory; and in the great voice of triumph, clothed the memory of their non-resisting predecessors in the conflict with the “white robes of purity and truth” (Apoc. 6:11). The victims slain by the fallen power had borne the heat and burden of the conflict; and the catholic church entered into their labors. The “great voice” called upon all catholics in power to rejoice at this result; saying, “Rejoice, O heavens, and ye that tent therein!” They are addressed as hoi skenountes, dwellers, or rather, sojourners in a tent. This is a very temporary indwelling. They were not permanently established there. Their tenancy was transitory: the mere shadow of the holding to which the slain victors shall attain in “the time of the dead, when they shall be judged, and the reward shall be given to them,” with the “white robes” of incorruption and eternal life. These will not then merely “tent” in the heavens of the conquered world. When they enter there, they become the pillars of the Divine temple, and go out no more (Apoc. 3:12): they possess the kingdom for the Olahm, even for the Olahm, and Beyond (Dan. 7:18). Then, not only will the heavens rejoice, but all the earth will be glad. This was not the case in the time of the “great voice;” for, while it called upon the heavens to rejoice, and those that tented in them, it gave no invitation to the inhabitants of the earth and sea to join in the joyousness of the time. But when the great salvation, and the power, and the kingdom of the Deity, and the dominion of His Christ, shall exist in the very image, then “every creature which is in the heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, shall say, Blessing and honor and glory and power, unto him that sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb for the aeons of the aeons (Apoc. 5:13), for all will then be blessed in Abraham and his seed. Such was the “great voice,” and the interpretation of it. Did the character of the time, consequent upon the victory over Licinius, correspond to my exposition? Unquestionably it did. Eusebius, who lived at the time, testifies to this. “On the fall of Licinius,” says he, “the great conqueror Constantine and his son Crispus the Caesar, received the East as theirs, established one government as formerly over the Romans, and swayed the whole in peace from east to west, and from north to south. The people therefore being freed from all fear of the Court by which they had before been overwhelmed, held festal days of great splendor. There were everywhere illuminations. They who were before dejected, looked on one another with joyful aspects and smiles, and with choirs and hymns through the cities and country, gave honor, first to God the Supreme Ruler of all, as they were taught, and then to the pious emperor and his children. The miseries and impiety of the past were forgotten; joy and exultation prevailed at the blessings now promised, and happy anticipations of the future. Philanthropic edicts were everywhere published by the emperor, and laws that displayed his munificence and piety.” And Lactantius also, a contemporary and friend of Constantine writes; “Let us celebrate the triumph of God with gladness; let us commemorate His victory with praise; let us make mention in our prayers day and night of the peace which, after ten years of persecution, He has conferred on his people.” Eusebius narrates very fully how, at the same time, there was solemn remembrance of the witnesses and confessors that had illustrated the past persecution, and praise and honor rendered them: he tells how public notice was taken of those who had suffered unto death, as of heroes that had conquered by the doctrine of the cross in their conflict of witnessing unto death; and how, as a further tribute to their innocence and worth, the property confiscated from them was reclaimed and restored to their surviving relatives, or to the catholic church.

22. The Ruling of the Woman's Son

“Who was to rule all the nations with an iron sceptre”—v. 5.

In consequence of the final overthrow of the idols by the defeat and death of Licinius, their champion, the Woman’s Son, who had cast him and his partisans out of the heaven, became, by right of conquest, the Supreme Ruler of “the whole habitable”. He had now arrived at “the Deity and his throne.” There was no power on the Roman inhabited earth equal to him; his authority was absolute in church and state, in both of which he did “according to his own will; and exalted himself and magnified himself above all.” He was now the chief of a great dominion, and prepared to rule with an iron sceptre. He was to rule all the nations; not all the nations of the globe, but all the nations of Daniel’s Fourth Beast so far as it was then developed. Beyond the limits of this symbolical dominion he exercised no rule. The nations of Persia, China, India, and so forth, with the tribes of what is now called Germany and Russia, were all exempt from his jurisdiction. He ruled “all the nations” inhabiting Britain, Gaul from the Rhine to the Atlantic, and from the Channel to the Alps and Pyrennees, Spain, Italy, the Roman Africa, Egypt, Syria from the Mediterranean to the Tigris, Asia Minor, the rest of Turkey and the Danubian Principalities, and Hungary (as they are now termed), Greece, the Islands of the Mediterranean, and the region lying between the Danube and the Adriatic: all the nations of these countries were subjected to his iron rule.

The character of Constantine as a ruler is no doubt correctly delineated in the eighteenth chapter of the Decline and Fall of the Roman empire. Therein Gibbon remarks, that by the grateful zeal of what he calls “the christians,” he has been decorated with every attribute of a hero and a saint; while the vanquished party compared him to the most abhorred of those tyrants, who by their vice and weakness, dishonored the imperial purple. But neither of these opinions can be admitted without qualification. He was doubtless a hero and a tyrant; but neither a saint, nor the worst of the tyrants that had reigned. Had he fallen on the banks of the Tiber, or even on the plains of Adrianople, he might have transmitted to posterity, with some exceptions, a less questionable fame: “but the conclusion of his reign,” says Gibbon, that is, the last fourteen years, “degraded him from the rank he had acquired among the most deserving of the Roman princes.” This remark of the historian assigns the worst period of his rule to that indicated in the prophecy; namely, from the time he arrived at “the Deity and his throne” by the overthrow of Licinius. This was the period “the conclusion of his reign,” when he was to rule all the nations with an iron sceptre; and Gibbon refers to it as the period of his degradation among princes. In regard to this period of his life he says, “we may contemplate a hero, who had so long inspired his subjects with love, and his enemies with terror, degenerating into a cruel and dissolute monarch, corrupted by his fortune, or raised by conquest above the necessity of dissimulation. The general peace which he maintained during the last fourteen years of his reign (the Half-hour’s silence in the heaven—Ch. 8:1) was a period of apparent splendor rather than of real prosperity; and the old age of Constantine was disgraced by the opposite yet reconcilable vices of rapaciousness and prodigality. The oppression of the people was the only fund which could support his magnificence. His unworthy favorites, enriched by the boundless liberality of their master, usurped with impunity the privilege of rapine and corruption. A secret but universal decay was felt in every part of the public administration, and the emperor himself though he still retained the obedience, gradually lost the esteem of his subjects. An impartial narrative of the executions, or rather murders, which sullied the declining age of Constantine, will suggest to our most candid thoughts the idea of a prince who could sacrifice without reluctance the laws of justice, and the feelings of nature, to the dictates either of his passions or of his interest.” The murderous executions of his son Crispus, his nephew Licinius, and of a great number of respectable and innocent friends, who were involved in their fall, were sufficient to justify the discontent of the Roman people, and to explain the satirical verses affixed to the palace-gate, comparing the splendid and bloody reigns of Constantine and Nero. Such was the character of his rule—a sceptre of iron in the hand of the Man-Child of Sin.

23. The Flight of the Woman

“And the Woman fled into the wilderness, where she has a place of the Deity, that they may sustain her there a thousand two hundred and sixty days”—Verse 6

The ANTIPAGAN BODY, compared in the prophecy to a WOMAN, consisted of Catholics, Novatians, Donatists, Valentinians, Marcionites, Paulists, Cataphrygians, and others, whose names are no longer remembered. Out of this heterogeneous community, which agreed only in its opposition to the reigning idolatry, the Man-child of Sin was developed, A.D. 312,313. The fall of Maxentius was the crisis of his birth. Being decreed by the Senate the first of the three Augusti of the Roman world, and being in intimate alliance with Licinius, then seemingly favorable to his policy, he published jointly with him the famous Edict of Milan. This was the great charter of toleration. It granted to “the whole body of the christians,” as well as to others, the free choice to follow that mode of worship which they may wish; and that no freedom at all shall be refused them. No distinction was made between christian and pagan in this matter; so that each might have the privilege to select and worship whatsoever divinity he pleased. Nor was there any distinction made with regard to sect in “the whole body.” When the edict was published, Constantine’s mind was either undecided as to which religion was absolutely true, or he hesitated to speak plainly that he might not offend the latent prejudices of his colleague. This indiscriminate toleration, he said, “has been done by us, that we might not appear in any manner to detract anything from any manner of religion, or any mode of worship.”

But, though well disposed to Antipaganism, the Man-Child of Sin, at the time of the edict of Milan, did not know his own Mother. He was too young to be able to discern her. He did not know to which sect of “the whole body of christians” he belonged. It was not long, however, before the worst of the sects was able to establish its ascendancy over the untutored mind of this ambitious and fortunate soldier. This was the sect which styles itself, and taught him so to style it, “THE HOLY CATHOLIC CHURCH.” This was that sect which was pre-eminently “wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked;” but which said, “I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing.” It was the sect in which the rage of faction exploded in frequent and violent seditions; and the blood of its members was shed by each other’s hands. Hilary, a contemporary of the times, writes to Constantine’s successor, and declares concerning the catholic clergy, that “in the wide extent of the ten provinces of Asia, to which he had been banished, there could be found very few prelates who had preserved the knowledge of the true God. It is a thing equally deplorable and dangerous that there are as many creeds as opinions among men, as many doctrines as inclinations, and as many sources of blasphemy as there are faults among us; because we make creeds arbitrarily. The Homousion is rejected and received and explained away by successive synods. The partial or total resemblance of the Father and of the Son is a subject of dispute for these unhappy times. Every year, nay every moon, we make new creeds to describe invisible mysteries. We repent of what we have done, we defend those who repent, we anathematize those whom we defended. We condemn either the doctrine of others in ourselves, or our own in that of others; and reciprocally tearing one another to pieces, we have been the cause of each other’s ruin.”

Such was the sect which Constantine concluded it would be to his interest to ally himself to. He, therefore, used the altars of catholicism as a convenient footstool to the throne of universal dominion. He came to imbibe the piety peculiar to it, and with it its sanguinary spirit of persecution, and murderous hostility to all who dissented from it. The catholic church became the especial object of his care and favorable legislation; and he was taught by its bishops to believe that its members were his only real and trustworthy adherents. Impressed with this conviction he established it by law; and set it up in the heaven as the “Woman invested with the sun, and the moon underneath her feet, and upon her head a wreath of twelve stars.” And there she has remained over fifteen hundred and fifty years, even to this day. She has never been a fugitive in the wilderness: but has always (except in the short reign of Julian, who apostatized from her communion) retained her position in the heaven, by enacting the part of a Harlot with the kings of earth, until with her whoredoms and sanguinary abominations, she became “the Great Harlot sitting upon many waters, drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the witnesses of Jesus” (Apoc. 17:1, 2, 6).

But when Constantine came to recognize the catholic sect as his Mother Church, what became of the rest of the Anti-pagan Body—“the whole body of the Christians” besides, namely, of the Novatians, Donatists, Valentinians, Marcionites, Paulists, Cataphrygians, and others? They were still “the Woman,” only minus the catholic sect. Whatever other differences obtained among them, they were generally opposed to the union of church and state; for, as all of them could not be the world’s church, they were displeased at any one sect enjoying that pre-eminence over the rest. “What,” said they, “has the emperor to do with the church? What have Christians to do with kings, or what have bishops to do at court?” Hence, without ceasing to be anti-pagan, they now became an ANTI-CATHOLIC BODY. This was the Woman” of the sixth verse of this twelfth chapter—the ANTI-CATHOLIC WOMAN. Between this woman and the Sun-clothed Harlot in the heaven, there has been, and can be, no fellowship. They are essentially hostile organizations. Not that the anticatholic woman as such is what Mr. Elliot styles “Christ’s faithful orthodox church;” for there were sects in her communion whose principles and practices were both worldly and unscriptural; but there were to be found in her anti-catholic pale hoi loipoi tou spermatis autes, remnants of her seed, who were characterized by “keeping the commandments of the Deity, and holding the testimony of the anointed Jesus” (verse 17). These were anti-catholic of the intensest character; but they were also opposed to all other sects of the anticatholic woman, which did not keep the commandments of the Deity, and did not hold the testimony of the anointed Jesus. This is illustrated by the position of CHRISTADELPHIANS in regard to all sects at this day. They are intensely anti-catholic, and are, therefore, an ecclesiastical element of the anti-catholic woman; but they do not, therefore, recognize as Christians, the anti-catholic sects of “Christendom” so-called. The edict of Milan had confirmed to each individual of the Roman world the privilege of choosing and professing his own religion. But this inestimable privilege was soon violated; for with the knowledge of Catholic principles, the son and protector of the Catholic church, imbibed the maxims of persecution; and the sects which dissented from it were afflicted and oppressed by the triumph of Laodiceanism. Constantine easily believed that Heretics who presumed to dispute his opinions, or to oppose his commands were guilty of the most absurd and criminal obstinacy; and that a seasonable application of severities might save those unhappy men from the danger of an everlasting condemnation. Not a moment, therefore, was lost in excluding the ministers and teachers of the separated congregations from any share of the rewards and immunities which the emperor had so liberally bestowed upon the Catholic clergy.

An imperial persecuting and repressant influence was thus brought to bear upon the anti-catholic woman, who under the hostile pressure would set her face fugitively towards the wilderness—eis ten eremon. The anti-catholic sect that took the lead in opposition at this crisis was that of the Donatists. It was in feud with the catholic sect before the overthrow of Maxentius; and, therefore, before the Roman Africa became subject to Constantine. It was such a feud as might be supposed to exist in the Baptist denomination, resulting in the development of the Campbellite sect. There was, doubtless, error and wrong-doing both with the Donatists and Catholics; but, as from among the Anti-baptist Campbellites was originated to loutro tou hudatos en remati, by the laver of the water with doctrine (Eph. 5:26), the CHRISTADELPHIAN DENOMINATION; so from among the anti-catholic Donatists began to be manifested in the three years of their trials before Constantine and his bishops, by the sealing angel that had ascended from the East (Apoc. 7:2), the first of “the remnants of the woman’s seed, who keep the commandments of the Deity, and hold the testimony of the anointed Jesus.” The name of this first remnant, if it had any other than Donatist, has not come down to us. But it matters not what it was called in its beginning—it was the sect composed of “the servants of the Deity sealed in their foreheads.” This is the apocalyptic description of it. Arising in the epoch of the Donatist trials, and being with the Donatists intensely anti-catholic, it is very likely to have been confounded with them, without having at all been mixed up with the feud between the party of Caecilian and that of Majorinus.

This feud is styled in history “the African Controversy.” The provinces south of the Mediterranean, from the confines of Cyrene to the columns of Hercules, A.D. 312, were distracted with religious discord. The source of the division was derived from a double election in the Catholic church of Carthage, the second in rank and opulence of the ecclesiastical thrones of the West. Cæcilian and Majorinus were the two rival bishops of Africa, and the death of the latter soon made room for Donatus, who, by his superior abilities and virtues, was the firmest support of his party. The advantage which Cæcilian might claim from the priority of his ordination was destroyed by the illegal, or at least indecent haste, with which it had been performed without awaiting the arrival of the bishops of Numidia. The bishops of the contending factions maintained, with equal ardour and obstinacy, that their adversaries were degraded, or least dishonored, by the odious crime of delivering up the Holy Scriptures to the officers of Diocletian to be burned. In this state of bitter partizanship, the divided church was incapable of affording an impartial judicature. Application was, therefore, made to Constantine by the Donatist bishops of Africa, A.D. 313, desiring him to appoint bishops of the church in Gaul to settle their difficulties. “Good emperor,” said they, “as you are of a just family, of all the emperors your father alone having never persecuted, and as Gaul is now exempted from that outrage, we ask you in your piety to appoint bishops from that province who may judge between us and the other bishops of Africa, with whom we are at variance.” Their request was granted, and the controversy was tried in five successive tribunals, and the whole proceeding, from the first appeal to the final sentence, lasted above three years. A severe inquisition taken before the praetorian vicar and the proconsul of Africa; the report of two episcopal visitors who had been sent to Carthage; the decrees of the Councils of Rome and Arles, and the supreme judgment of Constantine himself in his “sacred consistory,” were all favorable to the cause of Cæcilian: and he was unanimously acknowledged, by the Civil and Ecclesiastical Powers, as the true and lawful catholic primate of Africa. The honors and estates of the church were attributed to his suffragan bishops, and it was with difficulty that Constantine was satisfied with inflicting the punishment of exile on the principal leaders of the Donatists.

The punishment of exile was banishing, or causing to flee into a wilderness state. This was the imperial sentence upon the anti-catholic, or anti-state-church woman in the African wing of the empire. Her seed were banished from the high places of church and state, and made to seek refuge in the wild and uncivilized places of society.

Speaking of this “schism of the Donatists” A.D. 315, Gibbon remarks: “This incident, so inconsiderable that it scarcely deserves a place in history, was productive of a memorable schism, which afflicted the provinces of Africa above three hundred years, and was extinguished only with Christianity itself. The inflexible zeal of freedom and fanaticism animated the Donatists to refuse obedience to the usurpers, whose election they disputed and whose spiritual powers they denied. Excluded from the civil and religious communion of mankind (driven into the wilderness), they boldly excommunicated the rest of mankind, who had embraced the impious party of Cæcilian, and of the Traditors, from whom he derived his pretended ordination. They asserted with confidence that the prerogatives of the catholic church were confined to the chosen portion of the African believers, who alone had preserved inviolate the integrity of their faith and discipline. Whenever they acquired a proselyte, even from the distant provinces of the east, they reimmersed and re-ordained him, as they rejected the validity of the baptism and ordination administered by heretics or schismatics. Bishops and virgins were subjected to the disgrace of a public penance, before they could be admitted to the communion of the Donatists. If they obtained possession of a temple which had been used by their Catholic adversaries, they purified the unhallowed building with the same jealous care which a temple of idols might have required. They washed the pavement, scraped the walls, burnt the altar, which was commonly of wood, melted the consecrated plate, and cast the ‘holy eucharist’ to the dogs, with every circumstance of ignominy which could provoke and perpetuate the animosity of religious factions. The narrow and solitary path which their first leaders had marked out, continued to diverge from the great society of mankind; so that they could affirm that when Christ should descend to judge the earth, he would find his true religion preserved only in a few nameless villages of the Cæsarean Mauritania.”

From this condensed quotation from Gibbon the reader will easily discern the feeling that existed between the Woman Jezebel in the heaven, and the Woman, by oppressive imperial edicts, caused to begin her flight into the wilderness. No enlightened professor of the doctrine which is according to godliness would think of looking for the true believers in “the heaven” where all was sunshine and imperial favor. “All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution” (2 Tim. 3:12). This testimony is true and not to be gain-said, and directs us in our search for “the remnants of the woman’s seed, who keep the commandments of the Deity, and hold the testimony of the anointed Jesus,” to that anti-catholic community of professors, which has been ever since the great Donatist repudiation of the self-styled “Holy Catholic Church,” and “Church of God,” A.D. 315, an oppressed, proscribed and persecuted people—persecuted in some form or shape, if not by governments, by the machinations and slanders of scribes, pharisees and others; of all professors, in fact, whose foreheads are unsealed by the truth, and whose hearts, consequently, are unpurified by “faith that works by love” of the truth believed.

24. The Woman’s Place

“The woman fled into the wilderness, where she had a place that had been prepared of the Deity—verse 6: And to the woman were given the two wings of the Great Eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness into her place”—verse 14.

The fourteenth verse, in certain particulars, is explanatory of the sixth. In this it is said that “the woman fled;” but nothing is hinted about “the two wings of the great eagle.” The sixth verse testifies that “she fled into the wilderness,” in which wilderness a place hath been prepared for her of the Deity. But where was this wilderness to be found? The Roman habitable was well stocked with wildernesses. Was it simply an uninhabited solitude, a desert waste? or did the word eremon, indicate her isolation and exclusion from the ecclesiastical pale recognized by the powers that be? She fled into the wilderness-state, in which she did not stand in the presence of the Serpent. The Serpent was in the heaven, from the sunshine and splendors of which she was caused to fly. It was the woman Jezebel that stood before the Serpent, and gloried in his embrace. The Serpent had beguiled her, and enthroned her in the heaven; but those of her party, who were proof against his enticements and subtilties, he banished from his imperial presence, that they might dwell alone in the solitude of social isolation. But the woman fugitive was not an abstraction, or a mere idea. She was a multitude of dissidents from the new and established order of things. Like Israel after the flesh, they were to dwell alone, and not be reckoned among the nations; still, like Israel, they required some place, or country, in which to dwell. Where did the woman dwell in her wilderness-state? This question is answered in the fourteenth verse in the words, "The two wings of the great eagle were given to the woman." These were the sections of the habitable Divinely appointed for her, that there she might be sustained in her wilderness-state.

But, what was represented by this great bird of prey? The original is quite emphatic—ho aetos ho megas, the Eagle which is the great one. There was but one eagle contemporary with the woman's flight that could be styled emphatically, ho megas, the large, spacious, ample one. This was the Roman territorial jurisdiction. Rome was the eagle's head; Italy, its body; and the Roman Africa and the regions of the Alps, Pyrennees, Britain, Bulgaria, Thrace, Asia Minor, and Armenia its wings or extremities. The eagle is the well-known symbol of the Roman Power. Moses alludes to this power in connection with the eagle in Deut. 28:49, 50, 63, 64, as, "Yahweh shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, which as (kaasher) the eagle shall fly; a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand; a nation of fierce countenance ... and he shall besiege thee in all thy gates ... and ye shall be plucked from off thy land whither thou goest to possess it; and Yahweh shall scatter thee among all peoples." This cannot refer to the Eagle of Nineveh and Babylon; because these eagle powers did not come "from the end of the earth" against Israel; and because they understood the tongue spoken by the Assyrians and Chaldeans. "The end", not ends "of the earth" in regard to Palestine, was Chittim, or Italy; whose ships came against Asshur, when Antiochus, king of Assyria, invaded Egypt (Dan. 11:30). Israel did not understand the tongue of Chittim, which is known as that of the Roman Eagle, the Latin, between which and the Hebrew there is no family likeness. This eagle-nation was to come against them as a bird of prey to devour their body politic, and to scatter them among all peoples, because they did not fear "that glorious and fearful name, YAHWEH ELOHIM." This was accomplished by the Roman legions under Titus, A.D. 70; predictive of which, YAHWEH ELOHIM, in fleshly manifestation, said, "wheresoever the carcase is, there shall the Eagles be gathered together" (Matt. 24:28).

But, in relation to the woman's flight into the wilderness, the two wings of the great Roman Eagle, spreading along its northeastern and southwestern regions, were not for destruction, but that she might find safety and protection in obscurity; upon the principle of being "out of the Serpent's sight" (apo prosopon) she might be out of his mind also. "The two wings" is regarded by some as a more correct reading than "two wings". They say that it reads thus in certain manuscripts—hai duo pteruges. They are, no doubt, right. Daniel's leopard had four wings; but there is nothing in symbolic prophecy to indicate that the great Roman Eagle had more than two. The mountains, glens, fastnesses, and more open valleys of these wings of the empire, would be but little cared for, or regarded, by the priests of the Catholic Church, who would crowd to those centres whence wealth and honors were distributed. The more interior locality of the eighteen hundred temples, endowed by the munificence of the emperor, would be the arena upon which they would, as Arians and Trinitarians, Iconoclasts and imageworshippers, disputatiously exhaust their zeal for the ensuing five hundred years. The violence of these all-absorbing disputes within the pale of the Serpent's communion, would so occupy him that he would have but little time or ability to hunt for "heretics" and "schismatics" in the two wings of his dominion. In this way was Providentially "prepared a place," or country, for dissenters and nonconformists of whatever names their enemy, the Seed of the Serpent in church and state, might, in the plenitude of ignorance and malice, think proper to call them. It is not to be supposed, however, that in all sections of the Eagle's Wings they would be always nourished in peace and safety. The woman's seed could not evade the common lot of mankind, which is born to trouble. They are an afflicted people, clothed in sackcloth, until the end of their appointed time, when they will be invested with white raiment. But till then, affliction is more or less the rod of their condition; and necessarily so; for "whom the Lord loves he chastens, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth;" that, by this wholesome, but unjoyous, discipline they who are exercised by it, now partaking of the Divine holiness, may hereafter reap the peaceable fruit of righteousness Heb.—12:6; Apoc. 11:1–3.

25. The Period of the Woman's Sojourn

"She hath a place which has been prepared of the Deity, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and threescore days"—verse 6.

In the fourteenth verse, this is equivalently expressed by the words, "where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time out of sight of the Serpent." This parallelism shows us that "1,260 days" is a form of words importing the duration of "a time, times, and half a time". Whatever the word day may signify, it requires 1,260 of them to equal three times and a half. In common time, 1,260 days are forty-two months, or three years and six months. But in dramatic prophecy, where the things predicted are acted on a small scale, by the persons of the drama, the time is proportioned, and therefore expressed in miniature. Hence, when a piece is performed on the boards of a theatre, its incidents, which are spread over a long series of years, are all brought in the acting before the spectator's eye in the short space of an evening. This is a practical condensation of the time of the piece performed. If the acted time of the piece were dramatically expressed by the performer, according to the real time, an evening theatrical entertainment would be impossible. He has therefore, in his acting, to reduce the literal, or real, time of the incidents he represents, from years to minutes, which all the audience, from pit to gallery, easily perceives.

Now, upon the same principle of condensation is time exhibited in the apocalyptic drama. It is condensed from real time to acted time, the latter being proportioned to the former, and to the agents dramatically engaged. Thus, if the real time be 1,260 years, it is proportionally represented by 1,260 days, or forty-two months, or three times and a half. It is also made proportional to the agents acting in the time. Thus, in the dramatic prophecy before us, the woman and her feeders, or nourishers, are the agents. She dwells in her place as a woman, the cycle of whose natural existence is threescore years and ten. Now, to affirm of her that they nourished her 1,260 years, would be in violation of the decorum of things. It would be a monstrosity in the picture, because out of all proportion, seeing that, naturally, women do not live 1,260 years. But the fitness and suitableness of things are observed; and the language descriptive of her pregnancy and subsequent life, does no violence, but is in strict accordance with, the laws of a real woman's natural existence. The remarks of Daubuz upon symbolic time, are to the point in this place.

"The way of the symbolic language," says he, "in expressions determining the spaces of time may be set in a plain light from the manner of predictions, or the nature of the prophetic visions. For a prophecy concerning future events is a picture, or representation of the events in symbols; which, being fetched from objects visible at one view, or cast of the eye, rather represent the events in miniature, than in full proportion; giving us more to understand than what we see; and, therefore, that the duration of events may be represented in terms suitable to the symbols of the visions, the symbols of duration must be also drawn in miniature. Thus, for instance, if a vast empire, persecuting the Church for 1,260 years, was to be symbolically represented by a beast, the decorum of the symbol would require that the said time of its tyranny should not be expressed by 1,260 years; because it would be monstrous and indecent to represent a beast ravaging for so long a space of time; but by 1,260 days. And thus a day may imply a year; because that short revolution of the sun bears the same proportion to the yearly, as the type to the antitype."

Thus, the anti-catholic community was to be sustained, out of the sight of the Serpent-government, in the two wings of the Great Roman Eagle, for one thousand two hundred and sixty years from the epoch of its legal condemnation as heretical, its exclusion from high places, and its banishment from the sunshine of imperial favor, A.D. 312–315. The three years intervening between these dates, constitute the initiatory epoch of the Woman's flight. The individuals who composed the party of the woman were not all saints; they were all, as we have seen, exceedingly hostile to the State Church: but it was only a particular class of the woman's seed which was entitled to be regarded as consisting of the saints. Her seed was composed of remnants, hoi loipoi, not, as in the Common Version, of a remnant. She was providentially placed in the wilderness, that she might be fed and nourished; for without food and nourishment she could not exist in such a world as this. The "faithful men" who were within her pale, "who were able to teach others" (2 Tim. 2:2), fed her with knowledge and understanding (Jer. 3:15); and "the earth," with whom she found an asylum, "helped her" with the nourishment of protection, without which she would have been carried away of the serpent-flood. A remnant of her seed, and the common people of the Eagle's wings, "the earth," coalesced. They became political allies against the party in power; and were upon emergency prepared to withstand their oppressor by force of arms. These were the vanguard of the other remnant of her seed, whose principle is passive endurance of injury "unto death;" and trusting for vindication to Him who saith, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay." These were the saints sealed in their foreheads as the especial servants of the living God.

Now, to what in our own times shall we liken the civil and ecclesiastical arrangement of things existing at the crisis of the woman's flight? The following constitution of things with which the reader is familiar, will answer the purpose of bringing vividly before his mind what was presented before John's in the dramatical exhibition of the woman in the wilderness. The British Imperial Unicorn is an element of the Serpent-power of the world. It is enthroned in all the splendor of the heaven; and sheds the rays of its glory and power upon all the constituted authorities of the state. Invested with this brightness is a Harlot, diademed with the jewels of the British crown. This woman is a daughter of "Mystery, Babylon the Great, the Mother of Harlots, and all the Abominations of the Earth;" and is constitutionally styled, "the Church of England and Ireland, as by law established." In the palmy days of the Tudors and the Stuarts, there was another woman, who fled from the face of the British Serpent. This was the woman of nonconformity and dissent. And to this fugitive were given the wings, or extremities, of the Great Unicorn; that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished until the coming of the Ancient of Days. These wings are now known as the United States and British America. Here the Puritan Woman exists out of the sight of the British Serpent, fed by her spirituals, and nourished by "the earth," which is remarkably inimical to everything British. But, are the sects of which this Anti-British State-Church Woman is composed, "the remnants of her seed which keep the commandments of the Deity, and hold the testimony of the anointed Jesus?" Far, very far, from it; they are as far from it as the British Harlot herself; nevertheless, there will be found within the pale of Anti-British Harlotry a remnant, styled CHRISTADELPHIANS, whose intellectual and moral characteristics are answerable to the last clause of Apoc. 12:17.

Now, the Puritan Woman, styled by her enemies and persecutors "the Donatists;" but by the children of her body, Cathari, or the Pure Ones; for the first 1260 years of her existence was Providentially settled in the wings of the Roman Eagle. Her remnants were not to be found in Persia, India, China, or America: but after the discovery and settlement of America, the persecutions and massacre of her seed by the SerpentPowers of Europe caused her to seek refuge in the American wilderness, whereby the help of "the earth," which styles itself "the unterrified democracy," she is fed and nourished to the full.

It is now over 1550 years since her flight began in the days of Constantine, or A.D. 315. In Apoc. 11:3, "the remnants of her seed" are specified by the names "THE HOLY CITY" and "The two Witnesses". The former, consists of those "who keep the commandments of the Deity, and hold the testimony of the anointed Jesus:" the latter, the Politico-Religious Democracy essentially and constitutionally hostile to the "Mother of Harlots" and her Harlot Daughters, in all the countries where they are "by law established."

A copy of the Edict of Nantes, which was promulgated by Henry IV in 1598, an important date in Apocalyptic prophetic chronology. This edict granted Protestants a degree of toleration. Its benefits, however, were terminated by its revocation in 1685 by Louis XIV, which resulted in the political death of the Witnesses (Rev. 11:9). However, as predicted, after their “dead bodies” had remained unburied in “the street” (France) of the Great City (Babylon the Great) for 3 1/2 lunar “days” or 105 years, their political “resurrection” followed in 1790 through the French Revolution, Rev. 12:14 also requires a period of 1260 years during which time the “woman” finds refuge in the “wilderness” or in various parts of the Roman Empire. Commencing from A.D. 312 when the Donatist controversy divided the Church, 1260 years terminates in 1572 and the Massacre of St. Bartholomew’s Day. This commenced the “war” of Rev. 11:7, and whilst the Edict of Nantes gave temporary relief to the Protesting communities, this terminated its revocation. See comments opposite, and compare with the time periods epitomised in Vol. 2, p. 282—Publishers.

Now, the times of these two classes are differently arranged. The duration of the symbolical formulas is the same number of years with respect to each; though the symbolical formulas themselves are differently expressed. Thus the symbolical formula of “the Holy City” is written “forty-two months,” while the symbolical formula of the woman with especial reference to the remnant, “the witnesses,” is written “one thousand two hundred and sixty days.” This is also expressed in the form “a time, and times, and half a time.” and the reason why these two various formulas are given in the sixth and fourteenth verses of this twelfth chapter is, that this form, which is reproduced from Dan. 7:25, and 12:7, might be shown to consist of 1260 symbolic days. The form in Daniel indicates a period reaching to the epoch when judgment is given to the saints of the Highest Ones, which implies the manifestation of the Ancient of Days and the subsequent resurrection of the dead; because, there can be no judgment until they are raised; and no resurrection till he comes.

But the time when the 1260 æon commences is not the same in all its relations. In Dan. 7 and 12, it has special reference to “the Holy City,” or saints, in the highest sense; and begins with their delivery as heretics into the hand, or power, of the Roman Blasphemer, styled in Dan. 11:38, 39, “a foreign god” and “a god of guardians.” The “forty-two months” of Apoc. 11:2, begins at the same time. Not so, however, the 1260 of the Two Witnesses, and the times of the woman in ch. 12:6, 14. These all begin with the commencement of her flight in the Constantinian epoch. In these times she was to be fed and nourished; and fire was to proceed out of the mouth of her dualized witnessing remnant, to devour her enemies and theirs. During these times they had power to shut the heaven, that it might not rain in their days of the prophecy, or the 1260. But when they may “have finished their witnessing,” which they accomplished at the end of that period, or 1260 years after their banishment by Constantine, that is, in the epoch of A.D. 1572–’75, war was made upon them, and they were overcome, and put to death politically: they were “killed” in a like sense to the killing of “the third of the men” in ch. 9:18—a death which said third sought, but could not find, because the time Divinely appointed to extinguish the eastern Roman dominion had not yet come.

But, though the 1260 years of the sackcloth-witnessing of the anticatholic remnant of the woman’s seed ended in A.D. 1575; the other class of her seed, “the Holy City,” still continued to travail in the affliction of its down-trodden condition; and to press on through the weary years assigned to it in the “forty-two months,” or “the reed like to a rod” with which it was measured (Apoc. 11:1). The finishing of the witnessing by the secular element of the woman in A.D. 1572–’5, marks the lapse of nine hundred and sixty-eight years of the forty-two months; in all of which time “the Holy City” had been in the hand of the Roman Blasphemer. At the end of the witnessing in A.D. 1575, there still remained two hundred and ninety-two years of the forty-two months to be traversed by the Holy City. These elapsed, and she attains the A.D. 1867–’8; or, having traversed and completed an æon or cycle, of fortytwo months of years from A.D. 607, she is justified in looking for a speedy deliverance from the down-treading she has been subjected to in all that terrible and sanguinary time.

But though the 1260 years of her sustentation in the two wings of the Roman Eagle were fulfilled, it must not be supposed that, because war was made upon her seed, and they were overcome and politically killed, she was therefore dead, and had no further part in the history of the papal world. So long as she has a remnant upon the earth, she lives in it; though she may no longer be found in her original place of abode. Exterminated in one section of the Habitable, her seed reappear in another, on the principle of being persecuted in one city, they flee to another. In the first 1260 years of her sojourn out of the Serpent’s sight, her fugacious migrations were confined to the wings of his dominion. For three hundred years after her flight she was fed and nourished in the Roman Africa, and the Cottian Alps. At the end of these centuries, she disappeared from the African Wing of the Great Eagle, and manifested her presence in Armenia and Asia Minor; and when she could no longer find food and nourishment there, she migrated in the course of a hundred and fifty years into France, and thence into Bulgaria, and up the Danube westward and northward through Hungary and Bavaria. In the ninth century, the witnessing of her seed was no longer heard in Armenia, Asia Minor, and Thrace; but was more particularly limited to the Alpine regions of Italy, Switzerland, and France. In the twelfth century, the witnessing of her seed in these countries became so hateful to the Roman Catholic Church, that its malice against her became unbounded. “The rivers and fountains of waters,” or those who ruled among the mountains and valleys of the Alps, were stirred up by the spiritual head of that communion, to shed their blood without mercy (Apoc. 16:4–7); nevertheless, the food and nourishment afforded her, enabled her to endure, and to continue her witnessing in these Alpine regions until the expiration of her 1260 years. But in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the power of the strong governments of Europe was brought to bear upon her seed. The two wings of the Great Eagle no longer afforded her protection; so that her witnessing against catholicism, and THE ANTICHRIST, whose power had now reached its greatest altitude and breadth, was suppressed in all the kingdoms, or Horns, of the Beast of the Sea (Apoc. 11:7; 13:1).

This was the death of the witnessing of the politico-ecclesiastical remnant of her seed. The war upon her that ultimated in this result, continued over a century after the termination of her æon (aion) of 1260 years. From A.D. 1685 to A.D. 1790, her seed’s voice against the Roman Antichrist was death-stricken in all the Ten-Horns of the Beast of the Sea. During this period of three lunar days and a half of years, her anti-catholic communities lay voiceless in the streets, or kingdoms, of the Great City, very much to the joy and mirthfulness of the priests and rulers of the Horn-Powers, especially of the VICE-GOD of “Christendom” and his Cardinals, whose sanguinary domination is now tottering to its fall. These priestly and besotted tyrants “rejoiced over them, and made merry,” because the tormenting testimony of her seed was, as they thought, effectually and finally silenced (Apoc. 11:4–10). But they knew not the purposes of Him who doeth all things after the counsel of His own will. They knew not that a great revival of this tormenting witnessing had been decreed; and that their joyous mirth was doomed to set in mourning, lamentation, and woe. For, after the expiration of the three lunar days and a half of years, that is, of 105 years; marked also by the termination of 1260 years from the epoch A.D. 530–533, in which the Dragon-Power “acknowledged” the bishop of Rome as “a god” over all the spiritual affairs of his dominion (Dan. 11:39): after the end of his cycle, “the Spirit of life from Deity was to enter into them, and they were to stand upon their feet.” In the epoch of A.D. 1789–’93, this came to pass in the birth of what the terrified “foul spirits” and “unclean and hateful birds” of the Roman “cage,” denominate “THE REVOLUTION.” This fearful power, which is now sternly and threateningly glaring in the face of the trembling demon-and-idol-worshippers of the Roman “hold” (Apoc. 18:2), is the organized witnessing of the politicoecclesiastical remnant of the Woman’s Seed. Created A.D. 315, slain A.D. 1685, it rose again A.D. 1789–’93; and, in the last epoch “it ascended to the heaven,” where it is now working through the Frog-like influences of the French, Italian, and Prussian powers which will not cease to operate until they shall have unwittingly “gathered the kings of the earth and of the whole habitable to the war of that great day of God Almighty—a day which is near, even at the door, and waiting only the expiration of the forty-two months of the down-treading of the Holy City; that is, of 1260 years from the giving of the Saints into the hand of “the Foreign God,” A.D. 607–’8; or 1335 from his “acknowledgment” by the King that did according to his will in A.D. 533; which gives for a glorious epoch to the believer, A.D. 1868–’9.

26. “The Earth Helped the Woman.”

“And the Serpent cast out of his mouth after the Woman water as a flood, that he might cause her to be carried away by the flood. 16. And the earth ran with help for the woman, and the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed up the flood which the Dragon cast out of his mouth. 17. And the Dragon was enraged against the woman, and went away to wage war with the remnants of her seed who keep the commandments of the Deity, and hold the testimony of the anointed Jesus”—Verses 15–17.

The Dragon, the Serpent, the Diabolos, and the Satan, in this twelfth chapter, are all terms expressive of the political, or civil, military, and spiritual, “enmity” in organized activity against the woman and her seed. When the political organization that seeks her destruction is wholly pagan, then it is represented as “a Great Fiery Red Dragon”—ver. 3: if still pagan, but not wholly so in all departments of the state, then it is no longer the “great fiery red dragon,” but simply the Diabolos, as in ver. 12; and if no longer pagan, but a subtle and seductive power, wise in its own conceit, and invested with supreme authority, it is indicated by “the Serpent” and “the Dragon,” as in ver. 15, 16. This identity is established by the testimony concerning the flood of water, which states that it issued both from the mouth of the Serpent and the mouth of the Dragon: now the flood being one, not two, the Serpent and the Dragon in the verses at the head of this section must represent the same power.

But the Dragon and his angels were cast out of the political heaven, or Roman government, “and their place was found no more in the heaven;” nevertheless, in the last four verses of this chapter we find the Dragon in power, and exercising it vengefully for 1260 years against the woman, and making war with the remnants of her seed. How is this? It was the pagan constitution of power enthroned in Rome and Italy that was cast out, and has reappeared no more to this day. But after the battles of Adrianople and Chrysopolis all power over the Roman Habitable came to be vested in Constantine. He was the sole imperial bishop of the Dragon empire; which, by the revolution he had consummated, was transformed from the Pagan Dragon, into the Catholic Dragon, dominion. It is this Catholic Serpent and Dragon that figures in the concluding verses of this chapter, as well as in the thirteenth and twentieth chapters of the Apocalypse, which has no more to do with the Great Fiery Red Dragon after ch. 12:13;

The throne of the Pagan Dragon was Rome; but when the Dragonpower came to be vested in Constantinople he established a New Polity in a New Capital, which after himself he styled, the City of Constantine, or Constantinople. In the period in which the woman became a fugitive, Constantinople, previously called Byzantium, became the capital of the Roman world. It has retained its sovereign rank over 1540 years. Its founder ascribed his resolution of building it to the infallible and eternal decrees of Divine Wisdom; and in one of his laws, he declares that it was in obedience to the commands of God, that he laid the everlasting foundations of Constantinople. His choice of Byzantium for a city is said, by contemporary writers, to have been owing to a vision which appeared to him while he slept within the walls of that city. Its tutelar genius, a venerable woman sinking under the weight of years and infirmities, was suddenly transformed into a blooming female, whom his own hands adorned with all the symbols of imperial greatness. The emperor awoke, interpreted the auspicious omen, and obeyed, without hesitation, the supposed will of heaven. On the day on which the foundation of the city was laid, Constantine on foot, with a lance in his hand, traced out the boundary of the destined capital. It was of great extent, which his assistants observing, ventured to remark, that he had already exceeded the most ample measure of a great city. "I shall still advance," replied Constantine, "till he, the invisible guide who marches before me, thinks proper to stop." Whether or not the emperor did see the vision of his dream, it is a fact as already shown, that this twelfth chapter was generally supposed by anti-pagans of that day to refer to the events of the life of Constantine. Hence, it is more than probable that the dream he professes to have had was not a vision of his own, but a fiction into which he introduced the two women of this chapter, the one distressed, inferior, and persecuted, the other blooming and decorated with the sun, the moon and the stars, the symbols of imperial greatness, with which "his own hands adorned her;" and for whom he determined, dream or no dream, to found a new capital.

"Water as a flood" is said to have been cast out of the Serpent's mouth after the woman to sweep her away. Water flowing like a river indicates an army or body of men in motion. That water symbolises people is evident from Apoc. 17:15. Hence, when the water is in motion the people are moving; when it flows like a river the body of people moves in a certain direction; when the river overflows its banks, the army crosses its frontiers and invades another nation; when the water sweeps along like a flood, the army subdues and carries all before it; but when the earth opens and absorbs the flood, then the operations of the army are spent without effecting its purpose; and if the water of the river be dried up, as in Apoc. 16:12, the power and independence of the people represented are destroyed. Some of these definitions are strikingly illustrated in Isaiah 8:7: "Behold," says the prophet, "Yahweh bringeth up upon them (the Jews) the waters of the river, the strong and mighty; even the king of Assyria and all his force. And he shall rise above all his channels, and shall go over all his banks; and he shall pass through Judah, overflowing and spreading; even to the neck shall he reach; and the extension of his wings (the wings of his army) shall be over the full breadth of thy land, O Immanuel!" The kingdom of Assyria was divided from that of Israel by the Euphrates, termed in Scripture "the river," and "the great river." Hence, it came to symbolize his power; so that when he invaded Israel, the waters of his river are said to have swelled over their banks, and flooded their country to so great an extent as to rise "to the neck," or capital, but without submerging it; so that it would be an overflowing invasion, which would recede without finally subjecting the nation.

The Mouth of the Serpent or Dragon is symbolical of the words, utterances and commands, proceeding from the power called Serpent or Dragon. The commands of a power are expressed or made audible and effective by the reigning administration of public affairs; and which holds a similar relation to the power that the mouth does to the brain of a man. Hence, “the Mouth of the Dragon, the Mouth of the Beast, and the Mouth of the False Prophet,” are the governments of the powers signified by these symbols.

The Serpent and Dragon are said to have cast water as a flood out of their Mouth; that is, an army of pursuers was sent forth by order of the catholic government of Constantinople and Rome, to sweep the fugitive woman from among the living. The execution of this decree of extermination might have been successful, had not “the earth ran with help for the woman, and opened its mouth and swallowed up the flood.” The Common Version says, “the earth helped the woman.” This is not incorrect; but it is not as exact as it might be, and as the events represented justify. The word boetheo, signifies properly, “to run to the aid of those who cry for help.” The woman in her flight was pursued, or persecuted by power, which caused her in her sufferings to cry aloud. Her cries fell upon the ears of the earthiest of earthborns, who ran to and fro dealing the most terrific vengeance upon her foes. The ferocious purpose of the catholic power encountering this most unexpected resistance was defeated; the earth swallowed up the wrath which expended itself upon it, and the woman was saved.

Historical Illustration

Such, then, is the meaning, or “mystery,” of the form of words presented in the prophecy. The Catholic Dragon, or Man of Sin power, incorporate in the unbaptized episcopal emperor, Constantine, and in the ignorant and superstitious ecclesiastics whom he had associated with himself in synodical session, was the effluent pursuer of the woman, who rejected the traditions and commands of the tribunal which had arraigned and condemned her, and all her seed, as odious and pestilent heretics. Having lost their cause at Rome and Arles, the Anti-catholic Donatists had appealed for the last time to Constantine himself, who in A.D. 316, examined the whole affair at Milan, in the presence of the contending parties. The issue, as might be expected from the character of the judges, was not more favorable to the Donatists than the decisions of the previous councils, which were confirmed by the sentence he pronounced. Condemned by the Bishop of Rome, and by that bishop’s imperial master, “this perverse sect,” as they are styled by Mosheim, are said to have loaded the emperor with “the bitterest reproaches,” and complained that Osius, bishop of Cordova, who was honored with his friendship, and was intimately connected with Cæcilianus, had, by corrupt insinuations, engaged him to pronounce an unrighteous sentence. “Perhaps their complaint,” says Gibbon, “was not without foundation, that the credulity of the emperor had been abused by the insidious arts of his favorite, Osius. The influence of falsehood and corruption might procure the condemnation of the innocent or aggravate the sentence of the guilty.” Be this as it may, “the Dragon, the old serpent, incited to great wrathfulness by these irritating trials, which disturbed the serenity of the party in power, deprived the anti-catholic Donatists of their churches in Africa, drove their bishops into exile, and carried his resentment so far as to put some of them to death. This was the commencement of the Catholic Dragon’s wrath against the woman, and of the war he waged against the remnants of her seed (verse 7). The immediate effect of these violent measures, were desperate commotions and tumults in Africa, as the Donatists were exceedingly influential and numerous in that wing of the great eagle. But these insurrections were regarded by them with the utmost detestation and abhorrence; and, therefore, though a persecuted people, we are not to attribute these popular uprisings in their defence to a spirit of recrimination in them against their “christian” oppressors. The Donatists Remnant had fled “into the wilderness” of Getulia that they might be “out of sight of the Serpent”—of “the first Christian emperor” and his catholic myrmidons, who had seized their property, exiled their teachers, and put some to death. Upon this, the Spirit of Deity stirred up the indignation of “the Earth” —of those who, though neither catholics nor Donatists, had spirit enough to defend the oppressed against imperial and ecclesiastical tyranny, and that in their own irregular and violent way. This situation of affairs may be illustrated by the following supposition. Thus, Christadelphians where known are in very bad odor with “every name and denomination,” against which they protest as the Anti-christian “Harlots and Abominations of the Earth.” Suppose these were to lay aside all their animosities and strifes, and to combine to suppress and exterminate them with fire and sword; would not the “infidels,” who have predilection for no sect, oppose force to force in their defence? There can be no doubt of it; and, though Christadelphians deprecate, and would all violence in their behalf, the infidels, as in the first French Revolution, would make the quarrel with the oppressor their own; and the most horrible cruelties would probably be perpetrated upon the enemy under the pretence of assisting them. To a certain extent, such an event occurred in the epoch of the American revolution, when the infidel leaders of revolt against British tyranny in church and State, interposed between the episcopal church and the Baptists and other sects it was oppressing, and proclaimed an equality of rights for sects of every name. But they were not content with proclamations; they drew the sword, and watered the earth with blood for seven years, to establish it. Shall we charge the Baptists and Quakers of that day with appealing to the arbitrament of arms against the Established Church of England, because they, in common with others, obtained exemption from future whippings and incarcerations on account of their religious principles, by the triumph of revolutionary unbelievers? Even supposing that many Baptists and Quakers were found in the ranks of the insurgents, as no doubt there were, should we, therefore, condemn the Baptist and Quaker bodies as baptized in human gore? A community is not to be condemned as a murderer of its species, because of the delinquency of some of its adherents; if so, then most of the apostolic churches would have to be condemned as anti-christian. The case, however, is entirely altered where a sect, as the Catholic Anglo-Episcopal, in its corporate capacity, condemns, imprisons, and puts to death as heretics, those who assert the imprescriptible and inalienable right of judging what is truth for themselves. Here the murder of “heretics” socalled, is the crime of the whole body; which, as in the case of individuals, will sooner or later suffer the just penalty of the Divine law. The case of the Donatists is parallel to our supposition. The indignation of the people was roused, and in the language of the prophecy, “the Earth ran with help to the Woman.” The emperor and his party were alarmed, and Constantine endeavored by embassies and negotiations to allay the disturbances, but without effect.

The Donatists used the title traditores to describe weak bishops who handed over the sacred writings to persecuting authorities. The title was derived from the term Tradito legis, the Catholic title for the imagined action of the Lord in handing the scroll of authority and teaching to Peter. This is illustrated in the motif above from the fifth century. Therein the Lord is depicted handing over a scroll to Peter—Publishers.

Who are represented by “the Earth” in the period of the woman’s flight into, or towards, the wilderness, will readily appear from the following account. The persecution of the servants and brethren of Christ by the Catholic Serpent at this juncture was acquiring strength, the flame of discord gathered force daily, and seemed to portend the approaching horrors of civil war. To prevent this, Constantine, having tried in vain every other method of accommodation, abrogated at last, by the advice of the governors of Africa, the laws he had enacted against the Donatists, and allowed to the people the full liberty of adhering to that which in their minds This state of party they preferred. tranquillity, which did not long continue, was brought about by a horrible confederacy of desperate ruffians who passed under the name of CIRCUMCELLIONS. These bands were composed of a set of furious, fearless, and bloody men, formed of the rough and savage peasantry of the Numidian and Mauritanian villages, who were semi-pagans, and had been imperfectly reduced under the authority of the Roman laws. "This outrageous multitude," says Mosheim, "whom no prospect of sufferings could terrify, and who, upon urgent occasions, faced death itself with the most audacious temerity, contributed to render the sect of the Donatists (whose cause they espoused) an object of the utmost abhorrence (to the Catholics) though it cannot be proved, by any records of undoubted authority that the bishops of that faction (those at least who had any reputation for piety and virtue) either approved the proceedings or stirred up the violence of this odious rabble." This was truly "the unterrified," and unterrifiable, "democracy." This may be styled the spontaneous soldiery of the Donatists, extemporized by the urgency of their distress. These Circumcellions never failed to take up arms to defend them against their enemies. The imperial officers were usually sustained by a military force in the execution of the wrath of the Catholic Dragon, which issued like a sweeping flood from its Mouth; but it did not carry the woman away. It was sometimes successfully repelled. The blood of some Donatist teachers which had been shed by the imperialists, inflamed the Circumcellions with an eager desire of revenge. By their own cruelty and rashness, the ministers of persecution sometimes provoked their fate; and the guilt of an accidental tumult precipitated them into despair and rebellion. The leaders of the Circumcellions assumed the title of CAPTAINS OF THE SAINTS. Their principal weapon, as they were indifferently provided with swords and spears, was a huge and weighty club, which they termed AN ISRAELITE; and the well-known sound of "Praise be to God," which they used as their war-cry, diffused consternation over the unarmed provinces of Africa. At first, their depredations were covered with the plea of necessity; but they soon exceeded the measure of subsistence, indulging without control their intemperance and avarice; burned the villages they had pillaged, and, in defiance of the Roman legions, reigned the licentious tyrants of the open country. The occupations of husbandry, and the administration of justice, were interrupted; and as the Circumcellions pretended to restore the primitive equality of mankind, and to reform the abuses of civil society, they opened a secure asylum for slaves and debtors and all other refugees, who fled to their standard in crowds from their pursuers; or in the language of the prophecy, "the Earth opened her mouth, and swallowed up the flood". When they were not resisted, they usually contented themselves with plunder, but the slightest opposition provoked them to acts of violence and murder; and some catholic priests, who had signalized their zeal, were tortured with the most refined and wanton barbarity. They engaged, and sometimes defeated, the provincial legions of the Dragon; and in the sanguinary action of Bagai, when the troops of Constans were sent against the Donatists, as a flood from the Dragon's Mouth, the Circumcellions attacked in open field, but with unsuccessful valor, an advanced guard of the imperial cavalry. Those who were taken prisoners died without a murmur, either by the sword, the axe, or the fire; and the measures of retaliation were multiplied in rapid proportion, which aggravated the horrors of rebellion, and excluded the hope of mutual forgiveness.

The Donatists and Circumcellions were active in the North African area. The Donatists were given military protection by the fierce and warlike Circumcellions. The latter wanted to break away from the empire (hence the name given them), and supported the Donatists who had broken from the State religion. The Donatists were so called after the name of their leader Donatus who opposed those Bishops that supported Constantine in his drive for power—Publishers.

Such disorders are the natural effects of religious tyranny; but the rage of the Circumcellions was enflamed by a phrenzy of a very extraordinary kind. Many of them were possessed with a horror of life, and the desire of martyrdom; and they deemed it of little moment by what means, or by what hands, they perished, if their conduct was sanctified by "the intention of devoting themselves to the glory of the true faith." Such was "the Earth," and such the manner in which she "opened her mouth, and swallowed up the flood which the Catholic Dragon cast out of his mouth," in voluntary defence of the woman's seed in the African wing of the Great Eagle.

But the defensive operation of “the Earth” was not restricted to the African provinces of the empire. The peasantry of Paphlagonia was inspired by the same spirit. During the reign of Constantius, son and successor of Constantine, when the catholic Trinitarians and catholic Arians unsheathed the sword of the flesh against one another to arbitrate the rights of Homoiousion and Homoiousion to the claim of orthodoxy, the Novatians, another remnant of the woman’s anti-catholic seed, became obnoxious to the Arian emperor and patriarch of Constantinople. The latter distinguished pietist, whose name was Macedonius, being informed that a large district of Paphlagonia was almost entirely inhabited by the Novatians, resolved in fiery excess of zeal, either to convert them to Arian catholicity, or to exterminate them; and as he distrusted on this occasion the efficacy of an ecclesiastical mission, he determined to vomit forth a legionary flood to sweep them from the earth. To this end, he ordered a body of four thousand legionaries to march against these unoffending dissenters, and to reduce the territory of Mantinium under his patriarchal authority. “The Serpent cast out of his mouth water like a flood after the woman, that he might cause her to be carded away by the flood.” But the armed flood did not accomplish the purpose of the Constantinopolitan government. It was foreshown in the prophecy that it should not succeed; for it was Providentially arranged that the flood should be ineffectually expended upon the earth as it is written, “the earth ran with help for the woman and opened her mouth, and drank up the flood which the Dragon cast out of his mouth.” And so it came to pass; for the Paphlagonian peasants, animated by despair and religious fury, boldly encountered the invaders of their country; and though many of them were slain, the Serpent’s legions were vanquished by an irregular multitude armed only with scythes and axes; and except a few that escaped by flight, thousands of soldiers were left dead upon the field of battle. The Emperor Julian, who succeeded Constantius, an apostate from this sanguinary catholicism to paganism, speaking of his predecessor’s reign, in his fifty-third epistle, says, “many were imprisoned and persecuted and driven into exile. Whole troops of those who were styled ‘heretics,’ were massacred, particularly at Cyzicus and Samosata. In Paphlagonia, Bithynia, Galatia, and many other provinces, towns and villages were laid waste and utterly destroyed.”

After the death of Constantine, in the division of his empire between his three sons, Italy and Africa were allotted to Constans. He sent Macarius and Paulus into Africa to heal, if possible, this “deplorable schism,” as Mosheim terms it; and to engage the Donatists to conclude a peace. The efforts of Constans to induce them to coalesce with the catholic church were strenuous, but ineffectual. Force and corruption were the royal arguments employed for their conversion by these imperial commissioners. The chief bishop among the Donatists opposed all these methods of reconciliation with the utmost vehemence; and his example was followed by the rest of his brethren. The idea was odious to them of a coalition with those, who in the Diocletian persecution and distress, in order to avoid martyrdom, had delivered up the Holy Scriptures, the best gift of the Deity to man. This zeal for the word was a remarkable characteristic of the Woman’s Seed. It underlaid the whole controversy between the Catholics and Dissenters of the period. The Catholics very lightly esteemed the Scriptures; and were daily withdrawing the people’s attention from them more and more, until at length they came to legislate against the use of them by “the laity” at all. Not so their opponents, with whom the sacred writings have always been a tower of strength against their enemies. To the fugitive woman was Providentially committed the custody of the Divine Oracles; for it is the remnants of her seed which are testified to have held the testimony of the anointed Jesus, which is to be found only in the Holy Scriptures. No wonder, therefore, that these worthy and excellent people turned a deaf ear to every overture of reconciliation with the word-neglecting adherents of the tyrannical church of Constans. The cruelties of Macarius and Paulus only exasperated “the earth”, and widened the breach. The Circumcellions, provoked by their arbitrary proceedings, wreaked their vengeance on the persecutors of the Donatists by assassinations and massacres executed with unrelenting fury. "The Dragon was wroth with the woman," when he saw his projects baffled. He, therefore sent Macarius against them with "a flood". The Earth encountered the flood in the battle of Bagnia, A.D. 345, in which, however, the Circumcellions were defeated. This "servant of God," as Gratus, bishop of Carthage styled Macarius, now gave vent to the fury and rage of the Dragon, and indulged in crimes of deeper dye than he had yet perpetrated before victory. There was now no safety for the woman but in flight. Optatus of Milevi, a contemporary writer, whose testimony, Mosheim says, is beyond exception in this matter, informs us that a few of the Donatists submitted; "the greatest part of them saved themselves by flight;" numbers were sent into banishment. Among them were DONATUS, whom they called "the Great," on account of his learning and virtue; and many of them were punished with the utmost severity. "During these troubles," says Dr. Mosheim, "which continued nearly thirteen years, several steps were taken against the Donatists, which the equitable and impartial will be at a loss to reconcile with the dictates of humanity and justice; nor indeed do the catholics themselves deny the truth of this assertion."

The following passage from a Donatist writer would seem to indicate that they discerned the apocalyptic sign of their time. In treating of the suffering of Marculus, he says, "Behold suddenly the polluted flood of the Macarian persecution burst forth from the tyrannical church of king Constans, and two beasts being sent to Africa from thence, to wit, Macarius and Paulus, a most horrible and cruel ecclesiastical war was proclaimed, that a christian people should be compelled by the naked swords of soldiers, by the standards of Serpents or Dragons (draconum præsentiibus signis) and by the blasts of trumpets, to unite with Traditors!" Compare this passage with the 15th and 16th verses of this chapter. How striking the resemblance! The Donatists, doubtless, discerned that "the polluted flood of the Macarian persecution which burst forth from the tyrannical church of king Constans," was the "water like a flood the serpent or dragon cast out of his Mouth." From this, and other instances, I doubt not, that among the woman's seed there have been in all ages some who were able to discern the apocalyptic signs specially pertaining to the times in which they lived. They might not have been able to expound the apocalypse as a whole, but they could discern sufficient to answer the question. "Watchman, what of the night?" Let us be thankful, that the believer of the truth is also able, at this crisis of the woman's history, to discern the signs of these times; so that when the Ancient of Days comes in as a thief upon an intoxicated and insane generation like ours, he will find us with our lamps trimmed and our lights brightly burning, ready to go out to meet Him.

"And the Dragon was enraged against the woman". These calamities triumphed over them until A.D. 361, when the "earthquake" of Apoc. 8:5, placed the anti-catholic nephew of Constantine, "Julian the Apostate," so called, upon the Constantinopolitan throne of the Roman world. This imperial pagan proved more humane and merciful to the Donatists than his "christian" (?) predecessors. He permitted them to return to their country, and restored them to the enjoyment of their former liberty. This revolution so far renewed their vigor, that they recruited their wasted ranks by bringing over, in a short time, the majority of the provincials to their interests. Gratian published several edicts against them, and in A.D. 377, deprived them of their houses of assembly, and prohibited all their meetings public and private. But the fury of the Circumcellions, and the apprehension of intestine tumults, prevented the vigorous execution of these laws. This appears from the numerous conventicles they possessed in Africa towards the conclusion of this fourth century, to which were attached not less than four hundred bishops. About this time a celebrated, or rather, notorious ecclesiastic entered the lists against them. This was that veritable saint of the Serpent calendar, equally glorified by Greek, Latin, and Protestant, historically known as St. Augustine, bishop of Hippo. He attacked them in every way; and as he was a hot-headed and active spirit, he animated against them the whole antichristian world with its imperial court. "The catholic bishops of Africa," says Mosheim, "animated by the exhortations, and conducted by the counsels of this zealous prelate, exerted themselves with the utmost vigor in the destruction of those seditious sectaries (the Earth-assisted Woman) whom they justly looked upon, not only as troublesome to the (catholic) church by their obstinacy (as he calls her faithfulness to “the testimony of the anointed Jesus”) but as a nuisance to the State (or Dragon) by the brutal soldiery (“the earth”) which they employed in their cause (though on p. 124, § viii. he says, “the Donatists regarded the Circumcellions with the utmost detestation and abhorrence”). Accordingly, deputies were sent, A.D. 404, from the council of Carthage to the emperor Honorius to request that the laws enacted against heretics by the preceding emperors might have force against the Donatists, who denied that they belonged to the heretical tribe; and also to desire that bounds might be set to the barbarous fury of the Circumcellions.” In acceding to this request, the Dragon-emperor imposed a fine upon all the Donatists who refused to return into the bosom of the catholic church, and sent their bishops and teachers into banishment. In A.D. 405, new and severer laws were enacted against them under the title of Acts of Uniformity; and as the lay magistrates (the earth) were too tardy in the execution of vengeance for “christian priests,” the council of Carthage, A.D. 407, sent deputies a second time to the emperor, desiring that certain persons might be appointed to execute the new edicts with vigor and impartiality, in other words, without mercy. This was granted also. But the Donatists, though much shaken by these repeated assaults of the Dragon, were still “nourished” and “fed” by the Providence of the Deity. Their strength revived A.D. 408, after Stilico had been put to death by the order of Honorius; and gained an accession of vigor the following year, in which the emperor published a law in favor of liberty of conscience, and prohibited all compulsion in matters of religion. This law, however, was not of long continuance. There is nothing the catholic clergy detest so much as liberty to think, speak, and act, contrary to their traditions. This has been characteristic of them in all ages. It is a characteristic of the craft of all orders, though times and circumstances repress its manifestation when things are not convenient or propitious. Liberty to discuss freely the demerits of the Traditorial Church was terribly annoying to those who justified the delivering up of the Holy Scriptures to be burned as the redemption price of their nondeliverance. These word-despising catholic traditors would let the Dragon-government have no rest until the edict of toleration was repealed; and the blood of the Witnesses of Jesus was caused to flow afresh. The law was therefore abrogated at the earnest and repeated solicitation of the council of bishops which met at Carthage, A.D. 419; and Marcellinus, the tribune, was sent by Honorius into Africa with a flood of legionaries effluent of the Dragon’s Mouth. Full power was given to him to sweep the woman away; and so to bring to a conclusion, or to extinguish, the testimony of these faithful witnesses against that DIABOLICAL AND SATANIC APOSTASY, blasphemously styled “the Holy Apostolic Catholic Church.” Who can but be penetrated with disgust and horror at the villainous and execrable cruelty of the clergy of this and after ages! It was evident that the emperor was reluctant to persecute the Donatists. But, though an emperor, he doubtless had reason to fear, lest in shielding the lives of the innocent, he might forfeit his own at the bidding of his episcopal allies. Nothing but extermination seems to have satisfied these hissing serpents and dragon-speaking priests. How thankful ought we to be, that the Deity has put it into the heart of “the Earth,” to open her mouth against the execution of sanguinary vengeance upon the believers and advocates of the truth by the generation of vipers whose vested interests are opposed to it.

Marcellinus, by imperial commission, instituted a judicial investigation at Carthage. The trial lasted three days, and, as might be expected, judgment was given in favor of the dominant clergy. The catholic bishops present were 286; and those of the Donatists 279. The latter, like Paul, appealed to the emperor, but without any favorable result. The terrors of this persecution caused many to apostatize to the catholics; while the severest penalties were inflicted on those who continued to “obey the commandments of the Deity, and to hold the testimony of the anointed Jesus.” Fines, banishment, and confiscation of goods, were the ordinary punishments visited upon the Donatists; and says Mosheim,

“the pain of death was inflicted upon such as surpassed the rest in perverseness, and were the seditious ringleaders of that stubborn faction.” Some avoided these penalties by flight, and others by concealing themselves; and the malice of their enemies has not failed to blacken their memories by imputing to them the crime of suicide. In the meantime, the Circumcellion-Earth again “ran with help for the woman,” and interposed between her and her oppressors to ward off the execution of the sentence against her seed. They ran up and down through the African wing of the Great Eagle in the most outrageous manner, committing acts of great cruelty upon the catholics, and defending themselves by force of arms.

But, while the remnant of the woman’s seed, which, in those trying times, “kept the commandments of the Deity, and held the testimony of the anointed Jesus,” were thus witnessing unto death, and by their witnessing, tormenting them that dwelt upon the Catholic terrene, they had a powerful and influential intercessor within the veil, whose eyes beheld the ferocious wickedness of the Roman Serpent, and whose ears were not inattentive to their prayers. It is not difficult to conceive, that these prayers would be many, earnest and fervent; for, having faith in God and in his word, they would know that deliverance could come from Him alone. He had placed them in the African Wing of the Great Eagle, to testify against the Laodicean Apostasy in Church and State. This was a dangerous mission, but it had to be done, and faithfully performed until there should be no catholic power there to witness against. This was their hope; but of the time when it should be broken in Africa, and they delivered, they had no knowledge. All they could do, then was to “offer much incense upon the golden altar before the throne” (Apoc. 8:3)—pray much. “contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints,” and patiently wait for an answer to their earnest supplications, which would “ascend before the Deity out of the hand” of the incense-bearing angel of His presence.

JULIAN THE APOSTATE—Julian (361–363) reversed the religious revolution of Constantine and attempted to restore paganism throughout the Empire; but his reign did not last long enough to make this really effective. He issued a coin depicting “his image and superscription”, on the reverse side of which was a bull, symbol of pagan worship—Publishers.

These prayers had been partially replied to in the salutary events of the Julian Revolution, A.D. 361–’3. The angel Incense-Bearer had taken fire from the Golden Altar, and cast it from his censer into the earth; and there were in consequence, “voices, thunderings and lightnings, and an earthquake” (Apoc. 8:5). The time had now arrived to answer their prayers more fully in the breaking of the power of the catholic oppressor in Africa, by the events of the Second Wind Trumpet. For details, see Vol. 2, p. 53. The instrument of this great and righteous retribution was the world-wide renowned and terrible GENSERIC, whose invasion of Africa, A.D. 439, was favored and prompted by the impolitic persecution of the Donatists. The king of the Vandals, though a catholic, was an enemy of the Trinitarian communion. He presented himself to the Donatists as a powerful deliverer from whom they might reasonably expect the repeal of the odious and oppressive edicts of the Dragon-emperors. Having wrested the province from the hands of the Romans, he ministered “food” and “nourishment” to the woman in protecting her seed, and giving them liberty and peace.

“But the wounds”, says Mosheim, “which this sect had received from the vigorous execution of the imperial laws, were so deep, that though it began to revive and multiply by the assistance of the Vandals, it could never regain its former strength and lustre.” They continued to enjoy the sweets of freedom as long as the Vandals reigned in Africa. These formidable barbarians were the Deity’s messengers of wrath to punish the Trinitarian Catholics of the African Wing for the serpent ferocity with which they tormented his faithful witnesses. The scene, however, was greatly changed when the empire of the Vandals was overturned by the forces of Justinian, A.D. 534. Then, now nearly 1335 years ago, the African Wing was re-annexed to the body of the Great Eagle, and the Donatist section of the Witnesses was brought into contact and collision again with the “Dragon, the old Serpent.” They still continued a separate body, and not only retained their testimony, but toward the conclusion of the sixth century, and particularly from A.D. 591, defended their principles with renewed vigor, and were bold enough to proclaim the gospel publicly in the ears of the Homoousian Serpents themselves. Gregory, bishop of Rome, opposed these efforts with all the spirit and assiduity of the Antichrist, and tried various methods of putting them down; or, as Mosheim expresses it, “of depressing this faction which was pluming its wings anew, and aiming at the revival of those lamentable divisions which it had formerly excited in the church.” From this time, however, they do not appear to have attracted the notice of ecclesiastics. The early subjection of Africa to the Mohammedans, will account for this. The mission of the Witnesses was not against Mohammedanism; but against Homoousian Blasphemy. When this was eradicated by the Saracens, the witnessing of the woman’s seed was no longer required in Africa. As the Vandals favored Homoiousianism, which was the creed of Genseric, it is highly probable that they were from this time confounded with the Arians. The names of Arians and Manichæans, although originally employed to designate sectaries of the class the apostle terms “false teachers privily bringing in damnable heresies” (2 Peter 2:1), they were afterwards used by the ignorant and malicious to distinguish the inhabitants of the mountains and valleys of the other wing of the Great Eagle, in after times known by the general terms Albigenses and Waldenses. In fact, all who repudiated the Bishop of Rome after he had been created a god by the Dragon-power, as the Antichrist, were denounced as Manichæans, though they held nothing in common with those semi-pagans. Odious names imposed upon “heretics,” so called, by catholic doctors and councils rarely expressed the truth concerning them. It is the Serpent’s policy to call good things which are obnoxious to him and his sect by bad names. To bestow names expressive of the reality would be to speak the truth; and the highest authority has declared “that there is no truth in him” (John 8:44). Not being ignorant of this device, we are not to be hoodwinked by the foul names and hard speeches bestowed upon alleged “heretics” by popes, inquisitors, monks and doctors of “the church.” These all being ignorant of what constitutes a saint, are more likely to style him an Arian or Manichæan, or by any other name that prejudice or malice may invent, than by one that truly and Scripturally represents him. “The saints of the Highest Ones” have been denounced as “heretics” by the ruling faction ever since the woman fled into the wilderness; and will doubtless continue to be until the times of the down-treading-of the Holy City shall be fulfilled.

Thus, then, while the eleventh chapter exhibits the sackcloth-witnessing of the woman’s seed “before the god of the earth” for the truth of “the God of heaven” in the Alpine Wing of the Great Eagle (verses 4–13); this twelfth chapter, verses 14–17, represents her obedient and faithful remnant and protectors at war with the Serpent and Dragon of Constantinople and Rome, in the African Wing more especially, and before the Bishop of Rome was developed by the authority of the Constantinopolitan Serpent into the Supreme Pontiff of Antichristendom, apocalyptically styled “the god of the earth; and by Daniel, “a foreign god, a god of guardians, acknowledged by the king who does according to his will; a god whom his pagan ancestors did not know.” The twelfth chapter concludes at the epoch in which history loses all trace of a people, whose testimony against the superstition by law established kept the African Wing of the Catholic Empire in an excited and tumultuous condition to the great annoyance of all privileged bishops, priests, and deacons, who sought peace and comfort in high places for three hundred years. This brings us down to A.D. 612; or about five years after the Dragon had confirmed the gift of all heretics into the hand of the Bishop of Rome, who had been “acknowledged” by Justinian as a god over all the spiritual affairs of his empire, A.D. 533.

When the witnessing remnant had accomplished its mission against the Apostasy in Africa, the power of their oppressor, the Catholic Church, was broken there by the Saracens, as predicted in Apoc. 9:1–11. “The common granary of Rome and mankind” as the fertile and highly cultivated province is styled by Gibbon, was appropriated by the followers of Mohammed, who have possessed it, (Algiers excepted, and since A.D. 1830 occupied by the French) from Tangier to Tripoli, unto this day. Thus had been blotted out from the arena of their power and glory, the people who had become “drunk with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the witnesses of Jesus” (Apoc. 17:6); a fate richly deserved, and one which awaits the same class of superstitious savages in all of the other wing and body of the Great Eagle.

But the reader is not to suppose that the ferocity of the Catholic Dragon was confined to the seven fertile and populous provinces of the African Wing. All dissentients who protested against the imperial superstition in other provinces suffered as well as the Donatists. I have already referred to the case of the Novatians in Paphlagonia. By whatever name reproached, “the Serpent cast water, like a flood, out of his mouth after” them all. They were cast down, but not destroyed; persecuted and tormented in every way, yet not exterminated; for, says Mosheim, in speaking of “the heresies” of the 9th century, “the sects that had sprung up in the early ages of the church subsisted still with little change in their situation or circumstances;” and it may be added, that the saints of the Holy City and the witnesses of Jesus against the Laodicean Catholic Apostasy, have always existed under names imposed upon them, and holding views falsely attributed to them, by the malignity of their enemies, to the present day.

27. The Woe

The song of victory acclaimed by the privileged adherents of the MAN-CHILD OF SIN, in which they are made to ascribe their triumph over “the Great Fiery-Red Dragon” of Pagan Rome, not to themselves, but to the self-sacrificing devotion of their brethren, and to the faithfulness of their testimony even unto death; this epinikion, as it is styled by some, is contained, as we have seen, in the tenth, eleventh, and first clause of the twelfth verse of this chapter. The whole of the twelfth verse does not belong to the song. This verse should have begun at the word “Woe!”. The address to “the inhabitants of the earth and sea” is continuous of the subject of the ninth verse, and in place would read thus: “the Dragon was cast out INTO THE EARTH, and his angels were cast out with him. WOE to the inhabitants OF THE EARTH and sea! for the DIABOLOS is come down unto you having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time. And when the Dragon saw that he was cast INTO THE EARTH, he persecuted the woman which brought forth the Man-Child”—Verses 12–13.

It is evident from this connection, that the casting out of the Dragon into the earth, and the beginning of the “woe” to the earth, were synchronous, or contemporaneous events. Though cast out of the heaven, he still retained power as the Diabolos to persecute the woman. He had lost position in the heaven. The Supreme Dragon-power and authority was located apocalyptically upon the “Seven Mountains,” the area of the “Seven Heads”—ch. 17:9, 10. To be excluded from the exercise of dominion in ROME, the Queen City, over Italy and the African Wing of the Great Eagle, was to be cast out of the heaven; but this might obtain without the entire deprivation of authority and power. “The earth and sea,” or all the Roman Habitable not included in Italy and Africa, still remained to be governed by emperors enthroned in other capitals. To lose authority in Rome, but yet to retain it in the earth and sea habitable, was to fall from the one “into” the other.

This was the fate of the Pagan-Roman Power, the subject of the prophecy. As we have seen elsewhere, it was “cast down” from supreme authority, and “cast out” from the “Seven Mountains into the earth,” when Maxentius was dethroned and superseded in the government by Constantine, A.D. 312. But the dominion of the idols was not thereby abolished: the situation, or relative position of parties, had only been changed. The imperial ascendancy of the idols had been destroyed in Italy, Africa, Spain, Gaul and Britain; but they were still sovereign in the lower, or less dignified and important countries of Illyricum, Dacia, Macedonia, Thrace, Grecia, Asia Minor, Armenia, Syria, and Egypt. Of these countries, Illyricum, comprehending the region south and west of the Danube, north of Macedonia, north-east of the Adriatic, and north of Lombardy and Venetia; DACIA, including Hungary and the region between the lower Danube and the Balkan Mountains; GREECE, MACEDONIA, and THRACE; these constituted “the inhabitants of the earth”: while Asia Minor, Egypt, Syria, and the East, were occupied by “the inhabitants of the sea.” Before the idols lost their ascendancy, all these countries were ruled by the great political firm “Dragon Serpent, Diabolos and Satan.” But these partners in iniquity quarrelled, though all brethren of the same church. Dragon and Serpent lost caste, having fallen deeply into debt with nothing to pay. Their creditors therefore pronounced against them: and caused two other parties of the same name (and as after experience proved, of characters no less iniquitous) to take their place in the establishment. It was now “a house divided against itself,” consisting of Catholic and Pagan parties in the State—Dragon and Serpent catholic; and Diabolos and Satan zealous worshippers of the gods of their ancestors. The situation being thus changed, the administration of affairs was changed also. DIABOLOS was allowed to retain the direction and supervision of things spiritual and temporal in “the earth and sea,” while the catholic members of the firm rejoiced in the greater dignity and authority of the Italian Heaven.

But DIABOLOS saw clearly that this arrangement could not stand. He not only knew that the house of the kingdom was divided against itself; but that such a house must fall. The administrative elements were too incompatible to work in harmony together; for, though essentially there is no difference between Catholicism and Paganism, yet the intense lust of the former for universal empire would inevitably bring on a collision that would ultimate in the destruction of the weaker of the firm. Diabolos therefore knew that “he had but a short time.” He was determined, then, to make the most of his present opportunities, and to pour out the “great wrath” of idol worship upon the sympathizers with Dragon and Serpent, the catholic partners of the West, whom he might find among his subjects of “the earth and sea.”

DIABOLOS represented the interests of “the Great Fiery-Red Dragon” in “the earth and sea” after his supersession by the Man-Child of Sin upon the “Seven Mountains.” His principal agents after the fall of Maxentius, were Maximin and Licinius; the former the ruler of “the sea,” and the latter, of “the earth,” as already defined. The “short time” Providentially allotted to him to exhaust his “great wrath” upon the woman-inhabiters of the earth and sea, was a period of twenty years from A.D. 312 to A.D. 324. This great wrath constituted the “WOE” upon them; and consisted in the persecution of Maximin, “the most implacable enemy” of anti-pagans; his war with Licinius; the persecution of Licinius; and Licinius’ war with Constantine, when he led the forces of “the earth and sea” in the great and final conflict between the Michael and the Dragon—verses 7, 8.

Thus, the great wrath of Diabolos expended itself in the complete bankruptcy of the old concern. But this house had been so long established, that it was deemed expedient to continue it under the ancient style of “Dragon, Old Serpent, Diabolos, and Satan,” the essential difference between the old house and the new being, that the former did business in the interest of Jupiter and the Idols; while the sharp practice of the latter is in the name of an imaginary Peter and fictitious saints. The foundations of the two houses are the same. They are based solely in the flesh and the speculations of the fleshly mind so that their normal condition is “enmity against Deity,” and hatred of those who “keep his commandments, and hold the testimony of the anointed Jesus.”

28. Other Remnants of the Woman’s Seed

The Novatian remnant was numerous in most parts of the Great Roman Empire until towards the end of the sixth century. After this their name is not found in the history of the times. This arose from the fact of other leaders appearing to direct the witnessing of the woman's seed against traditions and superstitions more recently introduced by the Catholic Satan. Laxity of discipline, which was protested against by Novatianus, had caused the division of Anti-pagans into two distinct bodies, A.D. 251, or thereabouts. The majority styled themselves Catholics; the others, NOVATIANS, and Puritans. Some sixty or seventy years after, these received an accession of strength and numbers by the secession from the Catholics of multitudes, who were opposed to professors being ordained bishops, who surrendered the Holy Scriptures to be burned as the condition of personal safety in the Diocletian persecution; and who were also opposed to the incorporation of the church with the Roman State. These at the end of the sixth century were no longer the leading questions of the day. All the Woman's witnessing seed, whether called Novatian or Donatists, were united in judgment concerning them; but there were other topics that now came to demand more especial attention, in the witnessing for which other names than Novatians and Donatus strongly attracted the notice of mankind.

The tyranny and arrogance of Catholic bishops had become insufferable. Their oppressiveness created what might be styled the episcopal question; or the inquiry, Does the New Testament make any difference, in order or degree, between Presbyters and Bishops? The difference was generally admitted in the fourth century; but is without the least sanction in the apostolic writings. This was the earnest conviction of a presbyter named Ærius, whom Mosheim depreciates by nicknaming him "a Semi-Arian." He says, that in the latter part of the fourth century, "He erected a new sect, and excited divisions throughout Armenia, Pontus, and Cappadocia, by propagating opinions different from those that were commonly received. One of his principal tenets was, that bishops were not distinguished from presbyters by any Divine right; and that according to the institution of the New Testament, their offices and authority were absolutely the same" Had this tenet been received and maintained by the Catholic church, the world could never have been afflicted by the blasting presence of the Roman Pontiffs. "How far Ærius pursued this opinion, through its natural consequences, is not certainly known; but we know with the utmost certainty, that it was highly agreeable to many good Christians, who were no longer able to bear the tyranny and arrogance of the bishops of this century."

"There were other things in which Ærius differed from the common notions of the time: he condemned prayers for the dead, stated fasts, the celebration of Easter, and other rites of that nature, in which the multitude erroneously imagine that the life and soul of religion consists. His great purpose seems to have been that of reducing Christianity to its primitive simplicity. This was a great and noble enterprise, and places the Ærians, as those who associated themselves with Ærius were styled, in the apocalyptic category of "the remnants of the woman's seed."

But the Novatian and Donatista remnants were not only reinforced by the Ærians; their strength and influence were augmented in the middle of the seventh century by the Paulicians. It was about A.D. 653, that a new sect arose in the Roman East, upon which this name was bestowed. There resided in the city of Mananalis, in Armenia, a person of the class to whom the gospel is preached, the obscure, whose name was Constantine. One day a stranger called upon him, who had been a prisoner among the Saracens in Syria, and having obtained his release, was returning home through this city. He was kindly received by Constantine, and for some days entertained at his house. The stranger had been a deacon of a church. In return for the hospitality he had received, he presented Constantine with two manuscripts; one of the "four gospels;" the other, of Paul's epistles. Constantine studied them as they deserved to be; and when he came to understand them, he would touch no other books; and commenced to teach the doctrines of Christ and his apostle to the Gentiles. He threw away his Manichæan library, exploded and rejected many popular absurdities; and led his countrymen to abandon their former teachers whom they had most venerated; and opened an effective battery upon the superstitions of the catholic church and its hierarchy.

The history of the Paulicians is traceable only through the writings of their adversaries. The account given of their origin is derived from Peter the Sicilian, who was sent by Basil the Great to the Paulicians in Armenia, A.D. 870, to negotiate with them an exchange of prisoners. The following extract from Gibbon will show the special abominations against which they faithfully testified in their character of a remnant of the woman's seed. "Against the gradual innovations of discipline and doctrine," says he, "they were as strongly guarded by habit and aversion as by the silence of the Apostle Paul and the evangelists. The objects which had been transformed by the magic of superstition, appeared to the eyes of the Paulicians in their genuine and naked colors. They reasoned that an image made with hands was the common workmanship of a mortal artist, to whose skill alone the wood and canvas must be indebted for their merit and value;—that miraculous relics were a heap of bones and ashes, destitute of life or virtue, or of any relation, perhaps, with the person to whom they were ascribed;—that the true and vivifying cross was a piece of sound or rotten timber;—the body and blood of Christ, a loaf of bread and a cup of wine, the gifts of nature and the symbols of grace. The Mother of God, in the creed of the Paulicians, was degraded from her celestial honors and immaculate virginity; and the saints and angels were no longer solicited to exercise the laborious office of mediation in heaven and ministry upon earth."

"The Paulician teachers were distinguished only by their (assumed) Scriptural names, by the modest title of fellow-pilgrims, by the austerity of their lives, their zealous knowledge, and the credit of some extraordinary gifts of the Holy Spirit. But they were incapable of desiring, or at least obtaining, the wealth and honors of the catholic prelacy; such antichristian pride they bitterly censured; and even the rank of elders or presbyters was condemned as an institution of the Jewish Synagogue."

By the labors of Constantine, who added Sylvanus to his name, numerous disciples were made and collected into societies; and "the remnant," in a little time, was diffused over the provinces of Asia Minor and the region westward of the Euphrates. Ecclesias were constituted, as much upon the plan and model of the apostolic ecclesias as it was in their power to form them. Six of their principal congregations were designated by the names of those to which the Apostle Paul addressed his epistles; and their pastors adopted Scriptural names, as Titus, Timothy, Sylvanus, Tychicus, and so forth. "This innocent allegory," says Gibbon, "revived the memory and examples of the first ages." Their endeavour was to bring their contemporaries back to the original simplicity of Christian faith and practice. In this good and laudable enterprise Constantine Sylvanus spent twenty-seven years of his life with considerable success. The Catholic Dragon was greatly alarmed at the defections caused by his labors; and at the formidable proportions into which "the remnant" was being developed. After the ancient method of dealing with heretics, he proceeded to "cast out water like a flood" to sweep them away. He began to persecute the Paulicians with the most sanguinary severity; and the bloody scenes of the Great Fiery-Red Dragon miniætered by Galerius and Maximin were repeated under catholic names and forms. "To their excellent deeds," says the bigoted Peter of Sicily, "the divine and orthodox emperors added this virtue, that they ordered the Montanists and Manichæans (as he falsely styled the Paulicians) to be capitally punished, and their books, wherever found, to be committed to the flames; and further, that if any person was found to have secreted them, he was to be put to death, and his goods confiscated." "What more," asks Mr. Gibbon, "could bigotry and persecution desire?"

In the outpouring of the flood, a Greek official named Simeon, armed with legal and military powers, appeared at Colonia to strike the shepherd, and to reclaim, if possible, the lost sheep of Satan's flock. By a refinement of cruelty, this monster of vengeance planted Constantine Sylvanus before a line of his disciples, who were commanded, as the price of their pardon, and a proof of their repentance, to stone him to death. But they nobly refused to imbue their hands in his blood. Only one apostate named Justus, but styled by the wretched catholics, a new David, could be found boldly to overthrow the Goliath of heresy. This Judas again deceived and betrayed his unsuspecting brethren; and as many as were ascertained and could be collected, were massed together into an immense pile, and by order of Justinian the Second, whose native cruelty was stimulated by the piety of superstition, consumed to ashes.

But Simeon, the officer, who had breathed out threatenings and slaughters against them, struck with astonishment at their valor, in the face of such cruel torments, like another Paul, became a preacher of the faith he once destroyed. He renounced his honors and fortune, and three years afterwards became the successor of Constantine Sylvanus, and at last sealed his witnessing for the anointed Jesus against the apostasy with his blood.

But though they did not fear to die for the faith, “the Paulicians,” says Gibbon, “were not ambitious of martyrdom; but in a calamitous period of one hundred and fifty years, their patience sustained whatever zeal could inflict. From the blood and ashes of the first victims, a succession of teachers and congregations arose.” The great instrument of their multiplication was the New Testament, as illustrated in the following example related by Peter of Sicily. A young man named Sergius, conversing one day with an aged woman, of the Paulician Remnant, was thus addressed by her:—“I hear, Sir, that you excel in literature and erudition, and are besides, in every respect a good man: tell me, then, why do you not read the sacred gospels?” He answered, Nobis profanis ista legere non licet, sed sacerdotibus duntaxat—“it is not lawful for us the profane to read them, but for the priests only.” “Not so,” she replied; “there is no respect of persons with God; he wills that all men should be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth; but your priests, because they adulterate the word of God, do not read all to you.” She then repeated to him various portions of the holy Scriptures. After hearing them, he took the gospels, examined them for himself, and became a Paulician. Sergius was an important acquisition to the remnant. For thirty-four years he devoted himself to the ministry of the word; or to give it in his own words, “From the east to the west, and from the north to the south, have I been proclaiming the good news of salvation, and laboring on my knees.” And this he did with such success that the catholic clergy of Rome and Constantinople considered him to be the forerunner of Antichrist; and declared that he was producing the great apostasy foretold by the Apostle Paul! Peter of Sicily pronounced him “the wolf in sheep’s clothing, the Devil’s chiefest champion, the crafty dissembler of virtue (that is, an accomplished hypocrite), the enemy of the cross of Christ, a blasphemer, the hater of Christ, the mother of harlots;” “all which epithets,” says Turner, “have only one meaning, namely, that he taught with great effect.” The Paulician Remnant of the Woman’s Seed were harassed by the ferocity of the Catholic Dragon for a long period. Michael the first, and Leo the Armenian, were foremost in the race of persecution; “but,” says Gibbon, “the prize must doubtless be adjudged to the sanguinary devotion of Theodora, who restored the images to the oriental church. Her inquisitors explored the cities and mountains of the Lesser Asia, and the flatterers of the empress have affirmed that, in a short reign, one hundred thousand Paulicians were extirpated by the sword, the gibbet, or the flames!”

29. The Earth Again Runs to the Woman’s Help

“The most furious and desperate of rebels,” says Gibbon, “are the sectaries of a religion long persecuted, and at length provoked. In a holy cause they are no longer susceptible of fear or remorse; the justice of their arms hardens them against the feelings of humanity; and they revenge their father’s wrongs on the children of their tyrants.” Such were the Circumcellions of Africa, the peasants of Paphlagonia, and such in the ninth century were the popular sympathizers with the Paulicians of Armenia and the adjacent provinces. History styles these sympathizers Paulicians; but history is written by men who are ignorant of the principles of the doctrine of Christ, and are the enemies of “the remnants of the woman’s seed, who keep the commandments of the Deity, and hold the testimony of Jesus the anointed.” These are neither fanatics, nor furious and desperate rebels; neither are they hardened against the feelings of humanity, nor do they seek to avenge themselves; for this they are strictly forbidden to do by Him who says, “vengeance is mine; I will repay”. The furious and desperate fanatics, steeled against the Divine law and the feelings of humanity, are the serpents, the generation of vipers, in place or power, “the spirituals of the wickedness in the heavenlies,” who counsel and execute the sanguinary ferocity of the Dragon and the Beast. Providence has graciously and mercifully arranged that these insatiable shedders of the blood of His saints shall be fiercely antagonized by the indignant hatred of tyranny, and the love of civil and religious liberty, common to the Scripturally enlightened of mankind; for men may have light enough to discern the folly, and hypocrisy, and diabolism, incorporated in Church and State, and yet be very far from an intelligent belief of “the truth as it is in Jesus” by which alone they can be saved.

Of this earthly class were the “Paulicians,” so called, who revolted and warred against the Constantinopolitan Catholic Dragon, A.D. 845–880. They were the militant Paulicians of the pike and gun, stirred up to deeds of blood and valor by the cruel torments of the clergy, in defence of the spiritual and real disciples of the apostle Paul, whose only fight was “the good fight of faith.” This thirty-five years of Paulician warfare with the Dragon was “the earth running with help to the woman, and opening her mouth to swallow up the flood cast out of the Dragon’s Mouth.” They were first awakened to inflict death upon a governor and a bishop, who lent themselves to execute the imperial mandate for the conversion and destruction of “heretics.” A more dangerous and consuming flame was kindled by Theodora’s persecution, and the revolt of Carbeas, a valiant sympathizer, who commanded the imperial guards of the General of the East. His father had been skinned alive by the Catholic Inquisitors. This horrible cruelty determined him to abandon the service of the Dragon. Five thousand sympathizers joined him in renouncing their allegiance to anti-christian Rome, and in forming an alliance against her with the Saracen “Commander of the Faithful.” “During more than thirty years,” says Gibbon, “Asia was afflicted by the calamities of foreign and domestic war; in their hostile inroads the disciples of St. Paul were joined with those of Mohammed; and the peaceful christians, the aged parent and tender virgin (the besotted catholics) who were delivered into barbarous servitude, might justly accuse the intolerant spirit of their sovereign. So urgent was the mischief, so intolerable the shame, that Michael was compelled to march in person against the Paulicians: he was defeated under the walls of Samosata: and the Roman emperor fled before the heretics whom his mother Theodora had condemned to the flames.” The valor and ambition of Chrysocheir, successor to Carbeas, embraced a wider circle of rapine and revenge. In alliance with his faithful anti-catholic Moslems, he boldly penetrated into the heart of Asia Minor. These were the times of the Moslem Woe, in which the catholics were “tormented with the torment of a scorpion when he striketh a man.” “The men who had the seal of Deity in their foreheads,” the Paulicians, were “not hurt” by it; but, as we see, were defended by the Moslem Locusts, who, as the sword of Deity, avenged them upon “the shaven crowns” whose skulls they cleft without mercy. “In those days they sought death (or the political extinction of the State, which would relieve them of those tormenting inroads), but they found it not; and they desired to die, but the death fled from them” (Apoc. 9:4–6). The Dragon legions were repeatedly overthrown, and his edicts of persecution were responded to by the pillage of Nice and Nicomedia, of Ancyra, and Ephesus, whose cathedral was turned into a stable for mules and horses; and the Paulician sympathizers vied with the Saracens in evincing their contempt and abhorrence of the idols and relics of catholic superstition.

This was a righteous retribution encouraging to behold. Truly, as Gibbon remarks, “it is not unpleasing to observe the triumph of rebellion over the same despotism which has disdained the prayers of an injured people.” The dragon was reduced to sue for peace, to offer ransom for catholic captives, and to request, in the language of moderation and charity, that Chrysocheir would spare his fellow-christians, and content himself with a royal donation of gold and silver and silk garments. “If the emperor,” replied the Paulician defender, “be desirous of peace, let him abdicate the East, and reign without molestation in the West. If he refuse, the servants of the Lord will precipitate him from his throne.” But the time for the fall of the Eastern Roman Empire had not yet arrived. The emperor Basil the Macedonian accepted Chrysocheir’s defiance, and led his army into “the land of heresy,” which he wasted with fire and sword.

With the death of Chrysocheir the power of the Paulicians’ defenders declined. About the middle of the eighth century, Constantine Copronymus had transplanted many of the Paulicians from the Euphrates to Constantinople and Thrace; and by this emigration their doctrine was introduced and diffused in Europe. The Paulicians of Thrace struck their roots deeply into this foreign soil, where they resisted the storms of persecution, maintained a secret correspondence with their Armenian brethren, and gave aid and comfort to their preachers, who labored, not without success, among the Bulgarians. They were restored and multiplied by a more powerful colony of Paulicians transplanted A.D. 970, by John Zimisce, from Armenia to Thrace. Their exile to this country was softened by a free toleration. They held the city of Philippopolis, and the keys of Thrace; the catholics were their subjects; they occupied a line of villages and castles in Macedonia and Epirus; “and many native Bulgarians,” says Gibbon, “were associated to the communion of arms and heresy.” As long as these Thraco-Bulgarian Circumcellions, “the Earth,” were awed by power and treated with moderation, they were distinguished in the Dragon armies as volunteers; and the courage of these “dogs ever greedy of war and thirsty of human blood,” is noticed with astonishment, and almost with reproach, by the pusillanimous Greeks. The same spirit rendered them arrogant and contumacious; they were easily provoked by caprice or injury; and their privileges were often violated by the faithless bigotry of the Dragon-government and clergy. The emperor Alexius Comnenus undertook to proselyte them to the reigning superstition. Those of their leaders who were contumacious were secured in a dungeon, or banished; but their lives were spared by the prudence, rather than the mercy, of the emperor, at whose command a poor and solitary heretic was burnt alive before the cathedral of St. Sophia.

But the proud hope of eradicating the faith and testimony of the remnant was speedily overturned by “the invincible zeal of the Paulicians,” who ceased to dissemble, or refused to obey. After the death of Alexius, they soon resumed their civil and religious laws. In the beginning of the thirteenth century their head-quarters were on the confines of Bulgaria, Croatia, and Dalmatia, with which filial relations were maintained by the Paulician congregations of France and Italy. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries they found great favor and success in these countries, which Gibbon says, “must be imputed to the strong, though secret, discontent which armed the most pious christians (catholics) against the Church of Rome,” now in the seventh century of its legal supremacy over all the spiritual affairs of the Great Roman Eagle. “Her avarice,” he continues, “was oppressive, her despotism odious; less degenerate, perhaps, than the Greeks in the worship of saints and images, her innovations were more rapid and scandalous: she had rigorously defined and imposed the doctrine of transubstantiation; the lives of the Latin clergy were more corrupt, and the eastern bishops might pass for the successors of the apostles, if they were compared with the lordly prelates, who wielded by turns the crosier, the sceptre, and the sword.”

Under the Constantinopolitan standard, the Paulicians were often transported to the Greek provinces of Italy and Sicily: in peace and war they and their sympathizers of “the earth,” who were confounded with them under the same name, freely conversed with strangers and natives, and their views were silently propagated in Rome, Milan, and the newly-arisen Ten-Horn kingdoms of the Beast beyond the Alps. It was soon discovered, that many thousand catholics of every rank, and of either sex, had embraced the “heresy” of Paul; and the flames that consumed twelve cathedral priests of Orleans was the first act and signal of persecution in the West. “They spared their branches,” says Gibbon, “over the face of Europe.” United in common hatred of idolatry and Rome; they were connected by an ecclesiastical organization of over-seers and presbyteries, usually styled elders and pastors. The French called them “Bulgarians” by way of reproach, meaning thereby “unnatural sinners”. Their catholic enemies also falsely styled them Manichæans, and charged them with contempt of the Old Testament, and the denial of the body of Christ, either on the cross or in the bread and wine. They repudiated the catholic dogmas connected with the cross and eucharist; but they took both bread and wine, discerning by “the testimony of the anointed Jesus which they held,” the representation therein of his broken body and blood, shed for remission of the sins of the many (Matt. 26:28). “A confession of simple worship and blameless manners,” says Gibbon, “is extorted from their enemies; and so high was their standard of perfection, that the increasing congregations were divided into two classes of disciples, of those, who practised, and those who aspired. It was in the country of the Albigeois, in the southern provinces of France, that the Paulicians were most deeply implanted; and the same vicissitudes of massacre and uprising of “the Earth” which had been displayed in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates, were repeated in the thirteenth century on the banks of the Rhone. The laws of the Constantinopolitan Dragon and Serpent were revived by Frederick the Second, the reigning emperor of the Two-Horned Beast of the Earth, which “spake as a Dragon” (Apoc. 13:11). The barons and cities of Languedoc were “the earth that ran with help for the Woman: and Pope Innocent the Third surpassed the sanguinary and murderous renown of the ferocious Theodora. It was in cruelty alone that her soldiers could equal the Crusaders; and the cruelty of her priests was far excelled by the founders of the Inquisition. The visible assemblies of the Albigensian Paulicians were extirpated with fire and sword; and “the bleeding remnant” escaped by flight, concealment, or conformity to the hated superstition of the destroyer. But the invincible spirit which they had kindled still lived and breathed in the western world. A latent succession was preserved of “the disciples of St. Paul,” who protested against the tyranny of Rome, and embraced the Bible as the rule of faith.

Thus, I have briefly tracked “the remnants of the woman’s seed,” under the names of Novatians, Donatists, Ærians, Paulicians and Albigenses, through a long and sanguinary period of sack-cloth-witnessing of a thousand years, against the Apostasy as by law established in “the two Wings of the Great Eagle.” In this weary and heart-rending journey, we have visited the Roman Africa, Armenia, Asia Minor, Thrace, Bulgaria, and working our way up the Danube, crossed the Alps into Italy and France. But how changed is the constitution of “the Great Eagle” at the close of this Millennium of Blood! When the remnants of the Woman’s seed began their anti-catholic witnessing in the African Wing, the great eagle was subject only to “the Dragon the old Serpent,” enthroned in Constantinople. Then there was no Pope of Rome; no Ten-Horned Beast of the Sea; no Two-Horned Beast of the Earth; nor any Image of the Beast. Then, the simple inquiry was, “Who is like the Dragon? who is able to make war with him?” for in those days they all “worshipped the Dragon,” in all the length and breadth of the Roman world. But now, in the twelfth century, we stand in the Alpine regions of France and Italy as witnesses “before the god of the earth” (Apoc. 11:4); a god unknown to the Dragon in the epoch of the woman’s flight, A.D. 315–345, and his pagan predecessors, in whose times he was but the simple OVERSEER of an ecclesia in Rome. But, ere this century, he had long become a god by the grace and power of the Dragon, who had bestowed upon him “his power, and his throne, and great authority” (Apoc. 13:2). And besides this, in surveying the subjacent landscape from the Alpine heights, we see the Beast of the Earth and the Beast of the Sea intensely catholic and hostile to “the commandments of the Deity and the testimony of the anointed Jesus”. Whence came these dominions? They are the results of the outpouring of the Divine wrath upon the Dragon, in retribution of his catholic worship of daimonia and idols, and of the murders, sorceries, fornications and thefts of his clergy (Apoc. 9:20, 21); in other words, they are the results of the sounding of the wind-trumpets in answer to the prayers of “the remnants of the woman’s seed,” which, as “much incense,” ascended, through their Golden Intercessor, before the throne (Apoc. 8:3, 4).

But, while we have been making this millennial tour through the Wings of the Great Eagle, has it been all peace and spiritual tranquility in the interior regions? No; from time to time, reformers started up amidst the catholics themselves; and, as pioneers, prepared the ground for more advanced believers to cultivate and sow with the incorruptible seed. Of these pioneers was Claude, Catholic bishop of Turin, appointed to that See by Charlemagne. He was in high repute for his knowledge of the Scriptures and his first-rate talents as a preacher; in consequence of which, says the Abbe Fleury, “the French monarch being apprised of the deplorable state of darkness in which a great part of Italy was involved in reference to the doctrines of the gospel, and anxious to provide the churches of Piedmont with a teacher who might counteract the growing rage for image-worship, appointed Claude to the See of Turin, about A.D. 817.” Though he died the catholic bishop of Turin, he is regarded as the spiritual father of the “meek confessors of Piedmont,” who seceded from the catholic church, and became for many centuries a remnant of the woman’s seed. Claude continued his zealous anti-Romish labors until A.D. 839, by which time the valleys of Piedmont were filled with his disciples; and, says Jones, “While a night of awful darkness sat brooding on almost every other part of Europe, the inhabitants of Piedmont preserved the gospel among them in its native simplicity, and rejoiced in the healing beams of the Sun of righteousness”.

In the tenth century, that is, from A.D. 900 to A.D. 1000, there were thirty occupants of “St. Peter’s Chair.” When describing this period Mosheim says: “The history of the Roman pontiffs who lived in this century, is the history of so many monsters and not of men, and exhibits a horrible series of the most flagitious, tremendous and complicated crimes, as all writers, even those of the Romish communion, unanimously confess”. In this dismal period, the clergy was, for the most part, composed of a most worthless set of men, shamefully illiterate and stupid; ignorant, more especially in religious matters; equally enslaved to sensuality and superstition, and capable of the most abominable and flagitious deeds.

To stem this torrent of corruption, there appeared in the south of France, in the province of Languedoc and Provence, one Peter de Bruys, about A.D. 1110. He was the founder of the Petrobrusians. His labors were successful. He taught that “the ordinance of baptism should be administered only to adults; that it was a piece of idle superstition to build and dedicate churches to the service of God, who, in worship, has peculiar respect to the state of the heart, and who cannot be worshipped with temples made with hands; that crucifixes are objects of superstition, and ought to be destroyed; that in the Lord’s Supper the real body and blood of Christ were not partaken by the communicants, but only represented in the way of symbol or figure; and, lastly, that the oblations, prayers and good works of the living, can in no way be beneficial to the dead”.

A few years after the decease of Peter de Bruys, an Italian by birth, generally styled Henry of Toulouse, arose to bear witness against the corruptions of the time. He declaimed with fervid vehemence against the vices of the clergy and the superstitions they invented. He rejected the baptism of infants; treated the festivals and ceremonies of the catholic church with the utmost contempt, and held clandestine assemblies, in which he explained and inculcated the doctrine he set forth.

Contemporary with Henry, and eight years his survivor, was Arnold of Brescia, who from A.D. 1147 to 1155, bearded the papal lion in his den. He was inferior to Peter de Bruys and Henry, neither in fortitude nor zeal, while in learning and talent he excelled them both. The zeal of this daring reformer was first directed against the wealth and luxury of the Romish clergy. He charged upon them most of the corruptions that disgraced religion, and called upon them to renounce their usurped possessions, and to lead a frugal and abstemious life on the voluntary contributions of the people. The inhabitants of Brescia revered him as the apostle of religious liberty, and rose in rebellion against their accredited bishop. Driven by persecution from place to place, he determined on the desperate experiment of fixing the standard of revolt in the very heart of Rome.

He was the Garibaldi of the twelfth century. For a time he found protectors among the nobility and gentry. He harangued the populace with his usual fervor, and inspired them with such a regard for their civil and ecclesiastical rights, that a complete revolution was effected in the city. The papal Pontifex Maximus struggled in vain against this invasion of his power, and at last sunk under the pressure of calamity. His successors, Celestine and Lucius, were unable to check the popular frenzy. The leaders of the insurrection waited upon Licius, demanded the restitution of the civil rights which had been usurped from the people, and insisted that he and the clergy should trust only for their stipends to the pious offerings of the faithful, as at the beginning. The pope survived this astounding demand only a few days, when he was succeeded by Eugenius III., who, dreading the mutinous spirit of the inhabitants, withdrew from Rome, and was "consecrated" in a neighboring fortress.

Arnold, who had withdrawn from Rome during this extraordinary insurrection, hearing of the escape of the newly-elected pope, repaired once more to the city, and animated with fresh vigor the energies of the populace. He called to their remembrance the achievements of their ancestors, and painted in the strongest colors the sufferings which sprung from ecclesiastical tyranny. He charged them never to admit the pontiff within their walls till they had prescribed the limits of his spiritual jurisdiction, and fixed the civil government in their own hands. The passions of the populace were aroused by these harangues; and, headed by the disaffected nobles, they attacked the cardinals and other ecclesiastics, set fire to the palaces, and compelled the inhabitants to swear allegiance to the new constitution.

The excesses of this ungovernable mob, "the Earth," stirred up all the wrath of "the successor of St. Peter;" who, placing himself at the head of his troops, marched against the city, into which he was admitted after making some trifling concessions. The friends of Arnold were nevertheless still numerous, and for ten or a dozen years they "shut the heaven," or continued to agitate the city. It was not till A.D. 1154, that anything like a settled peace was established. The presence of Arnold and his witnessing brethren in the very face, as it were of "the god of the earth" was the cause of all this tumult. For it was their mission to agitate the waters, and "to shut the heaven, that it rain not in their days of the prophecy; and to turn the waters into blood, and to smite the earth with all plagues as often as they willed" (Apoc. 11:6). But at this date, a riot having ensued, Adrian IV. placed the city under an interdict, and from Christmas to Easter deprived it of all catholic worship. This gave a sudden turn to the public mind. Arnold and his friends were expelled from the city, and fled for protection to the Viscount of Campania. Thither the vengeance of the pope pursued them, and he instigated Frederick Barbarossa to force Arnold from his asylum in his territories. Immediately after this he was seized by Cardinal Gerard and burned at the stake, in the midst of the fickle populace, who gazed with stupid indifference on the bold and valiant champion who had fallen in defence of their dearest rights, and whom they had regarded with the highest veneration.

"We may truly say," says Dr. Allix, "that scarcely any man was ever so torn and defamed on account of his doctrine as was this Arnold of Brescia. It was because, with all his power, he opposed the tyranny and usurpation which the popes began to establish over the temporal jurisdiction of the kings of the earth. He was the man who by his counsel renewed the design of re-establishing the authority of the Senate of Rome, and of compelling the pope not to meddle with anything but what concerned the government of the church, without invading the temporal jurisdiction; this was his crime, and this, indeed, is such a one as is unpardonable with the pope, if there be any such".

Though Arnold, like Garibaldi, was a zealous anti-papist, there is no proof of his belonging to “the Holy City;” but much presumptive evidence that he did not. He was a strenuous advocate of civil and religious liberty, and heretical according to the catholic standard of orthodoxy. But he might be all this, and yet not a christian of the New Testament type. However, he was enlightened enough to impugn the dogma of transubstantiation, and to deny that baptism should be administered to infants. And this alone in catholic judgment was sufficient ground for his condemnation.

The memory of Arnold was long and fondly cherished by his countrymen, and his tragical end occasioned murmurs both loud and deep. His murder was regarded as the act of the Bishop of Rome and his clergy. Arnold’s friends, who were numerous, separated themselves from communion with the pope’s church, and by the name of Arnoldists long continued to bear their testimony against its numerous abominations, as another of “the remnants of the woman’s seed”.

A multitude of converts in all the southern provinces of France, and the states of Italy, resulted from the able and faithful labors of these three men. When it became aware of it, the Court of Rome became alarmed, and resorted to torture and destruction for the suppression and extermination of them, as heretics that troubled the church, or “tormented them that dwelt upon the earth” (Apoc. 11:10). “It made war upon them,” and ultimately “overcame them, and killed them” (v. 7; 13:7); for what was deemed a good and sufficient reason, namely, their tormenting testimony, styled by the catholic destroyer, “HERESY.” The following extract from Venema’s Ecclesiastical History will serve to show in what their heresy consisted:

“The chief articles of their heresy,” says he, “were the following:

1. That the Holy Scriptures were the only source of faith and religion, without regard to the authority of the fathers and tradition; and although they principally used the New Testament, yet, as Usher proves from Reinier and others, they regarded the Old also as canonical scripture. From their greater use of the New Testament, however, their adversaries took occasion to charge them with despising the Old.
2. They held the entire faith, according to all the articles of the apostles’ creed.
3. They rejected all the external rites of the dominant church, except baptism and the Lord’s Supper; such as temples, vestures, images, crosses, the religious worship of holy relics, and the remaining sacraments, confirmation, penance, holy orders, matrimony, and extreme unction; “these they considered as inventions of Satan and the flesh, and full of superstition.
4. They rejected purgatory, with masses and prayers for the dead, acknowledging only two terminations of the present state—heaven and hell; but in what sense of these terms, Venema says not.
5. They admitted no indulgences, nor confessions of sin, with any of their consequences, except mutual confessions of the faithful for instruction and consolation.
6. They held the sacraments of baptism and the eucharist only as signs, denying the corporeal presence of Christ in the eucharist, as we find in the book of this sect concerning Antichrist, and as Ebrard of Bethunia accuses them in his book against heresies.
7. They held only three ecclesiastical orders—bishops, priests or presbyters, and deacons—and that the remainder were human figments: that monasticism or monkery was a putrid carcase, and was the invention of men; and that the marriage of the clergy was lawful and necessary.
8. Finally, they asserted the Roman Church to be the Whore of Babylon; and denied obedience to the pope or bishops, and that the pope had any authority over other churches, or the power of either the civil or ecclesiastical sword”.

Towards the end of the twelfth century heresy of this sort grew apace; for a new impulse was given to it by the labors of another enterprising witness against Rome, named PETER WALDO of Lyons. He was an opulent merchant, whose attention was drawn to the Holy Scriptures, which he was able to read for himself in the Latin Vulgate, the only edition of the Bible at that time in Europe. From the Scriptures alone he obtained the knowledge of the way of salvation; and being enlightened in this, he began to teach it to his neighbors. He felt the necessity of their having the word in their own tongue; he therefore, rendered the four testimonies for Jesus into French. This accomplished, he proceeded to expound their contents. Reinerius Saccho, a Romish Inquisitor, says of him, that "being somewhat learned, he taught the people the text of the New Testament in their mother tongue". "His kindness to the poor," says one of the Magdeburgh Centuriators, "being diffused, his love of teaching, and their love of learning, grew stronger and stronger, so that great crowds came to him, to whom he explained the scriptures. He was himself a man of learning; nor was he obliged to employ others to translate for him, as his enemies affirm." Be this as it may, the inhabitants of Europe were indebted to him for the first translation of the Bible into a modern tongue since the time that the Latin had ceased to be a living language—a gift of inestimable value to all who spoke French.

Animated with an enlightened zeal, he repudiated all the dogmas, rites, and ceremonies of human invention; and lifted up his voice like a trumpet against the arrogance of the pope and the reigning vices of the clergy. In short, he seems to have taught the truth in its simplicity, while he exhibited in his own example its excellency, and labored most assiduously to demonstrate the difference between the teaching of the New Testament and that of the blasphemous clergy of the Latin church. These proceedings of Waldo were reported to the Archbishop of Lyons, who became very indignant. He forbade Peter to teach any more on pain of excommunication, and of being proceeded against as a heretic. But Waldo belonging to a remnant of the woman's seed, was not to be silenced by archiepiscopal authority. He replied, that though a layman, he could not be silent in a matter which concerned his fellow-creatures. Attempts were presently made to apprehend him, but without success: so that he lived concealed in Lyons for a space of three whole years. At the end of these, pope Alexander III. hearing of his doings, anathematized both him and his adherents. The shepherd and his flock were therefore scattered abroad, and like the faithful in Jerusalem on the death of Stephen, "went everywhere preaching the word" (Acts 8:4). Waldo retired into Dauphine, where he preached with great success. Persecuted from place to place, he next retired into Picardy. Driven from thence, he proceeded into Germany, carrying along with him "the testimony of the anointed Jesus." He at length settled in Bohemia, about A.D. 1184, where he continued witnessing until death.

His followers were chiefly called "Leonists," after the city of Lyons, where he commenced his labors: they were also frequently designated "the Poor of Lyons". Numbers of his disciples fled for an asylum into the Valleys of Piedmont, taking with them the new translation of the Scriptures. In this country they mingled with the Paulicians and other witnesses against Romish superstition previously existing there, and were afterwards known by the name of "Waldenses," or Vaudois: they also diffused themselves over the South of France, where they became known as "Albigenses;" for it is the same class of witnesses styled by these different names, according to the different countries, or districts of the same country in which they appeared. In Alsace and along the Rhine, the doctrines of Waldo spread extensively. Persecution followed in their wake. Thirty-five citizens of Mentz were consumed to ashes by the papists in one fire in the city of Bingen, and eighteen in Mentz itself. The bishops of Mentz and Strasburgh breathed nothing but vengeance and slaughter against them; and at Strasburgh, where Waldo himself is said to have narrowly escaped, eight persons were committed to the flames. Multitudes died praising God, and in the confident hope of resurrection to eternal life. The blood of the witnesses became the seed of a new generation of faithful ones; and in Bulgaria, Croatia, Dalmatia, and Hungary, societies were established which flourished throughout the thirteenth century.

It is not surprising that the great and rapid increase of the witnesses should stimulate the Court of Rome to great activity against them. Their testimony was tormenting; and it is not in human nature to endure torment without seeking relief. Rome had but one remedy, and that was persecution to the ruin of body and estate. Councils were held in continual succession, and persecuting edicts issued to check the growing evil, though with little or no effect.

The following is an extract from the fourth canon of the council of Tours, held A.D. 1163. Evidently referring to the Albigensian Remnant, it thus proceeds:

“In the country about Toulouse, there sprang up long ago a damnable heresy, which, by little and little, like a cancer, spreading itself to the neighbouring places of Gascony, hath already infected many other provinces; which whilst, like a serpent, it hid itself in its own windings and twistings, crept on more secretly, and threatened more danger to the simple and unwary; wherefore we do command all bishops and priests dwelling in these parts, to keep a watchful eye upon these heretics; and under the pain of excommunication, to forbid all persons, as soon as these heretics are discovered, from presuming to afford them any abode in their country, or to lend them any assistance, or to entertain any commerce with them in buying or selling; that so at least, by the loss of the advantages of human society, they may be compelled to repent of the error of their life. And if any prince, making himself partaker of their iniquity, shall endeavor to oppose these decrees, let him be struck with the same anathema. And if they shall be seized by any catholic princes, and cast into prison, let them be punished with confiscation of all their goods. And because they frequently come together from divers parts into one hiding place, and because they have no other ground for their dwelling together save only their agreement and consent in error—therefore we will that such their conventicles be both diligently searched after, and, when they are found, that they be examined according to canonical severity”.

But, while power was on the side of the oppressor, the Deity had also given power to His witnesses (Apoc. 11:3). This made their sackcloth-witnessing singularly effective, as is very plain from the following extract of a letter from the Archbishop of Narbonne to Louis VII., king of France: “My Lord the King,” says he, “We are extremely pressed with many calamities; amongst which there is one that most of all affects us, which is, that the catholic faith is extremely shaken in this our diocese; and St. Peter’s boat is so violently tossed by the waves that it is in great danger of sinking”!

The god of the Roman earth was exceedingly incensed at this stormy buffeting of his bark. In A.D. 1181, Lucius, the third pope of that name, fulminated his decree against them, in which he said, “We declare all Catharists, Paterines, and those who call themselves ‘the Poor of Lyons,’ etc., to lie under a perpetual anathema!” All who presume to buy and sell without authority from the Roman image (Apoc. 13:17)—all who held or taught opinions concerning baptism, the Lord’s Supper, remission of sins, marriage, or any of the sacraments of the church, differing from what the holy church of Rome doth teach and observe—are to be judged heretics, and anthematized. The refusal to take an oath is to be deemed a proof of heresy, and treated accordingly; and all the afore-mentioned were to be delivered up to the secular power for punishment, and their goods confiscated to the use of the church. The clergy are enjoined to make vigilant search after all such heretics, and to call to their aid all earls, barons, governors, and consuls of cities, and other places, to execute the ecclesiastical and imperial statutes concerning these matters; and any city that refused to yield obedience to these “decretal constitutions” was to be excluded from all commerce with other cities, and deprived of the episcopal dignity. These intolerant proceedings, directed chiefly against the witnessing remnants of the woman’s seed in the south of France, drove multitudes of them into and across the Pyrenees, into Spain; in consequence of which, Ildefonsus, king of Aragon, published an edict, A.D. 1194, charging and commanding all the “Waldenses, Insabbati, who are otherwise called ‘the Poor of Lyons,’ and all other heretics, who cannot be numbered, being excommunicated from the Holy Church, adversaries to the cross of Christ, violaters and corrupters of the Christian religion, to depart out of our kingdom, and all our dominions.” Moreover, “whosoever from that day forward, should presume to receive the Waldenses, Insabbati, or any other heretics, of whatsoever profession, into their houses, or be present at their pernicious sermons, or afford them meat or any other favor, should incur the indignation of Almighty God, as well as that of his majesty—have his goods confiscated, without the remedy of an appeal, and be punished as if he were actually guilty of high treason!” Such was the state of matters at the end of the twelfth century; and it may serve to make the reader’s mind more appreciative to the appalling scenes of slaughter and carnage inflicted upon the woman’s seed in the war upon them by “the Beast that ascendeth out of the abyss” (Apoc. 11:7). Summary of Chapter 13

The Apostle John, standing upon the Sand of the Sea, beholds a Beast ascending out of the sea, even that beast he alluded to in Ch. 11:7, as the destroyer of the Witnesses. Like the Dragon, it had Seven Heads and Ten Horns; and its power, throne, and great authority, it acquired from the Dragon. Thus it divided the Habitable with the Dragon; so that the inhabitants thereof worship the Dragon and the Beast. Upon the Seven Heads he saw a Name of Blasphemy, to which was given a Mouth like a Lion, with which he gave utterance to the great things and blasphemies he conceived. He sees them in continuance forty and two months, in the course of which long period they make war upon the saints and at length overcome them.

After the ascending of this beast from the sea, John beholds another beast ascending out of the earth, having Two Horns and speaking as a Dragon. After his ascent, he sees this beast in contemporaneous existence with the other; and of like constitution with the wounded head of the Ten-Horned Beast. John also sees an IMAGE of the Wounded Head, which the Two-Horned Beast caused to be set up; and to which all on the earth of every degree were subjected. The Name of the Beast symbolically revealed.

Translation

Apoc. 13

1. And I stood upon the Sand of the Sea, and I saw ascending out of the Sea a Beast, having Seven Heads and Ten Horns: and upon his horns Ten Diadems, and upon his heads a NAME OF BLASPHEMY.

2. And the beast which I saw was like to a Leopard, and his feet as of a Bear, and his Mouth as the mouth of a Lion: and the Dragon yielded to him his power and his throne, and extensive authority.

3. And I saw one of his heads as if wounded to death: and the plague of his death was healed; and there was wondering in the whole earth after the beast. 4. And they worshipped the Dragon which yielded dominion to the Beast; and they worshipped the Beast, saying, Who is like to the Beast? Who is able to make war with him?

5. And there was given to him a MOUTH speaking great things and blasphemies; and there was granted to him license to practise. Forty-Two Months. 6. And he opened his mouth in blasphemy concerning the Deity, to have blasphemed his NAME, and his Tabernacle, and those who tabernacle in the heaven.

7. And it was given to him to make war with the Holy Ones, and to overcome them: and there was given to him dominion over every tribe and tongue and nation. 8. And all the dwellers upon the earth shall worship him, of whom there hath not been written the names before the foundation of the world, in the book of the Life of the Lamb that hath been slain.

9. If any one have an ear, let him hear. 10. If any gathereth together a captivity, into captivity he goes away; if any shall kill with the sword, it behoves that he be killed with the sword. Here is the patience and faith of the saints.

11. And I saw another Beast ascending out of the Earth; and he had Two Horns like to a Lamb, and he spake as a Dragon. 12. And all the dominion of the former beast he exerciseth in his sight: and he causeth the earth, and the dwellers therein, that they worship the former beast whose plague of his death was healed.

13. And he performs great signs, so that he even causeth fire to descend out of the heaven into the earth in sight of the men. 14. And he deceiveth the dwellers upon the earth through the signs which it was given to him to perform in the sight of the beast, commanding the dwellers upon the earth to make an IMAGE to the beast which hath the plague of the sword, and lived.

15. And it was given to him to give spirit to the image of the beast, that the image of the beast might both speak and practise, that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed.

16. And he causeth all, the small and the great, and the rich and the poor, and the free and the bond, that there should be given to them a mark upon their right hand, or upon their foreheads; 17. and that no one be able to buy or to sell, but he having the mark, or the Name of the Beast, or the Number of his Name.

18. Here is wisdom. Let him that hath the understanding, count the Number of the Beast: for it is a Man's Number, and his number is Six Hundred and Sixty-six.

I. Beast of the Sea

1. Preliminary Remarks

In the first year of Belshazzar, the prophet Daniel saw in a vision of the night, Four Beasts. The first resembled a Lion; the second, a Bear; the third, a Leopard; but the fourth was like nothing seen among beasts. "It was diverse from all the beasts that were before it," which signifies, according to the interpretation given in Ch. 7:23, "diverse from all kingdoms."

The vision was communicated to him with special reference to this incongruous fourth beast. It had a head, and upon his head Eleven Horns, and claws of brass, and teeth of iron. Daniel saw it arise in a stormy period out of the Great Sea; and he perceived that it continued until the Ancient of Days came, when, judgment having been given to the Holy Ones, or Saints of the Most High Ones, they destroyed it with fire and sword.

This simple statement of facts identifies the Fourth Beast of Daniel with the Scarlet-colored Beast of John in Apoc. 17:3, 11. The light shed upon the subject in these texts, reveals that the head seen by Daniel was the Sixto-Octavian, or the last; and gives us to understand what was concealed from the prophet, that the nameless beast he saw had Eight Heads. John's Scarlet Beast "goeth into perdition." Daniel saw this consummation; and John saw the perdition inflicted by the same agents—by the Lamb, and his called and chosen, and faithful companions—the Saints (Ch. 17:14).

Now, a beast with an eighth head and ten horns, contemporary with the advent of the Ancient of Days, implies its previous existence, either under seven heads coevally extant, or under seven heads successively existing. The revelator disposes of this alternative by telling John that five of the heads had fallen, that the sixth was in being in his day, and that the seventh had not then as yet come. Hence this succession of heads, and development of horns upon the imperial head, implies the subjection of the Fourth Beast to successive revolutionary changes. Daniel saw one revolution connected with its horns, in which an Eleventh Horn, with Eyes and Mouth, came up upon the head after the ten horns, of which it rooted up three; but in regard to the head he saw nothing.

"I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots: and, behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things" (Dan. 7:8)—the Papacy in power.

Thus there is a great lack of particulars in Daniel's vision, which the Deity "reserved in his own power," as not important to be made known at that time. He gave Daniel a general outline of "the matter," in symbol and its description; but he deferred the details, or a more particular representation, until he should give them to "the Son of Man" in actual manifestation. When the Son had received them of the Father, he sent his messenger and signified them to John in Patmos. Among the signs exhibited were the Great Fiery-Red Dragon, the Catholic Dragon, the Beast of the Sea, the Name of Blasphemy, the Beast of the Earth, the Image of the Beast, and the Woman-Bearing Scarlet-Beast. All these apocalyptic signs are contained in Daniel's Fourth Beast. They are a symbolical analysis of this beast, which they exhibit in its chronological, geographical, and constitutional relations at different periods of its long and eventful, or its "dreadful and terrible," career.

Thus, Daniel's Fourth Beast commences its career with the Foundation of Rome, B.C. 753, and does not finish it until after the advent of Christ and the resurrection, of which long period 2,621 years are now in the past. It was predestined to "devour the whole earth, and to tread it down, and to break it in pieces" (Dan. 7:23). This is the extent of what is styled in Apoc. 16:14, "the earth and the whole habitable"—its territorial dominion in its amplest extent; and comprehending the countries represented by the dynastic sovereignties of the gold, the silver, the brass, the iron, and the clay, of Nebuchadnezzar's Image. This is the whole earth, and exhibits the reason why Britain, France, and Russia, elements of Daniel's Fourth Beast, have been so much occupied of late in China, Cochin-China, India, Mexico, Algiers, and Central Asia. These countries added to Europe, Turkey, and America, are "the whole earth" subdued to the authority of the Fourth Beast.

But, besides Daniel's Four Beasts, and their appendages, the prophet saw a class of people, for whose sake all things consist (2 Cor. 4:15). These he styles, "the Saints of the Most High Ones." They are the Seed of the Woman, against which the Fourth Beast in many centuries of his career, would have great and deadly "enmity;" for all the elements of said beast are "the Serpent" and his seed; or, in the words of Christ, "the Devil and his angels" (Matt. 25:41; Gen. 3:15). He was to make war upon them, and to prevail against them till the end of "a time, times, and the dividing of a time," when the Ancient of Days would come, and join them in the execution of judgment unto the utter and complete destruction of their enemy.

Now this, in the estimation of Deity, is an all important matter; and all worthy of ample illustration for the support and strengthening of "the faith and patience" of the sufferers in so long and sanguinary a conflict with the beast. Hence the signs apocalyptically exhibited to John. This one, especially, which he calls attention to as "the Beast ascending out of the Sea;" for, like Daniel's beast, it makes war upon them, and overcomes them; yea, and kills their allies, the witnesses (Apoc. 11:7; 13:7): but then, there is hope in their end. For, as this great sea monster "gathereth them into a captivity and killeth them with the sword"—fills his prisons with them and puts them to death; so the serpent-seed he represents are to receive measure for measure, heaped up and shaken down; or, as Daniel expresseth it, "he shall be slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame." "Here is the patience and faith of the Saints."

But the saints were not to be scattered over "the whole earth," or fourth-beast habitable in its amplest signification; but, for two distinct, and partly parallel periods of 1260 years, to be fed and nourished in the Two Wings of the Great Eagle. Because of the Serpent's relations to them in the wilderness, or Court of the Gentiles, in their long antagonism, it was deemed necessary for the illustration of the times, to exhibit the Fourth Beast analytically. And this is the analysis with reference to him in his conflicts with the saints. The Fourth Beast made war upon them from the crucifixion of the Captain of their salvation, until A.D. 324. Daniel did not see this war in his vision; but John saw it; and predicted that the saints would come out of the conflict victorious. This victory we have seen celebrated in the twelfth chapter, tenth and eleventh verses. In this relation the fourth beast appears as "the Great Fiery-Red Dragon." While this constitution of power obtained, its jurisdiction extended over "the whole habitable," but not over "the whole earth," as when the Ancient of Days comes. Had this particular been revealed to Daniel, it might have been in these words, "And the Great Fiery-Red Dragon made war upon the Saints; but the Saints overcame him, and cast him out of the heaven." But the Spirit condescended to be more specific; and instead of this brief and summary statement, represented the stages of the conflict ultimating in that result, in the prophetic symbols of the first six seals.

But the Fourth Beast, though vanquished in this war of two hundred and ninety-one years, was not subdued: for afterwards, as we have seen, he put on a new uniform, and in all the sanctimonials of Laodiceanism, "he went away to make war with the Remnants of the Woman's Seed." He was the Fourth Beast in catholic uniform; and although he inflicted great cruelties upon the saints, he did not overcome them, nor have they as yet conquered him.

But Daniel saw the saints conquered by the Fourth Beast. That is true in part. He saw them conquered by a horn of the fourth beast, styled “a Little Horn that had eyes, like the eyes of a man, and a Mouth that spake very great things, whose look was more stout than his fellows.” This Little-Horn power subdued them, and prevails against them until the Ancient of Days come. Representative of this prevalence, we have the symbols of this thirteenth chapter. The Beast of the Sea, like the Catholic Dragon, who, since the cession of his throne, has assumed the uniform of Mohammed, is the enemy of the saints; and for the very obvious reason, that the Mouth of the Sea-Monster is the veritable Mouth of Daniel’s Little Horn whose “very great things” John characterizes as “blasphemy concerning the Deity to have blasphemed his Name, and his tabernacle, and those tabernacled in the heaven.” And for the same reason the Beast of the Earth is their enemy; for the Speaking Image he sets up is the embodiment of the same Mouth which commands all to be killed Who will not worship it. This command brings it into collision with the Saints, who worship no power but the Deity in manifestation. Hence war ensues between them and the beasts. This is the war Daniel saw; and both he and John testify that the Saints were prevailed against; while John goes further and explains the prevalence by saying their allies, the Two Witnesses, were killed.

In this thirteenth chapter, we have presented to us Daniel’s Fourth Beast under the analytic symbols of the Dragon, the Beast of the Sea, the Beast of the Earth, and the Image of the Beast. The throne of the Dragon was Rome, so long as the Roman Senate existed there, and the Seven Heads of the Dragon were incomplete. But when this throne was “yielded,” and the Roman Senate expired, the throne of the Dragon was confined to Constantinople exclusively. The jurisdiction the Dragon-Power was able to reserve extended over all the habitable Eastward, of a line following the Rhine up to its point of nearest proximity to the source of the Danube, that is, half way between Strasburg and Basle; thence down the Danube to Belgrade; and thence southwardly to Dyrrachium, now called Durazzo, and across the Adriatic and Mediterranean to the Syrtis Major and the great Desert of Africa. All to the eastward of this line was the Constantinopolitan Dragon, or Greek division of the Great Roman Eagle, and comprehended MÆSIA, or Bosnia, Servia, and Bulgaria: THRACE, or Roumelia; Macedonia, Greece, ASIA MINOR, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Syria, and Egypt. This was a great diminution of the original Dragon dominion; still it was ample, and sovereign over rich and fertile regions.

The Beast of the Sea divided the Roman habitable with the Catholic Dragon of the East. They are the two limbs of Nebuchadnezzar’s Image. The dominion of this Sea Monster was, as John predicted, “extensive”. It ruled all the habitable to the Westward of said line, including France, Spain, the Roman Africa, Italy, and the region between the Alps and the Rhine, Danube, and Save, anciently known under the names of Rhætia, Noricum, and Pannonia, but in our times as Switzerland, half Suabia, Bavaria, and Austria and the western part of Hungary. In this outline I have not included England, Scotland, and Ireland, for reasons which need not be mentioned in this place.

The beast, which John styles “another Beast,” and which he says “ascended out of the earth,” came up among the Horns of the Sea Beast, and after they had made their appearance (Dan. 7:8, 24). The Beast of the Earth was to be “diverse” from the Beast of the Sea, and to subdue three of its horns. These three horn-territories were so much of the Dragon Fourth Beast habitable taken from the Beast of the Sea; and conferred upon it the Roman characteristic. A map of Central Europe will exhibit the Beast of the Earth with sufficient accuracy. Its acquisition of ROME conferred upon it the quality of holiness in the estimation of its worshippers; so that by them it came to be styled “THE HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE.” It comprehended Italy, Austria, Bavaria, Hungary, and Germany to the North and Baltic seas. Its secular throne, in the beginning, was at AIX-LA CHAPELLE, but afterwards at VIENNA; and its spiritual seat in ROME. The Beast of the Earth is an extension of Daniel’s Fourth Beast northwards, through the forests of Germany, in which the Romans of the old world could never effect a permanent settlement.

The Beast of the Sea emerged after the collapse of the Western Empire in 475 A.D. It was superseded by the Holy Roman Empire, or Beast of the earth in 800. The Dragon represented the military power of eastern Rome centred in Constantinople which fell to the Turkish Power in 1453.

As, then, the moon hath her different phases, called new, half, gibbous, and full, nevertheless the same moon; so also Daniel's Fourth Beast hath his phases, which are different constitutional manifestations, yet the beast remains the same to the end of his "dreadful and terrible" career. He has nearly passed through his Sea-Beast and Earth-Beast phases; that is, in certain relations: but there yet awaits him a vast extension, and a constitutional development of thirty years duration which will be final. In this future and last phase of his existence, he will stand before the nations in his most dreadful and terrible aspect, scarlet of body with sin and blood, with his SIXTO-OCTAVIAN HEAD diademed with Ten Horns, and a Drunken Harlot sitting upon his back. Thus panoplied with the Mystery of Iniquity in Church and State, he will have consummated the mission revealed to Daniel, in the full discharge of which, he was to "devour the whole earth, and tread it down, and break, it in pieces." Having accomplished this, "he goeth into perdition," where in the popular abyss, he is bound for a thousand years (Apoc. 17:11; 20:1-3).

2. The Prophetic Stand-Point of the Vision

Daniel reclined upon his bed and dreamed; but John stood upon the Sand of the Sea, and saw things bearing resemblances to what he deemed sufficiently striking to establish their identity. Daniel says that it was stormy in his vision; or, as he expresses it, "the four winds of the heaven strove." But in this thirteenth chapter John says nothing about a strife of winds; but simply "I stood." I take it therefore that there is a sense in which John's standing is equivalent to storminess of the situation. Any one who has stood upon the sea shore, especially if rocky, will know that the situation is not characterized by silence, or the absence of noise. On the contrary, the roar of the waters is incessant. If the sea were quiescent as a pond, then to stand upon its beach would be to experience the silence and solitude of the boundless prairie. Such a standing for observation of phenomena would be symbolical of times of tranquillity and peace. But this could not be the nature of John's standing; for no such politico-ecclesiastical organizations could ascend into a position to command, or rather, to divide the command of, the world in halcyon days undisturbed by the storms of war and conquest. His standing then upon the margin of the roaring waters was significant of the storminess of the times, when what he "saw" should ascend to dominion "in the whole earth," en hole te ge. He stood, and the roar he heard was "the multitude of many peoples, making a noise like the noise of the seas; the rushing of nations, making a rushing like the rushing of mighty waters." Such a roaring of the waters implies a tumult of the sea from the strife of words. This implication places John and Daniel side by side as spectators of the storm. Daniel saw the four winds lashing the sea into fury; east, west, north, and south winds, all blowing upon the same sea. No ship could live in such a storm.

Each of Daniel's four beasts, or dominions, was brought up out of the sea by the four winds of his vision. The Fourth Beast was brought up thereby; and so was his Sea-Beast development; and John apocalyptically beheld the same four winds as he "stood upon the Sand of the Sea, and saw." This leads me to remark as to the time of his standing. He stood there while the Four Winds continued the storm.

The winds producing the roar of the sea, were “the four winds of the earth,” which, in their blowing, gave voice to the first four trumpets, which in my Tabular Analysis, Vol. 2 p. 114, are styled, “Wind Trumpets.” And from this tabular exposition I would transfer the “note” in Vol. 2 pg. 115, as appropriate to the place. It reads thus: “The judgments of these four winds culminate in the development of the Seventh Head, which ‘continues a short space’; and of the Ten Diademed Horns of the Beast that rises out of the sea; in the ‘wounding as it were to death’ of its Sixth Head; and in the consequent cession by the Dragon of his power, throne and dominion over the affected Third Part, which before the blowing of those winds, was a constituent of his empire”. The time of this stormy period is indicated on p. 115 of that volume, as “from A.D. 395 to A.D. 554–’59, the epoch, or beginning, of the darkened day and night in the third of them, being equal to a period of 159–’64 years.” The reader will please compare what is written here concerning the “time of events,” and correct what he finds on p. 115 under this caption, by this erratum.

Now the time represented by John’s standing on the sand, was all the time of the sounding of the four wind-trumpets, to the end of the darkened day and night in their third part. This was a long period; but defined by the work done as revealed in this chapter. It was a period of 405 years. This was the time of his symbolic standing upon the Sand of the Sea, beholding the development of the Fourth Beast, in its Seventh Head, Ten Horns, and Little Horn, with Man’s Eyes and a Lion’s Mouth. The four hundred and five years are composed of 164, from the beginning of the first trumpet to the darkening of Rome’s day in the epoch of the Pragmatic Sanction, or settlement of Italian affairs, by Justinian, A.D. 554–’9. “Under the Exarchs of Ravenna,” says Gibbon, “Rome was degraded to the second rank.” Rome had hitherto been imperial or regal, under the Sixth and Seventh Heads of the Dragon; but she was now, as the consequence of the blowing of the four wind-trumpets, neither the one nor the other; but a city which had “reigned over the kings of the earth” (Apoc. 17:18), now degraded to a rank in which she exercised no sovereignty at all. She was therefore now in a state of eclipse both in respect of the luminaries of her day and night; for “the day shone not for a third part of it, and the night likewise” (Apoc. 8:8, 12). The reader will please connect, by reference, what I am now writing with what appears in Vol. 3 pp. 68–75. The phrase “the third part of the day,” and “the third part of the night,” implies a whole day, and a whole night, each equal to the third part three times repeated. With the Jews, a day and a night were each twelve hours long; so that “a third part of” a day would be four hours; and “a third part of” a night, also four hours; in all eight hours. Now there is a certain class of Laodicean speculators in apocalyptic mysteries, who style themselves “Literalists,” and who would have us to believe that day and night signify nothing more than what is ordinarily meant by these terms! So that they would reduce us to the absurdity of believing, that the events of the four trumpets culminated in the darkening of the natural sun, moon, stars, day and night, for the short period of only eight literal hours! But this folly is too ridiculous for an argument against it, or for a serious refutation. The “day” and the “night” must be proportional to the subject treated of. The subject is the obscuration of the luminaries of a political universe—of a dominion. These are things of centuries. Their day and their night, is their day-time and their night-time of ages. Hence a time is a minor cycle contained in the aeon, or æon, of their duration. The æon of the Sea-Monster’s Mouth is three cycles and a half, or three times and a half, or three days and a half, or 1260 years and as a cycle, or circle, is geometrically divisible into three hundred and sixty equal parts. A time or day, is a year of years, or 360 lunar years. Rome’s lights which ruled her day and night times were not eclipsed for a whole day and a whole night: but only for a third of each of these times. Had she lost her rule for a whole day and a whole night, her ruling would have been suppressed for seven hundred and twenty years, or a dual of times: but as it was, her day-time and her night-time only ceased shining two hundred and forty years, which are the sum of the thirds predicted; for the third of a daytime of three hundred and sixty years is one hundred and twenty years: and the third of a nighttime of three hundred and sixty years; is also one hundred and twenty years; and these two periods of one hundred and twenty years each added together give two hundred and forty years. Now if these 240 years be added to A.D. 559, the epoch of Rome's degradation, it gives the sum A.D. 799; when, if my exposition of the symbolic time of the Fourth Trumpet be correct, history ought to testify Rome's restoration to the IMPERIAL DIGNITY from which she had been degraded by the will of the Catholic Dragon. Now John informs us, that he stood and saw the ascending of the Sea-Beast and the ascending of the Earth-Beast: this then was the period of his standing—he stood while they were ascending. The latter Beast was developed imperially, with Rome for its tempo-spiritual throne, A.D. 799. Hence John's standing upon the Sand of the Sea reaches, in its significance, to this date, or to the end of the 240 years. Add then these years to the terminal epoch of the fourth trumpet, and we have a period of 405 years—a stormy period, which changed the face of the world; and laid the foundation of a polity, which, after a lapse of more than a thousand years, is manifest in the existing constitution of MODERN EUROPE.

3. The Sand of the Sea

But John in his symbolic standing “stood upon the Sand of the Sea”. There must be some meaning in this standing upon the sand. In the tenth chapter the “mighty angel” stands upon the earth and sea; and in the fifteenth, John's brethren, and John himself, therefore, are seen standing upon the transparent sea, no longer mingled with fire; evincing that they had gotten the victory over the Ten Horned Beast, and the Image of the Sixth Head of the Beast, which had ascended out of the stormy sea while John stood upon the sand thereof. But here John stands not upon the earth to view the ascent of the Beast of the Earth; nor upon the sea to behold the ascent of the Beast of the Sea; but upon the sand of the sea to see the ascent of them both.

Jeremiah says, that the Deity placed the sand for a bound of the sea—ch. 5:22. This is true in a natural sense; when, therefore, the sand of the sea is introduced into symbolical prophetic writing, it must be taken to represent the bound, shore, or limit, of the symbolical sea. But the sand of the sea is also the similitude for a multitude of people. Thus Hosea predicts the multitude into which Israel shall be developed in the day of their glory under this figure, saying in Ch. 1:10, “the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered”: and sand also in the sense of multitude we find used apocalyptically in chapter 20:8, where the hosts of the post-millennial Gog and Magog, or Dragon released from confinement in the abyss, are compared to the Sand of the Sea.

Now John was “a man wondered at,” a man of sign, or as we say in our vernacular, a representative man; and his actions and postures, like Daniel's and Ezekiel's, were dramatic. Hence John upon the sand represented that portion of “the great multitude which no man can number” (Apoc. 7:9) existing contemporaneously with the ascending of the beasts out of the sea; and who refused to worship the Image of the Beast, and would not receive his mark, nor the number of his name (ch. 13:15; 15:2). The position they occupied in the four hundred years of the ascending of the monsters of the sea and the earth, was that of neutral observers of events; whose antipathies were against their old enemy the Catholic Dragon, who was compelled by the four wind-trumpet powers to “yield his power, throne and an extensive dominion” to the Ten Horns. The judgments of the four wind-trumpets were not sent against the servants of the Deity, sealed in their foreheads with the Father's name (chap. 7:3; 14:1) whom John represented; but upon the catholic worshippers of daimonia and idols (ch. 9:20). Hence John's multitude in the Wings, or extremities, of the Great Eagle, had the sympathy of “the barbarians” who rushed in upon the Dragon's domain to establish kingdoms for themselves. The saints and witnesses being at war with the Dragon (ch. 12:17), his enemies, “the barbarians,” would naturally be their friends; so that, while the Dragon and the barbarians were in tempestuous and stormy conflict, their multitude in the Roman Africa and the Alpine regions would hear the roar of the tempest-tossed sea, standing as it were upon the shore.

4. The Sea

In the Hebrew tongue any collection of waters is termed seas as in Gen. 1:10, "The gathering together of the waters, he called seas." The word before us in the original is thalassa, on which the lexicon says, "when Homer uses it of a particular sea, he means the Mediterranean, for he calls the outer sea Okeanos, Ocean, and holds it to be a river. Herodotus calls the Mediterranean the inside sea; and the Ocean, the outside sea; the Latins called it MARE NOSTRUM, "Our Sea" as it is geographically and apocalyptically. What Matthew in ch. 8:20, calls thalassa, Luke in ch. 8:23, terms limne, a lake, or, an inland sea.

"Many waters," says Daubuz, "upon the account of their noise, number, and disorder, and confusion of their waves, are the symbol of peoples, multitudes, nations, and tongues. The symbol is so explained in Rev. 17:15. And in Jer. 47:2, waters signify an army, or multitude of men. The comparison of the noise of a multitude to the noise of mighty or many waters, is used by Isaiah in ch. 17:12, 13, much after the same manner as Homer compares the noise of a multitude to the noise of the waves of a sea in a storm."

"SEA, clear and serene, denotes an orderly collection of people, in a quiet and peaceable state." "Sea, troubled and tumultuous, signifies a collection of men in motion and war. Either way, the waters signifying people, and the sea being a collection of waters, the sea becomes the symbol of people, gathered into one body politic, kingdom, or jurisdiction, or united in one design."

"The resemblance between the noise of an enraged sea, and the noise of an army, or multitude in commotion is obvious, and frequently taken notice of by the prophets."

Daubuz truly remarks, that "the accomplishment of a prophecy must be considered, and consequently applied according to the signification of the terms by which it is expressed. This signification is either symbolical or literal. But it happens sometimes that there are occasions in which the event appears to be suitable to both these. The first signification, if the terms are in their nature symbolical, is the principle in the intention; the second, if joined with the other, is only concurrent. If both suit the terms, the first (or symbolical) must always have the preference, as being the more noble, and worthy of the Holy Spirit's care to foretell it; and then we may give way to the latter, where it will concur. The principal event is that which answers fully to the majesty and first intention of the symbols; in which God does, as it were, speak in His own dialect, and so is always of greater extent, and more comprehensive than any other. The secondary event of a symbolical prediction is, when such an event, being also concomitant with the other, answers more nearly to the literal signification of the terms in which the symbolical prediction is expressed; and, as it were, alters the nature of the symbols, as if they were literal characters of the things meant by them. An example will set this in a clear light. The prophet Nahum predicts the overthrow of Nineveh in these words: 'with an overrunning flood he will make an utter end of the place thereof' (Ch. 1:8). An overrunning flood is the symbol of desolation by a victorious enemy. The accomplishment, however, showed the signification to be two-fold, that is, symbolical and also literal. Diodorus informs us, that in the third year of the siege, the river being swollen with continual rains overflowed part of the city, and broke down the wall for twenty furlongs; and the enemy entered the breach that the waters had made, and took the city."

According to the same principles, the Sand of the Sea, and the Sea itself may be rightly viewed in the chapter before us. The events in their accomplishment show that the signification of the Sea is both symbolical and literal. Daniel's vision of the ascendancy of the Horns plainly shows, that their manifestation was in connexion with the literal LATIN SEA, the Mediterranean. His words are, "the four winds of the heaven strove upon THE GREAT SEA." This was the name given to the Mediterranean, or Sea in the midst of the earth, by the Hebrews. He describes the four beasts that came up out of it, as four dominions: and in the interpretation, the Sea is styled the Earth; and the beasts arising out of it, are termed kings (Ver. 17, 3). Compare the symbol in verse 3, with the signification in verse 17: thus, “Four beasts came up from the sea (upon which the winds strove); diverse one from another;” and now read the explanation, “These great beasts which are four are four kings which shall arise out of the earth”. Now the fourth king was the “dreadful and terrible” one. He came up with his body, head, and horns Out of the Great Sea, in the sense of arising out of the countries by which the sea is almost enclosed as a lake. Here is a blending of the symbolical and the literal; and so, that in the interpretation, the symbolical is anchored to the literal; by which I mean, that we must not go away to the Baltic, and Atlantic, and German Oceans, to find the fourth beast and his heads and horns; but must confine our investigations to those countries which in the days of the prophecy had outlets upon the Great Sea. Now, what Daniel beheld arising out of the sea as the results of the storms of war upon it, John also saw in part from his Patmian standpoint ascending from the same sea and in the same sense. He saw the kingdoms and empires of Modern Europe so far as their origin was Mediterranean, ascending from this sea. He stood literally upon its Patmian Shore, in a numerous cluster of its islands, which were as but the sands of its coast; and from this, as the representative of a multitude occupying the wings of this sea-region, he saw kingdoms arise from the symbolic sea inhabiting the literal maritime earth enclosing the Latin Sea, of which he has presented us with a symbolical description in the chapter we have in hand.

5. The Bottomless Pit

“The Beast that ascendeth out of the Bottomless Pit”—Ch. 11:7

In the apocalypse there are the earth, the sea, the sand of the sea, the abyss, and the pit of the abyss. All these terms have their own special signification where they occur. The sea, the sand of the sea, and the abyss styled in the Common Version, “the bottomless pit,” are related to the Beast of ch. 11:7 and chapter 13:1. In the former text, it is said to ascend out of the abyss, and in the latter, out of the sea. But, though the terms expressive of the place of origin are two different ones, there are not two different beasts, but one and the same beast only. But then, why are these two different terms employed with reference to the same beast? There must be a reason for it. In elucidation of this inquiry, then, I remark in addition to what has already been written in Vol. 3. p. 85, that, though in the Septuagint and certain texts of the New Testament, abyss, or abussos, is identical with the sea and deep, yet symbolically and apocalyptically, sea and deep do not represent all that is intended to be conveyed by the word.

The Empire at its Greatest Extent.

Abussos is derived from a priv. and bussos, the depth, and therefore signifies, that which is not, or has not been, fathomed; hence, in general, boundless, exhaustless. The apocalyptic terms above recited are terms of extension. The sea and the earth of this chapter are coextensive with the Mediterranean and its countries to the Rhine, and Danube; these were a deep that had been politically bounded, or fathomed: but, what of that vast unmeasured, or boundless, region beyond? That region styled in John’s time, Germania, European and Asiatic Sarmatia, and Scythia, beyond the Rhine, the Danube, the Carpathian Mountains, the Dniester, the Black Sea, the Caucasian Mountains, and the Caspian Sea? This was a wild, unsubdued wilderness stretching along the northern frontier of the Great Roman Eagle, inhabited by swarms of fierce barbarians, whom the Romans were unable to fathom, or to bring within the appreciable depths of the earth and sea. They were an unorganized confused multitude—an abyss of which no conqueror or legislator had been able to reach the bottom.

But how changed this country of the abyss since John stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw arise out of the Latin Sea and the Earth, the Beasts of the Sea and Earth! Since then the Abyss has been fathomed, and no longer erupts its wild barbaric hordes in destructive inundations, whereby suddenly and without warning, cities and rural districts are plundered and reduced to smoking ruins. The abyss, which was “the Northern Hive” from which swarmed forth the destroying agents of the first four trumpets, sounded against the Roman Earth and Sea, is now the area of Germany from the Rhine and Danube to the Baltic, Bohemia, Poland, the Great Russian empire, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. In the times of the ascending of the Sea Beast, these were the ultramarine, abyssal fountains of the Great Sea; which, when broken up, roared forth their floods and tempests, and developed upon the Latin Habitable the Ten-Horn Kingdoms of Modern Europe. Hence the reason why the same beast is attributed to different sources. He came latent, or hidden, as it were, being as yet undeveloped, from the outlying abyssal region, when the Barbarians of the North rushed in upon the sea, and the rivers, and the fountains of waters, belonging to the Catholic Dragon: and he came up above the waters of the sea when the invading hosts of the abyss effected settlements upon the Dragon-territory, and were developed into the Ten Diademed Horns of the Beast.

But, very different to this is the speculation culled from “Horsley’s Sermon on the Descent of our Lord into Hell.” He says, “the abyss is where the wicked spirits are reserved in chains unto the great day. This abyss is situated in the central regions of the earth, and therefore is below the sea. It is therefore not impossible that in the ascent of the Beast (Rev. 13:1; 17:8) two different ideas may be combined. He might be described as arising out of the sea in reference to his secular and political resurrection; and as ascending out of the abyss, or region of condemned spirits, with relation to his spiritual removal. Moreover, even if he ascended from Hades, the sea might be the medium of his ascent; and there is a peculiar fitness in its being so represented, to denote his arising out of the commotions and struggles of the nations, the symbolical sea.”

“According to the Jews,” says Daubuz, “the abyss was a place under the earth, in the most internal parts of it, and was thought to be a great receptacle of waters as a reservatory to furnish all the springs or rivers. And this opinion was not only held by the Egyptians, Homer, and Plato, but also by some of the modern philosophers. And Seneca seems to be of the same opinion. And in this sense, the abyss symbolically signifies a hidden multitude of confused men.”

6. The Beast

“A Beast,” says Daubuz, “is the symbol of a tyrannical, usurping power or monarchy, that destroys its neighbors or subjects, and preys upon all about it, and persecutes the church of God?”

“The four beasts in Dan. 7:3, are explained in ver. 7, of four kings or kingdoms, as the word king is interpreted, ver. 23.

“In several other places of Scripture wild beasts are the symbol of tyrannical powers; as in Ezek. 34:28, and Jer. 12:9, where the beasts of the field are explained by the Targum, of the kings of the heathen and their armies.

“Among profane authors, the comparison of cruel governors to savage beasts, is obvious. And Horace calls the Roman People a many-headed beast—Lib. 1, Ep. 1 ver. 76. And as for the Oneirocritics, wild beasts are generally the symbols of enemies, whose malice and power is to be judged of in proportion to the nature and magnitude of the wild beasts they are represented by. ‘As a roaring lion and a ranging bear; so is a wicked ruler over the poor people’” (Prov. 28:15).

Upon the principle of this proverb the beasts of the apocalypse are symbolical of wicked rulers. They are “dreadful and terrible” to the choicest of mankind; for it is written, “the beast that ascendeth out of the abyss,” said the Spirit, “will make war upon my two witnesses, and will overcome them, and kill them” (Apoc. 11:7); and the same thing is affirmed of the beast of the sea in ch. 13:7, as, “and it was given unto him to make war with the Saints, and to overcome them;” but in relation to these, which he overcomes, or treads them, as the Holy City, under foot, it does not say that he kills them as he killed the witnesses. Truly, “as a roaring lion and a ranging bear,” have these apocalyptic beasts been to the poor saints and witnesses over whom they have tyrannized for ages.

The general description of this symbolized dominion is, that it has “seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten diadems, and upon his head the Name of Blasphemy.” These are few words, but they comprehend much of an interesting and important character. I shall take them in their order, and proceed to treat therefore of

7. The Seven Heads of the Beast

“The Head of a beast answers to the supreme power, and that whether the supreme power be in one single person or in many. For as the power abstractly is not considered, so neither the persons abstracted from their power; but both in concreto, make up this head politic. And, therefore, if the supreme power be in many, those many are the head, and not the less one head for consisting of many persons, no more than the body is less one body for consisting of many persons.”—Daubuz.

The Beast of the Sea has seven heads as well as the Pagan-Catholic Dragon. They are the same heads, and identify the Dragon and the Beast as apocalyptically diverse constitutional developments of the same power. The only difference of the two series of heads symbolically viewed is, that the Dragon series is diademed, while the Beast series is not. In the latter symbol the Horns, not the Heads, are diademed; but in the case of the Dragon it was the heads and not the horns. This diversity, of course, is significative of some peculiarity, and has to be explained when we come to the further consideration of the horns.

The reader will please to turn to what has been written concerning the heads of the Dragon in the previous chapter. What is found there is equally applicable to the heads of the Sea Beast, and need not, therefore, be repeated here. Leaving the heads, then, for the present, I proceed to a further exposition of the horns.

8. The Ten Diademed Horns of the Beast

“Horns are the symbols of power, exerted by strength of arms because such beasts as have horns make use of them as their arms.

“As the symbol of strength they are used in Psa. 18:2. They are also used to denote the regal power; and when they are distinguished by number, they signify so many monarchies. Thus horn signifies a monarchy in Jer. 48:25; and in Zech. 1:18, the Four Horns are the four great monarchies which had each of them subdued the Jews. See also Dan. 8:20–22.

“The Horn of David in Psa. 132:18, is explained by the Targum of a glorious king to arise out of the house of David.

“It appears from Valerius Maximus, that the ancient Romans understood horns as the symbol of regal government; and the images of the gods, kings and heroes, among the heathen, were adorned with horns as a mark of their royalty and power.

“Horns upon a wild beast are not only expressive of powers, but also of such powers as are tyrannical, ravenous and at enmity with God and his saints, as in Dan. 8”—Daubuz.

The Horns of the Sea Monster represent Ten Kingdoms established by the Barbarians of the Abyss upon all that Mediterranean territory conquered by them from the Roman Dragon. This appears from the testimony that “the Dragon yielded to him his power, and his throne, and an extensive jurisdiction”—ver. 2. In relinquishing it to the beast, he yielded them to his appendages, the horns and mouth as well.

In ch. 17:12, John was informed that the ten horns were symbolical of kingdoms: “the ten horns which thou sawest are ten kings, which have received no kingdoms as yet;” that is, they had received no kingdom at the time the interpreter was talking with John. Daniel gives the same record in ch. 7:23. He had said that he wished to know the truth represented by the ten horns upon the fourth beast’s head; upon which it was stated to him that “the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise;” and those in ver. 9, are styled “the thrones” which are to be “cast down” when the Ancient of Days comes to sit in judgment upon them. And this judgment John indicates in the words: “These (Ten Horns) shall make war upon the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them; for He is Lord of lords, and King of kings: and they that are with him (the Saints of the Holy City) are called chosen and faithful” (Apoc. 17:14).

The geographical extent of the Roman Habitable upon which the barbaric tribes of the abyss established themselves with Feudal Sovereignty, was the Mediterranean West. They have to be enumerated by the names they bore in the period when they were engaged in the work of establishing themselves upon that territory. The symbol, as we shall see, requires at least eleven abyssal tribes—ten for the horns, and one or more for the Seventh Head. The following is the list that seems to me authorized by history: 1. Huns; 2. Vandals; 3. Visigoths; 4. Burgundians; 5. Gepidæ; 6. Lombards; 7. Franks; 8. Suevi; 9. Alans; 10. Bavarians. These were the founders of the Horn-Kingdoms of the Beast. This divided form of Mediterranean Europe has continued for ages, even to the present time; though the number of its divisions has not always, nor is it now, ten. The prophecy does not require that the number of the kingdoms should be invariable. They were ten in the period of their foundation, and from this fact have acquired the symbolic designation of the Ten Horns. So that though their number might be reduced onehalf, the power that might be established over the territory they originally occupied would, to that extent, be represented as the Ten Horns.

“The emergence of the wild beast of the sea,” says Mr. Lord, “is not to be regarded as having been accomplished in a moment, or a brief space, but as having occupied such a period as would naturally be required for the invasion of the empire (of the Catholic Dragon) by many separate tribes migrating from vast distances, engaging in numerous wars, and, finally, after victory, establishing new and independent governments. Nor are the chiefs who rule them after the conquest of parts of the empire, to be considered as having assumed that relation in which they are symbolized by the horns while they remained, as in France for a long period, in subordination to Rome. They emerged from the sea as dynasties, when, by concession or victory, they became rulers of portions of the empire in independence of that power. The institutions of the horns, therefore, took place at different periods, and they were those that subsisted when the conquest of the (Western) empire was completed and the imperial power extinguished”—A.D. 476.

On the conquest of Italy and termination of imperial authority by the deposition of Augustulus by Odoacer, the Herulian Goth, A.D. 475, the barbarians of the apocalyptic abyss held possession of the whole western division of the Latin Sea, with the exception of a part of Gaul, and were distributed under ten kingly governments.

The collapse of the Western Roman Empire in 475 left the Eastern Roman Empire intact, but found Europe divided into various Individual nations. These answer to the ten horns of the beast. The numeral ten is used figuratively in Scripture in the sense of completeness, so that there is no need to seek for ten specific nationalities, but rather for a welding of existing nationalities on the territory defined in the prophecy as in the Common Market Organisation today. Though both Britain and Greece form parts of the Common Market, as the former had been separated from the Western Empire before its fall, and the latter formed part of the Eastern Roman Empire, the indications of prophecy are that both will ultimately leave the Common Market. Greece coming more directly under the domination of the Soviet.—Publishers.

1. The HUNS, erupting from the Scythian region of the Alps, crossed the Volga, the Don, the Dnieper, the Dniester, and planted themselves in the vicinity of the Danube, and, therefore, styled Hungary, A.D. 370. Under Attila, A.D. 451, they descended into Thrace, about thirty miles from Constantinople; then turning westward into Macedonia, he wheeled north into Pannonia, a part of Hungary; and thence, passing through Noricum, a part of Austria and Bavaria, crossed the Danube and the Rhine near their sources, and pursued his march through Belgium almost to the English Channel. He then crossed the Seine, and descended to the Loire, whence he turned eastward, recrossing the Seine, the Rhine and the Danube near their sources; thence he descended into Lombardy, from which, repassing through Noricum and Pannonia, he again crossed the Danube, where he died at his seat of government. This was the course of the Great Blazing Star of the third wind-trumpet, the remains of whose dominion exists in the Horn-Kingdom of Hungary.

2. The VANDALS descended from the Swedish section of the abyss, and entered Gaul, A.D. 406. They soon passed into Spain, and after occupying a part of that Mediterranean province nearly twenty years, A.D. 427, crossed into Roman Africa, wrested it from the Catholic Dragon, set up an independent kingdom under GENSERIC, and ruled it until A.D. 533. The kingdom was founded under the sounding of the second wind-trumpet, when a Great Mountain burning with fire was cast into the sea.

3. The VISIGOTHS, or Western Goths came originally from Sweden with the Ostrogoths, or Eastern Goths. The Visigoths, as the “hail and fire mingled with blood” of the first trumpet, after their separation from the Ostrogoths, who encamped between the Dnieper and the Dniester, descended upon Greece under the leadership of ALARIC, and afterwards, having ravaged Illyria, Lombardy and Italy, laid siege to Rome. In A.D. 408, they passed from Italy into the south of France, and maintained a kingdom there till A.D. 506, when, being driven by the Franks into Spain, they wrested a part of it, Galicia, from the Suevi, and in A.D. 585, extended their sway over the whole peninsula.

4. The BURGUNDIANS issued from the Germania region of the abyss east of the Vistula. They established themselves in Belgic Gaul A.D. 407. After a few years they obtained possession of Savoy, and subsequently of Gaul on the Rhone, and maintained a separate kingdom till A.D. 524, when they were conquered by the Franks. On the division of the Frank kingdom, it again became a separate state, and continued such most of the time for several centuries.

5. The GEPIDÆ migrated from the Scandinavian country west of the Baltic, now called Sweden. They crossed the sea and proceeded southeasterly across the Dnieper, and encamped between that river and the Don. From thence they passed westward into Hungary and thence radiated to Illyria, now styled Dalmatia, in which they established themselves on the Adriatic Bay of the Mediterranean, after the death of Attila in A.D. 453. Ardaric, the king of the Gepidæ, erected his throne in the palace of Attila, whence he exercised royal authority over the old country of Dacia, from the Carpathian hills to the Black Sea. The kingdom of the Gepidæ continued until A.D. 566, when it was destroyed by the Lombards.

6. The LOMBARDS migrated originally from Scandinavia, ascending thence nearly due south to the Danube. On the dissolution of the empire of Attila, A.D. 455, whose standard they followed, they took possession of a portion of Pannonia, a part of Hungary. Subsequently to the conquest of the Gepidæ, they extended their possessions as far as Bavaria, A.D. 568; they invaded and conquered Italy, where they maintained themselves till near the close of the eighth century, when they were “plucked up by the roots” (Dan. 7:8).

7. The FRANKS is a name assumed by a confederacy of German tribes, inhabiting that section of the abyss lying between the Lower Rhine and the Weser. It signifies the Freemen. In Gibbon’s day, their original territory was in part enclosed within the Circle of Westphalia, the Landgravate of Hesse, and the Duchies of Brunswick and Lunenburg, now absorbed by the Prussians in their transitory confederation of Northern Germany. In their inaccessible morasses, redolent of mud, water, and frogs, they used to shake defiance at the Roman arms. When the time arrived for the ascending of the Diademed Horns out of the sea, they instinctively obeyed the summons of the First Trumpet, and in A.D. 407, entered Gaul, and within a few years established a kingdom upon the Rhine, which they continued to maintain and advance, until in the sixth century it extended over the whole territory embraced in modern France.

8. The SUEVI filled the interior Germanian countries of the abyss from the banks of the Oder to those of the Danube. A short time before the sounding of the first trumpet, they united with the Alemanni. They passed through Gaul, conquered Galicia in Spain, and maintained themselves there as a Diademed Horn of the Sea till A.D. 585, a space of one hundred and seventy-seven years.

9. The ALANS migrated from the Asiatic Sarmatia, lying between the Black and Caspian Seas. They passed from this section of the abyss into Germania, being joined on their march by the Vandals, who had previously descended from Scandinavia, and had halted in European Sarmatia, between the Dnieper and the Don. In Germany their forces were still further increased by the accession of the Suevi. Thus strengthened, the Alans, who did not remain in Gaul with the Vandals and Sueves, crossed the Pyrenees into Spain, where they divided; the Suevi settling in Galicia, the Alans in Portugal, and the Vandals in Vandalitia. After sustaining a separate government eight or nine years, they were incorporated by conquest with the Vandals and Sueves, and passed with the Vandals under Genseric into Africa. Another body of Alans had settled between the Rhine, the Seine, and the Loire. They repulsed Attila from Orleans, their capital, on his invasion of Gaul, A.D. 451, and were stationed in the centre of the army by which he was defeated at the great battle of Chalons. On his invasion of their territory, A.D. 453, they were supported by the Goths, and gained another victory. A.D. 464, they invaded Italy, and laid Liguria, the southern part of Sardinia, waste. Clovis, king of the Franks, extended his conquests over their territory as far as the Loire, A.D. 485, but they continued to subsist as a separate people till A.D. 507, or thereabouts, when they were conquered by the Franks.

10. The BAVARIANS. The present Bavaria in the time of the Romans formed part of the Dragon empire, known as Vindelicia and Noricum. Besides South Bavaria, Vindelicia also embraced the south-eastern part of the kingdom of Wurtemberg; while Noricum comprehended the Archduchy of Austria, Styria, Carinthia, and part of Carniola. The Jesuit Gordon in his Opus Chronologicum, referring to A.D. 511 says “Theodon, the first king of Bavaria, dies.” We are not informed how long he had reigned; but Mr. Elliot thinks we may date it as before A.D. 493. The Bavarian Horn is noticed by Gibbon as forming one of the boundaries of the Ostrogothic kingdom of Italy under Theodoric: “He reduced,” says he, “the unprofitable countries Rhoetia (the Tyrol), Noricum, Dalmatia, and Pannonia, from the source of the Danube and the territory of the Bavarians.” And again he says, “the Lombard kingdom extended east, north, and west, as far as the confines of the Avars, the Bavarians, and the Franks of Austrasia and Burgundy;” and Muller: “the Bavarians had now (that is, about the end of the sixth century) given name to Noricum.”

Such, then, is my list of the ten notable abyssal horns of the sea. Though separate dynasties, they are very properly united in a single symbol, and exhibited as one great combination of tyrannical states, from the identity of their origin in the abyss, the oneness of their policy (ch. 17:13), and the similarity of these rulers. This European Commonwealth was composed of monarchies that were all feudatories of the Dragon; for Gibbon shows, that they all adopted, in a great degree, the laws of the ancient empire as their common law. They all came at length to submit themselves to the Papal Yoke; a power which was rising with them out of the sea, whose system of falsehood they co-operated in imposing upon their subjects at all hazards. They may truly be styled the Papal Horns; for their history has proved them to have been, in all their past career, the blind instruments of “THE NAME OF BLASPHEMY” that sits upon the Seven Heads.

In the foregoing enumeration of the horns of the sea, I have made no mention of the Saxons and Danes, who issued forth from the Scandinavian and Germanian abyss against the Dragon province of Britannia. In all the lists of the horns I have seen, the Saxons have been made to figure as one; and, consequently, the Anglo-Saxons of Britain, now styled England, have been set down as one of the horns of the Beast. But this classification of England with the horns cannot be admitted. It is true that the Saxons and Angles issuing from Holstein and Schleswig, A.D. 449, conquered Britannia. But, instead of constituting themselves one horn, they founded seven kingdoms, styled Kent, Essex, Sussex, Wessex, East Anglia, Mercia, and Northumberland. These were called the Saxon Heptarchy; and were as distinct and independent kingdoms as any of their ten contemporaries upon the Continent.

Another objection to England being numbered with the ten, is that she is not a country of the Great-Sea world. The ten horns were to ascend out of the Mediterranean upon which Daniel saw the tempest raging. Gaul, Spain, Italy, Illyria, Africa, and Dacia, are political sections of a terrene, whose waters, directly or indirectly mostly discharge themselves into the Mediterranean. But the British Isles afar off have no relation to it at all. As Origen says in Hom. 6, A.D. 230, “The Britons are divided from our world.” They are no part of the Sea Monster’s interior maritime territory. Even in modern times they are three kingdoms, not a single horn only; and those three horns, the horn of England, the horn of Scotland, and the horn of Ireland, are more imperial than regal, and more Oriental than European.

Another objection to Britain being numbered among the ten horns is, that though, indeed, she is ruled ecclesiastically by a name of blasphemy, her constitution is, in word and deed, opposed to “the Name of Blasphemy” upon the heads of the Beast. The ten horns all worship this Name, and recognize it as their Holy Father; and maintain ambassadors at his court; and exercise their influence to uphold him in glory and power, that his supposed relations with the heavenly world may, by his favor and blessing, be caused to redound to their spiritual and temporal prosperity. He is their Mouth in all spiritual utterances, “speaking great things and blasphemies concerning the Deity, his Name, his Tabernacle, and them that dwell in the heaven” (ch. 13:5, 6). But, blasphemous as Britain is in her constitutional ecclesiasticism, she protests against, and repudiates, the Chief Blasphemer of the world. She does not belong to the politico-ecclesiastical system, or body politic, of which he is the Mouth. She sends no ambassador to the Court of Rome; and though there may be spiritual imbeciles who have real, and crafty politicians who have feigned, reverence for the Roman God and the mummerly of his superstition, the heart of the British peoples is hardened against them with the impenetrability of adamant. This hostility is known and understood at Rome, where the will, but not the power, has always existed to reduce Britain to subjection to the so-called “Holy See.” In witness of this, there is the Spanish Armada equipped and sent against England in the days of Elizabeth, at the instigation of the Court of Rome, that by the thumb-screw arguments of the Inquisition, the British nation might be brought within the pale of the Mediterranean Sea Monster, beyond which no heretical soul can be saved!

The map above depicts the Roman Empire about 449 A.D. (see p. 199). By that time the invasion of Britain by the Angles, Saxons etc., had politically severed the British Isles from the Empire; and as the ten horns of Western Europe were to receive their independence after its fall (A.D. 475), Britain is not to be numbered among them—Publishers.

No, the United Kingdom of England, Scotland and Ireland was never one of the ten horns. The taint of imperialism, as it were, was indelibly infixed in British soil by the Dragon. The Saxons and Angles from the abyss did not expel him. The Dragon withdrew, and told the Britons to defend themselves. Invaded by the Picts and Scots, they invited the Saxons and Angles to come over and help them. The Celts were repelled; but when the war was over, the Saxons refused to leave, and made the heptarchial settlement for themselves. Nearly fourteen centuries have passed since these events; and the Dragons carved in relief upon the interior of the House of Lords, are now the appropriate symbol of British power. The real ruler at Constantinople, the throne of the Dragon, is Britain, who claims “the Sick Man” there, as her “ancient and faithful ally.” Her interests are intimately associated with the destiny of the Turkish empire, more especially with that part of it termed Syria and Egypt. If the British power in any way be an element of the beast, it can only be in connexion with its body, which is like unto a Leopard.” As the power indicated by the words, “Sheba and Dedan, and the Merchants of Tarshish and the young lions thereof,” in Ezek. 38:13, she becomes identified with Daniel’s third beast, the four-winged and four-headed Leopard, which is to have its dominion taken away when the Ancient of Days comes; but which, before it loses its dominion thus, is to come into collision With “the feet of the Bear.”

9. The Ten Diadems

“And upon his Horns ten Diadems.”

The Horns on the Dragon had no diadems upon them; because the nations of the abyss had not then issued forth to erect kingdoms upon the Roman Habitable. But in the chapter before us, the Dragon-Horns of the sea are exhibited with diadems upon them, indicating that they were not Republics; but States, whose chief magistrates were enthroned, and diademed, and who would figure in the unmeasured Court of the Gentiles (ch. 11:2) as “the Crowned Heads of Europe.”

The diadems upon the ten horns is a symbolical rebuke of the foolish prediction of republican politicians and prophets, who deceive their worshippers with the conceit, that the kingdoms of Europe are to become republics after the type of the “MODEL REPUBLIC” of this western world! A horn with a diadem upon it is nowhere to be found, in sacred or profane heraldry, as the symbol of a republic. It always represents a kingly power, or dominion. The Gothic nations of the Abyss acquiesced in the military leaders who had led them to victory, and founded States upon the Roman territory, being recognized as kings, and decorated with diadems, by the Dragon-power. Hence they were kingdoms in their beginning; and will continue kingdoms until the Ancient of Days shall come, and by their overthrow, transfer the many diadems of these horns of the sea to his own glorious and snowy head (Apoc. 19:12; 1:14; 11:15). The very reverse of these republican prophecies is the real truth of the matter. Instead of the kingdoms of the world becoming republics, all the republics of the world will become kingdoms. This will be a great blessing to mankind, who have proved themselves incompetent for self-government upon wise and righteous principles, under any form of rule they may devise. It is the Divine purpose to bless mankind in Abraham and his seed. This is the great gospel prophecy of the word (Gal. 3:8, 9): and when the nations rejoice in peace and security under their own vines and fig-trees, they will be interested in nobler themes than the crude, unprofitable and lying vanities of those who now deceive them. Their political interests will be supervised by kings, who will then reign “by the grace of God”. It will be theirs to command of their own sovereign will and pleasure; and for all nations simply to obey without question or dispute; for then, “judgment will be given to the Saints;” who will take the kingdom and the dominion under the whole heaven, and possess them for a thousand years and more (Dan. 7:22, 27, 18; Apoc. 20:4, 6). Then the universal world will be “ruled in righteousness,” and truly “blessed in Abraham and his seed.”

A few last words may be added in reference to the diadems, which I find collected by the industry of Mr. Elliott, from Gibbon, and other writers with whom the reader will never probably become acquainted. What follows, he says, he has borrowed from Lelewel’s great work on the coinage of the Middle Age. “It is well known,” says Elliott, “that the barbarian Gothic or German kings, after their first conquests, were almost all anxious to receive appointment from the Roman emperor as Masters-General or Patricians of the empire” of the Dragon; “the appointment being equivalent to that of Viceroy; and most useful above all in order to legitimize their government in the eyes of their Roman subjects, who in respect of number immensely exceeded the barbarian population that had conquered them. In the negotiations and treaties on which matter, it was usually stipulated by the Roman emperors, and agreed to by the barbaric kings, that the Diademed Bust and names of the emperors should be stamped upon the barbarian coinage (at least on their gold coins) not the Gothic princes’ own. Hence there was a semi-Roman state of the Gothic coinage, as Lelewel calls it, for a century more or less, from about A.D. 450 to 550; the Vandals of Africa forming however an exception apparently, and acting more or less independently in this respect. At length Clovis the Frank, at the opening of the sixth century, had the plenary sovereignty of Gaul awarded to him by the Byzantine emperor, with the title of Consul and Augustus, and the Diadem of Pearls as its badge and token: a grant renewed in A.D. 532 to Clovis’ children, by Justinian, with full power over the coinage; and engagement that his purely Frank money should have the privilege of currency assured to it throughout the whole Roman empire. In the course of the sixth century, the example of Clovis was followed by others of the princes; the Lombards coming last about A.D. 600.

“On the whole, it appears that at the opening of the sixth century, not only did the several Gothic princes exercise in their respective dominions the prerogatives of supreme sovereignty, but also had begun to appropriate to themselves the Roman Diadematic Badge of such sovereignty; and that at the close of the century their assumption of the diadem, in sign of it, had become universal.”

In connection with these remarks he gives an engraving illustrating the reservation of the diadem to the Dragon, which was not assumed by the horns in their beginning. I conceive that the apocalyptic reason of this is found in the Dragon symbol of ch. 12. In this all the Seven Heads are diademed or sovereign; but the horns not. The idea then is this, that the horns were not to be diademed in their own absolute right, until the Seventh head had passed away; when the Romano-Gothic Sea Monster would stand before the world with Seven undiademed Heads and Ten Diademed Horns.

The first coin of the engraving is Burgundian On one face is the diademed bust of the Dragon-emperor, Anastasius, and on the other, Sigismund, king and consul. The second, is a coin of the Suevi, with the bust, diademed, of the emperor Honorius on one side; and on the other, Richarius, king. This was issued by the Suevi twenty-seven years after the death of Honorius, and his name stamped upon it out of regard to Roman imperial authority. A third coin is Ostrogothic. It was issued during the reign of the Seventh Head, while Theodoric was king of Italy, and Justinian was emperor. On one face is the diademed bust of the Dragon-emperor; and on the other, a wreath with the monogram of the king in the centre. There is another Ostrogothic coin about the size of a quarter dollar, with the diademed bust of Justinian on the one side; and the name and office of the ruler, king Witiges, on the other.

I would remark here, that these two last-mentioned coins are evidence that the Ostrogothic kings of the Seventh Head, who reigned in Rome, did not consider the emperors of the Sixth Head as abolished from all influence in the affairs of Italy; but only “wounded as it were to death;” for here is evidence of the Sixth and Seventh Heads of the Dragon uniting in the coinage of the realm, which only mutually recognized governments and dynasties are free to do. Gibbon, writing of the first two kings of the Seventh Head, Odoacer and Theodoric, says of the former, that “he abstained, during his whole reign from the use of the purple and diadem;" and of the latter, he says, that "from a tender regard to the expiring prejudices of Rome, he declined the name, purple, and diadem of the emperors;" though "he assumed the whole substance and plenitude of imperial prerogative". This was the simple difference between the Imperial Sixth, and the Regal Seventh, heads of the Dragon and the Beast. Had Odoacer and Theodoric assumed "the name, purple and diadem of the emperors" when they reigned in Rome sovereigns of Italy, their government would have been a mere continuation of the Sixth Head. The substance and plenitude of sovereign prerogative remained, only the form of its constitutional administration was changed. This change in the form of the supreme power, with its exclusion from Africa, Sicily, Corsica, Sardinia, Majorca, and Minorca, then possessed by the Vandalic Horn, established a marked dissimilarity between the Sixth and Seventh Heads.

This coin was issued during the reign of Athalaric (516–535) king of the Ostrogoths who succeeded his grandfather, Theodoric in A.D. 526 after the fall of the Western Empire. The coin shows the king as wearing a diadem illustrating the point made by Eureka in this section—Publishers.

The fifth coin of the engraving I regard as a very remarkable one. It is a coin of the Vandals, about the size of an English shilling. Upon one side is the front figure of a man, standing upon an altar. From each shoulder projects a wing with four little circles in each, as if he were an angel, or were identified with an angelic mission. From his waist to his ankles is a four-square in which are inserted four rows of precious stones, three in a row, or twelve in all, and strikingly resembling the Jewish High Priest's breastplate of righteousness on which were engraved the names of the twelve tribes. In his extended right hand he holds a globe surmounted with a cross; and in his extended left, a rude representation of a trumpet. On the other side, is the legend Genser Augustus, and underneath, a star of considerable magnitude. The age of this coin is over fourteen hundred years.

Genseric was an Arian catholic, and the ally of the Circumcellions against the Dragon persecutor of the Donatists. Hence, when he conquered Africa and the islands of the Mediterranean from the Dragon, he proclaimed himself the Augustus of the Catholic world, as the word "Augustus" after his name, and the globe and cross in his right hand, upon the coin, evince. Having delivered the Donatists from the bloody persecutions of the Catholics, they, doubtless, gave him to understand, that they hailed him as one of the Angels of the Four Trumpets and the deliverer of the true church. Hence, the wings on his shoulders with four little circles upon them; and the four-square plate of Twelve Stones. All that Mr. Elliott has to say upon this interesting coin, is to correct Lelewel's reading of the name from Jensæ to Genser; but, to my mind it is a striking indication that the Donatists of Africa, contemporary with the sounding of the Four Trumpets, were sufficiently advanced in apocalyptical exposition, to discern the true character of the times in which they lived, and their own ecclesiastical relations to them. The "terrible Genseric" and his Donatists clients, were neither Preterists, Futurists, nor Literalists; but rational interpreters of the Apocalypse as a symbolic prophecy of events concurrent with the conflict of the Saints with the powers that be, to be explained in the light of history. In this, Vandal barbarians of the fifth century far transcended the intelligence of the "ripest" and brightest scholars of our age!

Besides these he gives two other coins, one of the Franks, and the other of the Visigoths, to show that the diadem came at length to be adopted by the Gothic kingdoms, without regard to the Diadem Bust of the emperors. This was after the fall of the Seventh Head.

10. The Name of Blasphemy

“And upon his Heads a Name of Blasphemy.”

The name of a person or thing, according to the Hebrew style, frequently imports the quality or state thereof. Thus in Ruth 1:20, “and she said unto them, call me not Naomi,” that is, pleasant, “but call me Mara,” that is bitter; “for Yahweh hath dealt very bitterly with me.” And thus, when it is said in Isaiah 7:14, “she shall call his name Immanuel,” the meaning is, that the Son of the Virgin there spoken of should be “AIL,” or Eternal Power, “with us,” Israel, dwelling in their midst. And so in Luke 1:32, “He shall be called the Son of the Highest,” is, He shall be the Son of the Highest.

Names of men are sometimes taken for the men themselves. Thus in Acts 1:15, “the number of the names,” that is, the number of the men. And thus in Virgil, Sylvius, “Albanum Nomen,” an Alban Name, is Sylvius, a man of Albania.

Isaiah 30:27, it is said “The NAME of Yahweh cometh from far, HIS anger burning, and the burden thereof heavy; HIS lips are full of indignation, and HIS tongue as a devouring fire.” Here name obviously denotes a person, an individual of great power, developing great anger and fiery indignation. It is the name styled by Moses in Deut. 28:58, “the glorious and fearful Name, YAHWEH Elohim,” for the repudiation and blasphemy of which Judah and Benjamin, with a multitude of Levi, have been banished from their country, and tormented among the Nations for nearly eighteen hundred years.

Name also is equivalent to power. This appears from Acts 4:7, where the rulers demanded of the apostles, saying to them, “by what power, or name, have ye done this?”—and in ver. 30, they pray that “wonders may be done by the name of Jesus,” that is, by his power. Hence, the Jesus Name is a name of glory and power, as well as a name of holiness and truth, and is styled by Paul “a Name above every name; that at the Name of Jesus every knee shall bow” (Phil. 2:9, 10).

But name not only denotes the existence, quality, or state of a person, power, or other thing, singly considered; it also denotes these things in multitudinous manifestation. Thus, in Jer. 13:11, Yahweh caused “the whole house of Israel, and the whole house of Judah” to cleave unto Him, “that they might be to me, saith he, for a people, and for a name, for a praise, and for a glory.” Here is a name inclusive of the whole nation. There are numerous instances in the prophetic writings where name is representative of many, too numerous to be quoted here.

The gods of the nations were so many names, whether idols or founders of sects. In this sense, name denotes an object of worship, invocation, or reverence. Thus, in Mic. 4:5, “all people walk, every one in the name of his God; we will walk in the name of our God.” To walk in the name of any one is, first, to have said name constitutionally placed upon the walker; and, secondly, to shape the course of life according to the precepts and institutions of such name. Every one that does this is in said name; and, therefore, denominationally a part, or element, of that name. Thus, the NOMEN LATINUM, or Latin Name, the Nomen Anglicanum, or Anglican Name, Luther, Calvin, Wesley, and a host of others, are all names of Gods in which the peoples walk. They are specially related to the Romano-Gothic Beast of the Abyss, which John testified would be gemon onomaton blasphemias, full of Names of Blasphemy (Ch. 17:3). All the peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues, constituting the body politic of the fourth-beast system of nations, “walk every one in the name of his god,” glorying in the Latin Name of Blasphemy upon the Seven Heads; the Anglican Name of Blasphemy in Canterbury, York, and Dublin; and in all the other blasphemies, to which the names of Luther, Calvin, Wesley, and others too numerous to mention, are attached.

But, while all the people walk every one in the precepts of these “worshipful names” of the unmeasured Court of the Gentiles, “the remnant of the woman’s seed, who keep the commandments of the Deity, and have the testimony of the anointed Jesus,” will walk in the name of their God alone. First, believing “the truth as it is in Jesus,” the Name of the Deity has been constitutionally placed upon them, according to the command that all such believers be “immersed into THE NAME of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit” (Matt. 28:19; Mark 16:15, 16; Luke 24:47; Acts 2:38; 8:12, 16): and secondly, being taught to observe the all things the apostles were commanded to teach (Matt. 28:20), they walk in the name of the Deity as constituents of that name; having no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness; but, as the grace of Deity which brings salvation teacheth, they “deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and live soberly, righteously, and godly, in the present world; looking for that blessed hope, and the appearing of the glory of the great Deity, and of their Saviour, the anointed Jesus” (Tit. 2:12). This is the Name which, in Ch. 13:6, is styled His Name—the name of the Deity, blasphemed by the Name of Blasphemy upon the Seven Heads, and by all the other names which fill up the body politic of the Beast.

The Name of Blasphemy is a power; and like the Beast over which it presides is, or rather has been, in centuries of its career, a “dreadful and terrible” power. It is an EPISCOPAL NAME, because it is the embodiment of those audacious “EYES” Daniel was so observant of in his vision. He saw a Little Horn come up among, and after, the ten. It was not like the other horns. These had no eyes in them; nor had they any mouth. If they had possessed these, there would have been twenty eyes and ten mouths. But a different constitution of the evil was predetermined. One pair of Eyes and one Mouth were to suffice for the Little Horn and all its ten associate horns. Had there been eleven pairs of eyes instead of one pair, there would have been eleven names of blasphemy upon the sea-monster’s heads, which would have been incongruous, and a cause of inextricable confusion.

The eyes Daniel saw were “like the eyes of a man.” And not only so, but they were representative of a man; for, speaking of the glare, or fierce piercing look, of the eyes, he says, in Ch. 7:20, “whose look was more stout than HIS fellows.” They represented a human power, whose function was pre-eminently that of supervision over certain styled “his fellows.” His official state, therefore, was that of an episkokos, or a BISHOP. His look being “more stout” than his fellows of the episcopal order, he would, therefore, claim superiority over all spirituals; and to be entitled above all to the veneration and homage of mankind. Such an OVERSEEING NAME as this would be, within the sphere of his jurisdiction, a Bishop of bishops, such as Constantine claimed to be when he assumed headship over all the catholic churches of the Dragon empire.

But this Nomen Latinum, or Latin Name upon the Seven Heads, was not only a Supreme Bishop, but it was also a Name of Blasphemy. It was itself a blasphemy, and an utterer of blasphemy. A power claiming to be what it is not, is a blasphemy. Thus, certain of the synagogue of Satan in the ecclesia at Smyrna claimed to be Jews, when they really were not. This false claim is styled “their blasphemy” (Apoc. 2:9): because, being false, it injured the fair fame and reputation of those in Christ who were Israelites indeed.

BLASPHEMY is a thing but little understood by those who most glibly use the word in their denunciation of what they term heresy. In the Court of the Gentiles, in which the truth is trodden under foot by “the Spirituals of wickedness in high places”—THE CLERGY—everything is blasphemy, which, however Scriptural it may be, exposes their word-nullifying traditions to the well-merited contempt of mankind. Against this exposition they rend their garments instead of their hearts, put dust upon their heads, and with eyes and hands upturned to heaven, cry out blasphemy! But this is all theatrical. Mere sound has no terrors for the friends of truth. The clerical orders, whose apocalyptic chief is this Name of Blasphemy, are like him, essentially a blasphemy; because they arrogate to themselves the prerogatives of Christ and his Brethren, to which they have not the remotest or slightest Scriptural pretension. Being of the world, and speaking under the impression of the world, as proved by the world hearing and hiring them, their alleged identity with the members of the Divine Family, injures the reputation thereof, which is the import of the word blaspheme. For an order of men to claim to be “Vicars of Jesus Christ upon earth,” that is, his official substitutes, by Divine appointment; or to be his ambassadors and plenipotentiaries to the nations, by the same authority; and for them to be notoriously deficient of the least proof substantiatory of their high pretensions, is to convict themselves of falsehood; and when self-convicted liars and hypocrites claim to be the brethren and intimates of honest and righteous men, on the principle of a man being known by the company he keeps, the reputation of those excellent people is injured, or, in other words, blasphemed, in the estimation of the Deity, and of those “who hold the testimony of the anointed Jesus.” Thus, the Albigenses among whom the faithful may be found, in the twelfth century testified to their generation, saying, “We must not obey the Pope and Bishops, because they be wolves to the ecclesia of Christ”—quia sini lupi ecclesiae Christi. They repudiated the Name of Blasphemy and the clerical ministers of his name, as the transformed ministers of the Satan, who pretended to be ministers of righteousness, but were really nothing more than wolves in sheep’s clothing of the most ravenous and ferocious description. They protested against them as the orders of that DREADFUL AND TERRIBLE NAME OF BLASPHEMY, enthroned upon the Seven Heads of the Fourth Beast. This name they denounced as the Antichrist, the Man of Sin, the Son of Perdition—the Antichrist, because he set himself up as the VICAR OF CHRIST; that is, the Divinely deputed substitute of Christ, as indicated by the word Antichristos, from anti, in the place of, christos, the Anointed One, or Christ: they denounced this Name as the Man of Sin in maturity, or full manifestation. They did not regard the Man of Sin substitute for Christ as an individual man, but as an order of ecclesiastical rulers, a Name, or Body, with its Eyes, Mouth, and subordinate members. Being an imperial spiritual human power, its chief ruler would be a man, the supreme representative for the period of his reign, of the power that created him for adoration, as “the god of the earth”—quem creant adorant, whom they create they worship. And thirdly, they denounced this Man of Sin name of Blasphemy, as the Son of Perdition; because the power, in the Scarlet-Beast phase of it, is foredoomed, “and goeth into perdition” (Apoc. 17:11): and because Paul, in writing of the same power, whom he styles ho anomos, the Lawless One, as well as the Man of Sin, terms him likewise the Son of Perdition, “whom the Lord shall consume with the spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his presence” (2 Thess. 2:8).

BLASPHEMY

Reproduced from Watchman! What of the Night? this is a representation of a painting which was hung in the Genoese Arch in Rome, depicting Pope Leo X as the Light of the world. Beneath the painting is the Inscription: “The world hath Unveiled its Light; the King of Glory has come forth” Cp. this claim and illustration with Revelation 10:1.

It may not be uninteresting to the reader to peruse, in their own words, the views entertained by the witnesses of Jesus concerning this Name of Blasphemy upon the Seven Heads, over seven hundred years ago. The following is from a remarkable tract written by one of them, in A.D. 1120, for the express purpose of vindicating himself and friends for separating from communion with this name. It professes to be an answer to the question, “WHAT IS ANTICHRIST?” which it thus proceeds to answer:

“Antichrist is a falsehood or deceit varnished over with the semblance of truth, and of the righteousness of Christ and his Spouse, yet in opposition to the way of truth, righteousness, faith, hope, love, as well as moral life. It does not respect any one particular person ordained to any degree, or office, or ministry; but it is a SYSTEM OF FALSEHOOD (Name of Blasphemy) opposing itself to the truth, coveting and adorning itself with a shew of beauty and piety, yet very unsuitable to the ecclesia of Christ, as, by the names and offices, the Scriptures and the sacraments and various other things may appear. The system of iniquity thus perfected, with its officiating ministers, great and small, supported by those who are induced to follow it with an evil heart and blindfold—this is the congregation or composition of things (the Name, or Body) which, taken together, comprises what is called Antichrist, or Babylon, the Fourth Beast, the Harlot, the Man of Sin, the Son of Perdition, all of which are titles given to it in the Holy Scriptures. His ministers are called false prophets, lying teachers, the ministers of darkness, the spirit of error, the Apocalyptic Harlot, the Mother of Fornication, clouds without water, trees without leaves, twice dead, plucked up by the roots, wandering stars, Balaamites, and Egyptians. “He is termed Antichrist, because being disguised under the semblance of Christ and his ecclesia, he oppugns or opposes the salvation purchased by Christ, and truly administered in his (Christ’s) own ecclesia, which salvation the faithful are made partakers of by faith, hope, and love. Thus he counteracts the truth by the wisdom of this world, by false religion, by feigned holiness, by ecclesiastical power, secular tyranny, riches, honors, dignities, and the pleasures and allurements of this world.

“It is notorious, therefore, that Antichrist never has been brought forth without a concurrence of all the things now mentioned, so as to form a system of hypocrisy and falsehood (or Blasphemy); that is to say, there must be a concurrence of the wise of this world, ecclesiastical orders, pharisees, ministers, and doctors; the secular power and the people of the world, all mixed up together: all these combined make up the Man of Sin, and that Wicked One complete. For, though Antichrist was conceived so long since as the times of the apostles (see 1 John 2:18, 22; 4:3; 2 John 7) he was then only in his infancy (in embryo) wanting members both inward and outward. Consequently, he was the more easily detected, destroyed, and cast out of the ecclesias, being then unshapen and wanting utterance. As yet, he was destitute of that plausible, imposing, judicial or determinative wisdom which he afterwards attained; he wanted those hypocritical ministers (the clergy), and human appointments, and the outward show of those religious orders which were necessary to give him perfection. As he was destitute of those riches and endowments necessary to allure persons to his service, and enable him to multiply, protect, and defend his adherents, so he also needed the Secular Power to compel men to forsake the truth, and embrace a system of falsehood. Wanting these requisites, his deceitful practices had not their full effect—he was young and tender, and with difficulty got a footing in the ecclesias. But growing up in his members, that is, in his blind and dissembling ministers (the clergy) and in worldly subjects, he gradually arrived at maturity when men whose hearts were set upon this world, but blind in the faith, multiplied in the ecclesias, and BY THE UNION OF CHURCH AND STATE (in the time of Constantine), got the power of both into their own hands.”

After describing the wickedness of this Name of Blasphemy which arrogated Divine honor, the writer adds, “Christ never had an enemy to be compared with this; one so able to pervert the way of truth into falsehood; insomuch that the true ecclesia, with her children, is trodden under foot by it (Apoc. 11:2). The worship that pertains to God alone is transferred to Antichrist; to the creature, male and female, deceased—to images, to carcasses, and relics. The sacrament of the eucharist (the Lord’s Supper), is converted into an object of adoration, and the worshipping of God alone is prohibited. The Saviour is robbed of his merits, and the sufficiency of his grace in justification, regeneration, the pardon of sins, sanctification, establishment in the faith, and spiritual nourishment—ascribing all these things to his own authority—to a mere form of words—to the intercession of saints and to the fire of purgatory. Thus people are seduced from Christ, their minds are drawn off from seeking those blessings in him, by a lively faith in the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and teaching his followers to expect them by the will and pleasure and works of Antichrist.

“A third work of Antichrist consists of this, that he attributes the regeneration of the Holy Spirit unto the mere external rite, baptizing infants in that faith, teaching that thereby baptism and regeneration must be had, on which principle he confers and bestows orders (Apoc. 13:16, 17) and, indeed, grounds all his christianity, which is contrary to the mind of the Holy Spirit. He places all his religion and holiness in going to mass (as his Protestant relations now do in ‘going to church’) in which he has mingled together all kinds of ceremonies, Jewish, Heathen, and Christian; and by means thereof, the people are deprived of spiritual food, seduced from the true religion, and the precepts of God, and bolstered up with vain and presumptuous hopes. All his works are done to be seen of men, that he may glut himself with insatiable avarice; and to accomplish this, every thing is set to sale. He allows of open sins without ecclesiastical censure, and even the impenitent are not excommunicated. He does not rule or maintain his unity by the Sword of the Spirit, but by means of the SECULAR POWER (the Horn in which the Eyes are set) using that to effect spiritual ends (ch. 13:12, 15). He hates and persecutes, and searches after, and plunders, and destroys the members of Christ (ch. 13:7, 15). These are some of the principal of the works of Antichrist against the truth, but the whole are past numbering or recording. These are the most prominent features of that monstrous power.

“On the other hand, he makes use of an outward confession of the faith, and therein are verified the words of the apostle—‘they profess in words that they know God, but in works they deny him.’ He covers his iniquity by pleading the length of his duration, and the multitude of his followers; concerning which it is said in the Apocalypse, that ‘power is given him over every tribe, language, and nation; and all that dwell upon the earth should worship him’ (ch. 13:7, 8). He covers his iniquity by pleading the spiritual authority of the apostles, though the apostle expressly says, ‘we can do nothing against the truth; and, ‘there is no power given us for destruction’. He boasts of numerous miracles, even as the apostle foretold—‘whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all miracles and signs, and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness’ (2 Thess. 2:9, 10; Rev. 13:13, 14), also. He has an outward show of holiness, consisting in prayers, fastings, watchings, and alms deeds; of which the apostle testified, when he said, ‘Having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof.’

“Thus it is that Antichrist covers his lying wickedness as with a cloak or garment, that he may not be rejected as a pagan or infidel, and under which disguise he can go on practising his villanies boldly like a harlot. But it is plain both from the Old and New Testaments, that Christians are bound by express command to separate themselves from Antichrist.

“In the New Testament we read that the Lord is come and hath suffered death, that he might gather together IN ONE the children of God (John 12); and in the book of Revelation, he warns by his voice, and charges his people to go out of Babylon, saying, ‘Come out of her, my people, and be not partakers of her sins, that ye receive not of her plagues; for her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquity’ (Rev. 18:4, 5). The apostle Paul says the same—‘Have no fellowship with unbelievers—come out from among them, and be ye separate’ (2 Cor. 6:16).

“From what has been said, we may learn wherein consists the wickedness and perverseness of Antichrist, and that God commands his people to separate from him, and join themselves to THE HOLY CITY, Jerusalem (Apoc. 11:2). And since it hath pleased God to make known these things to us by his servants, believing it to be his holy will according to the Scriptures, and admonished thereto by the command of the Lord, we do inwardly and outwardly depart from Antichrist. We hold communion and maintain unity one with another, freely and uprightly, having no other motive thereto but to please the Lord, and seek the salvation of our souls. Thus, as the Lord is pleased to enable us, and so far as our understandings are enlightened into the path of duty, we attach ourselves unto the truth of Christ, and his ecclesia, how mean soever she may appear in the eyes of men.

“We, therefore, have thought it good to make this declaration of our reasons for departing from Antichrist, as well as to make known what kind of fellowship we have, to the end that, if the Lord be pleased to impart the knowledge of the same truth to others, those that receive it may love it together with us. It is our wish also, that if others are not sufficiently enlightened they may receive assistance from this service, the Lord succeeding it by his blessing. While, on the other hand, if any have received more abundantly from him, and in a higher measure, we desire with all humility to be taught and better instructed, that so we may rectify whatever is amiss.”

Such is a specimen of the testimony of the two prophet-witnesses, who, as lights, “stood before the god of the Earth,” the Name of Blasphemy, the pretended Vicar of Jesus Christ, the Eyes of the Antichrist; and which “tormented them who dwelt upon the earth” (Apoc. 11:4, 10). This testimony was delivered in the darkest period of the day of blasphemy, when men avowed their convictions in the face of ruin, captivity, torments, and death. But they were valiant for the truth; and though power was on the side of the oppressor, a power that roared from the “Mouth of a Lion,” and made nations tremble, and kings upon their thrones; yet were they undaunted in its presence in their earnest contention for the faith once for all delivered to the Saints. The secret of their energy was “the power of the Deity,” “the testimony of the anointed Jesus” which they held, “the word of the Deity which is living and powerful,” understood and lovingly and heartily believed. Their enlightened testimony filled the clerical orders of Antichrist with madness; and caused them to roar forth blasphemies against them, with terrible threatenings and slaughters. But in all the onslaught of the enemy, the Name of Yahweh in which they were entrenched, was their strong tower. THE NAME OF YAHWEH, and the NAME OF BLASPHEMY, were the two great rival names of the situation. Between them there can be no peace or compromise. The Name of Blasphemy on the Seven Heads has learned this by grievous experience; and discovering that the strength of the Eternal Name in the great conflict resided in “THE WORD,” he strove mightily to suppress it. But the greater his efforts in this direction, the more strenuous and determined were the witnesses to keep the Scriptures before the people. They learned the Bible by heart—Biblia ediscunt memoriter; and as we have seen by quotations in their declaration, they did not neglect to study the Apocalypse, by which they were enabled to discern the times in which they lived. This the contemporaries of Constantine were enabled to do; and a hundred years afterwards, the Donatists also, as evinced by the device of the Vandal coin; the Albigenses likewise of this twelfth century; and Peter Jurieu, who discerned in his own day, A.D. 1687, the death of the witnesses, and interpreted the fall of “the Tenth of the Great City” of France, a hundred years before it came to pass; and Bicheno, a century later, who discerned their resurrection in his own times; to say nothing of the author, about seventy years later still, lest he should seem to boast of things beyond his measure. But all these, and how many more who can tell, by the help of the Apocalypse were enabled to answer the question, “Watchman, what of the Night?” and to discern things in the Body Politic of Romano-Gothic society in their true relations to the Divine Name, which would otherwise have been inscrutable.

But this Name of Blasphemy was not only essentially and constitutionally a blasphemy, but it was an utterer of blasphemies also. To blaspheme required something more than “EYES, like the eyes of a man.” These were necessary to constitute it an EPISCOPAL NAME; but that this Overseeing Name, or Power, might give utterance to its purely fleshly thinkings, it was indispensable that it be furnished with a MOUTH. Therefore it was, that Daniel in his vision, in considering the Little Horn that came up after and among the ten, saw that it had a Mouth as well as Eyes. He does not inform us what the mouth looked like; whether it were like the mouth of a man, a bear, a lamb, or other animal. John the apostle was appointed to supply this information in the chapter in hand. It is very certain, however, that the mouth of a lamb would have been a very unfit symbol to represent it by, even upon Daniel’s showing; for he testifies, that it was “a Mouth speaking very great things against the Most High” (ch. 7:8, 20, 25); or, as John expresses it, “great things and blasphemies” (ver. 5). Between, the gentle, timid, voice of a lamb, and roaring blasphemies, there is no resemblance; but, on the contrary, from the nature of the thing spoken, we would expect that the organ of utterance would be symbolized by something ferocious and terrible; and because, likewise, all pertaining to the Fourth Beast “is dreadful and terrible.”

The NAME OF BLASPHEMY, then, is the embodiment of the Eyes and Mouth of Daniel’s Little Horn, in their episcopal relation to the ten horns. It is the LATIN SEE, without which there was no point of union between them. When it came to be enthroned, and they came to acknowledge its authority in all their kingdoms, it became their “HOLY FATHER” and they sons in his “holy keeping,” of whom, the first of the ten that recognized “HIS HOLINESS,” is surnamed “the Eldest Son of the Church.” But commentators and “recent editors,” who have undertaken to mend the Greek text, are greatly puzzled to determine whether the reading should be onoma blasphemias, a Name of Blasphemy, or onomata blasphemias, Names of Blasphemy. Griesbach has adopted the latter reading; which, a note to the “Revised Version” says, “is received by all the recent editors except Bengel. Heinrichs also mentions it as the superior reading. But Ewald, Zullig, and De Wette, disapprove it, the last considering it as an accommodation to ch. 17:3; and Hengstenburg regards the question as one of difficult decision. “I recommend,” says the Annotator, “the the marginal note of the English Version be retained: “or, names.” In other words, he was at a loss to say which it should be, therefore, they might split the difference between, the margin and the text. Mr. Elliott bows reverently to the authority of the “recent editors,” and speculates upon it accordingly. Lord also falls into the same line; and speaks of “the names of blasphemy on the heads of the Dragon!” This is certainly a newly found apocalyptic item not revealed to John; who affirms nothing about names of blasphemy on the heads of the Dragon. But, Mr. Lord falls into this error from the assumption, that the correct reading is names; and from the fact that the heads of the Dragon, and the heads of the Beast, are the same heads; and hence, the latter having names upon them, these names must have been on the Dragon likewise!

But, it is refreshing to find four discerning men in such a crowd of the kind—Bengel, Ewald, Zullig and De Wette. These affirm the truth. It ought to read name, not names; and doubtless, De Wette has given a true reason of the difficulty among their recencies, namely, “an accommodation to ch. 17:3.” But this is not the principal reason. It is this. They could not see how One Name could rest upon Seven Heads. If it had said, and one and the same name upon each of the seven heads, they might have interpreted it of one and the same inscription upon each; and there would have been no trouble with the text; but simply as it now reads, with the understanding that “the heads are Seven Kings,” how One Name of Blasphemy was to be on these, sent them all adrift in doubt and speculation. But, the solution of the difficulty is easy and apparent when understood. The key to the matter is in the signification of the Seven Heads, which requires another sort of wisdom than that by which the “recent editors” are inspired, to discern. Said the angel to John, “Here is the mind that hath wisdom. The Seven Heads are Seven Mountains on which the Woman (or Name of Blasphemy) sitteth. And there are Seven Kings: five are fallen, and one is and the other is not yet come; and when he (the Seventh Head) cometh, he must continue a short space”—ch. 17:9, 10. In other words, the seven heads of the Beast and the Dragon, which are the same, have a two-fold signification; they represented the Seven Ruling Headships of the Fourth Beast, which down to the fall of the seventh, has existed in the Seven-Hilled City, ROME, as the capital of the dominion. The Name of Blasphemy came to be enthroned there; not contemporarily with the Seven Ruling Headships, or Forms of Government; but after they had passed away; and when it had Rome to itself without the rival presence of the ancient Senate, or Roman emperors, as at the date of this writing Feb. 3, A.D. 1867. Hence, the Name of Blasphemy was not, as Mr. Lord intimates, an arrogation of the prerogatives of the Deity, assented to by these several pagan and catholic forms of Government, obtaining in Rome from the foundation of the city; but a distinct and independent head, or Form of Government, the Germano-Roman with its own audacious Eyes, and “exceeding dreadful” Mouth, with “iron teeth” (Dan. 7:19). It sat upon the seven mountains as the spiritual overseer of the Secular Powers of Europe, who “gave their power and strength to it,” that it might rule “until the words of the Deity shall be fulfilled” (Apoc. 17:13, 17); it became to them a bond of union—the Eyes, Mouth and Brain of the Romano-Gothic Body Politic, symbolized by this Seven Headed and Ten-Horned Monster of the Sea.

11. The Body of the Beast

“And the Beast which I saw was like unto a Leopard, and his Feet were as of a Bear”—(Verse 2).

The Leopard and the Bear elements of the Ten-Horned Monster of the Sea, indicate its identity with two others than the fourth, of the four beasts of Daniel’s vision. The second beast-dominion he saw ascend out of the Mediterranean Earth, symbolized by the Great Sea (ch. 8:3, 17), was “like to a Bear”, which was appointed to “devour much flesh”; and the third beast was “like to a Leopard”; and “dominion was given to it.” The Bear in this vision answers to the “Breast and the Arms of Silver”; and the Leopard to the “Belly and Thighs of Brass”—of the image-representation exhibited to Nebuchadnezzar, of WHAT SHALL BE IN THE LAST OF THE DAYS—beacharith yomaiyah. In the interpretation he was told that the silver section of the image was a kingdom that would be inferior to the Babylonian, which was his; and that the brass kingdom, the third section thereof, should “bear rule over all the earth.” This was equivalent to saying, that the Leopard is symbolical of a kingdom bearing rule over the whole earth.

Now history, that is Daniel himself, informs us, that the kingdom which arose after Nebuchadnezzar’s was the Two-Armed, or Two-Horned, Silver bear, or ram, kingdom of the Medes and the Persians: and that the third kingdom, reckoning that of Babylon as the first, was the goat-kingdom of Grecia. The Medo-Persian empire comprehended one hundred and twenty-seven provinces, stretching from India to Ethiopia (Esther 1:1). These were distributed into “three ribs,” or presidencies, of which Daniel’s jurisdiction was the first. The three ribs in the Mouth of the Bear are symbolical of these political divisions. Among the provinces of the Bear were Egypt, Armenia, Syria, and Asia Minor to the Bosphorus. These all came in due time to be annexed to the Dragon empire, or Daniel’s Fourth Beast; so that the Bear became a constituent of the Dragon, and its four paws, armed with claws of brass, became the Sea-Monster’s apocalyptic “feet,” with which it is yet in our future, “the last of the days,” to “break in pieces, and to stamp the residue” (Dan. 7:19).

But the Leopard had a more extensive dominion than the Bear. This Greek kingdom was to “bear rule over all the earth.” It commenced its predicted career about B.C. 330, under its “first king,” Alexander surnamed “the Great.” It extended from Macedonia into what is now a part of British India and styled the Punjaub: but notwithstanding it exceeded the dominion of the Bear it fell far short of “bearing rule over all the earth”—the earth, as defined by the symbol of the Great Sea.

Now, Daniel was given to understand that the four beasts he saw rising out of the Mediterranean Earth, would all co-exist at the coming of the Ancient of days (ch. 7:12): and that, at that extraordinary time of trouble, the fourth beast body politic shall be abolished; but that the Lion, the Bear and the Leopard shall remain, only without dominion, and that for “a season and a time; or, as John expresses it, “for a thousand years.” This was equivalent to saying that the Bear and the Leopard, and, consequently, the Lion, national organizations, or bodies politic, should be extant at the coming of Christ “as a thief,” in the Sixth Vial period. In order, therefore, to represent this truth, the Leopard, and the Bear, and the Lion, symbols are constituted elements of the Ten-Horned Sea Monster, which is to continue in political life till the advent, as appears from the testimony that “the ten horns shall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them” (ch. 17:14).

In Daniel’s four beasts, each succeeding beast absorbed the dominion of its predecessor; so that the Bear may be said to have devoured the Lion; and the Leopard to have swallowed the Bear; and the Ten-Horned Fourth Beast to have eaten up the Leopard; so that in the Fourth Beast would be contained the Lion, the Bear, and the Leopard, in addition to appendages peculiar to itself. This is shown by John in his Sea Monster, who shows the Leopard he had gorged in “his body,” and the Bear he had devoured in “his feet”.

But it is customary to style Daniel’s Fourth Beast “the Roman Empire,” by which is meant the dominion exercised by Rome and Constantinople, until the latter city came to be possessed by the Turks, A.D. 1453, when it fell, or passed away. It is true, it does symbolize said Roman Empire, but it also symbolizes a vast deal more. The Roman Empire, of which Gibbon wrote the decline and fall, has never yet embraced within its jurisdiction the hundred and twenty-seven provinces of the Medo-Persian Bear, which it is necessary it should have done that its Leopard-Body might “bear rule over all the earth,” and that it might stand upon its Bear-Feet, and with these feet “break in pieces and stamp THE RESIDUE.” John’s Sea Monster with the Bear-Feet and Leopard-Body, represents Daniel’s Fourth Beast in its amplest development of the last of the days. It answers to Nebuchadnezzar’s Image at the crisis of its demolition by THE STONE. When John’s Beast of the Sea comes, in fact, to stand upon its four brazen-clawed Bear-Feet, its dominion will consist of the Russian Empire, Continental and Mediterranean Europe, Persia, Ethiopia, Libya, Togarmah, Egypt and Syria. When the throne of the Russian Autocrat is transferred to Constantinople, the Apocalyptic Bear-Feet, armed with Brazen or Greek Claws, will also be enthroned there, and be prepared for the work that remains of “stamping the residue”. This residue that yet remains to be stamped, are the “many countries” to be “overthrown,” inclusive of Turkey, Egypt and part of the Glorious Land. Edom, Moab and part of Ammon, will evade the stamping process. These three countries will be “the front” of the forces of “Sheba, and Dedan, and the Merchants of Tarshish and the Young Lions thereof”—the Anglo-Indian Leopard empire of the latter days (Ezek. 38:1–6, 13; 11:40–44). The part which Britain has to enact in “the time of the end,” when “the Eastern Question” is to be Scripturally resolved, clearly indicates that she is not one of the ten horns. She is not of their world, but the Oriental section of the Sea Monster’s Leopard Body—a world peculiar to herself, and as distinct from them as Canada and the United States. In the approaching scramble for the effects of the expiring Sick Man of Ottomania, she will most likely secure for herself, or at least take possession of, Egypt and Syria. But Daniel shows that whatever power may primarily become seized of these countries, will not be able to prevent their being stamped by the Feet of the Bear. “The land of Egypt shall not escape” the power of the King of the North; “but he shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver, and over all the precious things of Egypt.” From this conquest he will proceed into the Holy Land. The war between the belligerents will then be transferred to this country, upon which the Oriental Power must necessarily retire. The conflict waged will be furious; for the Northern Power, symbolized by John’s Scarlet-colored Beast, will “go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away many. And he shall pitch the tents of his entrenched camp between the seas unto the mountain of the glory of the holy.” This brings him to Jerusalem, which he besieges and captures (Zech. 14:2). Upon this the Oriental Leopard falls back upon Edom, Moab and Ammon, beyond the Jordan and the Dead Sea. At this crisis the face of Yahweh is flushed with fury, and he goes forth against the invader (Ezek. 38:18; Zech. 14:3). As the Stone-Power, he smites the Image upon the feet, and shatters it into fragments. The Bear, the Lion and Leopard, inclusive of the British section of the last, lose their dominion; but as Assyria and Egypt are annexed to Israel (Isa. 19:23–25) and the tide of war is rolled back from Syria, north and west, upon the countries of the Ten Horns, and of the Two-Horned beasts, over which the Name of Blasphemy presides as their prophet, priest and king. This solution of the Eastern Question ushers in the solution of the Roman Question, neither of which can be finally disposed of until the Ancient of days, that is, Jesus Christ, come; and he give authority and power to his brethren, the Saints, to execute the judgment written in ch. 13:10; which is, as David expressed it, to slay the beast (the Fourth Beast in Apocalyptic manifestation), destroy his body in the burning flame, and take away the dominion of the Lion, the Bear and the Leopard (ch. 7:11, 12). The slaying of the beast is the utter extermination of the Greek and Latin Catholic governments by the power of the sword; and the taking away of the dominion of the Lion, the Bear, the Leopard, or that of the Asiatic Powers, is the binding of the Dragon, casting him into the abyss, shutting him up, and setting a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more for “a season and a time,” or “a thousand years.”

From these premises, then, it will be seen that this Apocalyptic Sea-Monster is not exclusively the Romano-Gothic Ten-Horn constitution of Papal Mediterranean Europe, but symbolical likewise of the Byzantine, or Greek Empire, as indicated by the Leopard-Body and Bear-Feet; for, that the Bear is Greek as well as the Leopard, Daniel shows by testifying that the Fourth Beast “had Nails of Brass” (ch. 7:19); and in his prophecy brass is the symbol of the dominion of “the brazen-coated Greeks.” Because, therefore, this Beast of the Sea symbolized the dominions of the whole eastern and western Mediterranean world, all the “kindreds, and tongues, and nations,” styled Apocalyptically “the whole earth,” in subjection to them, are said to have “wandered after the beast,” and to have “worshipped” both the Dragon and the Beast—Vers. 3, 4. The populations inhabiting Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, Greece, “worshipped” the imperial power enthroned in Constantinople, and that only; while the populations of Italy, Africa, Spain, Gaul, “worshipped” the Constantinopolitan and the new Gothic powers as well. This two-fold worship of the subjects of the Franks, Burgundians, Lombards, Visigoths, Suevi, and so forth, may be familiarly illustrated by numerous modern instances. Thus, Egypt is a part of the Turkish empire, and at the same time a quasi independent kingdom under its own hereditary king, who acknowledges the suzerainty of the Sultan; so that the Egyptians may be said to worship the king, and also to worship the Sultan, and to say in their ignorance, “Who is like unto the Sultan? Who is able to make war with him?” The question is very appropriate with regard to the Beast, if not to the Sultan; for, as the Beast is the symbol of power bearing rule over all the Mediterranean Earth, where is the power able to make war with it? Men know of none, because they know not the purpose of Yahweh. But, in the tenth verse of this thirteenth chapter, He has in effect declared that there is a power able to make war with the Beast, and to bind and slay him; for as he has made war with the Saints and Witnesses, bound them in captive chains, and conquered and killed them, so he is to be bound and killed with the sword, when judgment shall be executed upon him, by the very victims of his “exceeding dreadful and terrible” tyranny, after they shall have been raised from among the dead, and strengthened for the war.

12. The Mouth of the Beast

“2. And his Mouth as the Mouth of a Lion. 5. And there was given unto him (the Beast of the Sea) a Mouth speaking great things and blasphemies. 6. And he opened his Mouth in blasphemy concerning the Deity, to have blasphemed his Name, and his Tabernacle, and those who tabernacle in the heaven.”

Every living, and many inanimate, things, have their mouth in a literal or figurative sense. In man, it is the hollow between the jaws, shut or opened by the lips, which are, therefore styled “the doors of the mouth.” In him, it is the outlet of that which defiles, or of wisdom, graciousness, and blessing. It is that which proceedeth out of the mouth by which the character of the inward man is in a great degree determined. A man whose mouth speaks the wisdom of the Deity, gracious words, and blessing, and whose conduct is in conformity with what he speaks, is one whose heart is right with the Deity, and from which no blasphemy can find utterance: “the heart of the wise teacheth his mouth,” therefore, “the mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom, and his tongue talketh of judgment” (Prov. 16:23; Ps. 37:30) But the Mouth of the Beast evidently doth not belong to mouths of this class; for it “speaks blasphemies concerning the Deity.” Hence, the heart of the Beast must be desperately wicked; for “out of the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh.” The character of the inward Beast, therefore, or of that system of things spiritual and temporal, doctrinal, practical and political, hidden in the symbols before us, must be essentially “the Mystery of Iniquity in all the deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish” (2 Thess. 2:7, 10). The Mouth of the Beast is the mouth of the wicked in their politico-religious organization. It is a mouth which “speaketh vanity,” and “poureth out evil things:” the words thereof “are smother than butter, but war is in their heart; their words are softer than oil, yet are they drawn swords.” With this Mouth “the wicked boasteth of his heart’s desire, and blesseth the covetous, whom Yahweh abhorreth. Through the pride of his countenance he will not seek, the Deity is not in all his thoughts. His ways are always grievous; thy judgments, O Yahweh! are far above out of his sight: as for all his enemies, he puffeth at them. He hath said in his heart, I shall not be moved; for I shall never be in adversity. His Mouth is full of cursing, and deceit, and fraud; under his tongue is mischief and vanity. He sitteth in the lurking-places of the villages: in the secret places doth he murder the innocent; his eyes are privily set against the poor. He lieth in wait secretly as a lion in his den; he lieth in wait to catch the poor, when he draweth him into his net. He croucheth and humbleth himself, that the poor may fall by his strong ones. He hath said in his heart, God hath forgotten: He hideth his face; he will never see it” (Psa. 10:3–11). If John had written this as descriptive of the Lion-Mouth of the Beast, nothing could have more accurately recorded what have been the facts developed in the many centuries of its wickedness and blasphemies. The words proceeding out of it have been “softer than oil” towards its worshippers; but they have been “drawn swords” against the poor saints and witnesses of the anointed Jesus. He has puffed at his enemies; for, though but feeble in arms, he has set the most powerful of his enemies at defiance; and by his spiritual thunders reduced them to the most abject submission. The Name of Blasphemy speaking by his Lion-Mouth, declares the eternity of his rule; and that he shall “see no sorrow” from which he shall not ultimately be delivered: “He saith in his heart, I shall not be moved; for I shall never be in adversity” (Apoc. 18:7); and, as for cursing, deceit, fraud, mischief and vanity, his mouth is indeed full; for in the atmosphere of these he lives, and moves, and has his being. The judgments of the Deity are indeed “out of his sight” far above him. He discerns them not. This is highly characteristic of him at the present time. Even his worshippers are hating him, and making him desolate and naked, as it has long since been predicted they would (Apoc. 17:16); yet so blind are his eyes with which he surveys the world, and so infatuate and unteachable his obdurate and beastly heart from his long surfeit and intoxication of blood (verse 6), that he can see nothing; so that, persisting in his obstinacy, the fate of the blind when they undertake to lead the blind, will come upon him in an hour when he thinks only of future glory, and he will suddenly “go into perdition,” and there will be none to help.

When a man becomes a spokesman for another he is regarded as a mouth to him. This was the case with Aaron. He was appointed for a mouth to Moses, who was slow of speech, and of a slow tongue; and Moses was to be to him in the place of God (Exod. 4:16). Hence, Aaron was Moses’ prophet, who spoke as he was moved by Moses. So of all in old time who spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit; they became mouths to Him who moved them to speak; and therefore, it is written, “the Deity spake to the fathers by the prophets.” There were such mouths of the Deity in the ecclesia at Corinth. They were styled prophets, and their utterances, prophesyings; or, speaking unto men to “edification, and exhortation, and comfort” (1 Cor. 14:3). And so also in relation to the worshippers of the Beast. They needed A PROPHET to teach and build them up in their superstition, and to be for them a bond of union in all things pertaining to it. As they designated their superstition “the Holy Catholic Apostolic,” they required a Prophet, who should be the Mouth of that system; and would expound and defend it against the Holy Scriptures, Deity Himself, and all who claimed to be His witnesses. The utterances of this Mouth would be his prophesyings; and by no means to be despised by those who should enjoy the favor of the Beast; or, of that Name of Blasphemy upon his heads. The requirements of the worshippers were provided for by the Dragon, who gave them “a Mouth speaking great things and blasphemies”; and to the Mouth himself, he “gave authority over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations;” so that “all that dwell upon the (Mediterranean) earth should worship him, whose names are not written, from the foundation of the world, in the book of the life of the Lamb slain.” To these millions of worshippers, upon whom the Deity sent “a strong delusion that they should believe a lie; that they all might be damned who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness”—the Mouth given became the spokesman of Anti-christendom—“the Mouth of the False Prophet,” or Name of Blasphemy—(Apoc. 16:13; 17:3). He is styled a false prophet, because his utterances, or prophesyings, are mere fraud, deceit, and vanity; because the signs, and lying wonders wrought in the presence of the Beast-authorities by him, are an imposture, and his preaching, allocutions, decrees, and so forth, the falsehoods of a lying oracle, by which they are deceived who have received the mark of the beast, and who worship his image (Apoc. 19:20). His end is perdition by being “cast alive into the Lake of Fire burning with brimstone.”

A Name of Blasphemy with Eyes only, might look more stoutly and defiantly than its fellows; but, however full it might be of “great things and blasphemies,” it could give no expression to them without a mouth. We have seen how Aaron was Moses’ Mouth, or prophet; so, upon a like principle, the reigning Pope for the time being is the Mouth, or Prophet, of the Name of Blasphemy; and therefore, of “the broad church,” which is the National Superstition of all the Horn-Kingdoms. The Eyes and the Mouth, then, of Daniel’s Little Horn, though in his vision placed in that horn only, represent a sovereign order of ecclesiastical officials, the Papal Dynasty, which is Eyes and Mouth both to the Ten Horns and to the Beast of the earth. Daniel says nothing of any other mouth pertaining to his Fourth Beast than this mouth of the Little Horn upon his head. He speaks of his “great iron teeth,” however; we must therefore, by the omission, no doubt designed, understand that these iron teeth belong to the Little Horn mouth. Iron is as much the symbol of the power of Rome, as brass is of that of Constantinople. If the teeth had been of brass, we must have looked to Constantinople for the Mouth; but the teeth being of iron, our attention is directed to Rome. The teeth being of iron, also connects the Mouth with the iron section of Nebuchadnezzar’s image; and the iron band of the Babylonian Stump (Dan. 4:15). This metal symbolizes the fourth dominion, as appears from ch. 2:40: “the fourth kingdom shall be as strong as iron; forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces and subdueth all things; and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise.” First, the Lion of Babylon, or the golden section of the image; then, the Bear of Medo-Persia, or the silver; third, the Leopard of Grecia, or the brazen; and fourth, the Dragon of Rome, or the iron. These are the four general phases of “the kingdom of men,” from the time of Nimrod to the future coming of the Ancient of Days to supersede it by “THE KINGDOM OF GOD.” The iron symbolizes the last: whether therefore it be a log, a band, a tooth, or a toe, if they be of iron, they are all related to the Latin section of the kingdom of men.

But, was the mouth, with its “great iron teeth,” like the mouth of a man? No: the human element of the thing signified, had been sufficiently indicated by “the Eyes, like the eyes of a man.” These represented a mystical man, the Antichrist. But, was he Babylonian, Persian, Greek, Latin, Turk, Jew, or infidel? This may be determined by the Mouth of the Monster of the Sea; for whatever the mouth is, such also is the man, or beast, that owns it. No; the mouth was not like the mouth of a man; “his Mouth,” says the apostle, “was as the mouth of a Lion,” and with “great iron teeth,” according to Daniel. It was therefore not only a ROMAN MOUTH, but a BABYLONIAN MOUTH also: for the Lion is the symbol of the old Babylonian organization of the kingdom of men. Hence, his mouth was like the mouth of Daniel’s first beast; his feet like his second’s; and his body like that of his third. This symbolization connects Babylon with Rome. Had the teeth been silver and the mouth like that of a leopard, the Name of Blasphemy would have been Persian and Greek; but, as given by John and Daniel, it can only be Latin and Babylonian. The following remarks of Daubuz on the apocalyptic identity of Rome and Babylon are quite in point here:

“Babylon in the Revelation,” he says. “is Rome, not only on account of Rome’s being guilty of usurpation, tyranny and idolatry, and of persecuting the church of God in the same manner as the old literal Babylon was, but also on the account of her being, by a successive devolution of power, the successor of the pretended rights of Babylon. The literal Babylon was the beginner and supporter of tyranny and idolatry, first by Nimrod or Ninus, and afterwards by Nebuchadnezzar; and therefore in Isaiah 47:12, she is accused of magical enchantments from her youth or infancy; namely, from the very first origin of her being a city or nation.

“This city and the whole empire thereof was taken by the Persians under Cyrus. The Persians were subdued by the Macedonians, and the Macedonians by the Romans: so that Rome succeeded to the power of the old Babylon. And it was her way to adopt the worship of the false deities she had conquered: so that by her own acts she became the Heiress and Successor of all the Babylonian idolatry, and of all that was introduced into it, by the immediate successors of Babylon, and by consequence of all the idolatry of the earth.

“Rome Catholic, corrupted by dressing up the idolatry of Rome Pagan in another form, and forcing it upon the world, because the successor of the old literal Babylon in tyranny and idolatry, and may therefore be properly represented and called by the name of Babylon; it being the usual style of the prophets to give the name of the head, or first institution, to the successors, however different they may be in some circumstances; even as in Ezek. 37, the Messiah is called David, as being successor to David; and as the Christian church, though chiefly composed of Gentiles, is called, Gal. 6:16, by the name of Israel, as successively inheriting, in a spiritual sense, the promises made to the literal Israel. So Rachel, in Jer. 31:15, Matt. 2:18, is put for the town, or women inhabiting the town of Bethlehem, wherein was the sepulchre of the literal Rachel, of which, consequently, those inhabitants were still in possession. And so the Persians and Moguls call the Ottoman Turks by the name of Roumi, i.e. Romans, because in possession of the country and capital enjoyed by the ancient Romans.

Roman Catholicism identified with Babylonian mythology. Hislop’s Two Babylons clearly demonstrates the links of Romanism with Paganism, and shows from the records of history and archaeology how the former superimposed the latter upon Apostolic Christianity. Pagan feasts and rites were given “Christian” names, and introduced into the worship of the church. The doctrines of Romanism exist in ancient Pagan religions; whereas the basic doctrines of the Scriptures do not. Basic to the teaching of Catholicism is the worship of the Mother and the Son. The following drawings, taken from Hislop’s Two Babylons identifies the two systems.

“Lastly, that Babylon is Rome is evident from the explanation given by the angel in Rev. 17:18, where it is expressly said to be that great city which ruleth over the kings of the earth: no other city but Rome being in the exercise of such power at the time when the vision was seen.”

The lion and the teeth, then, demonstrate beyond all doubt, that the Beast’s organ of utterance is Romano-Babylonian, having its seat, or throne, upon the Seven Heads, or Mountains. In other words, it is the Roman Government headed up in the Pope. This is the Name of Blasphemy, or blasphemous body-corporate, with its Eyes and Mouth, which has reigned over the Ten Horns for many ages. This sovereignty, like all others, had a beginning, as it will also have an end. It did not begin to reign as a Roman Power till all the Seven Heads of the Dragon-Beast had fulfilled their course; then that which hindered his manifestation would be totally and completely removed; for it is evident, that no Mouth like the Papal Government could co-exist in the same city with another sovereign power. Thus, if Rome were to become the capital of the kingdom of Italy, the Pope could only continue there as the Eyes and Mouth of the Horn-kingdoms without temporal sovereignty. Before these kingdoms were established, he was neither the Eyes nor Mouth of the Little Horn; but simply “HEAD OF ALL THE CHURCHES” of the Græco-Latin, or Dragon, empire. He had no imperial or royal authority; but only that sort of influence that attaches to the Chief Bishop of the capital of a dominion. In A.D. 554, and onward for many years, the Universal Latin Bishop was subject to the Exarchs of Ravenna, the Viceroys of the Emperors of Constantinople, in all things secular; while in spirituals he was acknowledged by his lord and master to be supreme. In after ages, however, he became greater than he who had created him; and when he opened his mouth in the roarings of his blasphemy he made all the beasts of the field to tremble. His heart was lifted up as the heart of Lucifer in his pride; and with a truly Babylonian Mouth, in the stoutness of his presumption, said, "I will ascend into the heavens, I will exalt my throne above the stars of AIL: I will sit also upon the Mount of the congregation in the sides of the north: I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the Most High" (Isa. 14:12–14). But there is a limit to human arrogance and blasphemy. The Romano-Babylonian Mouth of the Beast has long since passed the zenith of self-exaltation and presumption; and is now but the shadow of a name. The fate of the Babylonian Lucifer awaits him. He will be brought down to Sheol, to the sides of the pit; and though once the Mouth that made the world to tremble, and did shake kingdoms, he will be cast out as an abomination, and reproach of all peoples; for his dominion is the land of graven images, and they are mad upon their idols.

13. The Development of the Romano-Babylonian Name of Blasphemy

When the fiftieth day after the crucifixion had fully come, the apostles were all with one accord in one place, NOT IN ROME, but in Jerusalem. In obedience to the Lord's command, they were tarrying in this city until they should be endued with power from on high to execute the mission entrusted to them. Nor had they long to wait; for about nine in the morning of that day, they were all visibly and audibly filled with the Holy Spirit, and proceeded to speak as they were moved by the Spirit.

This extraordinary inflation of the apostles with Spirit when noised abroad, caused a multitude of people to assemble to behold this marvellous exhibition of the supernatural. Among these were "STRANGERS OF ROME, Jews and proselytes," who had come from the Capital of the empire to celebrate the Passover, the Wave Offering of the Sheaf, and the Feast of First Fruits, according to the Mosaic Law. Being devout Jews and proselytes, they were zealous for the law, and earnestly intent upon all the sacrificial observances it prescribed. They were acquainted with Jews of Nazareth; and with the miracles, and wonders, and signs, with which the Deity had attested his claims to the Messiahship; and had witnessed also his ignominious execution by the wicked hands of his enemies. For anything they knew, he was still in death, and securely confined within its gates; so that, whatever they might have thought of him, while living, they had doubtless settled it in their minds, that, though a man of excellent deportment, and of gracious and benevolent disposition, he was self-deceived. Was he not dead? And could a dead man be the Christ of God for the redemption of his people?

With these convictions, these devout Roman strangers stood before PETER and the rest of the apostles. They saw upon their heads Spirit, blazing in cloven-tongues of flame, the symbol of many languages in which they were declaring the wonderful works of the Deity. Astonished at the sublime eloquence outflowing from these illiterate Galilæan fishermen, they said one to another, "What meaneth this?" They had seen nothing like it in Rome, nor yet in Jerusalem, before; and there were none that could expound it, save the Eternal Spirit before whom they stood. Moved by this Divine Power, PETER standing up with the Eleven, replied to their inquiry, by saying, "Hearken ye unto my words." Why did not James, or John, "the beloved disciple," or some other apostle, rather than Peter, who, they afterwards learned, had thrice denied his Lord, stand up and invite them to hearken to his words? This inquiry would certainly be mooted before their return to Rome. They perceived that Peter was, on this Pentecostian occasion, the Mouth of the Apostolic Body; nor was he a Babylonian Mouth, nor a Roman Mouth, but the Mouth of Deity, in the sense of the Deity speaking by him. Why was this? To this question it would be replied, that the Spirit had given the Keys of the Kingdom of the Heavens to Peter according to a previous promise through Jesus Christ, who had said, "I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of the heavens, and whatsoever thou shalt bind upon the earth, shall be bound in the heavens; and whatsoever thou shalt loose upon the earth, shall be loosed in the heavens” (Matt. 16:19). What they saw and heard was in fulfilment of this promise, and of what had been spoken by the prophet Joel. Their attention being gained by this, they were furthermore informed by Peter, the Holder of the Keys, that all that had recently been transacted in Jerusalem connected with the crucifixion, was “by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of the Deity.” He charged them directly with the murder of Jesus, saying, “him ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain.” They had demanded his life, and imprecated the curse of his blood upon them and their children. But, continued Peter, the Deity hath delivered him from death, and placed him at the right hand of power in the heaven, there to remain until the time shall come for Deity to give him the throne of his father David; in proof of which, he shed forth the Spirit which they saw upon the heads of the apostles, and heard in all the languages of the empire.

The result of this discourse of the Spirit by the mouth of Peter, was the conviction, that the same Jesus they had crucified was alive again, and by the Deity made both Lord and Christ. These devout Jews and proselytes of Rome were pricked in their heart, and said to Peter and the rest of the apostles, “Men and brethren, What shall we do?” They perceived that they were involved in the greatest of crimes from which they knew not how they could be loosed. The import of their question was therefore, What must we do to be loosed from the consequences of our iniquity? Again it was Peter who took up the question put to all the apostles; for “Peter said unto them, Repent, and be immersed every one of you for the Name of Jesus Christ, epi to onomati, unto remission of sins,” eis aphasin harnartion. This command of the Spirit was new doctrine indeed to these Roman strangers from the Capital; but their conviction of its truth, “caused them to cease sacrificing and offering” (Dan. 9:27) according to the law; and gladly receiving Peter’s word, to be immersed for the Name. They were now immersed believers of the things concerning the kingdom of the Deity and the Name of Jesus Christ (Acts 2:38; 8:12). Peter by the use of his Key had opened the door of the prison in which they were bound, and gave them liberty in loosing them from their sins: and what he had done upon earth was ratified in the heavens, according to the words of Jesus.

Having thus become CHRISTADELPHIANS, or Brethren of the Christ they had crucified and slain, they had placed themselves in such a position, that, on their arrival in Rome, they would be regarded as apostates from Judaism; and no longer worthy of fellowship in the Synagogue of the Jews. It can easily be conceived what an excitement would be created in the Jewish community of Rome. They would, of course, tell the story of what they had seen, heard, and done; but, from the temper of the Jews in those days, we may know that, if they had no other evidence than their own assertion, they would be accused of falsehood and blasphemy; and accounted as worthy of a like fate with the Nazarene. But, the Spirit in Jerusalem had provided for such an eventuality in Rome and elsewhere. He knew that “the Jews, devout men, from every nation under heaven,” after the feasts were over, would have to return to their several countries and friends; and he knew also, that such extraordinary facts and doctrines as he had prepared for mankind, required no less than the attestation of Deity in his co-operation with his witnesses. Hence, he not only moved Peter to specify the condition upon which believers of the Gospel of the Kingdom might be loosed from all past sins; but he moved him also to promise the baptized “the gift of the Holy Spirit.” Filled sufficiently with this, they would be prepared for any emergency that might arise.

What, then, was necessary to equip these new converts for the work of introducing the gospel of Jesus Christ among the Jews of Rome? It was necessary that all things they had heard from the apostles should be brought to their remembrance; and that they should be guided into all the truth (John 14:8–14). This was as needful for them in Rome as for the apostles in Jerusalem. But more was required than this. It was necessary that what they affirmed as truth of Deity issuing from their mouth, should be acknowledged by Him as such; that their hearers might believe for the work’s sake. In this case, their faith would “stand not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of the Deity.” In short, it was necessary, that they should have all “the diversities of gifts” constituting “the Manifestation of the Spirit;” such as the word of wisdom, the word of knowledge, faith as it were, to remove mountains, gifts of healing, the working of miracles, prophecy, discerning of spirits, diverse kinds of tongues, and the interpretation of tongues (1 Cor. 12:4–10). Now, these gifts they would no doubt receive by the imposition of the hands of Peter, after the manner recorded of him, when the apostles sent him and John down to Samaria for a like purpose; who, when they arrived, “prayed for them that they might receive holy spirit: then laid they hands upon them and they received holy spirit” (Acts 8:15–17). In this way the gifts were imparted when apostolically and evangelistically bestowed.

Thus equipped, these “strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes,” would be transformed into a company of “prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers;” or saints perfected for the work of the ministry, for the formation in Rome of the Body of Christ, and its edification; until it should attain to perfect manhood in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of the Deity—“to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ: that thenceforth it be no more composed of babes, tossed to-and-fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness whereby they lie in wait to deceive.” All among these circumcised strangers from Rome, having the moral qualifications specified by Paul in his letters to Timothy and Titus, would be, doubtless, thus spiritually equipped through the instrumentality of Peter, who, with the rest of the apostles, would request them, as Brethren of Christ, to devote themselves with all earnestness to “speaking the truth in love” to the Brethren in Moses; not in Rome only, but in all Italy, as opportunity might serve: not forgetting, of course, this necessary principle of action, that they be faithful to the original elements of the doctrine delivered to them; and that they so build upon the foundation, that the converts they might make might “grow up into him in all things who is THE HEAD,” and therefore both Eyes and Mouth of the Body; or, as Peter styles him, “the Chief Shepherd and Bishop (episcopos) of their souls.” “From whom the whole Body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working of the Spirit in the measure of every part (whether a prophet, evangelist, pastor or teacher) maketh increase of the Body unto the edifying of itself in love” (Eph. 4:9–16). These instructions would be endorsed by all the apostles, among whom John would tell them, that he and the rest had declared unto them what they had seen and heard, that they might have fellowship with them; “and truly,” said he, “our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ, in whom is no darkness at all;” so that, if they walked in the light, they would have “fellowship with one another, and the blood of Jesus Christ would cleanse them from all sin” (1 John 1:3–7).

On their arrival in Rome, they would be, whether many or few would matter not, the Body of Christ in that city—the Holy Apostolic Ecclesia on the Seven Heads. They were a company of Christadelphians, Christou adelphoi, or Brethren of Christ, who believed into him through the word of Peter and the Eleven (John 17:20). This was the day of small things, which they did not despise. They had no temple, cathedral, or synagogue in which they could meet on their return, A.D. 33. Even seventeen years after they met in the house of Priscilla and Aquila, two Jews, who made tents for a living, Acts 18:2; Rom. 16:5. In this place, Paul mentions twenty-six by name, and alludes to others connected with them. Some of them, doubtless, were the original “strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes”; but there is nothing extant to distinguish them from the rest. When Paul wrote to the ecclesia in Rome, he speaks of Tryphena and Tryphosa “who labor in the Lord.” These may have been two of them, but there is no certainty. Whatever their names may have been, matters not now; they are no doubt on record in the heavens. They were apostolically “in the Lord,” and were prepared to state “the truth as it is in Jesus,” and to illustrate it, and to prove it, infallibly, or without making mistakes. This infallibility resided not in a Pope or a single bishop. There was no Bishop or Pope of Rome at that early day besides Tiberius Caesar, who was the Pontifex Maximus of the whole empire. There were bishops of the ecclesia in Rome; for these “prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers,” newly arrived from Jerusalem, were the presbyters, or elders, and overseers, or episcopoi, of their wonderful, though little, community, whose mission it was, first, to separate a people for the name of Christ; and secondly, to subvert the superstition of the capital. These saints, as the Star-Angel of the Ecclesia in Rome (Apoc. 1:20) were infallible teachers and rulers, whose infallibility was not of themselves, but of Holy Spirit ministered to them by Peter and the Eleven. This guided them into all the truth, and brought all things to their remembrance; so that thus they acquired a mouth and wisdom from Christ, which all their adversaries were not able to gainsay or successfully to resist (Luke 21:15).

At this early date, A.D. 33, all that were in Rome called saints, were “the beloved of the Deity.” It was not then necessary to go to Rome to be “canonized” by a pope. They had been made saints at Jerusalem by the word, which called them to that holiness without which no man can see the Lord (John 17:17; Rom. 1:7). These spiritually-endowed saints were the Mouth of the Deity; first, to the Jews; and some years afterwards, to the Gentiles, of Rome. For a few years, they preached the gospel to none but Jews; so that for that space, the ecclesia in that city was composed solely of the circumcised. It is not surprising, therefore, that the pagans should make no distinction between the Ecclesia and the Synagogue. They regarded them all as Jews; so that, when Claudius commanded all Jews to depart from Rome, Aquila and Priscilla, though Christians, had to leave. But, before the publication of this edict, Peter had opened the door of faith to Gentiles, as recorded in Acts 10 and 11. The news of this soon reached Rome, and the Mouth of Deity was opened there to the same effect. Pagans were invited to “the obedience of faith for His name,” that they might become “the tabernacle of the Deity, and dwellers in the heaven,” together with the saints already separated from the Synagogue. But for this extension of the Ecclesia, the edict of Claudius would have left none of the saints in Rome. It expelled all natural Jews, without regard to their belief; so that, in this crisis, the Ecclesia there would become in appearance entirely Gentile. But, when the edict became obsolete, the Jewish members would many of them return; nevertheless, the Jewish influence in the Ecclesia would predominate no more.

From this sketch of the origin of things in Rome, the reader will easily perceive how Peter, the apostle of the Circumcision, and the Two Keys, came in after times to occupy so prominent a position in the capital. When the strangers of Rome returned from Jerusalem, they would unquestionably speak more about Peter than the rest, because he was chief speaker. From this fact, he would acquire the title “Prince of the Apostles” and Holder of the Keys: and though there is no reliable evidence that he ever was in Rome (and, if he ever had been there, the account of it would hardly have been omitted from the Acts), the part he enacted was so conspicuous, that his relation to Rome in the introduction of the gospel there, would seem almost like his personal presence. In process of time, this would be affirmed, like many other imaginary things, to be a fact; and then, when popes came into fashion, they would seek to sanctify the imposition by styling Peter “the first pope!”

In the earliest years of the ecclesia in Rome, its faith was spoken of throughout all the empire. Its members presented their bodies a living sacrifice, and were not conformed to the world; but were transformed by the renewing of their mind; which was characterized by unanimity, a disregard of high things, and association with men of low estate. The Star-Angel that ruled them was neither “Bishop of Rome,” “Universal Bishop,” nor “Pope;” but a presbytery, or eldership, of inspired men of low degree in society, whose only ambition it was to be “glorified together with Jesus Christ.” They would have rejected with indignation and contempt the idea of being united with the State, or any state, as “the Church by law established.” Their mission was to convert sinners from the error of their way, not to form alliances with them; for they well knew that the friend of the world is the enemy of God (James 4:4; 1 John 2:15).

But this state of ecclesiastical affairs, so highly commendable, did not continue very long undisturbed by “unlearned questions and strifes of words,” which do not edify. Peter’s use of the SECOND KEY entrusted to him, and to him only, to the exclusion of all successors in Caesarea and elsewhere, aroused all the latent prejudices of the Jewish mind, whether identified with the Synagogue or the Ecclesia. The Jewish element of the Body of Christ soon found themselves in the minority; and that the uncircumcised were rejoicing in things which Peter said nothing about, when, by the use of the FIRST KEY, he opened the door of faith to them. Some of them were Judaistically disposed, while others who had been added from the Synagogue were but partially enlightened, and developed themselves as “false brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily (or with a secret purpose) to spy out the liberty which the Gentile party had in Christ Jesus, that they might bring it into bondage.” These false brethren stood up in all the ecclesias of Christ, and became the occasion of much trouble and anxiety to Paul, who was “preacher, apostle, and teacher of the Gentiles” (2 Tim. 1:11). Thus, Paul being especially the apostle of the uncircumcision, and Peter the apostle of the circumcision, in Corinth the Judaizers said they were of Cephas, or Peter; while their opponents, who advocated liberty from Mosaic bondage, said they were of Paul. The same condition of things manifested itself in Rome. The false brethren there were zealous for Peter, in whom they boasted as the Prince of the Apostles and Holder of the Keys. Their dogma was, that “it was needful to circumcise the Gentile converts to Christ, and to command them to keep the law of Moses, or they would not be saved” (Acts 15:1, 5): and, although this was contradicted by all the apostles as well as Paul, they continued to teach it; and with so much success, that the leaders of the faction and their disciples throughout Asia Minor, all turned away from Paul (2 Tim. 1:15); whom they did not hesitate to speak of evilly and with disrespect.

The false brethren in Rome were not behind their brethren in the provinces in zeal for the propagation of their traditions. By their fruits they were proved to be “grievous wolves, not sparing the flock; and speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them.” Their party was in secret alliance with the Synagogue; and their purpose seems to have been to Judaize Christianity, and then to use it in this corrupt form to turn the idolators from Jupiter to Moses, and subordinately, to Christ. In this way they would draw disciples after them, and thus acquire importance and influence in the world, which they clearly perceived were not to be obtained by devotion to the unadulterated Word. The interests of Christ’s flock they measured by their own selfishness, which was promoted by the assumption of clerical lordship over the multitude of them that believed. Paul alludes to these “grievous wolves,” overlaid with wool, styled by Christ Jesus, “false prophets who come in sheep’s clothing, but inwardly are ravening wolves,” in his letter to the saints in Rome, ch. 16:17, saying, “I beseech you, brethren, mark them who cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine you have learned; and AVOID THEM. For they that are such serve not the Lord Jesus Christ, but their own belly; and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple.” They caused divisions and offences, which, when viewed in the light of the apostolic teaching, and that of the Star-Angel which presided over them, were clearly seen to be such.

Now, it was from this Judaizing Faction in the Ecclesia at Rome all those evils sprung, which afterwards attained maturity as “THE CHURCH OF ROME.” The false brethren of this anti-apostolic faction were the outward expression of that “Mystery of Iniquity” which Paul said “doth already work.” In the beginning, it worked cautiously until it gained sufficient hold to make it careless of appearances. It aimed at the establishment of a HIERARCHY, or Sacred Order of Rulers, whose authority should be supreme over all. This Order is styled by Paul “the Man of Sin, the Son of Perdition.” So long as primitive apostolic equality was maintained among the presbyters, or overseers, of the ecclesia, there was no scope for the exhibition of such a tendency. The apostles were not lords over the faith of their brethren in Christ, but helpers of their joy. All the ecclesias were classed into rulers and ruled; but the rulers were no less governed by the authority of Christ in all their administrations, than the ruled were in all their religious practices. They were subject one to another, and clothed with humility. But, when a zeal for the doctrines and commandments of men, and a striving for power and dominion over one another took the place of the simplicity which is in Christ, the Mystery of Iniquity began to crop out, first, in the separation of the elders into a distinct order; and afterwards, in one particular presbytery usurping supremacy over the rest.

Originally the distinction of clergy and laity did not exist. The professors of Christianity were all brethren in Christ; and their several ecclesias, the clergies, kleroi, or heritages, of the Deity. The elders, or the episcopal presbyters, were exhorted by Peter to “feed the flock of the Deity, episcopizing it willingly; but not as lording over the heritages.” The ecclesial heritages, or clergies, composed the flock, which the elders were to episcopize, or oversee, not for their own sordid interests, but for the benefit of the flock itself.

But soon after the breaking up of the Mosaic Commonwealth by the Romans A.D. 70, the Judaizers changed the relations of things. They argued, that now the Levitical Order was removed, the Elderships of the ecclesias should take its place; and as the tribe of Levi was Yahweh's clergy, lot, or heritage under the law, so the Elderships should now be regarded as his clergy under the gospel; not forgetting to put in a claim for Levi's tithes and other perquisites. Whatever might have been thought of the claim, and the argument to enforce it, matters not; the Judaizing Presbyters and Deacons became the “priest and Levites” of the growing apostasy; and soon after ripened into a Hierachy, or “Holy Order,” called “The Clergy,” in contradistinction to the multitude, whom they styled ho laos, the Laity, or common people.

Having successfully usurped the birthright of Christ's brethren, and imposed themselves upon the Deity as his charge, or lot, an element of “the blasphemy of them who say they are Jews(and are not, but the synagogue of the Satan” (Apoc. 2:9), they were prepared to push onwards for the Satan's throne. About the middle of the second century, a very important change occurred promotive of this unhallowed ambition. The innovation then taking place, was a marked distinction between the Bishop and the Elder; in consequence of which a third kind of office was created; so that, instead of Episcopal Elders, or bishops and deacons, we come to read in ecclesiastical authors of bishops, presbyters and deacons. In a collection of epistles attributed to Ignatius, this novel and unscriptural distinction frequently and officially obtrudes upon the reader. This novelty soon came to be generally admitted, and paved the way for pernicious results. The adoption of the idea laid the foundation for the dominion of a Clerical King, or Pontiff, with clerical officials; a kingdom which, having originated in the Mystery of Iniquity, could not possibly ultimate in any other manifestation than that which has filled the habitable with hypocrisy and crime for sixteen hundred years. The passage alluded to in Ignatius is in a letter from him to Polycarp: “Attend to the Bishop,” says he, “that God may attend to you. I pledge my soul for theirs, who are subject to the Bishop, presbyters, and deacons. Let my part in God be with them.” No man guided by the Spirit into all the truth could write in such a style as this. Again, in his epistle to the Ephesians, ch. 6, it is said, “the more silent a man finds the bishop, he ought to reverence him the more”: on which Dr. Campbell remarks, that “one would be tempted to think this has originated with some opulent ecclesiastic, who was far too great a man for preaching; at least, we may say, it seems an oblique apology for those who have no objection to anything implied in a bishopric, except the discharge of its duties. No one whose notion of the duties of a bishop correspond with the prophet Isaiah's idea of a watchman, ch. 56:10, would have thought taciturnity a recommendation.” The passage must have been an interpolation, or if Ignatius really wrote it, he must have been in league with the Judaizers. Surely he could not have been ignorant that Paul required a bishop to be “able by sound doctrine, both to exhort and convince the gainsayers; for there are many unruly and vain talkers and deceivers, specially they of the circumcision; whose mouths must be stopped, who subvert whole houses, teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake." A silent bishop would be of no use in such a diocese. To talk down vain talkers who had made such a progress as this, would require an amount of words that would effectually destroy the reputation of any bishop for a taciturn, and therefore worshipful official. The writers in the interest of the Latin Name of Blasphemy have fabricated a list of what they style "Bishops of Rome." The first fifty-six they have named "Saints," in their sense of the word, which signifies one decreed to be holy by an official act of the pope! This sounds infinitely ridiculous in the ears of an enlightened believer, who knows that all true Christians, without distinction of class or order, are made saints by "the obedience of faith," independently of the acts and decrees of popes, bishops, presbyters, or councils. The memory of the faithful and humble presbyters who ruled the Ecclesia in Rome, is insulted and blasphemed by papal canonization. Though men of low degree, and despised by the wise and prudent of their day, they were men of whom Rome, the common sewer of nations, has never been worthy; but of all blasphemies ever uttered to their disparagement, that of being declared "saints," in the Romish sense of the word, is the greatest of all.

Of the said fifty-six, the catholic bishop Sylvester, who flourished in apostasy in the reign of Constantine, is reckoned the thirty-fourth saint from the apostle Peter, to whom they lyingly assign a reign of twenty-four years in Rome, as the first pope! The only reign of Peter in Rome was after the manner of his reign in America or Britain at this day, where his doctrine may be believed and obeyed. Where this reigns, Peter reigns; nay, more, Christ and the Father reign; for, said the Lord Jesus to his apostles, "he that heareth you heareth me; and he that despiseth you despiseth me; and he that despiseth me despiseth Him that sent me" (Luke 10:16). This saying constitutes the Father, Christ, and the Apostles, as one authority; and the only authority to which obedience should be rendered in spiritual affairs. Where this authority rules, everything works to the self-edification of the body in love. Had its members continued faithful to this supremacy, there would have been no scope for sovereign bishops and popes. But the Divine authority fell into disuse. It was no longer, what saith the Scripture? but, what saith the Bishop? And in later times, what saith the Bishop of Rome, or the Pope? An incredible number of volumes have been written to propagate and defend the old wife's fable of Peter's popeship, with Mark, Barnabas, and all others, as his subordinate clergy. Having planted him upon the Seven Heads, with these for his college of Cardinal Princes, they have, as a consequence, claimed Rome as the throne of spiritual dominion, and the Bishop there as the only true undoubted Christian Pontiff! And thus, by such a lying conceit, Peter, Mark, Barnabas, and their Company, are, in effect, made the inception of the Name of Blasphemy upon the Seven Hills!

Ecclesiastical writers refer to the third century as the time when the doctrine, order, and worship, instituted by the apostles, under went a memorable and manifest change. The theology of the Judaizers had, to a great extent, drawn off the attention of professors from "the simplicity that is in Christ Jesus," and fixed it on a Hierarchy, particularly in Rome, Antioch, Alexandria, and Carthage, which, by this time, had become numerous, and ranked among their adherents many wealthy citizens. Professors of Christianity were now very numerous, and therefore, of no little consequence in the estimation of the government, which favored or repressed them as reasons of State dictated.

In this century, a system of ecclesiastical management was introduced, aptly styled by some, the Episcopal System of Church Law. It got rid of the trouble of consulting the laity, or common people, on the affairs of their respective ecclesias; it introduced sacerdotal or priestly authority; it set up as many principalities as there were bishoprics; it acknowledged the Bishop in Rome as the first in order, but nothing more; and to consummate the whole, it eventually deprived the so-called laity of all right to be consulted about their own affairs. This state of things, when compared with that exhibited in the Acts of the Apostles, indicates a notable falling away; of which, the following quotation from Mosheim will give the reader some idea:

“The most respectable writers of that age,” says he, “have put it out of the power of an historian to spread a veil over the enormities of ecclesiastical rulers. For, though several yet continued to exhibit to the world illustrious examples of primitive piety and christian virtue (these were the “few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments,” and the “little strength” of Philadelphia that had “kept the word, and had not denied the name of Christ”—Author) yet many were sunk in luxury and voluptuousness; puffed up with vanity, arrogance, and ambition; possessed with a spirit of contention and discord, and addicted to many other vices that cast an undeserved reproach upon the holy religion of which they were the unworthy professors and ministers. In many places the bishops assumed a princely authority, particularly those who had the greatest number of churches under their inspection, and who presided over the most opulent assemblies. They appropriated to their evangelical functions the splendid ensigns of temporal majesty. A throne, surrounded with ministers, exalted above his equals the servant of the meek and lowly Jesus; and sumptuous garments dazzled the eyes and minds of the multitude into an ignorant veneration for their arrogated authority. Presbyters, followed their example, neglected their duties, and abandoned themselves to the indolence and delicacy of an effeminate and luxurious life. Deacons imitated their superiors, and the effects of a corrupt ambition were spread through every rank of the Sacred Order.”

In treating of the progress of episcopal authority he remarks that “the prelates of the third century imperceptibly changed the language of exhortation into that of command, scattered the seeds of future usurpations, and supplied, by scripture allegories and declamatory rhetoric, their deficiency of force and of reason. They exalted the unity and power of the church, as it was represented in the episcopal office, of which every bishop enjoyed an equal and undivided portion. Princes and magistrates, it was often repeated, might boast an earthly claim to a transitory dominion; it was the episcopal authority alone which was derived from the Deity, and extended itself over this and over another world. The Bishops (it was said) were the Vicegerents of Christ, the successors of the Apostles, and the Mystic Substitutes of the High Priest of the Mosaic law. Their exclusive privilege of conferring the sacerdotal character, invaded the freedom both of clerical and popular elections; and if, in the administration of the church, they still consulted the judgment of the presbyters (or elders), or the inclination of the people, they most carefully inculcated the merit of such a voluntary condescension. The bishops acknowledged the supreme authority which resided in the assembly of their brethren (of the episcopal order); but in the government of his peculiar diocese, each of them exacted from his flock the same implicit obedience as if that favorite metaphor had been literally just, and as if the shepherd had been of a more exalted nature than that of his sheep. This obedience, however, was not imposed without some efforts on one side, and some resistance on the other. The democratical part of the constitution was, in many places, very warmly supported by the zealous or interested opposition of the inferior clergy. But their patriotism received the ignominious epithets of faction and schism; and the episcopal cause was indebted for its rapid progress to the labors of many active prelates who, like Cyprian of Carthage, could reconcile the arts of the most ambitious statesman with the christian virtues which seem adapted to the character of a saint and martyr.

“The same causes,” he continues, “which at first had destroyed the equality of the presbyters, introduced among the bishops a pre-eminence of rank, and from thence a superiority of jurisdiction. As often as in the spring and autumn they met in provincial synod, the difference of personal merit and reputation was very sensibly felt among the members of the assembly, and the multitude was governed by the wisdom and eloquence of the few. But the order of public proceedings required a more regular and less invidious distinction; the office of perpetual presidents in the Councils of each province was conferred on the bishops of the principal city, and these aspiring prelates, who soon acquired the lofty titles of Metropolitans and Primates, secretly prepared themselves to usurp over their episcopal brethren the same authority which the bishops had so lately assumed above the college of presbyters. Nor was it long before an emulation of pre-eminence and power prevailed among the metropolitans themselves, each of them affecting to display, in the most pompous terms, the temporal honors and advantages of the city over which he presided; the numbers and opulence of the christians, who were subject to their pastoral care; saints and martyrs who had arisen among them, and the purity with which they had preserved the tradition of the faith, as it had been transmitted through a series of orthodox bishops from the apostle, or the apostolic disciple, to whom the foundation of their church was ascribed. From every cause, either of a civil or of an ecclesiastical nature, it was easy to foresee that ROME must enjoy the respect, and would soon claim the obedience, of the provinces. The society of the faithful bore a just proportion to the capital of the empire; and the Roman church was the greatest, the most numerous, and, in regard to the West, the most ancient of all the christian establishments, many of which had received their religion from the pious labors of her missionaries. Instead of one apostolic founder, the utmost boast of Antioch, of Ephesus, or of Corinth, the banks of the Tyber were supposed to have been honored with the preaching and martyrdom of the two most eminent among the apostles; and the Bishops of Rome very prudently claimed the inheritance of whatever prerogatives were attributed, either to the person, or to the office, of St. Peter. The bishops of Italy and of the provinces were disposed to allow them a primacy of order and association (such was their very accurate expression) in the christian aristocracy. But (in the third century) the power of a monarch was rejected with abhorrence, and the aspiring genius of Rome experienced, from the nations of Asia and Africa, a more vigorous resistance to her spiritual, than she had formerly done to her temporal, dominion. The patriotic Cyprian who ruled with the most absolute sway the church of Carthage and the provincial synods, opposed with resolution and success the ambition of the Roman Bishop, artfully connected his own cause with that of the eastern bishops, and, like Hannibal, sought out new allies in the heart of Asia. If this Punic war was carried on without any effusion of blood, it was owing much less to the moderation than to the weakness of the contending prelates. Invectives and excommunications were their only weapons; and these, during the progress of the whole controversy, they hurled against each other with equal fury and devotion.

When the Bishops of Rome rose to positions of primacy, the history of the papacy began. As Eureka states: "The bishops then claimed to be the vicegerets of Christ". The representation above from the fifth century depicts the Pope as "the vicar of the city of Rome" (see inscription at the top) —Publishers.

"From the imperious declamations of Cyprian, we should naturally conclude that the doctrines of excommunication and penance formed the most essential part of religion, and that it was much less dangerous for the disciples of Christ to neglect the observance of the moral duties, than to despise the censures and authority of their bishops. Sometimes we might imagine that we were listening to the voice of Moses, when he commanded the earth to open, and to swallow up, in consuming flames, the rebellious race which refused obedience to the priesthood of Aaron; and we should sometimes suppose that we heard a Roman Consul asserting the majesty of the republic, and declaring his inflexible resolution to enforce the rigor of the laws. 'If such irregularities are suffered with impunity (it is thus that the Bishop of Carthage chides the lenity of his colleague) if such irregularities are suffered, there is an end of episcopal vigor; an end of the sublime and divine power of governing the church, an end of christianity itself.' Cyprian had renounced those temporal honors which it is probable he would never have obtained; but the acquisition of such absolute command over the conscience and understanding of a congregation, however obscure or despised by the world, is more truly grateful to the pride of the human heart than the possession of the most despotic power, imposed by arms and conquest on a reluctant people.

“A perpetual stream of strangers and provincials flowed into the capacious bosom of Rome. Whatever was strange or odious whoever was guilty or suspected might hope, in the obscurity of that immense capital, to elude the vigilance of the law. In such a various conflux of nations, every teacher, either of truth or of falsehood, every founder, whether of a virtuous or criminal association, might easily multiply his disciples or accomplices. The christians of Rome, at the time of the persecution of Nero, A.D. 61, in which Paul suffered death, are represented by Tacitus as amounting to a very great multitude. The church in Rome was undoubtedly the first and most populous in the empire”—not first in order of beginning, but in that of influence; “and we are possessed of an authentic record which attests the state of religion in that city about the middle of the third century, and after a peace of thirty-eight years. The clergy at that time consisted of ONE BISHOP, (named CORNELIUS, and of the Babylonian Mouth Order,) forty-six presbyters, seven deacons, as many subdeacons, forty-two acolytes, and fifty readers, exorcists, and porters. The number of widows, of the infirm and of the poor, who were maintained by the oblations of the faithful, amounted to fifteen hundred. From reason, it may be estimated that the Christians in Rome were about fifty thousand. The populousness of that great capital will not surely have been less than a million of inhabitants, of whom christians might constitute at the most a twentieth part.”

A list of the first twenty-six “popes” (or Bishops of Rome) preserved by the Church from the 8th century. Cornelius, referred to in Eureka, is No. XXII in the list—Publishers.

In the middle of the third century, this Cornelius figures as the Roman Mouth of that section of professors who now assumed to themselves the title of “the Holy Catholic Church.” The spirit of the Lion fully possessed him: and he spoke with all the loftiness and inflation of his prototype in Babylon. A council was convened in Rome while he was in office, which decreed the propriety of excommunicating the founder of the Novatians, who could no longer tolerate the episcopal arrogance and corruption of the times. In writing to Fabius, bishop of Antioch, on the decrees of the council, he undertakes to delineate the character of Novatus, who, judged by an enemy, would appear a very disreputable person. The extracts given by Eusebius (himself also an enemy to Novatus) from the letters of Cornelius, show the latter to have been truly a wolf in sheep’s clothing. He speaks of Novatus “aspiring to the episcopate” which he styles a “precipitate ambition,” and a folly. He speaks of “the artifice and duplicity,” “the perjuries and falsehoods, the dissocial and savage character,” “the devices and wickedness,” of “that artful and malicious beast.” The crime of Novatus consisted in maintaining that the Christian ecclesia was a society where virtue and innocence should reign; and whose members, from their entrance into it, were undefiled by any enormous crime. This most Scriptural position, consequently, caused him to regard every society which readmitted heinous offenders to communion, after the custom in Rome, as unworthy the title of a Christian ecclesia. This gave Cornelius and his adherents mortal offence, which was greatly aggravated by the Novatians obliging such as came over to them from the Catholics to be reimmersed, as a necessary preparation for entering their society. By the maintaining of this impregnable position, the nominally Christian body in Rome and elsewhere was rent in twain. There was now a large minority who repudiated the system of things described in the above citations from Gibbon and Mosheim; and who, in so doing, renounced all allegiance to the episcopate of the Apocalyptic “Synagogue of the Satan.” The Novatian minority regarded Cornelius as the prince of this synagogue in Rome, denied the Christianity of what he called “the Holy Ecclesia,” and claimed that the true apostolic faith and discipline was with the Novatians or Puritans, and with them alone.

This being the issue between Cornelius and Novatus, and knowing, on credible testimony, the awful corruption of morals that prevailed, we are at no loss to perceive the bitterness and malignity that inspired the epithets of Cornelius. A man who was contending earnestly for purity would be careful, for the sake of consistency, if for no other reason, to avoid such offences against morality as Cornelius accuses him of. "We have seen," says he to Fabius, "within a short time, an extraordinary conversion and change in Novatus. For this most illustrious man, and he who affirmed with the most dreadful oaths, that he never aspired to the Episcopate, has suddenly appeared a bishop, as thrown among us by some machine!" Novatus, doubtless, affirmed the truth, that he did not aspire to the Roman Episcopate, as constituted by the novel episcopal system of church law; but had no objection to act as bishop, presbyter, or elder, with others, upon a pure and Scriptural foundation. The means by which he was appointed such, the jealous Cornelius likens to "some machine" projecting him into their midst. The appearance of Novatus, claiming to be Bishop of the Only True Ecclesia in Rome, ordained an elder by three sympathizing elders from an Italian province, would create quite a sensation; especially when his presence there was hailed, and his ordination endorsed, by a large minority of the original community. We can imagine how Bishop Cornelius felt by supposing what would be the feeling of Pius IX, the present successor of Cornelius, if a second Novatus were now to appear in Rome, endorsed by nearly half the Catholics of St. Peter's alleged patrimony, as the only true successor of the apostle! Bishop Pius would no doubt be in a foaming rage, and open his lion-mouth in the most orthodox Babylonian style. He would defame and curse his rival in the fashion and phraseology peculiar to Roman Holiness, which claims universal and absolute authority over all. Cornelius though neither universal nor absolute, yet spoke as an episcopal lion's whelp who felt the spirit of future greatness moving within, and said, "this dogmatist, this pretended champion of ecclesiastical discipline, when he attempted to seize and usurp the episcopate not given him from above (whence Cornelius claimed to have received it) selected two desperate characters as his associates, to send them to some small, and that the smallest, parts of Italy, and from thence, by some fictitious plea, to impose upon three bishops there, men altogether ignorant and simple, affirming and declaring, that it was necessary for them to come to Rome in all haste, that all the dissension that had there arisen might be removed through their mediation in conjunction with the other bishops. When these men had come, being, as before observed, but simple and inexperienced in discerning the artifice and villany of the wicked, they were shut up with men of the same stamp with himself, and at the tenth hour, heated with wine and surfeiting, they forced them, by a kind of shadowy and empty imposition of hands, to confer the episcopate (pertaining to the ecclesia in Rome) upon him; which, though by no means suited to him, he claims by fraud and treachery. This was the roaring of the Lion-like Mouth, A.D. 251. The epithets sounded out against poor Novatus and his brethren, who were doing the best in their power to organize a Scriptural association, by which the original Apostolic faith and discipline introduced by the converted "Jews and proselytes" from Jerusalem, and strengthened afterwards by Paul's personal ministration for two whole years, might be maintained and perpetuated in Rome; and the Apostasy then so advanced there might be broken up, or restrained: the epithets which denounced this holy enterprise, and the unproved and reckless assertions accompanying them, are in themselves a justification of it. Cornelius claimed to be in possession of Holy Spirit; and therefore, when voted into office by his copresbyters, to have received "the episcopate from above;" all his sanguinary and blasphemous successors claim the same things; but his fruits and theirs clearly evince that the only spirit that has worked in them all is the spirit peculiar to "the children of disobedience." We know, by experience, how readily "fellows of the baser sort," pretending to great conscientiousness, and zeal for religion, busy themselves, for the promotion of their own wicked purposes, in defaming and bearing false witness against men whose lives are devoted to the propagation and defence of the truth. These were evidently the weapons of Cornelius wielded against the company of brethren convened in Rome. The wine and surfeiting story was most likely trumped up for the occasion. The author has been vilified, by so-called “elders,” after the same fashion. The same sort of accusation was circulated against the Lord himself; so that we can endorse the truth and justice of an observation of Dr. Jortin, that “we should not trust too much to the representations which christians, after the apostolic age, have given of the heretics of their times. Proper abatements must be made for credulity, zeal, resentment, mistake and exaggeration.”

It is easy to perceive how deeply Cornelius’ episcopal pride was wounded, from the following words: “This asserter of the gospel then,” says he, “did not know that there should be BUT ONE BISHOP in a catholic ecclesia—en katholike ecclesia. Novatius and Novatus both knew that, whatever there should be in a catholic church, there ought to be in a Scriptural ecclesia, more than one. If the original episcopal plurality had not been departed from, there would have been no place found for an Episcopal Monarch in Rome. Cornelius was such a king in embryo. The “shadowy and empty imposition of hands,” which he attributes to Novatus, had made him such; and it is the same sort of imposition, by which all bishops according to “church law,” are imposed upon credulous and deceived communities. Sixteen bishops ordained Cornelius, and three ordained Novatus; the whole nineteen claiming to possess the Spirit. Which was the bishop from above? Cornelius was ordained first. True; and Saul was ordained before David. Priority therefore, determines nothing. The anointing of David was the repudiation of Saul. And so it proved with reference to the Five Episcopal Bodies in Rome. The organization of the NEW ECCLESIA in the capital of the empire was, Providentially, the first step to the spuing of the Catholic Synagogue of the Satan out of the Spirit’s Mouth (Apoc. 3:16); and to the leaving it upon the Seven Heads, “a wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked,” carcass; then after to be galvanized by imperial power and authority into a political existence, the judicial termination of which is waiting at the door. It seems that Cornelius avenged his wounded dignity, in true papal fashion, upon the bishops who ordained Novatus; for he says, “one of these, not long after, returned to his church, mourning and confessing his error, with whom also we communed as a layman, as all the people present interceded for him, and we sent successors to the other bishops, ordaining them in the place where they were.” The successors sent were probably to rule catholic churches formed by the divisions endorsing the corrupt practices and lay discipline of the Cornelian church in Rome. The following extract from a writer on ecclesiastical affairs will finish what we have to offer in regard to the development of the Name of Blasphemy previous to the reign of Constantine.

“Novatianus was an elder or presbyter in the church at Rome about the A.D. 251, at which time Cyprian flourished at Carthage. He was a man of extensive learning, and the author of several publications in defence of the doctrine of the Trinity and other subjects. His address is said to have been eloquent and insinuating, while his morals were irreproachable. He beheld with just indignation the depravity of the church in his day, and sighed over its abominations. Within the space of a few years, Christians had been caressed by one emperor, and persecuted by another. In the day of prosperity many persons rushed into the church who had never seriously counted the cost; and, like the stony-ground hearers in our Lord’s parable of the sower, when persecution overtook them, they denied the faith, and reverted to idolatry. When the storm had subsided, they returned again to the church; and the bishops, who were much more concerned about the number and respectability of their congregations, than they were for the purity of communion and the free circulation of brotherly love among the members, encouraged all this, to the disgust of Novatian and all considerate persons. On the death of Fabian, who had sustained the character of bishop, one Cornelius, copresbyter with Novatian, who was a vehement partisan for taking in the multitude, was put in nomination for the bishopric. Novatianus opposed him, but ineffectually; and seeing no prospect of reformation in the church, but, on the contrary, a tide of immorality prevailing, he withdrew, and was joined by a number of the friends of reform. The consequence was, that Cornelius, irritated, it is said, by Cyprian, who was similarly situated, through the remonstrances of virtuous men at Carthage, and who was exasperated beyond measure with one of his elders, whose name was Novatus, and who had quitted Carthage and gone to Rome to espouse the cause of Novatianus, called a council, and got a sentence of excommunication against the latter. In a little time the friends of Novatianus formed themselves, or, at any rate, were formed into a church, which invested him with the pastoral office. The example was followed in various places, and Puritan churches were formed all over the empire, and flourished during the succeeding two hundred years. Afterwards, when penal laws (enacted by catholic emperors) obliged them to lurk in corners, and worship God in private, they became distinguished by various names, and a succession of them continued to the Lutheran reformation.

“It has been truly said,” continues the same writer, “that it is next to impossible to avoid being misled in perusing histories of heretics. They are all written by interested ecclesiastics, who study to blacken the character of those whom they describe, in the most bitter terms that malice can invent. Novatianus is held up by these writers as the first ANTIPOPE, because he withdrew from the communion of a corrupt church. The stigma of Antipope is ridiculous; for, at that time, there was no pope in the true sense of the word; nor for jubilees of years after his day. They call Novatianus the author of the heresy of Puritanism; whereas Puritanism, or the object for which the puritans, or CATHARI, as they were styled, contended, was a virtue, and not a heresy. In contending for purity of fellowship they were sustained by the concurrent voice of prophets and apostles. Novatianus was by no means singular in that respect even in the age in which he lived. Tertullian had quitted the church fifty years before, for the very same reason; and Privatus, who was an old man in the time of Novatianus, had, with several more, repeatedly remonstrated against the departures which had taken place from apostolic institution, and as they could get no redress, had withdrawn, and formed separate congregations, or worshipped God in private. These ecclesiastical writers attribute to Novatian what they regard as the crime of originating innumerable congregations in every part of the Roman empire; and yet he had no other influence over them than what his example gave him. The real friends of Christ and his cause everywhere saw the same ground of complaint, and sighed for relief; and when the standard of return to first principles was once lifted up, thousands gathered themselves around it; they saw the propriety of a remedy for a crying evil, and applied it to their own relief. In truth, so far are the charges of heresy and schism brought against Novatian from being well founded, that his memory ought to be embalmed in the recollection of the faithful for his zealous adherence to the cause of truth and virtue.”

In tracing the development of the Name of Blasphemy, we now advance to the era of Constantine. Sixty years after the death of Cornelius, who died in exile at Civita Vecchia, A.D. 252, “the Catholic and Apostolic Church, Mother of the Faithful,” was invested with the sunshine of imperialism, and constituted the religion of the State. The bishop of the Anti-novatian association in Rome now became “the Bishop of Rome,” and a spiritual prince of the empire. Before this change of fortune, he had but a bare precedency in respect of rank which had been tacitly yielded to him as bishop of the church in the metropolis of the empire. As to authority, Irenaeus, bishop in Lyons, on account of his personal character, was of ten times more authority even in the West than Victor, bishop in Rome; and Cyprian of Carthage, than Stephen of Rome, who excommunicated him. “But,” says Dr. G. Campbell, “matters underwent a very great change after christianity had received the sanction of a legal establishment. Then, indeed, the difference between one see and another, both in riches and in power, soon became enormous. And this could not fail to produce, in the sentiments of mankind, the usual consequences. Such is the constant progress in all human politics whatever. In the most simple state of society, personal merit, of some kind or other, makes the only noticeable distinction between man and man. In politics purely republican, it is still (many years ago when these words were penned) the chief distinction. But the further ye recede from these, and the nearer ye approach the monarchical model, the more does this natural distinction give place to those artificial distinctions created by riches, office, and rank.

“When Rome was become immensely superior, both in splendor and in opulence, to every western See, she would with great facility, and as it were naturally, (if nothing very unusual or alarming was attempted,) dictate to the other Sees in the west; the people there having had, for several ages, very little of the disputatious dogmatizing humor of their brethren in the east. It no doubt contributed to the same effect, that Rome was the only See of very great note which concurred with several of them in language; Latin being the predominant tongue among the western churches, as Greek was among the eastern. It was natural for the former, therefore, to consider themselves as more closely connected with the Roman Patriarch than with the Constantinopolitan, or any of the other oriental patriarchs. A similar reason, when not counteracted by other causes, operated among the Greeks, to make them prefer a Grecian patriarch before a Latin one.

“Sylvester was the catholic saint, whom Constantine recognized as the Bishop of Rome and Patriarch of the West. The papists reckon him as the thirty-fourth pope. But, we know from history, that popes had not yet come into fashion. The spirit of a pope, however, wrought in him mightily; and when he opened his mouth, his utterances showed what he would do when power should be given to him by the Dragon. Take the following as an illustration: The Nicene Creed having been subscribed, Constantine, the Man-Child of Sin, who presided at the council, transmitted its canons and decrees to Sylvester, who, in the thirteenth council that had been held in Rome, at which were present two hundred and seventy-five bishops, ratified them in the following Babylonian style: ‘We confirm with our mouth that which has been decreed at Nice, a city of Bithynia, by the three hundred and eighteen holy bishops, for the good of the catholic and apostolic church, Mother of the faithful. We anathematize all those who shall dare to contradict the decrees of the Great and Holy Council which was assembled at Nice (A.D. 325), in the presence of that most pious and venerable prince, the emperor Constantine.’ And to this all the bishops answered, ‘We consent to it.’ Nebuchadnezzar himself could not have spoken more loftily and lion-like. He that dared to call in question their utterances was deemed unworthy of all blessings human and Divine; for, if Constantine be worthy of the belief, their voice was not the voice of men, but of ‘the successors of the apostles, who had been established as priests and gods upon earth’”—Vit. Const. 50.3. 100.6.21.

This recognition of the Catholic clergy by the unbaptized and imperial president of their church, as “priests and gods upon earth,” was very flattering to their vanity and pride of life. They had instructed their imperial patron that this was their Scriptural relation to the sons of men. In their case, however, it was a mere assumption of Divine honors, and undeserved. In the days of the apostles, that which was spoken to Israel, might be truly applied to them, and to those who believed into Jesus through their word, saying, “I said, Ye are gods.” The Lord Jesus explained in what sense this saying was applicable to Israel, but not to mankind at large. Thus, “if He (the Spirit) called them gods, unto whom the word of the Deity came, and the Scripture cannot be broken; say ye of him whom the Father hath sanctified, and sent into the world, Thou blasphemest; because I said, I am the Son of the Deity?” The Jews considered this as “making himself equal with God” (John 5:18; 10:33–36). The gospel teaches, that a people to whom the Word of the Deity is sent, and who receive it, become Sons of God; and are, in this sense, gods. This Word was first sent to Israel, and then to the Gentiles. And who obeyed it in the love of it, became Sons of God by adoption through Jesus Christ. This is the Scriptural status of all true Christadelphians, or Brethren of Christ. This is a great honor, and an extraordinary manifestation of love on the part of the Father, the contemplation of which caused John to exclaim, “Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the Sons of God;” and lest any should say, that this sonship pertained exclusively to a future state of existence, he adds concerning the faithful, “beloved, we are NOW the Sons of God;” which was equivalent to saying, “we are now gods upon the earth;” and he continued, “it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him AS HE IS” (1 John 3:1–3).

But, though it be true that such men are “gods upon earth,” and also “priests,” it is a mere blasphemy in the mouth of the Man-Child of Sin, when applied to the corrupt and arrogant clergy of the Laodicean Apostasy. The gifts of the Spirit had been withdrawn; and State-Church Catholics were left to their own delusions. The Spirit had raised up a testimony against them, by which He “spued them out of his mouth,” as “wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked:” for He only recognizes them as “priests and gods upon earth,” in the Scriptural sense, who, having believed the things concerning the kingdom of the Deity and the Name of Jesus Christ, have been immersed, and walk in purity, “even as He is pure;” a condition of things that could not possibly be affirmed of Constantine and the professional ecclesiastics whom he delighted to honor.

Such, however, was the blasphemous assumption of the Catholic clergy, both Greek and Latin. Though utterly unworthy, by ignorance of the truth, by perversion of Apostolic institutions, and impurity of life, they claimed to be “priests and gods upon earth.” But, though nothing but the spued-out ejecta of the Spirit’s mouth, they were, in a certain relation of things, “priests and gods upon earth.” They were the “priests and gods upon earth” pertaining to the Laodicean Apostasy; and acknowledged by the Man-Child of Sin “in his estate.” According to Gibbon’s authorities, there were eighteen hundred of these gods upon the Roman earth; of whom one thousand were enthroned in the Greek, and eight hundred in the Latin provinces of the empire. Episcopal thrones were closely planted along the banks of the Nile, on the sea coast of Africa, in the proconsular Asia, and through the southern provinces of Italy. The episcopal gods of Gaul and Spain, of Thrace and Pontus, reigned over an ample territory, and delegated their rural suffragans to execute the subordinate duties of the pastoral office. A god’s diocese might be spread over a province, or reduced to a village; but all the gods possessed an equal and indelible character; they all blasphemously claimed to derive the same powers and privileges from the Apostles, from the people, and from the laws. The whole body of these priests and gods of Antichrist, was exempted by Sin’s imperial Man-Child, from all service, private or public, all municipal offices, and all personal taxes and contributions, which pressed upon the laity with intolerable weight; and the duties of their clerical profession, deemed holy by the strongly deluded, was accepted as a full discharge of their obligations to the republic.

The gods of the Catholic heaven were regularly assembled in the spring and autumn of each year; and these synods diffused the spirit of ecclesiastical discipline and regulation through the hundred and twenty provinces of the Roman world. The Archdeity, or metropolitan bishop, was empowered, by the laws, to summon the suffragan dæmons of his province; to revise their conduct, to vindicate their rights, to declare their faith, and to examine the merit of the candidates who were elected by the clergy and people to supply the vacancies of the episcopal college. The chief gods, or primates, of Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, Carthage, and afterwards of Constantinople, who exercised a more ample jurisdiction, convened the numerous assemblies of their dependent gods. But the convocation of great and extraordinary synods was the sole prerogative of the god who filled the imperial Dragon throne. Whenever the emergencies of the spiritual department of his estate required this decisive measure, the emperor dispatched a peremptory summons to the episcopal deities, or the deputies of each province, with an order for the use of post-horses and a competent allowance for the expenses of their journey. The Council of Nice was convened by this authority, A.D. 325. It was assembled by “the Mother’s” imperial protector and proselyte, to extinguish, by their final sentence, the subtle disputes which had arisen in Egypt on the subject of the Trinity. Three hundred and eighteen gods obeyed the summons of their imperial creator whom Gibbon styles “their indulgent master.” The inferior gods or dæmons, of every rank and denomination, have been computed at two thousand and forty-eight; the Greeks appeared in person: and the consent of the Latins was expressed by the legates of the Archdeity of Rome. The session, which lasted about two months, was frequently decorated by the presence of the imperial Man-Child, who claimed to be God of gods upon earth, as expressed in the title, BISHOP of bishops. Leaving his guards at the door, he seated himself (with the permission of the divine council) on a low stool in the middle of the hall, an eminent illustration of Satan’s “darling sin,” which is said to be

“He listened with patience,” says Gibbon, “and spoke with modesty; and while he influenced the debates, Constantine humbly professed that he was the minister, not the judge, of the successors of the apostles, who had been established as priests and as gods upon earth.”

Of all these gods of the apostasy, those of Antioch, Alexandria, Carthage, Constantinople and Rome, were the chief. They were, however, not only the chief of many, but they were rival gods, whose principle it was rather to reign in hell than to serve in heaven. Lust of power and love of contention were the ruling characteristics of them all; at least such is the testimony of a contemporary of those turbulent times. “If I must speak the truth,” says Gregory Nazianzen, “this is my resolution to avoid all councils of the bishops; for I have seen no good end answered by any synod whatever; for their love of contention and their lust of power are too great even for words to express.”

In the reign of Constantine’s son and successor, Rome had become a most seducing object of sacerdotal ambition. In the episcopal order, the Bishop of Rome was the first in rank among the gods, and distinguished by a sort of pre-eminence over all the others. He surpassed all his companion deities in the magnificence and splendor of the temple over which he presided, in the extent of his revenues and possessions, in the number and variety of his ministers, in his influence over the deluded people, and in his sumptuous and splendid manner of living. Ammianus Marcellinus, a Roman historian, who lived in the reign of Constantius, referring to this subject, says: “It was no wonder to see those who were ambitious of human greatness contending with so much heat and animosity for that dignity; because, when they obtained it, they were sure to be enriched by the offerings of the matrons, of appearing abroad in great splendor, of being admired in their costly coaches, sumptuous in their feasts, outdoing sovereign princes in the expenses of their table.” No wonder that Prætextatus, the pagan Prefect of the city, should say, “Make me Bishop of Rome, and I’ll be a Christian, too!”

As a further illustration of the pass at which the Mystery of Iniquity had arrived in Rome, it may be added that Liberius, the bishop, died A.D. 366, and that a violent contest arose respecting his successor in the throne of blasphemy. The Catholics were divided into two factions, one of which elected Damasus to that dignity, while the other chose Ursicinus, a deacon. The party of Damasus prevailed, and obtained his ordination of the godship. The other party, enraged at its failure, set up separate meetings, and eventually had their favorite ordained also. This occasioned great disputes among the pious laity, as to which of them should possess the episcopal dignity; and to such an extremity was the dispute carried, that great numbers on either side were killed in the quarrel; no fewer than a hundred and thirty-seven persons having been put to death in the very “temple of the God” itself! “How much more rationally,” remarks Ammianus, “would those pontiffs consult their true happiness, if, instead of alleging the greatness of the city as an excuse for their manners, they would imitate the exemplary life of some provincial bishops, whose temperance and sobriety, whose mean apparel and downcast looks, recommended their pure and modest virtue to the Deity, and his true worshippers.” This lively picture drawn by Ammianus of the wealth and luxury of the gods in the fourth century, “be, comes the more curious,” says Gibbon, “as it represents the intermediate degree between the humble poverty of the apostolic fishermen and the royal state of a temporal prince, whose dominions extend from the confines of Naples to the banks of the Po.”

Damasus was contemporary with “Theodosius the Great,” who, on his advancement to the imperial office, evinced a fervid zeal for Trinitarianism. He addressed a letter to the divided Catholics of Constantinople, and told them that “it was his pleasure that all his subjects should be of the same profession as Damasus, Bishop of Rome, and Peter, bishop of Alexandria; that their church alone should be denominated ‘Catholic’ who worshipped the divine Trinity as equal in honor, and that those who were of another opinion should be deemed heretics, be regarded as infamous, and subject to other punishments. This was an imperial constitution of the Trinitarian gods of Rome and Alexandria as the standards of orthodoxy. This was an advance upon their rivals of Antioch, Carthage and Constantinople; still it was a divided glory which did not satisfy the ambition of the god upon earth residing in Rome.

We are now, then, arrived at a great crisis in the development of the “Name of Blasphemy upon the Heads;” that is, at a period in which the second stage of its growth was nearly consummated—a period which may be expressed by the epochal years A.D. 380–410. The beginning of this period is illustrated by the exaltation of Theodosius to the imperial office, and is marked by the sack of Rome by the tribes of Germany and Scythia, under the command of Alaric, who visited the sanguinary intolerance, blasphemy, corruption and crimes of the Catholics and their God in Rome, with the “hail and fire mingled with blood” of the First Wind-Trumpet. Theodosius was one of the most intolerant and persecuting of the Catholic emperors of the Sixth Head of the Dragon. We have seen how he set up his will and pleasure as the rule of his subjects’ faith and conscience. This is further illustrated by his expulsion of all from Constantinople who would not subscribe the Nicene confession of faith. In A.D. 383, he issued two edicts against “heretics;” the first, prohibiting them from holding any assemblies; and the second, forbidding them to meet in fields or villages. These edicts would be especially oppressive to “the Angel having the Seal of the living God.” engaged in sealing His servants in their foreheads (Apoc. 7:2, 3): and, as though this were not enough, he followed it up by a law in which he forbade heretics to worship, or to preach, to ordain bishops, or presbyters, commanding some to be banished and others rendered infamous and deprived of the common privileges of citizens. This intolerant and wicked oppressor is surnamed “the Great,” and by scribes of the same superstition declared to be “very dear to the Catholic Church.” It was not to be supposed, however, that the Lord Jesus at the right hand of Power, to whom his brethren and servants are infinitely dearer, would permit these oppressions to pass away unavenged. He, therefore, let loose the four winds against the “earth, the sea and the trees” of the empire, by which it was extinguished in its western third, and the “god upon earth.” not yet become “the god of the earth” in Rome, was reduced almost to a nonentity.

Emperor Theodosius the Great, during whose reign Christianity was proclaimed the official state religion of the Roman empire. Theodosius reigned as Emperor from Constantinople between A.D. 379–95. He is termed “the Great” by Catholic historians as a tribute to his Orthodoxy. He was an able general who won civil wars, and a devout Catholic who persecuted minority Christian sects and pagans. He opposed the Arians (who believed in One God, but failed to comprehend the all-important doctrine of God-manifestation) and vigorously advocated the Trinitarianism of the Nicene Creed. In May 381 he summoned an ecumenical council at Constantinople which endorsed the Nicene creed—Publishers.

The six days pillage and slaughter of the inhabitants of the Queen City, was a terrible but richly-deserved calamity, and, at the same time, a blow that prostrated her dignity and honor in the dust. A city which, with the strength of iron, had broken in pieces and subdued all things; and had boasted of her reign over the kings of the earth, was now trampled under foot of barbarians, and insolently compelled to become a sport, and to sue for peace. This was a great discouragement and check to the ambition of the Bishop of Rome. Hitherto, he had based his claim to the first rank among “all called god, or an object of worship,” upon the greatness of the city in which he officiated. A canon of the Council of Chalcedon expressly declares this principle of primacy in voting equal privileges to the Bishop of Rome and the Bishop of Constantinople, because the last, then called New Rome, was also the Royal City. Leo, of Old Rome, however, indignantly rejected this co-equality in primacy, he would be first. But the time had now arrived to pour out the Divine wrath upon her which had been accumulating against her for over eleven hundred and sixty years. Her imperial and metropolitan dignity was doomed to suffer a total eclipse; so that, when it had departed, it would be necessary for the man who had “become a god,” to invent some new theory whereby his dignity might be prevented from taking its departure likewise. The proud and luxurious bishop was hurled into the lowest depths of misery. Had Ammianus Marcellinus beheld him after being spoiled by Alaric, he would have seen a blasphemer smitten of the God of heaven for his sins, and there would be nothing, at this crisis, Prætextatus would desire less than to be Bishop of Fallen Rome. The following extract from a letter of Pelagius, an eye-witness of the pillage, will give the reader some idea of the change of fortune that had come over the bishop since the days of Ammianus and Prætextatus, when princely magnificence and luxury were the rule of episcopal life: “This dismal calamity,” says he, “but just over, and you yourself are a witness how Rome, that commanded the world, was astonished at the alarm of the Gothic trumpet, when that barbarous and victorious nation stormed her walls and made her way through the breach. Where were then the privileges of birth and the distinctions of quality? Were not all ranks and degrees levelled at that time, and promiscuously huddled together? Every house there was a scene of misery, and equally filled with grief and confusion. The slave and the man of quality were in the same circumstance, and everywhere the terror of death and slaughter were the same, unless we may say the fright made the greatest impression on those who had the greatest interest in living.”

Coin of Alaric the Goth. The Goths invaded Italy led by the courageous and skilful Alaric. They were eventually turned back after the sack of Rome by Stilicho, famous general of eastern Rome—Publishers.

Thus, then, the glory of the city having departed, the glory of the bishop built upon it had departed also. A god located in a city of inferior rank, with no other prestige, could not expect to command the world. As the city faded into insignificance and contempt among barbarians, so would he unless he “changed his base,” and commenced to operate upon their ignorance and credulity from a new position. In a hundred and thirty-six years from its sack by Alaric, Rome was to be left a dreary solitude, without man or beast within its walls for forty days and more. It was time, therefore, that some pretension should be set up that would so awe the world, that a Divine supremacy should be accorded to its bishop altogether independent of the former plea. The pretension that seemed to meet the urgency_ of the situation, was that of the Bishop of Rome being the lineal successor of the apostle Peter; and that by virtue of this successorship, he possessed the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, and had Divinely intrusted to him the power of binding and loosing. The clergy were all assumed to be the successors of the apostles; but the Bishop of Rome claimed to be successor of “the Prince of Apostles,” and that, therefore, he was the Prince-god of all clerical “gods upon earth.”

But, upon what could this pretension be based so as to give it plausibility? It is true that Christ promised to give the keys to Peter, whom he pronounced “blessed;” it is also true that he fulfilled the promise; and furthermore, it is true that when Peter declared his conviction, in common with the rest of the apostles, that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of the living God, the Lord said to him, that upon this rock He would build His ecclesia, against which the gates of the unseen should not prevail (Matt. 16:15–19). But, in all this there was not a word, no, not a hint, of any one else than Peter; much less of such an ignorant, corrupt, and degraded blasphemer as the bishop of Rome. How, then, could what was promised and fulfilled to Peter, a Jewish fisherman of Galilee, be made applicable, even plausibly so, to a proud and luxurious man of fashion in Rome? This was a work and great labor to be done! A labor which only craft and falsehood, operating upon the grossest ignorance and superstition, could finish with success.

Paul testifies in Gal. 2:7, 8, that the gospel of the circumcision was intrusted to Peter, the ministration of which constituted his apostleship of the circumcision. Hence, as “the strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes” received the gospel in Jerusalem from the Spirit through him, a relationship was established between him and them, which two hundred and twenty years after came to be styled by Cyprian, “Petri cathedram, atque ecclesiam principalem, unde unitas sacerdotalis exorta est”—that is, the Chair of Peter, and the principal ecclesia whence priestly unity proceeds. But is it not ridiculous to style a little company of disciples of the Spirit in Rome, Peter’s Chair, because they heard the truth from his mouth? The “strangers of Rome” were only a small portion of his audience on the day of Pentecost. Besides them, there were “devout Jews” from every nation under the Roman heaven. When they returned, they would plant ecclesias in their homes, every one of which upon the same principle would be a Chair of Peter! But, craft, which deceives the ignorant and the simple, has no use for reason. Assertion without proof is all that it requires. The crafty ecclesiastics of the apostasy affirmed it; and it suited the policy of the aspiring bishops of the imperial city to adopt it. If it were conceded that the Church in Rome was Peter’s Chair, would not the man that occupied it as chief bishop of the church be Peter’s successor; and if Peter’s successor in office, must he not officially inherit all that is predicable of Peter? He would be “Vicar of the Blessed Peter”—Peter in every respect, save in personal identity.

This was the position assumed by “the Name of Blasphemy upon the Heads of the Beast;” and ultimately conceded by the Horns, which the judgments of the first four trumpets upon the Catholic West developed, when they gave in their adhesion to that Name; in evidence whereof the following gleanings of Mr. Elliott from divers sources will amply show:

He styles it, “the mighty fact” first privately spoken out by Boniface I., A.D. 419–22, to the Thessalian and Illyrian bishops. “The Blessed Peter,” says he, “to whom the height of priesthood was conceded by the word of Jesus Christ;” “on whom, we read, was placed the foundation of the universal ecclesia:” “on whom its government and supreme power rested:” “this, therefore, by ecclesias spread over the whole world, is established to be as the Head of its own members; from which whosoever cuts himself off, becomes exiled from the Christian religion.”

After this the Legate of Celestine, the bishop of Rome, A.D. 431, in the Council of Ephesus before all Antichristendom, said, “It is a thing undoubted, that the holy and most blessed Peter, the Exarch and Head of the apostles, the pillar of the faith, the foundation of the catholic church, received the keys of the kingdom; and to him was given the power of binding and loosing sin; which Peter still lives and exercises judgment in his successors, even to this day and always.” In the same style, bishop Leo’s deputies, some twenty years later, in the Council of Chalcedon, proclaimed him “Head of All Churches;” and this evidently because, as the Council itself said, “Peter spoke in Leo!” On similar grounds the headship of the Antichristian Body and the world was claimed by Leo himself, in his letters and orations. In a sermon of St. Peter’s day, he thus expressed himself before his Roman audience: “There are those, O Rome, who advance thee to this glory as a holy nation, an elect people, a sacerdotal and royal city complete through the Holy Seat of the Blessed Peter, head of the World; thou hast a wider rule by the divine religion than by earthly domination.” In these words he evidently applies 1 Pet 2:5, to the Roman See and people in communion with it. This is a specimen of the blasphemy of the Name, which perverts what the apostle says to the saints concerning their spiritual status, and applies it to the basest of mankind. Leo said that he, as Bishop of Rome, was officially “both the guardian of the catholic faith, and of the traditions of the fathers.”

Leo’s immediate successor was Hilary. The spirit of Leo had passed with the office to him, so that what Leo had affirmed, he readily accepted as his rightful prerogative. In the estimation of these men, “whoever disputed the primacy and authority of the Roman See, as being that rock on which by Christ’s own ordinance Christ’s universal church was built, was none other than the Devil or Antichrist.” Hence, the incense of the Tarragonese bishop’s reference to him as officially the “Vicar of Peter; unto whom, forthwith from after the resurrection of Jesus Christ, the keys of the kingdom belong, for the illumination of all,” was an odor of a sweet smell. From A.D. 492 to 496, Gelasius figured as Bishop of Rome, which was then the throne of the Seventh Head, the Gothic Kings of Italy. But though subject to Theodoric, he strenuously asserted his Divine supremacy over all kings and emperors. In a letter to Faustus, he wrote: “Things divine are to be learned by the secular potentates (the Horns of the Beast) from bishops, above all from the Vicar of the Blessed Peter”; and in a letter to the emperor in Constantinople, whom he excommunicated, A.D. 494, he writes: “There are two authorities by which the world is governed, the Pontifical and the Royal; the sacerdotal order being that which has charge of the sacraments of life, and from which thou must seek the causal of thy salvation. Hence, in divine things, it becomes Kings to bow the neck to Priests; specially to the Head of Priests, whom Christ’s own voice has set over the universal church.” But, to be Vicar of Peter was to be only the Vicar of a Vicar. There was a step still higher on the ladder of episcopal ambition, which the Blasphemer of Rome was ready to mount when opportunity presented. Two consecutive councils at Rome, held A.D. 494 and 495, recognized and accepted his words as those of the VICAR OF CHRIST: “The Holy Roman Church,” says he, “is preferred to other ecclesias by no synodical canons; but it obtains the primacy by the evangelical voice of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, saying, Thou art Peter. The Roman Church is therefore the chief seat of the apostle Peter, not having spot, nor wrinkle, nor any such thing;” “having authority over the whole church for its general superintendence and government.” This same Gelasius, as if determined indelibly to affix the character of blasphemy to the Name he represented, styles the apostle, “our Saviour the Blessed Peter,” because of the words spoken to him, “whatsoever thou shalt bind, etc.; so that none living are excepted from the church’s authority of the keys; but only the dead.” But, in after times, not even the dead were excepted. At the close of the Council in A.D. 495, when Gelasius had finished, the assembled bishops shouted, six times repeated, “We see that thou art the VICAR OF CHRIST.” There was more in the significance of the words of those episcopal shouts than they intended. VICARIUM CHRISTI te videmus! was in effect saying, “We see that thou art ho Antichristos, the Antichrist!” Vicarius answers to the word anti, that is, instead, or supplies the place of another; hence, as a substantive, a deputy, a substitute, a vicegerent, locum-tenens, vicar. “We see that thou art a substitute for Christ!” and a substitute for Peter! And that thou art above every thing called god or is worshipped! Anti-Christos is the Greek for Vicarius Christi. This “was blaspheming those who dwell in the heaven;” it was injuring greatly the reputation of the Father and the Son among men, for an ignorant and profane Gentile, who proclaimed in council the words noster Salvator Beatissimus Petrus, “our saviour the most blessed Peter,” to announce himself as their substitute and all-powerful representative upon earth. A Vicar-Christ is Anti-Christ; and though they did not mean to make that application, yet in shouting what they did, they for once proclaimed the truth to the world from the Seven Hills.

This same Gelasius at the Council of A.D. 494, had authoritatively drawn up a list of the Scriptures to be received as Canonical and Divine. The first list is headed, “The Order of the Books of the Old Testament, which the Holy and Catholic Roman Church receives and venerates; digested by the Blessed Father Gelasius, with seventy bishops.” This includes the Apocryphal Books of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Tobit, Esdras, Judith, and 1 Maccabees. The second list gives the books of the New Testament as still received. In a fourth list the writings of “the Fathers;” as Cyprian, Gregory Nazianzen, Basil, &c: and ending, “the rest, which are composed by heretics or schismatics, the Catholic and Roman Church by no means receives.” A list of about one hundred of the Apocryphal writings, not to be received, is then subjoined; among which are the Opuscula of Tertullian and Lactantius, and of the Apocalyptic Commentators, Victorinus and Tychonius. All these, with their authors, the concluding clause consigns to eternal damnation: “with their authors and the admirers of the authors we declare to be damned to an indissoluble bond in eternity.” Thus, like his predecessor Leo, he set himself up as the supreme arbiter and judge in all matters of faith!

At the opening of the sixth century, Symmachus was the official Antichrist and Antipeter. The Bishop of Rome was called PAPA, or English, Pope. “He was declared,” says Gibbon, “in a numerous synod to be pure from all sin, and exempt from all judgment.” Nevertheless, this self-deceiver and liar, as John styles all such, 1 John 1:8, was a subject of Theodoric, King of Italy. Though he claimed an ample dominion in heaven and earth, he had not yet been able to exalt his Trinitarian Holiness above an Arian King. He was a turbulent and unruly subject, and made himself obnoxious to his royal master. Theodoric in consequence, summoned a council to meet at Rome, A.D. 501, to judge of certain charges against him. But, when convened, the Council demurred to entering on the matter, on the ground of incompetency; considering that the party accused was supreme above all ecclesiastical jurisdiction. And a little after, as the climax of blasphemy, another Roman Synod, with Symmachus himself presiding and consenting, in the most solemn manner, adopted a book written by Ennodius in defence of the resolutions of the former synod; in which it was asserted, “that the Pontiff is judge in the place of Deity, and can be judged by no mortal.”

Assuredly there can be no mistake that we have before us an Order of Men, or a Name, answerable to Daniel’s “god of guardians, exalting himself, and magnifying himself above every god, and speaking marvellous things against the God of Gods;” “to Paul’s Man of Sin, Son of Perdition, and Lawless One;” and John’s “Name of Blasphemy, and Mouth like the mouth of a lion, speaking great things and blasphemies.” No person, or succession of persons, could be more like Lucifer of Babylon, more arrogant, more proud, more blasphemous, or more lawless. The reader will doubtless have perceived, that the falsehood lying at the bottom of all these blasphemous assumptions, is, that the clergy, as they style themselves, are the successors of the apostles and ambassadors of Jesus Christ; and that, consequently, all that is affirmed of the apostles, the true ambassadors of Christ, is truly affirmable also of them! Ignatius spoke of bishops as eis topon Theou, in the place of God; and Cyprian says, that every bishop within his own diocese, is a priest of God, and a judge appointed in the place of Christ. But there were professors of Christianity in the apostles’ days, who, in effect, claimed the same things. The Spirit speaks of these as men “who say they are apostles (sent ones) and are not, but are liars (Apoc. 2:2); and Paul styles them, “False apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into apostles of Christ—the ministers of Satan, transforming themselves as ministers of righteousness, after the example of their master.” Whoever says he is a successor of the apostles, in so saying affirms that he is an apostle; which signifies “one called and sent of God as Aaron was.” Hence, Jesus styled himself the Deity’s apostle: and all who say that he called and sent them to preach the gospel affirm the same thing.

But where did the clergy, so-called, get their dogma of Apostolic succession from? The answer is, from tradition and Scripture falsely interpreted. So long as the Star-Angel Presbytery shone in an ecclesia, the Spirit shined in its midst. That ecclesia was the dioikesis, jurisdiction, or diocese, of the presbytery; which was in the stead of the apostles, who could not be everywhere at once. It was the gift of the Spirit that made the Star-Angel Eldership what it was. It was concerning this spiritually-endowed order in each ecclesia that Paul wrote in saying, “Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves: for they watch for your souls as they that must give account, that they may do it with joy, and not with grief: for that is unprofitable to you.” The Star-Angel consisted of many bishops in an ecclesia, not of one only. It was in the place of the Deity, as Moses was instead of God to Aaron. It was the Vicar of God, and the Vicar of Christ, in the particular ecclesia that rejoiced in its presence; and it was this, because of the Spirit being in the elders to guide them into all the truth. But the Star-Angels, which had power to abuse, as well as to use, the spiritual gifts, did not continue to be faithful stewards of the mystery of Christ; they fell away from the faith as apostolically delivered; and having become apostate, the Spirit was withdrawn, and nothing remained of the Star-Angels but presbyteries of vain and self-conceited ecclesiastics, each presbytery being ruled by an ignorant bishop, whose wisdom shone brightest when he spoke the least. But though “the Spirit had spued them out of his mouth,” they claimed the same relation to God, to Christ, and to men—a claim, which being no longer endorsed by Deity, became mere arrogance, falsehood, and blasphemy. Thus, they claimed to be traditionally without the Spirit, what they were with it—apostles, ambassadors, and vicars, of Christ and of God.

But, evil men, when left to their own resources, always wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived. They flourish in deception. Being sensual, not having the Spirit, as the clergy have ever been even to this day, when they appealed to Scripture in support of their impious pretensions, they wrested it to their own destruction. They refer to the words of Jesus to the eleven, which they ridiculously enough apply to themselves. He said to the apostles, say they, “Lo, I am with you alway, even to the end of the world.” Now, they continue, this must refer to us, as well as to the apostles; for they did not live to the end of the world, which has not even yet come. It must, therefore, mean, “I will be with you, and your successors, to the end of time.” But, some of these clergy are very learned, if not very wise and candid, men; and they know, that the English version of Matt. 28:20, is not a correct transcript of the original, idou ego meth’ humon eimi pasas tas humeras, heos tes sunteleias tou aiovos. This, they know, ought not to be rendered, “lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world;” but, “Behold, I am with you all the days, until the end of the age.” There is nothing about “successors” in this. We are expressly told that Jesus Christ spoke these words to “the eleven disciples.” The promise was to them, and it was strictly and literally fulfilled; for we are informed in Mark 16:20, that “they went forth and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them;” and he tells us also, how the Lord worked with them; it was by “confirming the word” they preached, “by the signs following thereupon”—epakolouthounton. In this way, he was with the eleven apostles, and also with the twelfth, Matthias, and with Paul, and their co-laborers, “all the days” of the Mosaic Dispensation, from the Day of Pentecost first after his resurrection, “till the end of the age,” when it was abolished in the subversion of Judah’s Commonwealth by the Roman power; a period of about thirtyseven years. But, as to the clergy, Apostolic successors, and ambassadors of Christ, as they style themselves, the application of the text to their Satanic Order, is a gross imposition upon the ignorance and credulity of their strongly-deluded worshippers. The Scripture, and the facts in their case, are against them. The Lord’s promise was to co-work with eleven men preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom and Name; he did not promise to co-work with an impious order of imposters, who are ignorant of its first principles, and therefore could not make an intelligible statement of that Gospel to save their lives. Christ Jesus never promised to confirm, or bear witness to the truth of any teaching or preaching, by signs, and wonders, and divers miracles, and distributions of Holy Spirit (Heb. 2:4), other than the preaching of “The Word.” It was the preaching of this alone that he confirmed and attested; not the blasphemous and contradictory foolishness enunciated by the ecclesiastical mountebanks, and martexts, of “the times of the Gentiles,” among whom they have substituted their own traditions, which they style “divinity,” for the Word, which they have nullified, and made contemptible thereby. The clergy do not preach the Word the apostles preached, and which it was the function of the apostleship to do. No men can therefore be their successors in apostleship who do not preach the same things. Faithful men, who have learned the things Paul preached, and are also able to teach them to others, are the only Apostolic succession possible (2 Tim. 2:2). These faithful men, men full of faith, cannot be found in any of “the Names and Denominations,” Apocalyptically styled “Abominations” (ch. 17:5), of the excluded and unmeasured Court of the Gentiles (ch. 11:2). They are only to be found in “the House of Deity;” which is not a clerical bazaar, or temple, dedicated to fictitious entities canonized by the Apostasy; but “the ecclesia of Deity;” which Paul says, “is the Pillar and base of the truth” (1 Tim. 3:15). This is neither the Catholic nor Protestant organizations; but a company of Scripturally-enlightened and obedient believers, who have accepted the Deity’s invitation to His kingdom and glory; of which they are all, without distinction of class or order, both the heirs and heritage, or clergy, of the Lord (James 2:5; Rom. 8:17).

The Pope’s Tiara. The illustration depicts Gregory VII, known also as Hildebrand, wearing the tripled crowned tiara. This bee-hive shaped, somewhat bulging head-covering is decorated with three crowns, hence its name which signifies triple crown. It has no sacred character, being solely the ensign of sovereign power, and is never worn at liturgical functions, when the pope always wears the mitre. It is significant that Daniel, in describing the emergence of Papal sovereign power which led to the establishment of the Holy Roman Empire, described how that three horns were plucked up by the roots (Dan. 7:8). Three kingdoms in Italy were given to the pope by Pepin the predecessor of Charlemagne: the exarchate of Ravenna, the Kingdom of the Lombards, and the State of Rome; hence the tripled crowns of the tiara—Publishers.

Apostolic succession, then, as contended for by all ranks, orders, and degrees of the Antichristian clergy, is a mere fiction of the carnal mind. The only succession coeval in its origin with the Apostolic age they can truthfully claim to be partakers of, is, as successors of those troublers in God’s Israel, who, “by good words and fair speeches, deceived the hearts of the simple.” As successors of Satan’s apostles, they have built upon his foundation a superstructure which crowned itself with the TIARA upon the Seven Heads. This enormous blasphemy could not have been developed apart from the Satanic dogma of Apostolic succession, any more than the worship of Mary, as Queen of Heaven, and the Saints, as intercessors and mediators, could have been invented apart from the mythological dogma of the “immortal soul” in mortal flesh, separately existing after death. The one is as vain an imagination as the other. But vain and fallacious as it is, it has been a very profitable fiction to them all, from the Mouth of Blasphemy on the Seven Hills, to the most recent imitation thereof in the Mormon settlements of Utah. In this section of the thirteenth chapter, I have traced the development of the Name to the reign of the Seventh Head in the time of Theodoric, the Arian King of Italy, and his Trinitarian subject, Symmachus, the Bishop of Rome, who was now all ready to avail himself of anything that might present, whereby he could improve his fortune; and, instead of being a servant of heretical rulers, he could assume sovereignty for himself. But of this hereafter. I proceed now to consider the subject of the third verse of the chapter in hand.

14. The Wounding of One of the Heads

“And I saw one of his heads as if it had been wounded unto death”—verse 3.

John saw one of the heads, which were common to the Dragon and the Beast, “as if it had been wounded unto death.” This is as much as to say, that when he saw it lying prostrate, its death was only in appearance; it was not like the five heads that had preceded it. They were killed outright, never to recover sovereignty on the Seven Hills. But not so this Sixth Headship; for, though it seemed to be politically dead to all future sovereignty in Rome, where its supremacy no longer existed, yet the time would arrive when a like form of government would be located within its walls; and IMPERIAL

HEADSHIP, as an Eighth Sovereignty, once more elevate “the Eternal City” to the command of the world—in the words of Leo III., to “a wider rule through divine religion, than by the power of earthly domination;” or more correctly, “through the working of the Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders, and with all the deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish.” The head had received a severe wound, but not a fatal one; for, says John, “the plague of its death was healed.”

The apostle informs us that he saw “one of the heads” in this severely wounded condition; but he does not tell us which one of the seven it was. This he leaves us to find out for ourselves. Is the mystery, then, impenetrable? I think not. Let us see. In Ch. 17:10, the Revelator tells him, in speaking of the Seven Heads, “they are seven sovereign powers; five are fallen, and one is, and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh he must continue a short space.” One is; that is, at the time he was speaking to John in Patmos. The Heads being attached to the Seven Mounts upon which Rome sits, we have only to ascertain what form of Sovereign Power obtained there while John was residing in Patmos. This is well known to have been the Imperial; which is a sovereignty headed up in one or more emperors, uniting in themselves the supreme, civil, spiritual, and military authority of the state. As five sovereign powers had fallen, this must have been the sixth, and only the sixth, because “the other,” or seventh, had not then as yet come.

Now, when the sovereign powers of a state fall, they are prostrated by wounding to death. This was the case in the fall, or removal of the five, especially the fifth, to make way for the sixth, which continued a long space in Rome, or over five hundred years; the Imperial Senate residing on the Seven Hills, and the Imperial Court of the West in Ravenna, and the Imperial Court of the East in Constantinople. This Imperial Sixth Head ruled all the Thirds of the Roman habitable; but, at the end of these centuries, the imperial authority was to be suppressed in Rome, and over the Third Part attached to the jurisdiction of that city. This was to be effected by wounding as if to death. The blowing of the fourth wind-trumpet inflicted the wound by which it was prostrated; so that when John saw it, it had the appearance of a dead head. This death state of the head was a necessary condition for the development of its successor in sovereign power. So long as the sixth flourished in political life on the Seven Hills, a successor could not exist in Rome. The death of the Sixth was indispensable to the manifestation of the Seventh. And it may be noted here that there is nothing more said about the seventh head in this chapter than that the beast had seven heads. It does not seem to perform any important part in the prophecy; nevertheless, as a seventh potentate, coming in between the sixth and the eighth, its presence upon the arena was highly important to the preparation of the way of the full grown Man of Sin. In John’s time, “the other,” or the seventh, “had not yet come; and when he cometh he must continue a short space.” This “short space” was a period of great events. In the course of it, and during the nine decades that ushered it in, the TenHorn Sovereignities established themselves upon the western imperial third of the Roman Orb; Rome’s imperial dominion was abolished, and, in place thereof, a regal sovereignty was developed upon the seven mountains known in history as the GOTHIC KINGDOM OF ITALY. This was the Seventh Head, which was only to continue “a short space,” or sixty years. This passing away of the Sixth Head from Old Rome at the time of its successor, the Seventh Head’s inauguration, is thus symbolized in Apoc. 8:12, “and the third part of the sun was smitten, and the third part of the moon, and the third part of the stars; so as the third part of them was darkened.” The other two thirds were still unsmitten and left to shine in their proper spheres—two thirds of the sun, two thirds of the moon, and two thirds of the stars: that is, the imperial Sixth Head retained its position in Constantinople, from whence it continued to exercise rule and authority, in all matters, civil and ecclesiastical, over the other unsubdued two thirds of the Roman world.

Under the rule of the Gothic Arian Seventh Head, there was no scope for the development of the imperial tendencies of the Trinitarian Bishop of Rome. However, he might long for Universal Headship over all spiritual concerns of the Roman habitable, his subordination to an Arian kingship was an insuperable obstacle. So long as Arianism was king in Rome, he could not include Italy and that city in his universality. Hence, the policy of Symmachus and his successors would be to procure the ruin of the Seventh Head, and to prevent the return of the Sixth; so that Rome, being freed from the presence of both king and emperor, opportunity would be afforded for their own development into an Image of the Sixth Head upon the Seven Hills.

But of the wounding of the Imperial Sixth, and the establishment of the Regal Seventh, Heads, I need not treat in this place. It will be sufficient here to refer the reader to pages 71,75, Vol. 3, for the historical exposition thereof, with this explanatory remark, that the obscuration of Rome's imperial "day and night" would not cease with the fall of the Seventh Head; but with the inauguration of the Eighth Head, or Image of the Sixth, upon the Seven Hills.

The barbarians gradually formed independent kingdoms in the west, the Ostrogoths dominating Italy. Though "Christian" in religion, they were Arians, believing in one God as opposed to the Trinitarianism of the Catholic Church. The establishment of the Gothic Kingdom, therefore, was a blow to Papal Power, and answered to the "deadly wound" of Rev. 13:3. The overthrow of the Goths, and the revival of Catholicism in the West fulfilled the prediction that the deadly wound would be "healed"—Publishers.

15. The Healing of the Deadly Wound

"And the plague of his death was healed"—Verse 3

"His deadly wound," as it reads in the English version, is he plege tou thanatou autou, in the original, which I have rendered, the plague of his death. The word plege, rendered wound, occurs fifteen times in the apocalypse. In five other places it is very properly rendered stripes; and in a sixth, Luke 10:30, it would have been better translated, laid on stripes, than "wounded"—plegas epithentes. The judgments of the fifth and sixth trumpets, in the aggregate, are styled "plagues" Ch. 9:20; and the judgments the two prophets were able to inflict, are also styled "plagues" (Ch. 11:6). The judgments of the Seven Vials are thrice termed the seven plagues in Ch. 15; and the hail-storm that descends out of the heaven upon men, under the last vial is called a plague in Ch. 16:21. The plague of death that afflicted the Sixth Head, was a smiting plague; for, as the result of it, the sun, moon, and stars of the Roman heaven are said to have been "smitten". Hence, also, in Ch. 13:13, it is referred to as he plege tes machairas, the plague of the sword. The warlike operations of Odoacer, king of the Heruli, against Romulus Augustulus; and those of Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, against Odoacer, who, on the deposition of Augustulus, had become, by the title conferred upon him by Zeno, emperor of the Eastern Third, the Patrician Representative of the Sixth Head. These judgments by the sword, ultimating in the establishing of Theodoric in Rome as king of Italy, A.D. 493, made up the plague of the seeming death of the Sixth Head.

And, in this place, it will be right to state the reason why I have not reckoned the Heruli and the Ostrogoths as two of the ten horns. No barbarians, the throne of whose dominion was on the seven mountains, could be horns. Rome is the throne of the Heads, not of the Horns. Hence, there must be reckoned ten horns and one head contemporary with the continuance of the "short space" of Seventh Head Ascendancy in Rome. Neither can the Exarchate of Ravenna nor the Dukedom of Rome, as Sir Isaac Newton and others suppose, be horns; for the former was the representative of the Sixth Head in Italy, and the latter, together with the Exarchate, are defective in this material attribute, that they were destitute of diadems; all the horns have diadems, but they had none.

“It was healed,” says John. The plague of the death by the sword was healed. To heal a death plague is to cause to live that which was smitten. This is the interpretation put upon the phrase in the fourteenth verse in the words, “the beast which had the plague of the sword, and did live.” To heal is to institute a process of recovery. Healing is often a slow process, and always requires time; and the severer the injury to the constitution of the patient, the longer the time required for the recovery of health and strength. It is the same whether the patient be a sick man, or an enfeebled power. Time is demanded for a cure. It was so in the matter of restoring imperial dominion to Rome. There could, however, be no healing of “the plague of the sword,” that IMPERIALISM might live and flourish again in the Seven-Hilled City, so long as the REGAL Seventh Head exercised sovereignty therein. While this reigned in conjunction with the Ten Horns, Rome’s wounded imperialism was unhealed. The worship of “the peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues,” or “many waters” of the Roman Habitable, upon which the woman sits, was an e pluribus unum. It was no longer a worship, or political homage and allegiance, rendered to a Sole Emperor reigning in Constantinople; but it was a worship in which “they wondered after the beast in all the earth,” or empire; so, that “they worshipped the Dragon which yielded authority to the Beast; for the Seventh Head belonged both to the Dragon and the Beast; and the Ten horns, as we have seen by their coinage, acknowledged the supremacy of the Emperor in Constantinople, whose Vice-Kings they claimed to be: while, at the same time, they recognized the Seventh Head as a legitimate sovereignty. The constitution of things was analogous to the United States system of powers, in which citizens owe a divided allegiance to their native state and to the general government—they worship the American Eagle, which gives authority to the State-Feathers of its wings and they worship the Feathers. This is well understood. There is, however, this difference in the similitude, that whereas a Visigoth and a Frank, first worshipped their respective Horn-States; and secondly, the general government in Constantinople. Now, a Marylander or a Virginian first worships at Washington, and afterwards subordinately at Richmond or Annapolis. The comparison, however, is sufficiently close for illustration of the saying “they worshipped the Dragon which yielded authority to the Beast; and they worshipped the Beast, saying, Who is like to the Beast? Who is able to make war with him?”—Ver. 4. None. No beast-dominion can stand before him; for, as Daniel says of the SYSTEM OF POWERS represented by the Dragon and the Beast, it is “dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth; it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the brazen clawed feet of it” (Ch. 7:7, 19). The history of Modern Europe amply shows the truth of the Beast’s invincibility. It is the predominant dominion upon the earth; and rules the so-called civilized nations of Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and Australia.

But oceans of blood have been shed in the past 1,335 years of its existence, in attaining to a dominion so extended. This sanguinary and all-conquering career commenced with war between the imperial and regal potentates of Rome and Constantinople, which, after twenty years’ continuance with various fortune to the combatants, ultimated in the removal and final death of the Seventh Head; which marked the termination of the “short space” of its reign. As, then, the removal of the Seventh Head was an indispensable prerequisite to the healing, or causing imperialism to live again in Rome, I shall now proceed to an historical sketch of its suppression, and then return to the exhibition of the healing of “the plague of the death,” which had been inflicted upon its predecessor by the sword; which will afford scope, also, for accompanying the Name of Blasphemy in further development, until we find it seated imperially upon the seven heads.

16. The Rise and Decollation of the Seventh Head

The Roman Empire of the West was extinguished A.D. 476–479, by the conquering sword of the king of the Heruli, Odoacer. This ruler reigned in Rome about fourteen years, when he was succeeded by the renowned Theodoric, the Ostrogoth, the Arian king of Italy. This prince was born in the neighborhood of Vienna, and educated at Constantinople with care and tenderness. On his father's death he had succeeded to the hereditary throne of the Amali, who were subsidized as defenders of the frontier by the government of Constantinople. His people murmured at this arrangement, until he found it necessary to withdraw from the service of the emperor, and to lead them to some enterprize by which their fortunes would be improved. Having determined on this course he wrote to the emperor Zeno in the following words: "Although your servant is maintained in affluence by your liberality, graciously listen to the wishes of my heart! Italy, the inheritance of your predecessors, and Rome itself, the Heart and Mistress of the world, now fluctuate under the violence of Odoacer, the Mercenary. Direct me, with my national troops, to march against the tyrant. If I fall, you will be relieved from an expensive and troublesome friend; if, with the divine permission, I succeed; I shall govern in your name, and to your glory, the Roman Senate, and the part of the republic delivered from slavery by my victorious arms." Theodoric's proposal was accepted by the Byzantine Court. He marched against the tyrant in the depth of a rigorous winter, and after many obscure and bloody battles, he descended from the Julian Alps and displayed his invincible banners on the confines of Italy. The conflict between Odoacer and Theodoric was severe; but at length the former capitulated, and, being removed by death, the royalty of Theodoric was proclaimed by the Ostrogoths, "with the tardy, reluctant, ambiguous consent of the Emperor of the East."

After this manner the Seventh Head was developed and established upon the Seven Hills; the Dragon tardily, reluctantly and ambiguously ceding to it "his power, and his throne, and extensive jurisdiction" (ch. 13:2). Theodoric reigned thirty-three years, from A.D. 493 to A.D. 526. Among the barbarian Horns of the West the victory of Theodoric had spread a general alarm. But as soon as it appeared that he was satiated with conquest and desired peace, terror was changed into respect, and they submitted to a powerful mediation, which was uniformly employed for the best purposes of reconciling their quarrels and civilizing their manners. A wife, two daughters, a sister and a niece, united the family of Theodoric with the kings of the Franks, the Burgundians, the Visigoths, the Vandals and the Thuringians, and contributed to maintain the harmony, or at least the balance, of the great western Republic of the horns. He reduced, under a strong and regular government, the unprofitable countries of Rhætia, Noricum, Dalmatia and Pannonia, from the source of the Danube and the territory of the Bavarians, to the kingdom erected by the Gepidæ on the ruins of Sirmium. His greatness awakened the jealousy of Anastasius, the emperor of the east, who ravaged the sea-coast of Calabria and Apulia, but the activity and moderation of Theodoric were soon rewarded by a solid and honorable peace. He maintained with a powerful hand the balance of the Horn-Powers of the west, till it was at length overthrown by the ambition of Clovis, king of the Franks, whose progress he checked in the midst of their victorious career. By the Visigoths he was revered as a national protector and guardian of their infant prince. Under this respectable character, the king of Italy restored the prætorian præfecture of the Gauls, reformed some abuses in the civil government of Spain, and accepted the annual tribute and apparent submission of its military governor. The sovereignty of the Seventh Head was established from Sicily to the Danube, and from Belgrade to the Atlantic ocean, and the Greeks themselves have acknowledged that Theodoric reigned over the fairest portion of the western empire.

"From a tender regard to the expiring prejudices of Rome," says the historian, "the barbarian declined the name, the purple and the diadem of the emperors; but he assumed, under the hereditary title of king, the whole substance and plenitude of imperial prerogative. His addresses to the eastern throne were respectful and ambiguous; he celebrated in pompous style the harmony of The Two Republics, applauded his own government as the perfect similitude of a sole and undivided empire (or Head), and claimed above the kings of the earth (the Diademed Horns) the same pre-eminence which he modestly allowed to the person or rank of Anastasius.” “They worshipped the Dragon, and they worshipped the Beast,” which is further illustrated by Gibbon, who continues: “the alliance of the East and West was annually declared by the unanimous choice of two consuls; but it should seem that the Italian candidate, who was named by Theodoric, accepted a formal confirmation from the sovereign at Constantinople.” The fifteen regions of Italy were governed according to the principles and even the forms of Roman jurisprudence. The civil administration, with its honors and emoluments, was confined to the Italians, for whom were reserved the arts of peace, and the Goths were used for the service of war and public defence. These barbarians held their lands and benefices as a military stipend; at the sound of the trumpet they were prepared to march under the conduct of their provincial officers, and the whole extent of Italy was distributed into the several quarters of a well-regulated camp.

With the protection, Theodoric assumed the legal supremacy of the Catholic Church. He was riot ignorant of the dignity and importance of the Bishop of Rome, to whom was now appropriated the name of POPE. When “the chair of St. Peter” was disputed by Symmachus and Lawrence, they appeared at his summons before the tribunal of an Arian king, and he confirmed the election of the one he most approved. At the end of his life, in a moment of jealousy and resentment, he prevented the choice of the Romans, by nominating a pope in the palace of Ravenna. This produced great excitement, which he controlled, and the last decree of the Senate was enacted to extinguish, if it were possible, “the scandalous venality of the papal elections.”

The reign of Theodoric was mild, tolerant and promotive of the prosperity, security, and happiness of the people. But his ungrateful subjects could never be cordially reconciled to the origin, the religion, or even the virtues of the Gothic conqueror; past calamities were forgotten, and the sense or suspicion of injuries was rendered still more exquisite by the present felicity of the times. The religious toleration which Theodoric had the glory of introducing into the Catholic world, was painful and offensive to the Trinitarian zeal of the Italians. They dared not disturb the armed heresy of the Goths; therefore, they sought to vent their pious and cowardly rage by falling upon the rich and defenceless Jews. Their persons were insulted, their effects were pillaged, and their synagogues were burnt by the mad populace of Rome and Ravenna, inflamed by the most frivolous or extravagant pretences. A legal inquiry was instantly directed by the king; who, as the authors of the tumult had escaped, condemned the whole community to repair the damage; and the obstinate bigots who refused their contributions, were whipped through the streets by the hand of the executioner. This simple act of justice exasperated the discontent of the Trinitarians, who applauded the merit and patience of these so-called “holy confessors;” and from three hundred pulpits deplored the persecution of the church. “At the close of a glorious life,” says Gibbon, “the king of Italy discovered he had excited the hatred of a people whose happiness he had labored so assiduously to promote; and his mind was soured by indignation, jealousy and the bitterness of unrequited love.” Thus were embittered the relations between the Gothic Head and the Trinitarian Italians, who were devoted to the traditions of the Council of Nice, whom Theodoric suspected of a secret and treasonable correspondence with the Byzantine representative of the Head smitten by the sword. The powers of this government were then in the hands of JUSTINIAN, who already meditated the extirpation of heresy, and the reconquest of Italy and Africa; in other words, the healing of the plague of the sword, with which imperialism had been smitten in these countries, as it were, to death. A rigorous law which was published at Constantinople to reduce the Arians by the dread of punishment within the pale of the Catholic orthodoxy, awakened the just resentment of Theodoric, who claimed for his distressed brethren of the East the same indulgence which he had so long granted to the Trinitarian Catholics of his dominions. At his stern command, the Bishop of Rome, with four illustrious senators, embarked on an embassy. The singular veneration shown to the Bishop, who was the first pope that had visited Constantinople, was punished by Theodoric as a crime; and a mandate was prepared in Italy to prohibit, after a stated day, the exercise of the Catholic worship. “by the bigotry of his subjects and enemies,” says Gibbon, “the most tolerant of princes was driven to the brink of persecution.” The celebrated Boethius, a Roman senator, philosopher and minister of state, his father-in-law the patrician Symmachus, and Albinus, also a senator, were accused of treason for “hoping the liberty of Rome,” and actually inviting the Emperor Justinian to deliver Italy from the Goths; in other words, to undertake the healing of the wounded head that it might live. The suspicions of Theodoric were probably not groundless, and could only be appeased by their blood. They were executed, and the treason charged assumed a terrible reality in succeeding reigns.

Gold coin issued in the name of Theodoric King of Ostrogoths. He reigned from A.D. 493 to 526.

On the death of Theodoric, August 30, A.D. 526, the throne of the Seventh Head was occupied by his grandson, Athalaric, aged ten years, with his mother Amalasuntha as guardian and regent of the kingdom of Italy. She ruled the country about eight years, during which a spirit of discord and disaffection prevailed, and the Goths supported with reluctance the indignity of a female reign. Her son Athalaric dying, she caused it to be announced to the Senate of Rome and the Emperor of Constantinople, that she and Theodatus, her cousin, had jointly ascended the throne of Italy. But this regal partnership was soon dissolved by Theodatus, by whose orders she was first imprisoned, and then strangled in the bath, A.D. 535.

The emperor Justinian, who had recently “plucked up by the roots” the Vandal Horn in Africa, beheld with joy the dissensions of the Goths in Italy, who were feebly and unworthily governed by Theodatus. He considered the opportunity as favorable for the healing of his wounded authority over Italy. He demanded therefore the abdication of the Gothic king, and the surrender of the ancient provinces of the empire. Though agreed to by the weakness and imbecility of Theodatus, its execution was prevented by his assassination, and the elevation of Vitiges to the throne. Justinian, however, was not to be thwarted in this way. He ordered BELISARIUS to invade Italy with the forces of the empire, and to wrest it from the Goths. The invasion was easy, but the expulsion of two hundred thousand warlike barbarians in arms, proved to be a work of great difficulty.

Having recovered Sicily, the general of Justinian landed his forces in Italy, A.D. 536. From the capture of Naples he proceeded against Rome, which had been left to a feeble garrison, and the fidelity of its citizens. “But”, says Gibbon, “a momentary enthusiasm of religion and patriotism was kindled in their minds. They furiously exclaimed, that THE APOSTOLIC THRONE should no longer be profaned by the triumph or toleration of Arianism; that the tombs of the Caesars should no longer be trampled by the savages of the north; and, without reflecting, that Italy must sink into a province of Constantinople, they fondly hailed the restoration of the Roman emperor as a new era of freedom and prosperity. The deputies of the pope and clergy, of the Senate and people, invited the lieutenant of Justinian to accept their voluntary allegiance, and to enter the city whose gates would be thrown open for his reception.” He readily accepted their allegiance, and made his entrance at the Asinarian gate, while the Gothic garrison departed without molestation along the Flaminian way; and the city after sixty years’ servitude, was delivered from the yoke of the barbarians. The keys of Rome were sent to the throne of the emperor Justinian, to whom they were delivered by the Gothic commander of the garrison, who refused to accompany his troops in their retreat.

But Vitiges was not idle. During the winter season he collected an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men. With these forces he besieged Belisarius in Rome for more than a year. The city was greatly distressed. The general pitied the sufferings of the people, whose loyalty to the emperor had notably decayed, while their discontents proportionately increased. "Adversity," says Gibbon, "had awakened the Romans from the dreams of grandeur and freedom, and taught them the humiliating lesson, that it was of small moment to their real happiness, whether the name of their master was derived from the Gothic or the Latin language." Among the disaffected was Sylverius, the incumbent of the recently erected "Apostolic Throne." A letter subscribed by him was intercepted, which assured the king of the Goths, that the Asinarian gate, adjoining to the Lateran church, should be secretly opened to his troops. On this proof of treason, he was summoned to attend at the headquarters of Belisarius, and there to give an account of himself. The ecclesiastics who followed the pope, were detained in an anteroom, and he alone was admitted into the presence of the general. Belisarius was silent, but the voice of reproach and menace issued from the mouth of Antonina, his imperious wife. Being convicted of the treason, the pretended successor of St. Peter was despoiled of his pontifical ornaments, clad in the mean habit of a monk, and embarked without delay for a distant exile in the east, and was afterwards either slain or murdered upon a desolate island. At the emperor's command, the clergy of Rome proceeded to the choice of a new bishop; they therefore elected a deacon Vigilius, who had purchased the papal throne by a bribe of two hundred pounds of gold. From these circumstances the reader will perceive the relation in which the bishop of Rome stood to the imperial power in the first half of the sixth century. He was still subject to the civil authority though spiritual "Head of all the Churches" of the empire. The imperial authority was now in Rome again in power, or maintained by force of arms. Had this been permanent the pope would never have become a temporal sovereign; but would have lived and died the servant of the emperors. Hence, the removal of this pressure was necessary to the setting up of an imperial episcopal image upon the seven hills. The decollation of the Seventh Head, and the reduction of Rome to a subordinate rank among cities, would accomplish this; and therefore the calamities of the times as developed in this Gothic war.

Succours arriving from Constantinople, Rome was delivered from the Goths, who raised the siege, and fell back upon Ravenna. This well fortified city was at length captured by Belisarius, who also obtained possession of Vitiges the Gothic king, whom he sent prisoner to Constantinople, A.D. 539. By these reverses they lost their king, an inconsiderable loss truly, their capital, their treasures, the provinces from Sicily to the Alps, and the military force of two hundred thousand barbarians magnificently equipped with horses and arms. Yet all was not lost. Totila the nephew of the captive king was chosen to succeed him; and, at the head of five thousand soldiers, generously undertook the restoration of the kingdom of Italy.

Having routed twenty thousand Romans near Faenza, he crossed the Po, and traversing the Apennine, laid siege to Naples, which he reduced; and then retracing his steps, laid siege to Rome, whose Senate and people he calmly exhorted to compare the tyranny of the Greeks with the blessings of the Gothic reign.

Totila was chaste and temperate; and none were deceived who depended on his faith or his clemency. By his virtues in contrast with the vices of the officials, who served the interests of imperialism, a new people, under the appellation of Goths, was insensibly formed in his camp. The situation of the imperialists had already become desperate; and the return of Belisarius to save the country he had subdued in the first war, was pressed with equal vehemence by his friends and enemies. He reluctantly accepted the painful task of supporting his own reputation, and retrieving the faults of his successors. The sea being open to the Romans, he entered the port of Ravenna. From thence he addressed both the Goths and Italians in the name of Justinian, his gracious master, who, he said, was inclined to pardon and reward. But not a man was tempted to desert the standard of the Gothic king. Belisarius soon discovered that he had been sent by Justinian to remain the idle and impotent spectator of the glory of the young barbarian Totila. This he by no means approved; and, in an epistle to the emperor, exhibited a lively picture of the crisis, which caused him great distress. "Most excellent prince," says he, "we are arrived in Italy, destitute of all the necessary implements of war, men, horses, arms, and money. In our late circuit through the villages of Thrace and Illyricum, we have collected with extreme difficulty, about four thousand recruits, naked, and unskilled in the use of weapons and the exercises of the camp. The soldiers already stationed in the province are discontented, fearful and dismayed; at the sound of an enemy, they dismiss their horses, and cast their arms on the ground. No taxes can be raised, since Italy is in the hands of the barbarians; the failure of payment has deprived us of the right of command, or even of admonition. Be assured, Dread Sir, that the greater part of your troops have already deserted to the Goths. If the war could be achieved by the presence of Belisarius alone, your wishes are satisfied; Belisarius is in the midst of Italy. But, if you desire to conquer, far other preparations are requisite: without a military force, the title of general is an empty name. It would be expedient to restore to my service my own veterans and domestic guards. Before I can take the field, I must receive an adequate supply of light and heavy armed troops; and it is only with ready money that you can procure the indispensable aid of a powerful body of the cavalry of the Huns."

In the meantime, the siege of Rome was closely pressed by Totila, A.D. 546. The inhabitants were gradually reduced to feed on dead horses, dogs, cats, and mice, and eagerly to snatch the grass, and even the nettles, which grew among the ruins of the city. The failure of Belisarius to throw supplies into the place, left Rome without protection to the mercy or indignation of Totila; by whose instrumentality the Deity was inflicting plagues upon the Trinitarian adherents of the Name of Blasphemy upon the Seven Hills. The continuance of hostilities had embittered the national hatred; the Arian clergy were ignominiously driven from Rome; Pelagius, the archdeacon, returned without success from an embassy to the Gothic camp; and a Sicilian bishop, the envoy or nuncio of pope Vigilius, was deprived of both his hands, for daring to utter falsehoods in the service of the Trinitarian church and state.

At length on Dec. 17, the Goths were treacherously admitted into the city. As soon as daylight had displayed the entire victory of the Goths, Totila devoutly visited the so-called tomb of St. Peter; but while he prayed at the altar, twenty-five soldiers and sixty citizens, were put to the sword in the vestibule of the temple. The archdeacon Pelagius stood before him with "the gospel" in his hand, and exclaimed, "O Lord, be merciful to your servant." "Pelagius," said Totila, with an insulting smile, "your pride now condescends to become a suppliant." "I am a suppliant," he prudently replied, "God has now made us your subjects. and as your subjects we are entitled to your clemency." At his humble prayer the lives of the Romans were spared, and the passions of the hungry soldiers restrained. But they were rewarded with the freedom of pillage. The next day he pronounced two orations, to congratulate and admonish the victorious Goths, and to reproach the Senate, as the vilest of slaves, with their perjury, folly, and ingratitude. Yet he consented to forgive their revolt. Against the city he appeared inexorable; and the world was astonished at the fatal decree, that Rome should be changed into a pasture for cattle. The firm and temperate remonstrance of Belisarius suspended the execution; and Totila was at length persuaded to preserve Rome as the ornament of his kingdom. Having demolished one third of the walls in different parts, and stationed an army about fifteen miles from the city to observe the motions of Belisarius, he marched with the remainder of his forces into Lucania and Apulia. The Senators were dragged in his train, and afterwards confined in the fortress of Campania; the citizens with their wives and children, and the pope and his clergy of all ranks and degrees, were dispersed in exile; and during forty days and more Rome was abandoned to desolate and dreary solitude.

A golden medallion of Justinian issued in 534 commemorating his military successes in the West that provided the means whereby he could extend assistance to the Bishop of Rome, proclaiming him to be head of all the churches.

And here it would be well for the reader to pause, and reflect upon this chasm of forty days in the life of "THE MISTRESS OF THE WORLD"—"the Woman, that Great City," which in the apostles' day, and ecclesiastically in ours, "reigneth over the regal powers of the earth" (ch. 17:18). If the foundation of Rome be correctly stated at 753 years before the birth of Jesus Christ, the "Eternal City," so called, became a vacant space twelve hundred and ninety-nine years after. This chasm of forty days is nearly the central epoch of the city's existence. Twelve hundred and sixty years afterwards, Totila was represented by Napoleon, crowned emperor and king of Italy by the Pope. Totila was not unlike his modern representative in some respects. He had but little respect for Rome or its bishop. He filled Rome with darkness, so that no political lights, civil or ecclesiastical, shone in it for forty days; so also, Napoleon, as the executive of the Fifth Vial, poured vengeance upon Rome; and filled the kingdom, of which it is the seat or throne, with darkness. When Totila consented not to reduce it to a pasture for cattle, but to leave it a vacant and standing monument of the wrath of heaven, he carried off the pope with him into captivity; and 1260 years after, Napoleon degraded the city to a subordinate rank, and transferred the pope from a throne to captivity at Fontainebleau. Thirteen hundred and twenty years (1320) have now elapsed since this notable forty days of solitude; and it is exceedingly probable that but few more years will elapse ere this renowned centre of crime, blasphemy, and everything unclean and hateful, finds itself submerged in the unfathomable depths of a solitude, whose silence will never again be broken by the trumpet, or its darkness dispelled by a glimmering of light (ch. 18:22, 23).

After this forty days of solitude the city was reoccupied by Belisarius, who sent its keys (for there were then no "St. Peter's keys" to send) a second time to Justinian. But the imperialists were unable to hold it. In A.D. 549, the Goths laid siege to it again, and took it. Totila no longer desired to destroy the edifices of Rome, which he now respected as the throne of the Gothic kingdom; the Senate and people were now restored, and the means of subsistence were liberally provided. He reduced the cities of Rhegium and Tarentum; and annexed Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica. At every step of his victories, he repeated to Justinian his desire of peace, applauded the concord of their predecessors, and offered to employ the Gothic arms in the service of the Dragon-empire.

But, Justinian, true to the character of "the king who" should "do according to his will" (Dan. 11:35), was deaf to the voice of peace; but he neglected, through indolence, the prosecution of the war. From this slumber he was aroused by Vigilius, "the Head of all the churches" of his estate, and the patrician Cethegus, who appeared before his throne, and adjured him in the name of the Deity and the people, to resume the conquest and deliverance of Italy. An army was assembled, and under the command of Narses, was ordered to march against the Goths. Totila, conscious that the clergy and people of Italy aspired to a second revolution, resolved to risk the Gothic kingdom on the chance of a day, in which the valiant would be animated by instant danger, and the disaffected might be awed by mutual ignorance. The decisive battle was fought at Taginas, about ninety-five miles from Rome, in July, A.D. 552. The Goths were defeated, and Totila was slain. Narses, having paid his devotions to "the blessed Virgin," his imaginary goddess, and peculiar patroness, whose inspiration he professed had revealed to him the day, and the word of battle, advanced towards Rome, which did not long delay his progress. The keys of the city were for the third time sent to Justinian, under whose reign it had been five times taken and recovered. "But the deliverance of Rome," says Gibbon, "was the last calamity of the Roman people." Three hundred youths of the noblest families, who were hostages in the hands of the Goths, were slain by Teias, the successor of Totila. "The fate of the Senate suggests an awful lesson of the vicissitude of human affairs. All the fortresses of Campania were stained with patrician blood. After a period of thirteen centuries, the institution of Romulus expired; and if the nobles of Rome still assumed the title of senators, few subsequent traces can be discovered of a public council, or constitutional order. Ascend six hundred years, and contemplate the kings of the earth soliciting an audience, as the slaves or freemen of the ROMAN SENATE!”

In the following March, A.D. 553, was fought the battle of the Draco, in which the new king was slain. While exchanging his buckler his uncovered side was pierced with a mortal dart. “He fell, and his head exalted upon a spear, proclaimed to the nations that the Gothic kingdom was no more.” Thus, after a reign of sixty years, the Seventh Head of the Dragon and the Beast was destroyed from the Seven Hills. The Roman Senate and the Gothic kingdom became extinct together. Their place was filled by the Exarchs of Ravenna, who were the representatives in peace and war of the Constantinopolitan Dragon. But, though this power, after the agitation of a long tempest, had regained possession of Italy, the wounded Sixth Head was not yet “healed,” neither indeed could it be until Rome again became the throne of an imperial dominion. Instead of this, on the fall of the Seventh Head, whose “short space” had passed away with the death of Teias, the former Mistress of the World was dethroned. The civil state of Italy was fixed, A.D. 554, by a pragmatic sanction of twenty-seven articles, which the emperor Justinian promulgated at the request of the pope, who was still a subject, ruled by the emperor’s lieutenant resident in Ravenna. Justinian introduced his own jurisprudence into the schools and tribunals of the west; and ratified the acts of Theodoric and his immediate successors. Under the Exarchs of Ravenna, ROME was degraded to the second rank among the cities of the empire. The regulation of weights and measures was delegated to the pope and municipal senate. But, however benevolent their edicts, the power of rulers is most effectual to destroy; and twenty years of the Gothic war had consummated the distress and depopulation of Italy; so that “a strict interpretation of the evidence of Procopius,” says Gibbon, “would swell the loss of Italy above the total sum of her present inhabitants.”

The Sixth and the Seventh Heads which hindered the manifestation of the Name of Blasphemy upon the Seven Hills being taken out of the way, scope was now afforded for its development into the EIGHTH HEAD of the Beast. From the epoch of the settlement of Italy A.D. 554–559, and during the ensuing two hundred and forty years of Rome’s eclipse, the greatest, or most influential subject in the degraded city, was the pope. There was no constitutional superior therein to over-awe or keep him down. In the times of the Seventh Head, which was Arian, he was in great trouble, and especially during the Gothic war. Indeed, he has always fallen upon troublous times when he has had for ruler or neighbor, an independent king of Italy. It is so at this day. A king of Italy naturally enough claims Rome for the capital of his kingdom, which is incompatible with the sovereignty and independence of the Name of Blasphemy upon the Seven Hills.

JUSTINIAN’S EMPIRE IN 565

The victories of Belisarius and Narses over the Goths of Italy and the Arians of North America extended the influence of Justinian in the West and enabled the “deadly wound” of the sixth head of the beast “to be healed” at the expense of the 7th or Gothic head (Rev. 13:3). Thus the Dragon throne in Constantinople gave “power unto the beast” (v. 4).

Having, then, put the reader in possession of so much of history as will enable him to identify the Seventh Head; and having brought him down to the epoch of its decollation, or destruction, which was necessary for the subsequent “healing” of the wounded Sixth Head of Rome’s imperialism; it behooves us to pause in our exposition, that we may bring up arrears in regard to the development of the Name of Blasphemy upon the heads. When this is sufficiently advanced we shall have brought the ecclesiastical into line with the civil; and be prepared to carry them on together until the healing process is completed in their expansion into the Eighth Head upon the Seven Hills, as symbolized in this thirteenth chapter by the Beast of the Earth with Two Horns like a lamb, and speaking as a Dragon.

17. the Development of the Romano-Babylonian Name of Blasphemy

The Name of Blasphemy is the Eye and Mouth, or ecclesiastical element of the Eighth Head. As we have seen, this ecclesiastical constituent of the Beast was working upwards towards enthronization over all, anterior to the establishment of the Ten Gothic Horns upon the Roman Habitable. When the citizens and clergy of Rome were seized with a spirit of patriotism and superstitious zeal, A.D. 536, “they furiously exclaimed,” says Gibbon, “that THE APOSTOLIC THRONE should no longer be profaned by the triumph or toleration of Arianism.” Belisarius was then at the gates, and the Gothic king in possession of the city. Hence, the people of that day evidently recognized two thrones in contemporary existence within the walls—the Secular Throne of the king of Italy; and the Ecclesiastical Throne of the Archbishop and Patriarch of Rome. In Italy, the “Apostolic Throne” was overshadowed by the Secular; and as the Patriarch of Constantinople was in domestic slavery under the eye of his master, the Greek emperor, as he is at this day under the Sultan; so the Patriarch of Rome, occupying a distant and dangerous station amidst the Barbarians of the West, was the enthroned slave of his master, the king of Italy; who, while he professed great reverence for the throne of St. Peter, did not hesitate to chastise his pretended successor when convinced of disloyalty to the Gothic throne.

But as to this Apostolic throne. Whence its origin; by what authority was it established? John was informed that “the Dragon gave him his power, and his throne, and an extensive jurisdiction.” This was the constitutional source of all the Bishop of Rome’s preeminence. He obtained no honors, privileges, and immunities from the kings of the Seventh Head. He derived all he possessed from the emperors of the East and of the West; who were the great and powerful patrons by whom he was acknowledged as a god of gods upon earth.

His development, however, into an enthroned god was gradual and progressive. In the Canons of the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 450, the Bishop of Rome is styled, “Beatissimus Papa urbis Romæ, qui est caput omnium ecclesiarum,” i.e.; the most blessed Pope of Rome, who is “THE HEAD OF ALL CHURCHES.” About five years before this the western emperor, Valentinian III., and the eastern emperor, Theodosius II., unitedly published an imperial edict, or law, in which the Bishop of Rome is styled, “DIRECTOR OF UNIVERSAL CHRISTENDOM.” In this edict, the presumptuousness of resistance to the Holy See was sharply rebuked, the whole body of bishops bidden to do nothing without his approbation, and the universal clergy to obey him as their ruler. “From this time” (A.D. 445) says Ranke, “the power of the Roman Bishops grew up under protection of the Roman Emperor himself.” He was their especial patron, and predicted as such, as we have already seen in what is testified concerning the Dragon in the second verse of this chapter.

We come now to that remarkable epoch of four years, extending from A.D. 529 to 533. This belongs to the earliest years of Justinian, who began to reign in Constantinople, A.D. 527. The Catholics of Italy, then subject to the Arian kings of the Seventh Head, were greatly attached to him as “worshippers of the Dragon and the Beast,” because as Gibbon says, “he trod the narrow path of inflexible and intolerant orthodoxy. After a schism of thirty-four years, he reconciled the proud and angry spirit of the Roman Pontiff, and spread among the Latins a favorable report of his pious respect for the Apostolic See. The thrones of the East were filled with (Trinitarian) Catholic bishops devoted to his interests, the clergy and monks were gained by his liberality, and the people were taught to pray for their sovereign as the hope and pillar of the true religion.”

In this epoch of his reign, and by his care, the Roman Civil Jurisprudence was digested in what Gibbon styles,” the immortal works of the Code, the Pandects, and the Institutes.” These, “the public reason of the Romans, have been silently or studiously transfused into the domestic institutions of Europe; and the laws of Justinian still command the respect or obedience of independent nations.” “The Code, Pandects, and Institutes were declared to be the legitimate system of civil jurisprudence; they alone were admitted in the tribunals, and they alone were taught in the academies of Rome, Constantinople, and Berytus. Justinian addressed to the Senate and provinces his Eternal Oracles; and his pride, under the mask of piety, ascribed the consummation of this great design to the support and inspiration of the Deity.”

In the theological character drawn of him by Gibbon, he says, that he sympathized with his subjects in their superstitious reverence for living and departed saints: his Code, and more especially his Novels, confirm and enlarge the privileges of the clergy; and in every dispute between a monk and a layman he was inclined to pronounce that truth, and innocence, and justice were always on the side of the church. His fancy was amused by the hope or belief of personal inspiration; and that he had secured the patronage of the Virgin, and St. Michael the archangel. Among the titles of imperial greatness, the name of Pious was most pleasing to his ear; to promote the temporal and spiritual interest of the Catholic church was the serious business of his life; and the duty of father of his country was often sacrificed to that of defender of the Catholic faith. Justinian was a bigoted tyrant; and his reign a uniform yet various scene of persecution. He surpassed his indolent predecessors, both in the contrivance of his laws against heretics and the rigor of their execution. He assigned three months for the conversion or exile of all such; and if he still connived at their precarious stay, they were deprived, under his iron yoke, not only of the benefits of society, but of the common birthright of men and religionists. The residue of pagans, Jews, and Samaritans were equally obnoxious to his theological ire. The last were exterminated with fire and sword; and the once fruitful province of Samaria was converted into a desolate and smoking wilderness. It has been computed that one hundred thousand Roman subjects were extirpated in this Samaritan war. “But in the creed of Justinian,” says the historian, “the guilt of murder could not be applied to the slaughter of unbelievers: and he piously labored to establish with fire and sword the unity of the Catholic faith.”

Such was Justinian, the diademed representative of the Dragon from A.D. 527 to A.D. 565; and of Daniel’s Little Horn King, who worked according to his will; to whom the Patriarch of Rome was greatly indebted in the establishment of his self-exaltation “over all called god or sebasma”—an object of veneration. His “policy” was that of an ecclesiastical ruler of the class typified by Constantine the great.” “Never prince,” says Dupin, “did meddle so much with what concerns the affairs of the Church, nor make so many constitutions and laws upon the subject. He was persuaded that it was the duty of an emperor, and for the good of the State, to have a particular care of the church, to defend its faith, to regulate external discipline, and to employ the civil laws and the temporal power to preserve it in order and peace.”

Although the Bishop of Rome had himself claimed supremacy over all other bishops of the Roman earth, including the Patriarch of Constantinople, this claim had not been imperially, or Dragonically, recognized, until the publication of a Decretal Epistle from Justinian to the Pope, dated March, A.D. 533. “It is hence evident,” says Gothofred, the editor of the Justinian Code, cited by Cunningham, “that they who suppose Phocas to have been the first who gave imperial recognition to the primacy of the Roman See over that of Constantinople are in error: Justinian having acknowledged it before.”

“And the King (the Dragon-Power of the Apocalypse) shall do according to his own will ... And in his estate (or empire) he shall honor the god of guardians (the Bishop of Rome): even a god whom his (pagan) fathers knew not shall he honor with gold and silver, and precious stones and things desired.

Thus shall he do in the Bazaars of the Guardians (temples dedicated to fictitious saints and angels) with a foreign god, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory” (Dan. 11:36–39). The form of this acknowledgment is found in the aforesaid Decretal Epistle; from the Latin copy of which, as given in Elliot’s Notes, I have translated the following extracts for the information of the English reader.

“Justinian the Victorious, the Pious, &c., always August, to John the Most Holy Archbishop of the Sacred City Rome, and Patriarch.

Rendering honor to the Apostolic Throne and to your Holiness ... we hasten to bring to the knowledge of your Holiness all things which pertain to the state of the churches: because we have always a great desire to preserve the unity of your Apostolic Throne, and the state of the holy churches of God which hitherto obtains, and unchangeably continues, nothing to the contrary intervening. Therefore we have hastened both to subject and to unite to the Throne of your Holiness all the priests of the whole eastern region ... For we neither suffer anything that pertains to the state of the churches, although what is agitated may be manifest and indubitable, that may not be known also to your Holiness, who is the Head of All the Holy Churches. For through all, as it is said, we hasten to increase the honor and authority of your throne.”

After this follows a statement of certain heresies then existing in regard to the person of Christ; also of Justinian’s own belief, and its orthodox agreement with the dogmas of the four preceding General Councils of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus and Chalcedon, in conformity with the creed of the Roman See—“Accordingly,” says he, “all priests, following the doctrine of your Apostolic Throne, so believe and confess and preach.” The epistle then proceeds.

“Whence we have hastened to bring this to the knowledge of your Holiness by the Most Blessed Bishops HYPATIUS and DEMETRIUS, that the things be not concealed from your Holiness which are wickedly and judaically denied by some few monks according to the falsehood of Nestorius. We intreat therefore your paternal affection, as by your letters addressed to us and to the Most Holy Bishop of this Sacred City (of Constantine) and your brother Patriarch (and because he has written by the same (bishops), hastening in all things to follow the Apostolic Throne of your Blessedness) made manifest to us that your Holiness may acknowledge all who rightly confess the things aforesaid, and may condemn the falsehood of those who may dare judaically to deny the right faith. For so both the love of all increases more towards you, and the authority of your throne: and the unity of the holy churches which is to you will be maintained undisturbed: when through you all the most blessed bishops of those which pertain to you shall have learned the pure doctrine of your Holiness.”

This letter was written to the Bishop of Rome then subject to the king of Italy, while Justinian was meditating the re-conquest of the country. Three years after, Rome was besieged by Belisarius. The letter was exceedingly flattering to the Bishop’s pride and ambition, in that he found himself authoritatively seated upon the Seven Hills as enthroned head over all ecclesiastical affairs of the Roman world. But the Seventh Head, which was Arian, did not coincide with Justinian in the acknowledgement of the Pope as the Head of all churches. The Arian Catholic churches repudiated his headship; they were therefore, being heretics, the natural enemies of Justinian and his Universal Bishop, whose policy could not be established until the Seventh Head was abolished, and the Arians suppressed. Hence, the invasion of Italy; the sympathy of the Trinitarians in Rome with the invader; and the persecution of heretics of every variety of belief; and the location of the Dragon’s Viceroy in Ravenna, instead of Rome. The settlement of Italy by Justinian according to the Pragmatic Sanction, granted at the Pope’s request, A.D. 554, by reducing Rome to the second rank, left the Apostolic Throne therein free from the overshadowing and blighting presence of a sovereign temporal authority; and thus “the Dragon gave to him his power and his throne and an extensive jurisdiction,” saying in the 131st of the Novels, “we ordain that the Most Holy Pope of the Elder Rome be the first of all priests”—even in that Rome, which in the 9th of the Novels he styles, “the native country of the laws, the fountain of the priesthood.”

The Seventh Head being destroyed, and the Bishop of Rome acknowledged by the Catholic Dragon of the East, as the Pontiff of the empire, the next desideratum was that he should be acknowledged by all the Horns of the West. This implied their conversion from paganism and Arianism to what Justinian styles “the right faith,” and the “pure doctrine of his Holiness.” These Horns belong to the times of Imperialism, which was worshipped by them in the Western Emperor while there was one, and afterwards in the Eastern. They were the Diademed Viceroys of Rome, and Constantinople, being Masters-General and Patricians of the empire—a political relation to Imperialism which legitimized their governments in the estimation of their Roman subjects, who greatly exceeded the number of their barbarian conquerers. The beginning and the ending of this political relationship, with but slight recognition of them in the long interval of 1335 years, are the subject of Apocalyptic symbolization. The beginning was the seed or elements of things in the period of politico-ecclesiastical organization; the ending, the ripe harvest and vintage (Apoc. 14) in the period of analysis or dissolution: so as that in some sort, the beginning was typical of the ending.

The rude-Horn Governments holding this relation to Imperialism, with the Lawyers and Clergy of their kingdoms practitioners and professors of Roman law and Roman Theology, easily accepted the legislation of Justinian in favor of the Pope and their own interests legal and ecclesiastical. A clergy the great majority of whom were Trinitarian, and Viceregal administrations, partly pagan and partly Arian, were the constitutional elements of the situation in the sixth century. The clergy of the kingdoms recognized and sympathized with the Pope and his patrons the Emperor of the East: and operated upon the barbarian kings and governments as imperial and papal missionaries for their conversion to “the right faith,” and “the pure doctrine of his Holiness,” in other words, to the Roman Catholic Trinitarian Superstition.

A Council of Constantinople during the reign of Justinian, as depicted on a fresco in the Vatican. The support of Justinian elevated the Bishop of Rome to the status of Head of all the Churches, and laid the foundation for the greatest influence of the Papacy. So the “deadly wound was healed” as predicted (Rev. 13:3), and Trinitarianism triumphed over Arianism (belief in One God)—Publishers.

Here, then, in this beginning were the Little Horn of the East (Dan. 8:9, 12, 23–25), the Catholic Dragon of Constantinople; and the Papal Eyes and Mouth, occupying the so-called Apostolic Throne upon the Seven Mountains, the Name of Blasphemy; and the Gothic Horns. Of these, the Vandal Horn, which was Arian, and defiant both of the Pope and the Emperor, had been “plucked up by the roots” by the forces of Justinian under Belisarius. The horn of the Gepidæ was transferred to the Chagan of the Avars, the representative for two hundred and thirty years of the modern kingdom of Hungary. These were hostile to the Apostolic Throne. The opposition of the rest was gradually overcome. Clovis, king of the Franks, on occasion of a victory, embraced the faith of Rome, A.D. 496; and so being the first, received the title, which has been handed down through more than thirteen centuries, to his successors the kings of France, of Eldest Son of the Church. In the sixth century the rest of the Horns gave in their adhesion to the Papal Faith. Recared was the first papal king of Spain. He reigned from A.D. 586 to A.D. 589. “The royal proselyte,” says Gibbon, “immediately saluted and consulted Pope Gregory, surnamed the Great, a learned and holy prelate, whose reign was distinguished by the conversion of heretics and infidels. The ambassadors of Recared respectfully offered upon the threshold of the Vatican his rich presents of gold and gems; they accepted, as a lucrative exchange, the hairs of St. John the Baptist, a cross which enclosed a piece of the true wood, and a key that contained some particles of iron, which had been scraped from the chains of St. Peter.”

The Lombard Horn was the last of the ten to renounce Arianism, for “the pure doctrine of his Holiness” of Rome. This occurred A.D. 600, through the instigation of Gregory the Great, who encouraged his co-religionist, Theodelinda, the Queen of the Lombards, to propagate the Nicene faith among her victorious savages “Her devout labors,” says Gibbon, “still left room for the industry and success of future missionaries; and many cities of Italy were still disputed by hostile bishops. But the cause of Arianism was gradually suppressed by the weight of interest and example, and the controversy, which Egypt had derived from the Platonic school, was terminated, after a war of three hundred years, by the final conversion of the Lombards of Italy.”

Thus was the Bishop of Rome developed into “the Mouth” of the great VICEREGAL RREPUBLIC OF THE WEST; and after this manner was fulfilled the oracle, saying, “And there was given to him (the Beast of the Sea) a Mouth.” It was a mouth like the mouth of the symbol of Babylon, “the mouth of a lion.” When it spoke it roared forth thunderings and blasphemies, far more hideous than ever defiled the ears of pagan or Mohammedan—a Mouth that still gives utterance to “blasphemies against the Deity to blaspheme his Name and his Tabernacle, and them that dwelleth in the heaven.”

But, notwithstanding Justinian’s Decretal Epistle, and the professed desire of his servant, the Patriarch of Constantinople, “in all things to follow the Apostolic Throne” of Rome’s Blessed One (!), the emperors and patriarchs, their immediate successors, did not partake of this desire. As the political stability and ecclesiastical organization of the West increased and progressed, the influence of the Oriental Catholic Power, enfeebled and almost extinguished by the victorious Persians and Avars, was greatly impaired; and had become in Italy little more than an ancient name, venerable chiefly for its antiquity and past renown. This emboldened the Pope in his schemes of absolute independence, and generated a spirit of rivalry and hostility between Rome and Constantinople. The patriarchs of Constantinople, who were scarcely less arrogant and ambitious than the popes, perceiving the advantages accruing from universal ecclesiastical supremacy, refused to acknowledge the Headship of “the Most Holy Archbishop of the Sacred City of Rome,” and claimed it for themselves. These equal pretensions of the rival episcopal thrones of the East and West involved them in continual strifes, which were very considerably augmented by the course of John “the Faster,” who, in a council held in the sixth year of the reign of the Emperor Maurice, A.D. 588, assumed the title of UNIVERSAL BISHOP, which was confirmed to him by the council. This assumption was equivalent to a claim of spiritual lordship over the pope and over all the Gothic Horns, as well as over the countries now embraced in the Ottoman empire. This had been decreed by Justinian to the Bishop of Rome fifty years before, and was now a part of the constitution of the empire, which a council had neither the power nor the right to reverse. This invasion of his rights, Pelagius II., then pope, vehemently opposed as an execrable, profane and diabolical procedure. Though Rome was no longer an imperial city, and “Mistress of the World,” she was supposed to be the Throne of St. Peter, which Pelagius regarded as a better foundation for the seat of an universal bishopric than the enfeebled and tottering imperality of Constantinople; but his invectives and arguments were equally despised, and his indignation was soon after quieted in death. He was succeeded in the A.D. 590, by Gregory the First, surnamed “the Great,” a voluminous writer, and, though superstitious in the extreme, not entirely untalented. His works are still extant, and in great repute with the worshippers of the Beast. The following artful epistle, written by him to his imperial master, Maurice, at Constantinople, in consequence of John the Faster assuming the title of Universal Bishop, casts considerable light upon the history of the times, and may, therefore, with advantage to the reader be inserted here, illustrative also of the deceitful and lying utterances of the Babylonian Mouth.

“Our Most Religious Lord,” says he, “whom the Deity hath placed over us, among other weighty cares belonging to the Empire, labors, according to the just rule of the sacred writings, to preserve peace and charity among the Clergy. He truly and piously considers that no man can well govern temporal matters, unless he manages with propriety things divine also; and the peace and tranquillity of the commonwealth depend upon the quiet of the universal church. For, Most Gracious Sovereign, what human power or strength would presume to lift up irreligious hands against your Most Christian Majesty, if the clergy, being at unity among themselves, would seriously pray to our Saviour Christ to preserve you who have merited so highly from us? Or what nation is there so barbarous as to exercise such cruelty against the faithful, unless the lives of us who are called priests, but in truth are not such, were most wicked and depraved? But whilst we leave those things which more immediately concern us, and embrace those things for which we are wholly unfit, we excite the barbarians against us, and our offences sharpen the swords of our enemies, by which means the commonwealth is weakened. For what can we say for ourselves, if the people of God, over whom, however unworthily, we (the pope) are placed, be oppressed by the multitude of our offences?—if our example destroy that which our preaching should build, and our actions, as it were, give the lie to our doctrine? Our bones are worn with fasting, but our minds are puffed up!” This is a hit at John the Faster. “Our bodies are covered with mean attire, but in our hearts we are quite elated! We lie grovelling in the ashes, yet we aim at things exceedingly high! We are teachers of humility, but patterns of pride, hiding the teeth of wolves under a sheep’s countenance! The end of all is to make a fair appearance before men, but God knoweth the truth!

“Therefore, our Most Pious Sovereign hath been prudently careful to place the church at unity, that he might the better compose the tumults of war and join their hearts together. This verily is my wish also, and for my own part I yield due obedience to your sovereign commands”—the pope still a subject, and without temporal power. “However, since it is not my cause, but the Deity’s it is not myself only but the whole church that is troubled, because religious laws, venerable synods, and the very precepts of our Lord Jesus Christ are disobeyed by the invention of a proud and pompous speech”—alluding to John the Faster’s title of Universal Bishop. “My desire is, that our most religious sovereign would lance this sore, and that he would bind with the cords of his imperial authority the party affected, in case he (John) makes any resistance. By restraining him the commonwealth will be eased; and by the paring away of such excrescences the empire is enlarged. Every man that has read the gospel knows that, even by the words of our Lord, the care of the whole church is committed to St. Peter, the apostle—the Prince of all the apostles.” Then follows the quotation of John 21:15–17; and Matt. 16:18, 19. “Behold! He hath the keys of the kingdom, and the power of binding and loosing is committed to him. The care and principality of the whole church is committed to him; and yet he is not called ‘Universal Apostle’—though this holy man, John my fellow-priest, labors to be called ‘Universal Bishop!’ I am compelled to cry out”—from jealousy, envy and vexation, doubtless—“O the corruption of times and manners! Behold the barbarians (the Gothic Horns) are become lords of all Europe; cities are destroyed, castles are beaten down, provinces depopulated, there is no husbandman to till the ground, idolators rage and domineer over christians; and yet, priests, who ought to lie weeping upon the pavement in sackcloth and ashes, covet names of vanity, and glory in new names and titles. Do I, Most Religious Sovereign, in this plead my own cause?”—doubtless nobody else’s. “Do I vindicate a wrong done to myself, and not maintain the cause of Almighty God and of the church universal? Who is he who presumes to usurp this new name against both the law of the gospel and of the canons? I would to God there might be one called UNIVERSAL without doing injustice to others!”—that is, the Bishop of Rome. We know that many priests of the church of Constantinople have been not only heretics, but even the chief leaders of them. Out of that school proceeded Nestorius, who, thinking it impossible that God should be made man, believed that Jesus Christ, the Mediator between God and man, was two persons, and went as far in infidelity as the Jews themselves. Thence came Macedonius, who denied the Holy Ghost, consubstantial to the Father and the Son, to be God. If, then, every one in that church assumed the name by which he makes himself the Head of all good men, the Catholic Church, which God forbid should ever be the case, must needs be overthrown when he falls who is called UNIVERSAL. But, far from christians be this BLASPHEMOUS NAME, by which all honor is taken from all other priests, while it is foolishly arrogated by one. It was offered to the Bishop of Rome by the reverend council of Chalcedon, in honor of St. Peter, Prince of the Apostles; but none of them either assumed or consented to use it, lest, while this privilege should be given to one, all others should be deprived of that honor which is due unto them. Why should WE refuse this title when it was offered, and another assume it without any offer at all? This man (John the Faster) contemning obedience to the Canons, should be humbled by the commands of our Most Pious Sovereign. He should be chastised who does an injury to the Holy Catholic Church; whose heart is puffed up, who seeks to please himself by a name of singularity, by which he would elevate himself above the emperor! We are all scandalized at this. Let the author of this scandal reform himself, and all differences in the church will cease. I am the servant of all priests, so long as they live like themselves; but if any shall set up his bristles (bristles belong to swine; so that by implication the Clergy are admitted by Gregory to be a swinish multitude) contrary to God Almighty and the Canons of the Fathers, I hope in God that he will never succeed in bringing my neck under his yoke—not even by force of arms. The things that have happened in this city in consequence of this new title, I have particularly declared to Sabinianus, the deacon, my agent. Let, therefore, my religious sovereigns (Maurice and Theodosius), think of me, their servant, whom they have always cherished and upheld more than others, as one who desired to yield them obedience, and yet am afraid to be found guilty of negligence in my duty at the last awful day of judgment. Let our most pious sovereign either vouchsafe to determine the affair, according to the petition of the aforesaid Sabinianus, the deacon, or cause the man, so often mentioned, to renounce his claim. In case he submits to your just sentence or your favourable admonitions, we will give thanks to Almighty God, and rejoice for the peace of the church procured by your clemency. But if he persist in this contention, we shall hold the saying to be most true. ‘Everyone that exalteth himself shall be abased.’ And again it is written, ‘Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall.’ In obedience to my sovereign, I have written to my brother priest both gently and humbly, urging him to desist from this vain glory. If he give ear unto me, he hath a brother devoted unto him; but, if he continue in his pride, I foresee what will befall him—he will make himself His enemy of whom it is written, ‘God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble’.”

This artful epistle, so replete with the finesse of the politician, and the envy of the priest, does not appear to have produced the desired effect. John the Faster, whose fasting had worn his bones and puffed up his mind, soon afterward vacated his “blasphemous name” by death; but this did not relieve Gregory of his distress; for Cynacus, who succeeded him as Patriarch of Constantinople, adopted the same superimperial and pompous title as his predecessor. Having had occasion to dispatch some agents to Rome, in the letter which he wrote to Gregory, he so much displeased him by assuming the title of “Universal Bishop,” that the pope withheld from the agents somewhat of the courtesy to which they considered themselves entitled, and, of course, complaint was made to the emperor Maurice of the neglect which had been shown them. This caused the emperor to write to Gregory, advising him to treat them in future in a more friendly manner and not to insist so far on punctilios of style, as to create a scandal about a title and to fall out about a few syllables. To this Gregory replied, “that the innovation in the style did not consist much in the quantity and alphabet; but the bulk of the iniquity was weighty enough to sink and destroy all. And therefore I am bold to say,” says this pontifical representative of infallibility, “that whoever adopts or affects the title of ‘Universal Bishop,’ has the pride and character of Antichrist, and is in some manner his forerunner in this haughty quality of elevating himself above the rest of his order. And indeed both the one and the other seem to split upon the same rock; for, as pride makes Antichrist strain his pretensions up to godhead, so whoever is ambitious to be called the only, or Universal Prelate, arrogates to himself a distinguished superiority, and rises, as it were, upon the ruins of the rest.”

But, notwithstanding the good words and fair speeches of his former letter, Gregory’s heart was full of venom and bitterness against Maurice and his family. Neither of these epistles caused the obnoxious title to be suppressed; and if Maurice had not been moved out of the way by a revolution, the “blasphemous name” would have adhered to Constantinople as the Apostolic Throne. But the heart of Gregory, the last of the “sainted popes,” was made glad by the murder of Maurice, his wife and nine children, by a rebel and orthodox usurper named PHOCAS, who was peaceably acknowledged in the provinces of the east and west. Gibbon describes him as a monster, of diminutive and deformed person, grossly ignorant and steeped in lust, drunkenness and brutality. Such was the abandoned villain of the baser sort, who occupied the throne of the Catholic Dragon about eight years from A.D. 602 to A.D. 610. “As a subject and a christian,” says Gibbon, “it was the duty of Gregory to acquiesce in the established government; but the joyful applause with which he salutes the fortune of the assassin has sullied, with indelible disgrace, the character of the saint. The successor of the apostles might have inculcated with decent firmness the guilt of blood and the necessity of repentance: he is content to celebrate the deliverance of the people and the fall of the oppressor; to rejoice that the piety and benignity of Phocas have been raised by Providence to the imperial throne; to pray that his hands may be strengthened against all his enemies; and to express a wish, perhaps a prophecy, that, after a long and triumphant reign, he may be transferred from a temporal to an everlasting kingdom.” In his epistle to Phocas he says, “We are glad that the benignity of your piety hath arrived at the imperial dignity. Let the heavens rejoice, and the earth exult, and the people of the universal republic until now vehemently afflicted become hilarious on account of your benignant deeds.” This base flattery, doubtless, predisposed the sanguinary tyrant to favor and promote the ambitious views of the pope, at the expense of the Patriarch of Constantinople. Such a biophthoros drakon, life-destroying Dragon, as he was styled, the worthy rival of the Caligulas and Domitians of the first age of the empire, was a very fit and proper patron to legislate the Bishop of Rome into the Universal Bishop of the world, the All-Overseeing Eye of the Apostasy.

“In A.D. 604, just before the death of Gregory,” Dr. Barton says, “Phocas wrote to him, proposing an orthodox confession of faith, acknowledged the supremacy of the Roman See, was very liberal to the Roman churches, and allowed the Pantheon to be converted to christian purposes: all which must have been extremely gratifying to a pope in the seventh century.” But Gregory did not long rejoice in “the benignity of Phocas’ piety,” being removed by death this year. He was succeeded by Boniface III, who had no scruple about adopting the proud and “blasphemous name.” His election was confirmed by Phocas (an imperial privilege which was formally abandoned A.D. 684) whom he importuned to bestow upon him the exalted title of Universal Bishop, with the privilege also of transmitting it to all his successors. “The profligate emperor,” says Jones, “to gratify the inordinate ambition of this court sycophant, deprived the bishop of Constantinople of the title which he had hitherto borne, and conferred it upon Boniface, at the same time declaring the Church of Rome to be Head of all other churches.” Thus Phocas confirmed what Justinian had ordained seventy-five years before. Justinian had given the pope his power, throne and jurisdiction; Phocas confirmed the same with the original and additional gift of the imperial title, UNIVERSAL OVERSEER; by which he attained a rank ecclesiastically superior to the emperor; and at the prospect of which Gregory professed to be greatly scandalized.

The authorities for this are Paul the Deacon, who says of Phocas, “Being entreated by Pope Boniface, he ordained that the throne of the Roman and apostolic church be the Head of All Churches; because the Constantinopolitan church declared that it was first of all churches”; and Anastasius who in his Ecclesiastical History on the A.D. 606 observes, “This (Boniface) obtained from Phocas the Prince, that the Apostolic Throne of the Blessed Apostle Peter should be the Head of all churches; because the Constantinopolitan church declared that she her self was the first of all churches.”

Gordon and Baronius make the date of the edict, A.D. 606; Muratori, A.D. 607.

In addition to Paul and Anastasius, Ado in his Chronikon, repeats their testimony, and adds, “Phocas, being entreated by Boniface the Roman Pontiff elsewhere, the rabble of idolatry in the old temple which was called the Pantheon being removed, ordered that it be dedicated a church of the Blessed Mary always a Virgin, and of All the Martyrs: that, where at one time the worship not of the Gods but of the Dæmons was performed, there continually the memory of all the saints might be preserved.”

The “Annals of Italy” assign the decree of Phocas to the A.D. 607; upon which as a Note, Gieseler adds the following curious versified notice of Phocas’ grant by Godfrey of Viterbo, in his Pantheon, about A.D. 1186.

*Tertius est Papa Bonifacius ille benignus
Qui petit a Phocamunus per secula dignum,
Ut sedes Petri prima sit. Ille dedit.
Prima prius fuerat Constantopolitana:
Est modo Romana, meliori dogmate clara.*

The following version is close enough to give the mere English reader the sense;

*Pope Boniface the third is he benign
Who sought fit gift of Phocas for all time,
That Peter’s Chair the first may be. He gave’t.
The First of rank Byzantine was before;
’Tis Roman now, more fam’d by doctrine pure.*

This title, or name of spiritual power, was regarded by the popes as a splendid gift. It was, as Gregory the Seventh remarked, “unicum nomen in mundo, the only name in the world. There was no other name like it, distinguishing one son of pride from another. Father and Universal Bishop exalted the Bishop of Rome to the rank of “God of the earth,” a title always coveted by those who filled the imperial office of the Seven Hills. Until the tide of successful villainy turned, the pope adored the Piety of the execrable monster; and a pillar was erected called “the Pillar of Phocas,” to commemorate his “innumerable benefits,” conferred upon his Italian subjects; in other words, upon the Pope and his clergy. It was a Corinthian fluted column of Greek marble, standing upon a pyramid of seven steps. “In 1813, the Duchess of Devonshire having made an excavation around it, an inscription,” says Elliott, ‘was discovered on the base, stating that a gilt statue had been placed on the top of it to the emperor Phocas, by the then Exarch of Italy, in the A.D. 608.’” Dr. Burton in his book on Rome, gives the inscription at full. The date is thus defined. Die Prima Mensis August. Indict. Und. ac Pietatis ejus Anno Quinto;” the 11th of the Indiction, and the 5th of the reign of Phocas. Now of that indiction the first was the year 598; the eleventh, the year 608: and as Phocas began his reign A.D. 602 or 603, its fifth year comes also to A.D. 608. The occasion of the honor is stated to be, “Pro innumerabilibus Pietatis ejus Beneficiis, et pro Quiete procurata Italiæ, ac conservata Libertate”—For the innumerable benefits of his Piety, and for the Repose procured for Italy, and Liberty preserved. Dr. Burton justly refers this to his concessions to the Pope. Thus the four years from A.D. 604 to A.D. 608, are notable in the history of Phocas’ aggrandizement of the Papal See: and from A.D. 529 to A.D. 604, are seventy five years; and from A.D. 533 to A.D. 608, are also seventy five years:” or the difference between Daniel’s 1335 of ch. 12:12, and “the time, times, and the dividing of a time,” of his ch. 7:25, and 12:7.

The Column of Phocas referred to in Eureka dominated the centre of the Roman Forum. It was erected in A.D. 608, and was the last of the Columns to be there set up. Phocas was a cruel and oppressive tyrant. His short reign terminated by a revolt under Heraclius who took Constantinople in A.D. 610, and put Phocas to death on the scaffold. From the criminal Phocas, Pope Boniface of Rome, successor to Gregory, secured the title of Universal Bishop—Publishers.

Papists and Protestants seem to agree in assigning the constitutional beginning of the Papacy to this epoch of the reign of Phocas. Luther, in his Table Talk, says, “the Pope and Turk both began almost at one time under the emperor Phocas.” Osiander dated from the same, “a Foca Imperatore, qui Papatum, seu Primatum, publico edicto stabilivit”—by the emperor Phocas, who established the Papacy, or Primacy, by a public decree. And Bullinger, an early protestant, speaks of the Papacy having been established by Gregory I, and the Decree of Phocas. In fact, an imperial decree was indispensable to its establishment. The Bishops of Rome had made pretensions of a high and lofty character before the times of Justinian and Phocas; but their claims to supremacy, however approved by clerical adherents and canons, were of no account in a legal or constitutional point of view. Their pretensions to supremacy over all, only demonstrated the pride of their hearts, and the spirit of Antichrist therein, which, as Gregory truly said, would make him who was possessed of it “strain his pretensions up to Godhead”. But an Italian or Roman subject of the empire, lay or clerical, might have strained to bursting after godhead, they could never have attained it without the sanction of an imperial edict which had the force of law. The reader will perceive this readily, aided by the illustrative supposition, that Pope Brigham Young of Utah, as respectable a pretender to to godhead as Boniface the third, or any other blasphemer before or after him should proclaim himself Universal Overseer and Father of this consolidated despotism, the United States; his proclamation would only be the subject of ridicule and contempt with all the names and denominations of the day; but, if the factions in Congress, with the idea that in some way their interests would be promoted, were to pass a bill constituting said Brigham, Father of all men and Universal Overseer, with the approval of the President, the case would be wonderfully altered! The power and authority of Brigham would be enthroned in every family; he would be ex officio Judge of the Faith, and Head of all the churches of “The Union.” This would be no matter of ridicule; but a subject of great fear and trembling to all not of his church; for all “the names and denominations” in relation to Mormonism being heretical, the bill or decree constituting him Pope and Universal Bishop, would place them all at his disposal. All this we can comprehend, feel, and appreciate; and would be thoroughly convinced that there was more in the name than “punctilio of style and a few syllables”. If such a decree were promulgated in this country, it would convulse society from one end of it to the other. We should feel that our liberty had taken to itself wings and fled. This was the unrest and the apprehension of the Italians and citizens of Rome, when the emperor Maurice tacitly permitted the Byzantine Brigham, John the Faster, to proclaim himself, with the aid and consent of a council of Constantinople, Universal Bishop. The murder of Maurice by Phocas was therefore regarded as a joyful and auspicious event; especially when it was discovered, that he could be used in putting down Byzantine arrogance, and in transferring the “Blasphemous Name,” as Gregory styled it, to the city of Rome. This gave repose to Italy, and restored liberty to the adherents of THE ANTICHRIST IN ROME.

And who else, even upon Romish principles and upon Papal authority, could the Bishops of Rome from Boniface downwards be than the Antichrist Name? Gregory the First, whom Papists surname “the Great,” the last Bishop of Rome they have decreed to be “a saint,” and with them a great authority, says, as already quoted, “I am bold to say, that whoever adopts, or affects the title of ‘Universal Bishop’ has the pride and character of Antichrist, and is in some manner his forerunner in his haughty quality of elevating himself above the rest of his order.” John the Faster adopted the title and held on to it, and Cynacus, his successor, also. They were therefore either the Antichrist, or his Forerunner; they could not have been the Antichrist however much like him; because Paul, who styles him ho Anomos, the Lawless One, teaches that he will be in supremacy till the reappearance of Christ to destroy him; and their supremacy fell under the dagger of Phocas: they must, therefore, have been his Forerunner; and he who obtained the coveted title, Boniface the Third, the first Bishop of Rome who wore it, and their successor in it, and all of whose successors adopt it and glory in it, must be, according to Gregory, an incarnation of papal infallibility, the first of the order and name termed in Scripture, “THE ANTICHRIST.” And doubtless Gregory was correct; and, like Caiaphas the High Priest, prophesied the truth without believing or knowing it. The Man-of-Sin Power, born of the Woman about two hundred and ninety five years previous, was now transferred by this Decree of Phocas from the successors of Constantine to the Universal Bishop upon the Seven Hills. This “Only Name in the World” was now the Eyes and Mouth of the Man of Sin. So long as Italy remained a province of the Greek empire it was politically allied with the Eastern Roman Horn of Dan. 8:9; but, as the power of this receded, that of the Universal Bishop advanced; until, Constantinople losing all dominion in Italy, the Bishop became the Eyes and Mouth of the Little Western Horn of Dan. 7:8; when, in its after-growth, it reached the fullness of the stature of the Man-of-Sin Power, as we shall hereafter see.

The Antichrist who in A.D. 312, was a babe of sin, was now, in A.D. 604–’8, a young man, and still in his growth. He was not yet of full age; nor would he be, until the Two Horned Beast should rise up out of the earth among the already existing ten horns. The development of this Lamb-Horned Beast and the Image of the Wounded Head, would consummate the healing of that head. We have not yet quite arrived at that point in the vision. I must therefore pause again in tracing the development of “the Name of Blasphemy upon the Heads,” and proceed to consider the period allotted to the Mouth, during which it is Divinely permitted to “speak great things and blasphemies; and to open in blasphemy concerning the Deity (pros ton Theon) to blaspheme his Name and his Tabernacle, and the dwellers in the heaven.”

18. The Forty and Two Months

“And authority was given unto him to practise forty and two months”—Verse 5.

The first question here is, What is the thing for which the personal pronoun “him” stands in the text? The answer is, It is the Beast; or that politico-ecclesiastical constitution symbolized by the monster of the sea: as, “Who is like unto THE BEAST? Who is able to war with HIM? And there was given unto HIM a mouth, &c.; and authority was given unto HIM to practise forty and two months.”

The next question is, By whom was the authority given to the Beast to practise for that period? The answer is, that it was given by Him who alone knew how long the practising was to continue. That is to say, the authority was given by the Deity, Who ordains all things, and Who foreshowed the period in the text before us. “The powers that be are ordained of the Deity” (Rom. 13:1): “He hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of the habitation of all nations of men” (Acts 17:26). No nation can permanently extend its bounds, or perpetuate any system of government, beyond the limitation of His predetermined, and prearranged, times. The forty and two months are the Divinely authorized period of the Beast’s practising; at the end of which, the European Commonwealth which it symbolizes for that period, will pass into the phase predetermined for it in Apoc. 17.

The third question is, What is to be understood by the indefinite expression “to practise”? Authority was given unto the Beast of the Sea to practise—poiesai. In the seventh verse the word polemon is prefixed to poiesai; as, “It was given unto him to make war polemon poiesai, with the saints.” Hence the fifth verse, I take it, is elliptical, and expounded by the seventh. But, was he to practise against the saints successfully or otherwise? The use of the word in Daniel when treating of the same subject, shows that "practise" implies prevailing and prospering in what it might undertake against them. Speaking of the Little Roman Horn that "waxed exceeding great" and "cast the truth to the ground," it is said, "it practised and prospered;" and of the same power, it is said in another verse, "he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper and practise, and shall destroy the mighty ones and the people of the Holy Ones. And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify in his heart, and by prosperity shall destroy many (Dan. 8:24, 25, and 12). Now this shows, that the practising of the power was mischievous and destructive; and that it prospered by policy, craft, and all belligerent operations; and, as the prophecy has more especial reference to "the people of the Holy Ones," who, in Daniel and John's revelations, are the most important community, for whose sake are all things (2 Cor. 4:15), the prosperous practising is especially equivalent to the treading of the Holy City under foot of the Gentiles forty and two months (ch. 11:2): to the making war, overcoming, and killing of the two witnessing prophetic bodies, by which, as by two lamps standing before the deified Name of Blasphemy, the light of the truth and liberty was caused to shine (ch. 11:7, 3, 10, 4); to the leading of the saints into captivity, and killing them with the sword (ch. 13:10); equivalent also, to the saints being given into the hand of the Little Episcopal Horn-power which prevails against them until the expiration of a time and times and a dividing of a time (Dan. 7:21, 25). The fulfilment of these testimonies converges in the practising of the Beast of the Sea, the Papal Body Politic, which the Deity, for the developing of his own wise purposes, authorized so to do, as indicated in the text. And as this practising of mischief of which the saints are the victims, is for forty and two months, it follows that the periods similarly indicated in ch. 11:2 and ch. 13:5, are the same period; and consequently begin and end at the same epochs; that is, the forty and two months are the period of the prosperous and destructive practising of the papalized ten horns, and of the down-treading of the Holy-City body politic by them: and as this practising continues in all this period, we may accept the Common Version, "power was given unto him to continue forty and two months," as correct by implication.

The fourth question is, What duration, or length of time, is signified by forty and two months? Is this period long or short? Is it forty-two months of days, or forty and two months of years? In other words, is it 1260 days or 1260 years? Is it a literal period, or is it symbolical of the real time? By what rule can the truth of the matter be ascertained? My answer is, that the truth is determined by the rule of facts, which are stubborn things. This rule, however, cannot be generally used. It is of no use to the blind who are unworthy to read the opened book, and to look upon it (ch. 5:3, 4, 5). It is a rule for the blessed who read, and understand the words of this apocalyptic prophecy (ch. 1:3). Such are not blind. They can see, or discern, the facts; for they are discernible by the light of the Spirit's testimony, which "is hid to them that are lost, in whom the god of this æon hath blinded the minds of them who believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the Image of the Deity, should shine into them" (2 Cor. 4:3, 4).
